“He never has forgotten the assistance he received from District people such as the Ukitake during his time in exile, and it has shaped his philosophies since, both as Clan heir and Vice Captain,” he reflected. “His young son will be indoctrinated into the same line of thought when he is old enough to understand, and I, of course, have no objection. However, that is not to say full support exists... even given that Shirogane-senpai has made those advances, the Clan recently had to discipline the Ninth for not adhering to the Kuchiki's policy of acceptable compensation and District protection. As I said, change moves slowly. These days, it is not those at the pinnacle of power who provide the opposition. It is those lower down in the Clans, who fear that their position will be challenged. People like Anabomi and the Eleventh Division Captain, whose Clan rank is significantly low, feel threatened by talented District youths gaining promotions in other squads."

"Like Juushirou's bunch, I suppose," Mitsuki sighed, resting her hand against Koku's for a moment. "I see why Juushirou had this boy brought here and not sent to Fourth. Even the Unohana probably have their prejudices, though I've not been here to observe them first-hand. Unohana-taichou is one thing, and Fukutaichou and Madeki-dono aren't bigoted, but lower down..."

She shrugged.

"I don't pretend I like it, though. Rukongai isn't an easy place to live, sometimes, but at least it's lacking in the stifling politics of Clan. Being back here... reminds me of them all over again."

"Such is life in Seireitei," Ryuu agreed. "Am I to understand, then, that you plan on remaining here with this boy for the foreseeable future, and not returning with me to Sixth?"

"Probably," Mitsuki admitted. "I'm certain that in Sixth, my safety would be guaranteed, but honestly, I think I'm needed more here, and if danger threatens, I'll find a way to overcome it. Perhaps I also fit in better among the District squad members, too. I'm a healer, not a fighter, but Rukongai has also made me much further from being a Clan himethan I was even before graduation. I was glad to see you, and Senpai, and Father's flying visit made me realise how much I'd missed him, but..."

"I told you a long time ago that whatever path you chose would not affect our friendship," Ryuu reminded her. 'Meantime, to return to the problem of your waif, Clan politics aside, it does appear as though someone is attacking shinigami with deliberate purpose. Your own life was put in danger, so you can't pretend to be oblivious to that potential modus operandi or its success rate thus far. Such a threat to security obviously occupies the minds of the Gotei before the life of a District stray. I am not saying they are more important,' as Mitsuki's lips parted in ready protest, "just that they are otherwise understandably occupied. I am also preoccupied by it, if truth be told, but on a more personal level. I have no idea why you might be a target, and it troubles me that I do not — and equally, I can also not explain the reason for the murder of Hirata's poor son."

His eyes shifted to the boy on the bed.

"I wonder too if people are holding back because so much is unknown," he mused. "I have heard a rumour, Mitsuki — a rumour I did not like. I am reluctant to spread it, particularly in Guren-sama's hearing, since it is supposedly restricted to Council level security... but it hardly seems to matter since everyone in Seireitei seems to be whispering about it. They are talking about Aizen Keitarou, and the very real possibility he is grooming a son of his to usurp power in the Gotei by way of the Endou power vacuum. Whilst solving Souja's murder is important, it cannot bring him back. I don't disagree with your wish to heal this youth, and I hope very much he is capable of providing useful information but... in reality... I think it unlikely to be the case. He was unarmed when Ukitake found him, correct? Yet a sword fighter with enough ruthless power to slaughter a talented Vice Captain was at large. Surely, if he had seen anything of any worth, he would have been cut down too. His injuries are the result of Kikyue's careless blade, not of Souja's assassin, and even without using spiritual techniques, you are more than equal to the task of treating him. That being the case..."

"I know, but it's all we have right now," Mitsuki admitted. "Hirata's my friend as well as yours, Ryuu. True, it's been a long time since I've seen much of him and, in the little I have seen since I came back, I can tell that he's changed. Nonetheless, Juushirou's told me how much he loved his son, and I can't imagine the pain of a father having to bury his only heir. For that reason... I want to help. If all I can do is treat the one potential witness we have, that's what I'll do. At least that way I'm being useful. I prefer that... I'm not cut out to be a sheltered hime, even if you and Shirogane-senpai are worried about me."

"Well, worrying about you wouldn't be a new sensation, so I dare say we will survive it," Ryuu eyed her keenly. "I see your mind is made up. When I return to Sixth, I shall convey as much to my Vice Captain and my Captain. You are free to make your own decisions in this, Mitsuki. The Kuchiki do not own you or govern your movements — those decisions belong to your Captain, not to mine."

"Edogawa-san! Ryuu-dono!" At that moment the door of the small bedchamber slid back with a bang, revealing a frantic Tsunemori, whose expression became first relief and then consternation as he registered the room's three occupants. "Oh, you... did you find him?"

How... where? I only left the room for a minute, he was sleeping, and one of the recruits got himself tied up in a Hainawa and I had to go rescue him and the next thing I knew..."

"I think he was sleeping less deeply than we thought, so he went for a little walk without our knowledge, but there's no harm done," Mitsuki's initial impulse to scold melted away at the genuine anxiety in Tsunemori's gaze. "It's all right, Tsukabishi-kun. He'll rest for a bit now, I think, and if you'll remain with him, Ryuu and I can go report to Ukitake-taichou."

"I won't leave here again till Kirio returns, I promise," Tsunemori said fervently. "She'd be cross with me if I let anything happen to him. She considers him her own responsibility, now, because Taichou put her in charge of him, and so I'm a little relieved you found him and not her. She... doesn't need to know about it, does she?"

"I had no idea Hikifune was such a forceful individual," Ryuu looked surprised, and Mitsuki chuckled.

"Well, I think since she helped rescue this waif, she feels a certain duty towards his recovery," she said simply. "Don't worry, I won't say anything to her. As I said, there's no harm done. On the contrary, the fact he can rouse up is reassuring. It means he's recovering, and that soon we might be able to talk to him properly about what happened to Souja-dono."

She got to her feet, smoothing down her hakama and holding out her hand to her cousin, who followed suit, nodding his head towards Tsunemori who bowed fervently in response before guiding his companion out of the small chamber and down the hall that led out to Ugendou. Once alone, however, he frowned, and Mitsuki cast him a sidelong glance.

"Ryuu?"

"The boy said your name, didn't he?" Ryuu's words were soft, but at the sound of them, Mitsuki bit her lip.

"I thought so too," she admitted, "but I assumed I must have misheard. There's no way he could have known something like that... we've never met before."

"I would rethink that judgement, as I am quite certain he spoke your name and nothing else," Ryuu said categorically. "You must have a prior acquaintance from somewhere... perhaps a village you stopped to tend at one time?"

"How could I have done?" Mitsuki shrugged helplessly. "I've been in Rukongai, Ryuu. I've not been in Seireitei for twenty five years, and since I've been back, I've been here and nowhere else. That boy... whatever else is clear, he's not old enough to have even been born when I was last in Seireitei long term, and then I was just a student. I didn't go skipping around villages randomly dishing out healing treatment. There's no way. We must have misheard."

"Both of us?" Ryuu arched a sceptical eyebrow. "I think that to be unlikely."

"Well, then he heard my name from Hikifune-san or someone else, during the time I was treating him," Mitsuki ran an absent hand through her thick dark hair. "That's not impossible, now I think of it. I couldn't use any Kidou sedation techniques, and it's possible he was more conscious than we realised when I was dealing with his wound. The pain may have disturbed him, but not enough to bring him to full awareness. He might have heard someone say my name during that time — in which case..."

"In which case, I wonder why it was when he saw your face he reacted so, and not when he heard your voice," Ryuu said categorically. "I shall reiterate, Mitsuki. You should reassess all your possible past acquaintances with the Districts, as it appears that boy knows you by name and face."

"I don't see how he can," Mitsuki frowned. "My explanation is far more likely... he wasn't fully in his wits when we found him just now. You must've seen the glazed, half-dazed look in his eyes? He wasn't really aware of what was happening, and our being there triggered his panic impulses."

"I am not convinced," Ryuu admitted, "but I confess, I cannot find an adequate explanation within logic to account for his words."

"You two look concerned about something," as they reached Ugendou, Juushirou pushed the sliding door back, greeting them with a quizzical glance. "I assume this has something to do with the vague flurry of spirit power I felt a short time ago from the vicinity of our stray?"

"Mm... he roused up," Mitsuki nodded her head. "He was disorientated and decided to take a walk, but we got him safely back to bed. It's fine, Juushirou. Nothing to worry about. He hasn't upset his injury any more, and on the contrary, that he's able to regain consciousness even to that point means he'll soon be well enough for you to talk to him about Souja-dono."

"Then why those expressions?" Juushirou ushered them inside, indicating for them to make themselves comfortable on the various cushions while he resumed his own seat behind his desk. As Mitsuki settled herself, she could make out the official looking document on the top of the pile as being a recruitment slip, and she cast him a startled glance.

“Thirteenth are taking on new members?”

“One,” Juushirou agreed, letting out a sigh as he gazed ruefully down at the sheet of paper. “It’s a little complicated, but circumstances have indicated she’s better coming to us now than waiting. I expect her to arrive in the next day or two, depending on transport — and so I was finishing up the requisite documentation first. Enishi’s not a real fan of forms, so I said I’d handle it.”

“Another District child?” Ryuu asked, and Juushirou nodded.

“Yes, and a girl,” he agreed. “I’ve been told many interesting things about her ability, but I’ve yet to meet her face to face, so more I can’t tell you. Besides, that can wait for the time being. I’m more curious to know about our stray — and why, if all is well, the two of you came here with such long faces?”

“The boy knew Mitsuki’s name, Ukitake,” Ryuu cast his cousin a glance, speaking before she could prevent him, and Mitsuki sighed, clicking her tongue against her teeth in frustration.

“Ryuu, you’re jumping to conclusions that might not even mean anything!”

“He knew your name?” Juushirou’s brows knitted together in clear consternation. “Mitsuki, what does he mean? The boy can’t be more than twenty at most — how could he possibly know that?”

“I asked the same question,” Ryuu reflected. “It concerns me, given the fact that Mitsuki herself has been the target of assassination attempts recently.”

“You think that boy was sent here to kill me?” Mitsuki’s eyes grew huge with dismay, and Juushirou frowned, holding up his hands.

“One thing at a time. We’ve no evidence to suggest he even came here armed, let alone with the intention of killing,” he said frankly. “When Kirio and I found him, he had no weapon at all, nor had he made any attempt to take Souja’s. He was helpless against Kikyue’s attack, and there’s nothing that indicates he did anything but try and help our wounded comrade to return home. I’m concerned about Mitsuki’s safety too, especially if there was someone following her around the Thirteenth the other day, but...”

“Mitsuki is my cousin, so of course I am concerned,” Ryuu said simply. “Her life is not dispensible to me, and I am sure it is not to you, either. I am well aware, Ukitake, how you viewed the news from the Spiritless Zone, so in those circumstances...”

“Please stop talking about my safety as if I wasn’t in the room?” Mitsuki interrupted, irritation in her beautiful grey eyes. “If that’s how you were thinking, Ryuu, you could’ve told me right away. Koku wasn’t the person following me in the garden the other night. His reiatsu is different. And, Juushirou and his people captured a shadow-spy already, and he’s cooling his heels in Second Division. While I haven’t met this shadow, and don’t know whether he poses me any threat, I don’t see how this connects to Koku in the slightest.”

“How do you believe he knew your name, then, Mitsuki?” Juushirou asked gently, and Mitsuki pursed her lips.

“My only explanation is that he was coming out of his stupor and heard someone call me by it. Hikifune-san, or you, or anyone else who was in that room when I was treating him,” she said at length. “Ryuu thinks it unlikely, but it’s not impossible for him to absorb and retain the information. It’s also possible that his seeing me and calling me Mitsuki was a fluke lucky guess. Mitsuki is a woman’s name, and I’m a woman. It could just as easily have been Hikifune-san or Naoko, and he might have called either one of them by my name instead. It just happened to actually be me... that’s all.”

“There are too many coincidences in that story for my liking,” Ryuu said grimly. “Ukitake, Mitsuki is determined to remain here as long as that boy needs care. I know you probably don’t need asking, but I wish to make a particular request on behalf of Sixth and the Kuchiki that her safety is given paramount importance.”

“Mitsuki’s safety is always of paramount importance to me, Ryuu, wherever she is and whatever she’s doing,” Juushirou glanced across at the healer, whose cheeks pinkened slightly at the emotion in his hazel gaze. “You have my word she won’t be put in harm’s way. Souja was very clear, though — I heard him myself. He said Koku helped him, and was adamant that we protect him from harm. I took on that promise for him and for the Endou, from one shinigami to another. Now he’s dead, I feel an additional obligation to see it through. Koku isn’t here as a prisoner. We’ll keep a close eye on him, but unless there’s any indication of hostile behaviour... I’m not going to try and alienate him. We need his trust, not his fear.”

“When he saw us, he tried to run, not attack,” Mitsuki added. “In the state he was in, he would’ve followed his immediate instinct. He wanted to flee, not fight — which suggests that he's more afraid of us than he wants to cause us harm."

Ryuu sighed.

"Well, so long as you are aware of the concern and of Mitsuki's safety, then I suppose I will be content with that," he said at length. "In the meantime, while I am here, I wished to ask you — what you know about these rumours relating to Aizen Keitarou? Are they true? I imagine if they are you'd know something of them."

"Mm," Juushirou's expression clouded, "but I'm not sure what I ought to say. I was summoned to a formal Council meeting about it, Ryuu — and while I don't like pulling rank between friendships, we're talking about a man who may have been involved in the murder of a Vice Captain and Clan heir. All I'm going to say is that the name has come up... and that it will be investigated thoroughly."

"If it that way, then I shall wait until Guren-sama's official missive," Ryuu looked resigned. "I thought perhaps you might consider it that way, so I am not offended. I asked only because Hirata is my friend and Souja was his son — but I do not wish to create waves by demanding information ahead of my rank."

He got to his feet.

"I shall return to Sixth and report what I can about Mitsuki to Senpai," he added. "I also hope that your new recruit knows what she's coming into, Ukitake. It hardly seems the most ideal time or place for adding members."

"Normally, I wouldn't choose to accept one, but this is a special case and she has no other place to go," Juushirou replied with a sigh. "Don't worry, though. I won't be too busy to remember my other duties — and Mitsuki will be fine here if that's where she chooses to be, at least until she can return to Fourth."

"Then I shall take my leave," Ryuu inclined his head towards his old friend, then his cousin, before withdrawing from Ugendou, and Mitsuki sighed, shaking her head slowly.

"He worries too much about me because of what happened in Rukongai," she murmured. "I understand it, but honestly, being able to treat that boy is... well, it's returning to me some of my old spirit and sense of self. That's what I'm here to do, and he needs me. Nobody else is bothering about him, and I can't do much else... so I want to keep taking care of him until he's well."

"I have no authority to override that decision, since I'm not a healer,” Juushirou assured her. “If you’re happy to continue, I don’t intend on intervening. Tell me, though, your official opinion — the boy is on the mend?”

“Very much so,” Mitsuki agreed. “He’s thin, undernourished and he was dusty and grimy when he first came here, but he’s clean and he’s been allowed to rest, which will help. His injury is to his gut, though I’ve mended it as best I can. I want to be careful with what food we give him to begin with, but I see no problem with him taking soup or porridge for the first few days. Kikyue-dono’s sword made a mess of him, but it didn’t actually perforate any major organs, just grazed them and caused them to become battered and bruised about, so I think he should be able to ingest plain foods. Still, running away from Ryu and I prompted him to be sick, so his insides are still quite irritated from everything that’s happened. Rest, gentle food and plenty of fluids... as well as patience. I know you want to talk to him, and I think soon that will be possible — but I really think he’s scared of us.”

She sighed, folding her hands in her lap.

“Ryu thinks he means to hurt me, but I didn’t read it that way at all,” she continued. “He did say what sounded like my name, and he looked right at me when he did it — but it wasn’t guilt or hostility in his eyes. It was fear. Seeing me frightened him, as though I was some apparition that he didn’t expect to materialise before him. I don’t know how he knew I was Mitsuki, or even if he was speaking consciously, but I can’t read any malicious intent from his aura.”

“You think he’s just scared?”

“Yes. Disjointed. Scared. Ill and far from people and places he knows,” Mitsuki agreed. “It will take time to win him over, I think. Time and patience.”

“I’ll try my best,” Juushirou promised. “Us having him prevents any furious interrogations by the Endou, which, given Hirata’s current state of mind, would be a very real possibility. Koku is safest with us out of everywhere else in Seireitei at present... so we’ll do our best to make him realise that we don’t mean him harm. And, maybe, when he is more coherent, he can explain for himself the mystery of your name. In the meantime, I can’t forget Souja’s admonitions to protect the boy. Souja wasn’t a fool... if he said Koku was on his side, I believe it.”

He cast her a sidelong glance.

“You said his reiatsu was different from the person who was tracking you in Thirteenth — would you recognise that presence again if you encountered it?”

“Yes,” Mitsuki looked troubled, “but if the suspect is in Shihouin custody, that’s not a place I really want to go. Shihouin-kun is one thing, but the rest... Second Division has a feel to it and I don’t really like it. For now, I’d rather focus on Koku. I’m not as important as getting to the bottom of Souja-dono’s death, and since we know Koku wasn’t stalking me, then the matter should be dropped.”

“You seem very unbothered about this,” Juushirou’s eyes became suspicious, and Mitsuki met his gaze with an impassive one of her own.

“I am a healer. I heal,” she said frankly. “I leave the intrigue and the politics up to the rest of you — it’s not my place.”

“Mitsuki-chan?” Juushirou was taken aback, and Mitsuki sighed.

“For a while I’d like to focus on the living rather than the dead,” she said softly. “It’s the only way I can come to terms with Rukongai — by doing what I can to be useful for those who need me. He needs me, so I’ll do what I can. Please understand, Juushirou-kun, that the Spiritless Zone was never a guaranteed safe place. I knew that the whole time I was there, and I learned to live with that uncertainty by helping who I could help and being what use I could to the people as and when they needed me. This... is the same kind of thing. Seireitei is stifling in some regards, but you of all people ought to understand the desire just to get on with what’s right in front of you.”

“I suppose I do,” Juushirou’s fingers brushed the recruitment slip for a moment, and then he sighed, rubbing his temples. “I’m sorry, I didn’t mean to be insensitive. You do what you need to do to come to terms with what happened — I won’t stand in your way. I probably can’t understand as much as you’d like me to, what it was you faced over there.”

“You don’t need to go that far,” Despite herself Mitsuki smiled, reaching out to put a reassuring hand on the sleeve of his white haori. “So long as you realise this is part of my healing process, that’s enough. I’m grateful for you indulging me as much as you have done, and for just being there, even if it’s been from a distance.”

“I’m bothered that it’s all I can do,” Juushirou admitted. “Things have changed, but my feelings haven’t... balancing that with my duty is sometimes more tricky than I’d like.”

“Thirteenth needs to come first, though,” Mitsuki chided him gently. “I can’t pretend it hasn’t taken a while to get used to, and maybe I still am, but I don't want to come between you and your vocation. It's more than obvious that everyone here looks up to you and adores you — and whilst I envy that bond a little, I don't want to break it."

"Envy it?" Juushirou stared, and Mitsuki grinned faintly, reaching across to pat him on the arm.

"Perhaps a selfish part of me wants to consider you mine, even though I know as well as you do how we agreed against that," she confessed, her cheeks pinkening slightly. "Especially given recent circumstances, it's inappropriate to even discuss it — but I do appreciate what you're doing to support me. And... I don't want you to worry about my safety. I don't think I'm in any immediate danger, I really don't."

"The Council also think that we should stop investigating the person who helped you, now we've a man in Shihouin custody and Keitarou as a lead," Juushirou grimaced. "Maybe they're right. Maybe it's just because it's you that I can't let it go."

"Maybe it is," Mitsuki said lightly, relief flickering in her heart at these words. "They're right, though. Keitarou is far more important, and so is justice for Souja-dono and for my colleagues. In the meantime, I'm fine. In fact, it comforts me to know I'm not alone here."

"Unlike the young boy Koku?"

"Mm," Mitsuki agreed. "Hikifune-san is very keen on helping him, though. She sees it as a way to help her own friend, that Kotetsu boy, overcome his feelings of guilt over Souja-dono's death. Also, though, I think... there's more to it than that. I don't know her very well, Juushirou — but I wondered if, perhaps, she had been in a similar situation in the past?"

"I believe her family abandoned her out of fear for her spirit power when it first developed," Juushirou replied. "Thirteenth has become her family in many regards, though it's probably true that the Kotetsu boys are as much kin to her as any other. I see what you're saying, though, and I've noted it. Handing the boy to Kirio's care happened by coincidence, because she was with me at the time, but I think I'll maintain it once he's fully awake. Probably she will understand the feelings of an uprooted stray better than I can."

"I think that would be a good plan, especially if you've a new recruit to deal with," Mitsuki agreed. "One other thing, though, about the boy. You said yourself that you sensed a reiatsu flurry — what did you mean, exactly?"

"What I said, I think," Juushirou rubbed his chin thoughtfully. "It wasn't an aggressive flare, just... I was aware of someone's spirit power going in and out of focus suddenly."

He frowned.

"That was Koku's reiatsu, wasn't it? That's why you can be so sure about it being different from your stalker?"

"Mm," Mitsuki inclined her head, hoping Juushirou could not see the expression of guilt in her eyes. "Koku doesn't have very good reiatsu control. Reiryoku control either, I imagine, and I get the feeling he has quite a bit of that. Not that he's tried to use it at all coherently, and I'm not certain if I think he even could. However, it's something to bear in mind. I don't think he has any ill intent towards anyone here, but people sometimes react when they're cornered and frightened — I would advise only high ranking officers go near his room until we've established some kind of rapport with him."

"Then I'll make sure nobody below Tsunemori's rank goes near the chamber," Juushirou decided. "A... A District boy with unfettered reiryoku is a potential problem, as I know from vivid personal experience."

He patted Sougyo no Kotowari's sheath lightly, and for the first time Mitsuki felt certain there was a deeper level of concern in Juushirou's aura than she had perceived there at first..

"I imagine you're equal to whatever he can throw out, though, Mitsuki — so I'm reassured that I can leave him in your care."

Thirteenth Division had never felt more alien to him than it did now.

Tenichi stood in the front courtyard of the newest Gotei division's barracks, gazing with troubled eyes at his former home. Carved in the wood above the distinctive five slashes that made up the Japanese number 'Thirteen' was the image of a snowdrop depicted simply yet clearly as a message to all who stepped over the threshold and into the first and only District-based division. Tenichi did not know how the snowdrop had come to be associated with Juushirou's Thirteenth, only that it symbolised the hope which, to both new District recruits fresh out of the Academy and the scattered populations across the wider regions of Outer Seireitei was a promise from the Gotei that their words and needs would not be forgotten. During his own student days, Tenichi remembered with a bitter pang the sense of anticipation and excitement that had filled his young heart upon completing his application for recruitment, safe in the knowledge that he — as well as Kirio and others of their class — would not be debarred entry based on their place or circumstances of birth. It had been a time when he had resolved to put behind him the dubious heritage of his father and the common bloodline of his mother and focus simply on his own future as a shinigami of the Gotei Thirteen. He could hear himself now, telling Kirio how he would forge a new reputation for the Kotetsu name for both honour and bravery in uniform on the day they had first entered these grounds as new recruits, and it felt like an age had passed since then.

Fukutaichou is dead and I have a secret. Urahara blood is thicker than I ever thought it was, and it's not going to let me go.

He swallowed hard, clenching and unclenching his fists as he contemplated what he had decided he must do. It had not been an easy decision, nor one he took any pride in, but the more he had thought it over, the less options he realised he had. There would be no bribing Thirteenth's unexpected visitor, and even if that had been an option, Tenichi had only his basic salary to offer, a reasonable amount for a single shinigami but by no means in the realm of Clan wealth. With the power that the Council had on hand, he knew that intimidation was also not a viable tactic — in most quarters, simply the mention of the Shihouin's Onmitsukidou were enough to encourage a stubborn witness to share their heart, and Tenichi's acquaintance with Koku had been too brief and insubstantial to claim friendly obligation. No, there had been only one choice, and prevaricating over it would do nothing to change that fact.

Koku would have to be silenced, before he had a chance to talk.

Tenichi had never killed anyone before, and the thought of doing so now made him feel sick to his stomach with disgust and self-hatred. Every part of what he was planning was low and cowardly, he told himself grimly, and yet it did not change the necessity of the act. Even spilling blood by crossing swords was unpalatable, but there was nothing more base than the thoughts he currently entertained of sneaking into Koku's sickroom and stifling the life out of the young man before he could wake and reveal their connection.

Crossing over from Rukongai is a capital offence, anyway. His life is already forfeit — really, I'll only be doing what the court would do if they knew. Only if they knew, I'd be in trouble, so I can't let them find out.

Tenichi pressed his lips together, trying to convince himself of this fact.

If I'm careful, they'll think he died of his injuries. Shock, infection, something like that. If I'm careful, they'll never know anything else happened. Why am I still hesitating? This is to protect me, protect Ketsui, protect everything we've ever worked for. Surely I care more for my brother and my own reputation than I do whether one Rukongai vagrant lives or dies?

The sound of voices made him start, darting into a wooden alcove and hoping against hope that he had not been seen. His heart thundered in his chest, its rattle loud enough that he was convinced the two young division recruits could hear him a mile away, but, engrossed in their conversation about their sword training, neither one of them paid him the slightest bit of attention, and he let his breath out slowly, relieved that they had not been officers of higher rank. Although he had suppressed his reiatsu down as much as possible, he knew that such a skill was not infallible, and that there were individuals within the Thirteenth with enough ability in reiatsu detection to unmask him before he reached his destination.

Tenichi's lips thinned, and he pushed this thought aside. He knew that Juushirou was not on site, for he had watched the Thirteenth Division's Captain leave a short time before making his own entrance, a rolled up document in his hand and a preoccupied look on his face. Whatever had called him away, it was the best chance Tenichi had to slip in and out undetected, and he only hoped that the division's sharp-witted, sharp-tongued Third seat was also otherwise engaged. I can't wait any longer, though. Taichou spoke as though Koku's on the verge of waking. If that's the case... then I don't have much time left to act. I'll have to take my chances with Naoko-san and hope she's not on the prowl today.

He checked that the coast was clear, doublechecked and then slipped around the back of the division, tiptoeing across the cobbles until he reached the storehouse which held the division's supplies. Once a month this was replenished according to the orders placed by Enishi or Naoko, and in years past Tenichi had been given duties here, fetching and carrying and ensuring everything was in order in between recruit drills and mission dispatches. He had not enjoyed the mundane nature of the task then, but now he felt grateful for it, inching along the wall of the storehouse until he reached the middle door. This one, he knew, was loose at the hinge, for it rattled when the winds were high and yet with Thirteenth's limited personnel, nobody had found the time to spare to fix it. A half-inch's gap was all he needed to slide his fingers between the slats of wood and jiggle loose the metal fastening, opening the door as quietly as possible and slipping into the darkness beyond. Once inside, it was an easy task for him to navigate the heaps of rice sacks, salted fish and ink stones to reach the door that connected this outflung place to the heart of the division barracks and he eased the divide back cautiously, checking both ways to ensure he was alone before crossing the threshold.

His heart was still pounding fit to burst as he crept along the hallway towards the small back chamber where he had seen Koku asleep those fateful days before. As he approached, he filtered out the different reiatsu presences that had been nearby recently, his brow creasing as he struggled to identify each. One was Kirio, he was certain of that, but there was another one too which he realised with a jolt belonged to the healer that had been brought back from the Spiritless Zone. Tenichi had not met her himself, but knew she was some kind of acquaintance of his former Captain and Vice Captain, and therefore had been given free reign of Thirteenth despite not having an official division rank. As he drew closer to the chamber, however, he realised that she was not there, and, though his friend's reiatsu was the most recent, Kirio too was absent. The room was empty except for his prey, and he extended a cautious hand, before pausing, grimacing ruefully at his foolishness.

Rummaging in his obi, he pulled out a strip of cloth which he wrapped around his hand as a makeshift glove, using the cloth surface as a protective barrier between his fingers and the door. At first contact he realised it was locked, but Tenichi had come prepared for that, and after a bit of manipulation he heard the lock click loose. Inwardly thanking his lucky stars once again that his former Division did not boast the expensive high security measures of the Clan divisions, he pushed the door back, stepping into the sunlit chamber.

As he had expected, the room was empty save for the motionless, pale figure wrapped in blankets on the bed by the far wall, and Tenichi approached the young patient cautiously, convinced each step he made would give him away to his potential target. Koku's eyes were closed, and if it had not been for the slow rise and fall of his chest, Tenichi would have thought the skinny youngster had already left this world for the next but, as he drew closer, he realised that the pallor was simply a sign that the grimy youth he had met previously had been thoroughly washed before being treated, his unruly hair brushed and tied back neatly for the first time.

He seemed somehow fragile, and Tenichi's heart lurched slightly as he realised how vulnerable his companion was.

In Rukongai, he seemed self-possessed and unruffled. Older, too. Here he looks like a thin, pale boy, barely out of his teens. I wonder which is the real Koku.

His eyes narrowed, and he shook his head.

It doesn't matter. None of it matters. I didn't come here to think of him as a person. He's from Rukongai, not Seireitei. He shouldn't be here. He's a threat and that's all. I have to deal with it — to protect myself, to protect Ketsui, to keep everything as it should be. This person is a stranger to me and I don't know him. I can't hesitate now. There isn't a lot of time.

Glancing around him for something suitable to use as a weapon, Tenichi's gaze rested on a crumpled blanket and two spare pillows that had been tossed aside in the corner of the room, clearly discarded when Koku's bedding had last been changed. Perhaps Kirio was engaged on that errand, he thought absently, bending to pick up the nearest pillow in his cloth-wrapped fist and examining it critically. It was thin and moth-eaten, but substantial enough, he realised, to stifle breathing without leaving too much of a permanent mark, and he rallied his courage, gripping it more firmly and turning back towards the bed.

"I'm sorry, Koku," he murmured, the words barely more than the faintest of whispers dropping from his lips as he prepared to lower the pillow over the sleeping boy's face.

I'm really sorry. I have no choice though. I don't want to, but I have no choice. For the sake of everything I hold dear... I can't let anything link me back to what happened in Rukongai. No matter why you came here or what passed between you and Fukutaichou, I can't let you ever speak about it. For the sake of everything... I have to have you die.

Author's Note:

The other presences in Koku's room were Juushirou, Enishi, Naoko, Kirio, Mitsuki, Ketsui and Tsunemori ;) all of whom have spent some brief time within the chamber, or hovering in the doorway. Just in case anyone cares!

Oh yes, and there's Ryuu-kun. See, he still exists ;)

33. The Burden of Guilt

Chapter Thirty Two: The Burden of Guilt

“I was waiting for you to come,”

The sound of Koku’s voice made Tenichi’s body freeze, his arms going rigid. Shock flooded his body, followed by revulsion as he realised what he had been about to do. His fingers gripped tightly onto the pillow, his knuckles whitening from the pressure, and for a moment he stood there, unsure whether to flee or to try and talk his way out of the situation. At his clear uncertainty, there was a faint chuckle from the bed, and then a pale hand reached up, calmly pushing Tenichi’s arm aside so that for the first time the two men met gazes.

Koku’s dark eyes were no more than shadows in an ashen face, yet there was no lingering confusion in their depths and more, as Tenichi’s wits slowly began to return, he realised with dismay that of the two of them it was he and not the young stray who looked the more discomposed.

“Put the pillow down,” Koku spoke softly, his tones soft and tentative, yet there was no anger nor indignation lacing them, and, wordlessly, Tenichi did as he was bidden, sinking back against the wall as both the pillow and the protective slither of fabric slipped from his fingers onto the tatami mat floor.

“You... I... you were supposed to be...” The words stuck in his throat, and Koku’s lips twitched into a faint smile.

“Asleep?” he asked archly, and Tenichi reddened, lowering his eyes as a flood of genuine shame flooded through his body. There was a moment of silence, then Koku stretched out his arm a second time, brushing his fingers against the dark fabric of Tenichi’s shihakushou.

“Sit,” he murmured, and Tenichi eyed his companion hesitantly, making no move to obey. Koku met the gaze, a faint flicker of weariness mingled with resignation crossing his face, then he nodded.

“You’ll be glad, later, that I stopped you,” he said matter-of-factly. “You don’t want to hurt me, and you’d have regretted it if you did. There’s no killer instinct in your aura, Tenichi-dono — just a lot of confusion. If you sit, we can talk it out — but if you don’t want to, that’s fine too. I’m tired... and it does me no good either if people realise we've met before."

"No good...?" Tenichi echoed the words numbly, and Koku snorted, derision in his dark eyes.

"Do you think I'm a fool just because I came from Rukongai?" he asked quietly, and now Tenichi could hear the mocking edge in the younger man's tones. "I know as well as you that I'm not allowed to be here. More, we both know someone very dangerous... to both of our lives, don't we? Why would you think I'd tell them anything about it? Silencing me does nothing to help you and it certainly doesn't help me."

"You... aren't going to talk to the people in Thirteenth?" Tenichi latched onto this, as though waking suddenly from a daze, and Koku shook his head in disbelief.

"Why would I?" he demanded. "The penalty for crossing into Seireitei from Rukongai is death for people like me. Right now they're calling me a District boy — and I have absolutely no reason to correct their misassumption."

"That's... true." Tenichi acknowledged, sinking down on the edge of the low-slung pallet bed as the strength drained from his body. "I suppose... I should have thought..."

He paused, burying his head in his hands as if trying to gather his composure, then, at length, he raised his gaze.

"I'm sorry," he said honestly. "You're right... I'm not the type to sneak in and kill anyone. I just... with things... and people said... you'd come to Seireitei with..."

"Souja-dono," Koku agreed pensively, and Tenichi flinched, biting his lip.

"Why?" he whispered, and Koku's brows knitted together at the question.

"I'm surprised you asked me that," he admitted. "Wasn't he your Vice Captain? Surely you wanted him to come back alive?"

"Of course I did," Tenichi snapped. "Of course, I never wanted... I never meant... but you're... Kei... he is associated with you, and we both know that. And, given that..."

"Idiot," Koku's voice was growing stronger with each moment, and he cut across his companion with a grimace. "Do you think *he's*so foolish as to order that kind of assassination? Don't be crazy. He had nothing to do with it. Nothing at all."

“Nothing?” Tenichi’s eyes widened. “Then... did he send you to... help...?”

“He didn’t send me to do anything,” Koku said impatiently. “He didn’t know anything about it. Maybe he still doesn’t — I don’t know, and I can’t read minds. Even if I could, there’s a great big wall of that demon rock between us, so I couldn’t tell you what he’s thinking at the moment. Most likely he’s just cross with me — probably very cross, in fact — for getting myself involved in a shinigami’s problem.”

“Then...” Tenichi’s mind was whirling. “If he doesn’t... if he didn’t... why did you...?”

“Another strange question, considering you knew the murdered man personally,” Koku’s voice held a faint note of censure that once again made Tenichi feel ashamed. “If you see a person crumpled and bleeding on the ground, and they call to you for help, do you ignore them and walk on by? Is that what shinigami are trained to do? Don’t be stupid. I helped him because it was what I ought to do. Just because I come from... there... and because I’m known to people this place consider no better than hell demons doesn’t mean I don’t have a sense of right and wrong.”

“I’m sorry,” Tenichi bit his lip. “I didn’t mean to suggest... I just... I don’t know what to think about anything at the moment, and when Taichou reminded me that you were here, I immediately assumed... but it was wrong of me to do that, wasn’t it? If it wasn’t his order, and you didn’t come here because of that or because of me... then...”

“I have absolutely no interest in anything you’re doing, and I never did before,” Koku said bluntly. “The one who’s interested in you is him. It doesn’t really concern me either way — providing you pull yourself together and keep your mouth shut, you can guarantee that I’ve no reason to talk to people I don’t know about someone else who’s little more than a stranger. I don’t like death — it’s not attractive and I certainly don’t believe in getting people killed for the sake of it. But... that said...”

His gaze strayed to the fallen pillow,

“I don’t intend on lying back here and getting killed, either.”

“I’m sorry,” Tenichi repeated. “I panicked, but I won’t... you have my word, I won’t do it again. It’s not like me... I don’t know what I was even thinking. Kurotsuchi came to me the morning we discovered Fukutaichou had disappeared and... all of the things he said, I think they distorted my thoughts and made me paranoid. I was sure that, if Souja-dono came back here and talked about Rukongai, and if it was because of that man that he died, that I... and then the people I cared about too..."

"Well, I suppose I can't begrudge you that last sentiment," Koku pressed his lips together, shifting his body slightly and wincing at the discomfort. "I'm not really in a state to fight for my life, either, so I'm grateful for your forbearance. I promise that I won't tell them anything about you. I have no intention of telling shinigami anything. I came back here because Souja-dono wanted to go home to his family, and I felt he should... but that's all. I wanted to save him, but I failed. I have no obligation beyond that, and, if I could stand for more than a few seconds without passing out, I'd have left here already, believe me."

"Left... and gone home?" Tenichi asked, and Koku's expression became clouded.

"Who knows?" he replied eventually. "That's not your problem — it's for me to resolve. I know there are few pathways back there, and I don't know how Senkaimon work... but I'd figure something out. For now, though, since they seem so frantic about healing me... I'll let them do that and bide my time. Since this injury was because one of your shinigami friends strikes first and asks questions later, I might as well. I've been monitoring the situation for the past few hours and I can't sense anyone with the wish to hurt me, so I'll let them patch me up at the very least. You should use the opportunity to pull back from it completely. This has nothing to do with you, nor with his instructions, and especially not with what you promised him. All right?"

Tenichi paused for a moment, digesting this, then,

"If you know Souja-dono died, you must have already talked to someone," he realised, and Koku shook his head.

"I've only just started to regain my senses," he responded. "This morning, I tried my physical strength and pushed it beyond its limits. Since then I've had nothing to do but slowly put back together bits of my memory, listen to the conversations of those sent to watch me and, of course, wait for you to come here. I knew you would — it was only a matter of time."

"You really were expecting me?" Tenichi was taken aback, and Koku offered him a strange, humourless smile.

"I might be from the Rukon, but I'm not bad at sensing people's spirits," he said blithely. "I know Souja-dono died because I can't sense his presence any more, and if he was alive, I'd be able to find him. As for you, your reiatsu has been bubbling to a point of explosion. It was only a matter of time before it spilled over. When I first opened my eyes, I knew you'd been here. I knew you knew I was here — so of course you'd come at some point."

"Mm," Tenichi glanced ruefully at the pillow, bending to pick it up and tossing it across the room to rejoin its fellow and the crumpled blanket beside the door. "The less said about it the better."

"Well, cornered animals are often the most dangerous," Koku reflected pensively. "If Kurotsuchi got to you, I'm not surprised your head was in a twist. You shouldn't listen to him. He doesn't have any shred of humanity left in him, and he'll twist things to suit his own purpose. He probably said whatever he did to you to scare you and make sure you kept quiet about a certain acquaintance we all share... that's all."

"Perhaps," Tenichi gazed at his hands, then, "Souja-dono came back here... and he said something about Kei... about him to the Taichou. I don't know exactly what — but I know that Seireitei are in a flurry about it and that something will happen. I'm going to ask you, therefore — what really did happen in Rukongai? If you found him... you must know something. There's all kinds of whispers about Eirakihime and a girl who looks like her and... it made me think... of the girl... the one who tried to slit my throat."

"As you say," Koku sighed, weariness once more marring his young features. "That stupid kill-crazy saw a shihakushou and didn't stop to think about the consequences. Never mind that all hell would be let loose if she killed a Vice Captain — not to mention someone who was the son and heir of a Clan..."

He sighed, shaking his head as if to clear it.

"If I were more ruthless, I'd have killed her myself," he said regretfully. "But I can't, and it's not time."

"Then it was... that girl who did it?"

"Mm." Koku agreed. "But she did it on her own. I only picked up the pieces, Tenichi-dono — I didn't do anything to harm your superior. More, when they ask me about it, I won't even tell them that much. Even though she's a nuisance, I won't betray her."

"Then why tell me?"

"Because you, like me, are tied," Koku said simply. "We're both bound by secrecy for our own sakes and the sakes of people we care for, aren't we?"

"I suppose we are," Tenichi rubbed his chin ruefully. "All right. I guess I hadn't thought you were all that bothered about protecting... you know who... but maybe there's more to it than I understand. Maybe..."

"Without his involvement, everyone in that village would long since have died," Koku said categorically. "Whatever you think of him in other respects, their lives are in his hands. If the Gotei took him prisoner, those people would die. I told you — I don't like death. I don't necessarily agree with everything he does — but because of him, people are able to live their lives. Therefore I don't interfere with him — and I certainly am not going to betray him, or anyone connected with him, just to please some black-clad death gods."

"I guess that makes sense," Tenichi felt a flood of relief wash over his heart. "I misjudged you, and I overreacted, but I'll remember what you've said. It's strange but more than anyone else, talking to you has helped me put it into perspective. A loose cannon killed Fukutaichou. I'm not involved with that at all. I was taken against my will and I did what I had to to get back here. I want to help the people in Rukongai but..."

He paused, his eyes widening.

"Rukongai," he murmured, and Koku cast him a quizzical look.

"Tenichi-dono?"

"There's talk that the Captains are planning a mission to Rukongai," Tenichi whispered, twisting his hands together in sudden agitation as he remembered. "The Council had a meeting, and bits and pieces have filtered through about it. I don't know specifics, but I know... they want to find out where Souja-dono went. He told Taichou that he'd been to Rukongai, and that he'd met that crazy girl there. I know that... I heard bits and pieces of it through the wall of the sick room when he was speaking to Ukitake-taichou and Endou-taichou, before he died. Therefore..."

"It's not your problem to worry about," Koku cut across him, shaking his head.

"But what if... you just said, if the Gotei took Kei... took him prisoner..."

"They won't," Koku said simply. "Sakaki will have reported her kill to him in lurid detail by now. When they find no body, and when he investigates the Senkaimon and finds it was opened, then he'll take action. The Gotei might go to Rukongai, Tenichi-dono, but they won't find who they're seeking. Most likely they won't find anyone — or anything at all."

"But..."

"He's a master at hiding from them," Koku shrugged tentatively.

"But where?!"

"I've been here, so I wouldn't know that much," Koku replied dismissively. "Better that I don't, probably. Perhaps, better he doesn't know where I am either, right at present."

"Would he... hurt you?" Tenichi asked hesitantly, and Koku snorted.

"What, you mean, smother me with a pillow?" he asked archly, and Tenichi flinched, sending him a troubled look. "No, he wouldn't. He knows I won't speak to them, so he won't do anything rash. He'll probably want to find me, though. Better for the Gotei that he doesn't... better that I heal and get out of here before he decides to mount an expedition."

"You'd be bothered if that happened?"

"I told you. I don't like death," Koku said simply. "I don't care which side of the battle it occurs on... it doesn't suit me. Things are better left in peace. Rukongai is Rukongai, here is here. Mixing them is a bad idea from both sides... so I'm not going to do anything to hasten an encounter between them."

"You and me both," Tenichi decided, getting to his feet. "If that's the case, then we have an accord, don't we?"

"I imagine for very different reasons, but we do," Koku agreed. "If it means you stop behaving in a crazy way then I'll let you look at it like that. You're in no danger from me, Tenichi-dono — and I'm in no danger from someone who can't even wield a pillow to ruthless effectivity."

"Shut up," Tenichi muttered, and despite himself, Koku laughed.

"I don't know what his interest is in you, but I think you're an honourable person and I'd like it if you stayed that way," he reflected. "The best way you can do that is keep away from this, from me, and most of all, from him. He has ideas and sometimes they're bad for him and everyone else — it would be nice if you didn't get caught up in the flow of his madness. I don't say everything he does is for bad purposes — but he's a man with many faces, and you'd be foolish to choose only to see the good or the bad. Do you understand?"

“I’m not sure,” Tenichi admitted, and Koku sighed.

“You said you had people here you wanted to protect,” he pointed out. “Worry about them first. If it becomes a situation, let me handle it. I can handle it. Probably there’s only me that can, so let me do it.”

“Even if he’s cross with you?”

“He will be cross, probably very cross,” Koku said resignedly, “but I’m not afraid of him, and he won’t hurt me. I’m not the one in danger — you should watch out for yourself first and foremost.”

“Meaning...?” Tenichi’s eyes narrowed, and Koku paused, then lowered his voice.

“Someone is coming, so I’ll make this quick,” he murmured. “I don’t know who it is, but Keitarou-san has a spy here in Seireitei. Someone who reports things to him that other sources can’t... someone on the inside. It’s that person you need to be wary of. If it seems like you’re cracking, or you’re going to betray what happened in the Rukon, it could lead in a bad direction. It’s not my problem or my business, but I think it would be a shame if you got killed because of idiocy — so I wanted you to be aware.”

“A spy? Within the Gotei?” Tenichi paled, and Koku nodded.

“Yes,” he said frankly. “Someone who sympathises. I don’t know who this person is, and I’m not going to try to find out. You shouldn’t either, but just be on your guard. There’s more than just Kurotsuchi.”

Tenichi chewed on his lip for a moment, mulling this over, then,

“All right,” he said at length. “Thank you for that, at least. You’ve no reason to tell me those things — but even if it’s just a pact of silence, I feel reassured that you’re more my ally than my enemy.”

“What did you just say?” Koku’s brow creased in consternation, and Tenichi frowned.

“More my ally than my enemy,” he repeated. “Why that face? Does the idea disgust you so much?”

“No... no, I think you’re probably right,” Koku sighed, and Tenichi saw the pale fingers twitch as if trying to suppress a sudden sense of apprehension. “Never mind. It’s all right. I think you’re probably all right to have as an ally... at least so far as this goes. I just... didn’t expect to hear you say it, that’s all. It reminded me of something... but I think it’s not important.”

“Well, whatever you say,” Tenichi shrugged his shoulders. “I ought to clear off out of here, if someone else is coming to see you. It might be hard to explain my presence here otherwise.”

“Too late for that,” Koku offered him another humourless smile, gesturing feebly towards the sliding door. Tenichi turned in alarm, seeing it begin to slide open and instinctively jumping back from the bed as though it had suddenly turned into a raging inferno. Koku let out a soft chuckle, then closed his eyes, reposing his body as if in sleep as the door opened to reveal Kirio, her arms full of towels and fresh dressings. At the sight of Tenichi she let out an exclamation, almost dropping her burden, and Tenichi muttered a curse, hurrying forward to help her before the clean white cloths went flying all over the dusty floor.

“Edogawa-san isn’t teaching you very well, if you’re at the stage where you throw stuff at your patients,” he teased, finding that despite the compromising nature of his position, a huge weight had been lifted from his chest at Koku’s words. “Here, you shouldn’t try to bring so much at once — your arms are only little stubby things, even now you’re fully grown.”

“It’s your fault, you startled me!” Kirio objected, dropping her armful down on the end of Koku’s bed and wresting the remaining ones from her friend’s grasp. “What are you doing here? Nobody’s meant to be in here — the door’s supposed to be locked, and Taichou’s orders, nobody ranked below Tsukabishi-san is allowed in here without special permission!”

“Mm,” Tenichi turned, glancing at the bed, then gathered his resolve as he prepared to deceive his friend. “I know, and I’m sorry. I’m completely breaking and entering and I apologise for it. I suppose I was being too eager. Taichou asked me some questions this morning and it reminded me that someone had been brought back with Souja-dono. I thought, if I came to speak to him...”

“You idiot,” Kirio grimaced, swiping him across the back of the head lightly with the flat of her hand. “He’s in no condition for that... as you should be able to see by looking at him. Edogawa-san said he roused up this morning, but nobody’s been given leave to question him yet. I know you want to get justice for Souja-dono, Tenichi-kun, but you’ll get disciplinary warnings if you start invading other division space without permission. Even given that it’s you, and even in the circumstances — Taichou’s orders are firm ones and not to be disobeyed. You’re lucky he’s gone out to finalise some new recruit paperwork, else you’d be for it.”

“I know,” Tenichi acknowledged, rubbing the back of his head

absently. "You still hit like a girl, by the way. As you can see, your patient is still fast asleep, so I didn't get anywhere with my initiative. I was hoping to get out before anyone caught me — but I'll go quietly now, I promise. I'd rather you didn't report me to either your Captain or mine so... since I've left the guy still in one piece, will you put this down to madness on my part and pretend it didn't happen?"

"Tenichi-kun..." Kirio gazed at him for a moment, then she sighed, slipping an arm around him and hugging him. "You are an idiot, but I like this idiot better than the one who was here the night Souja-dono died. Even if it was crazy, coming to interrogate Koku without clearance, it's more positive and more like you than you've been since it all happened. You weren't replying to my messages... I was worried, but clearly you're fine."

"I feel all right," Tenichi agreed. "Better... as though I've... found peace with myself over it a little more. I'm all right, Kirio. Really. And I'm sorry I've worried you. It was such a shock, and then... well, things at Seventh are a bit all over the place. We've no adjutant, Kikyue-dono's none to stable at the moment, and Taichou's trying hard not to unleash the Wind Hawk and kill us all over the smallest thing, so everyone's on eggshells. Hajime-dono's trying to hold things together, but our Fifth seat has his head up his backside about his Clan position, so Nakata-san and I have been roped in to do a lot more than we'd usually be asked to do. It's a lot, but I can't say no."

His gaze flitted back to Koku for a moment, marvelling how convincingly asleep the youngster looked, then,

"I still feel some of the guilt for this lies with my being abducted, and Taichou said Souja-dono was investigating it when he was killed," he said softly. "That means I need to do whatever I can for Seventh right now. Even if it's thankless, or hard, or I don't get much sleep... I have to. That's my division... I have to help keep it together."

"I know," Kirio patted him lightly on the arm. "It's all right. If it's like that, we get it. Just, seeing you in a state... then hearing nothing... but it's fine. Do what you need to do — Ketsui and I will see you when you've a moment to catch your breath."

"It might be a while, but I'll hold you to that promise," Tenichi assured her. "For now, I'll leave you to your duties and go get on with mine. I've wasted enough of both our time for one day, and someone is almost certain to be shrieking for me back at base."

He grabbed her hand, squeezing it for a moment, and offering her a smile, he ducked out of the chamber, making his way swiftly through the familiar halls and corridors towards the least frequently used entrance of the Thirteenth Division barracks. Though he was no longer a resident here, such things were emblazoned onto his memory as though he had never left, and he was soon in the outer courtyard, feeling the sun on his face and appreciating for the first time since Souja's death the gentle scent of blossoms on the breeze.

Koku is my ally, he's not my enemy. Keitarou-san didn't kill Souja-dono. Kurotsuchi was wrong. It was a case of Souja-dono being in the wrong place and meeting that crazy woman, but that was just bad luck. Nobody knows what happened in Rukongai, about my promise, or anything else. Taichou believed me when I said I knew nothing earlier, and when he realised all that Fukutaichou told me to keep quiet was those silver people, he calmed down. Whoever they are, I don't care. They're nothing to do with me, and I'm not going to think about them or it any more. What I said to Kirio is right... I have to put my guilt in this into perspective and do what I can for my division. It's a hard blow, losing a family member. It's no good if I fall apart too.

With that he slipped through the main gate and out onto the concourse, sliding his hands into the white folds of his obi as he walked slowly back towards his home base. Though the wind blew more harshly around the Seventh Division barracks than anywhere else in Seireitei at that present time, it was with less foreboding that Tenichi stepped over the threshold, hurrying across to the main building in search of Hajime and Nakata.

Nobody knows I remember what happened in Rukongai. Nobody knows I even went to Rukongai. Fukutaichou didn't find that out, and if he did, he didn't get a chance to tell anyone. I'm not glad he's dead, but it's beyond changing and I can't help him. Better to look forward, do as Koku says and protect the people I care about instead. If Koku says Keitarou-san won't be caught, then he probably knows better than me, and he isn't worried about the shinigami finding out who he is or where he came from. It's all all right. It's all going to be... all right.

"Tenichi? You're back."

A voice from the window of one of the nearby offices made him paused, snapping to attention the next minute as he recognised the weary features of his patrol leader, her dark hair in a loose tail behind her head and her eyes dark and smudgy, lined with black shadows that indicated a lack of sleep. She was robed in her usual smart black shihakushou, though the sash at her waist remained in the dark colours of mourning, and a thin cloak of muted brown hung over her shoulders as though protecting her from the chill in the atmosphere. It was the first time they had met face to face since the funeral; the first time they had exchanged words since that fateful day in the forest, and Tenichi was struck for the first time by a sense of vulnerability about the young hime. Kikyue-dono was younger even than his brother, he remembered, perhaps, yes, perhaps no older than Koku, yet the burdens of the squad now hung heavily on her shoulders, cast deep in the shadow of her brother's untimely death. It had been no secret that Kikyue had adored and idolised Souja, looking to him for guidance whenever the path ahead was unclear. Now, Tenichi realised with a faint pang of regret, she would have to find her own path. When mourning was over, would Hirata follow the convention of other Clans and appoint his daughter as Vice Captain, or would the pressures of the Endou require him to name a more experienced male adjutant? Looking at her now, Tenichi found it hard to imagine the Vice Captain's badge adorning Kikyue's slender arm, and more, he realised with a jolt, he could not visualise her accepting the role with anything more than reluctance.

I've been meandering to myself about this, yet she's carrying a far heavier burden, and I'm not doing a thing to help her out. Tenichi, you suck. Your first duty is to Captain and patrol leader, so suck up and do it right.

"Kikyue-dono?" he asked softly, and the young woman pursed her lips.

"I'll tell you now, before I forget," she threw back the shutters further, resting her hands on the sill and meeting his gaze with a hint of her usual predatorial intensity. "A Hell Butterfly came for you, from Second Division."

"A... Hell Butter... from Second Division?" Tenichi gaped, his eyes widening in surprise, and Kikyue nodded.

"I have no idea what it's about, but you'd better answer it," she said briefly. "It was directed to Father but it asked for you and he told me to tell you when you came back. You'd better snap to it — it came from Kai-dono, and he outranks both of us. Besides, I don't want him to think Seventh are falling apart at the seams. Go, and go quickly, then come back and report to me. Understand?"

"Yes, ma'am," Tenichi's heart skipped a beat at the thought of venturing into the Shihouin's forbidding territory, but he nodded his head. "I'll go at once."

Back in the small back chamber of the Thirteenth Division, Kirio had rearranged her burden more neatly into some kind of order, pausing pensively to rest her gaze on the face of the sleeping patient.

"You look so peaceful," she murmured with a half-apologetic sigh, crossing the chamber and moving to open the window slightly to let a faint breeze stir through the sunny room. "I only wish I could promise it was going to stay that way."

She looped the window lace around the notch to keep it from banging, returning to the bed and pausing to brush the back of her hand against Koku's brow. It was cooler, she realised with relief, despite his morning's exploits, and as she settled herself back down in her sentry's chair at the bedside, she reflected ruefully on how involved she had become in the life and death of a complete stranger. I can't help it, though. He's so young, and he's hurt, and it shouldn't have happened like this at all. He looked so scared, and I just wanted... Naoko-san said I should be careful, but he doesn't seem threatening. And he was so afraid...

She frowned, her gaze darting back suddenly to the stranger's features. Had she imagined it, or had the eyelashes quivered slightly, the eyelids twitching as if preparing to open?

"Koku?" she murmured softly, reaching down to touch the boy's pale fingers lightly with her own. "Can you hear me? If you can, please, open your eyes and look at me. I want to speak to you."

There was no response, and she chewed on her lip, once more remembering the expression on his blood-spattered, grimy features when they had first met in the forest.

"Nobody will hurt you here," she tried again, sliding her fingers around his and squeezing them reassuringly. "You don't have to be afraid, or try and run away. Nothing bad will happen now, I swear. Please, open your eyes and look at me. If you know I'm here, I'd like... I'd like to be able to apologise to you properly for what happened with Kikyue-dono in the forest."

She gazed at him expectantly, as one second dragged into two and then three without any kind of reaction from the still form on the bed. Then, just as she was beginning to believe she truly had imagined it, the lashes twitched a second time, and, very slowly, they began to lift, blinking open and shut as they revealed two hazy brown eyes that seemed to struggle to bring his surroundings into clear focus. His eyes rested on her, and Kirio saw the sudden flash of self-preservation that flared in their chocolate depths, but this time he did not try to move away from her. Instead he stared up at her, his eyes full of questions and accusations, but his lips remained still and he did not try to speak. At his expression, guilt flooded Kirio's body yet again, and she frowned.

“I’m so sorry,” she murmured. “We must seem like demons to you — the enemy, dressed in black, swords waving, cutting people down before asking any questions. I know there’s no reason why you should listen to me, or trust a word I say, but really... we don’t mean you any harm.”

The boy blinked, but he still said nothing, and Kirio squeezed the thin, pale fingers, then released them, setting his hand back down on the bed covers.

“My name is Kirio,” she said softly, “and Souja-dono told us your name was Koku, but I don’t know if that’s true. I’d like it, if you’d tell me — I’d like to know for sure who I’m talking to. You were very brave, helping a shinigami in distress, and you’re not in any trouble, I promise. We want to help you — and to find your family, so you can go home — and so we need to know who you are.”

There was a long, heavy silence, then the boy drew a deep breath of air into his lungs, letting it out in a heavy sigh.

“You were there,” at last he formed words, and to Kirio’s surprise, despite the tentative nature of his speech, his response did not seem as fragmented or frightened as she had expected. “When I fell, in the forest... you were there.”

“Yes, I was,” Kirio nodded her head eagerly, reddish curls bobbing over her shoulders. “My Captain and I came to help, and I was the one who brought you back here so that you could be treated. I know Kikyue-dono hurt you, but she misunderstood, and she didn’t mean it. She’s sorry and so are we... we know you tried to help Souja-dono, not hurt him.”

“He died,” Koku said flatly, and Kirio nodded again, her expression sad this time.

“He did,” she agreed. “He was very badly hurt. But that wasn’t your fault — you shouldn’t blame yourself. He didn’t blame you. He was grateful — he wanted to make sure we took care of you, and Taichou promised that he would. This is our Division, and you’re safe here. Really. You have nothing to fear from me or from anyone else.”

Koku did not respond for a minute, then a faint smile touched his lips. It was gone in a moment, but Kirio had seen it and she returned it with a warm one of her own.

“Your name is Koku?” she pressed, and slowly, the young man inclined his head.

“And your family? You have family we can send for? We’ve been wanting to do that, so you weren't here alone and abandoned when you woke, but none of the villages around the region of Seventh we found you knew anything about you."

Koku's eyes darkened for a moment, then he shook his head.

"Nobody... will look for me," he said sadly. "There is... nobody for you to find, K... Kirio-san. I am alone here."

"I see," Kirio's gaze softened in compassion. 'I guess I wondered about that, to be honest. You're skin and bone, and it looked like you'd been wandering for a while... I mean, I hope you're not offended by my saying that,' she added hurriedly, her cheeks pinkening slightly, "because I don't mean it in a bad way. It's just, when I was younger, I was in that position myself. I know... how hard it can be to find food when you're young and don't have a trade or a way to make ends meet."

Koku's brown eyes became thoughtful, as though he was digesting this, and his fingers twitched slightly towards the black fabric of Kirio's sleeve.

"So... you became a shinigami?" he asked, and Kirio shrugged.

"I was lucky," she admitted. "I found my calling, and it saved my life. Yes, I suppose that it happened that way. I... found a family I could belong to, and now I wouldn't be anywhere else. But I know what it's like, being alone and abandoned. I won't ask you about your family any more, I promise. If it's like that... if it's painful... I won't pry. I only wanted to know so we could find them, but if there's nobody to find..."

"Not a soul in Seireitei would care if I lived or died," There was no bitterness in Koku's tones, but the words struck through Kirio anyway, and she sighed, running her fingers through her reddish hair.

"But you tried to help Souja-dono, I know that," she said at length. "When your wound is healed, I know the Taichou will do what he can to help you, because you did that."

"I don't need shinigami charity. I can manage on my own."

"Mm," Kirio tapped her fingers absently together, then shook her head. "You might think so, but it's not about charity. Taichou made a promise to Souja-dono, and therefore he needs to keep it. This is what Souja-dono wanted, and after you got hurt, it's only fair we help you get back on your feet. Don't push it away, Koku-kun. Even if you're used to managing on your own — everyone can use help from time to time. Even the strongest of us."

“But your friend died. What use is it to reward me for failure?”

“You brought him home to his friends and his family, who loved him,” Kirio said evenly. “The best healers couldn’t save his life, so nobody expected you to. To take time to help him and bring him home... that was enough. That and... if you remember... when Souja-dono was hurt, and... if you know anything about that...”

“I thought so,” Koku let out a humourless chuckle, and Kirio was stricken at the bitter note in the young man’s tones. “You want information from me, so you’ll feed and clothe and treat me and try and be my friend. Shinigami who slash first and ask questions later, just to avenge the death of one of their own.”

“Koku...” Kirio faltered, genuine emotion in her greenish eyes as she gazed at him in dismay. “It’s not like that, I promise it isn’t. Maybe it’s true that people want to ask you questions about Souja-dono, and if you can help us find his killer, then all to the good. But... well... it’s not just... I mean... we don’t all...”

“I hurt your feelings,” Koku seemed startled by this revelation, and Kirio nodded.

“I told you. I was on my own once too,” she replied. “Taichou assigned me to look after you, but I wanted you to be all right, regardless of whether you could help the investigation or not. It was a shinigami who hurt you, so I know it must be hard to believe any of us care anything for people outside of Inner Seireitei, but really, a lot of us were just like you—we know how hard life can be, and we... we care about what happens in the Districts.”

“In the Districts,” Koku let out another weary sigh, pursing his lips. “I’m sorry, Kirio-san. Maybe that’s true. I don’t know. I never met a shinigami before I encountered Souja-dono. I only know what I’ve heard... and it hasn’t always been good things.”

“Thirteenth Division never hurt or abandon people in the Districts, whatever else you might have heard,” Kirio said frankly. “We’re most of us District born, and we do what we can to help. We’ll help you too. When you’ve met Taichou, you’ll understand. He’s not the kind of person to use and discard anyone for any purpose, regardless of the situation. He was close to Souja-dono and to Souja-dono’s father, but he’s not tried to hurry us in waking you up, and he’s said he’ll only try and speak to you when the healer in charge of your care says you’re ready. We really do want to help. You can believe me or not, but it’s true.”

“I believe you,” Koku acknowledged reluctantly. “But your friend...”

the man who was here before... I heard what he said. He woke me up, ranting at you about things I know nothing about. He wanted to interrogate me, even if your Captain doesn't. And I don't trust shinigami. Even if you're telling me the truth — it doesn't mean others will honour your standards. I've heard things about shinigami interrogation — and I don't like it."

"Tenichi," Kirio grimaced, but nodded. "Yes, he was out of line. I'm sorry. Souja-dono was his Vice Captain, and I think Tenichi thinks it was his fault that this all happened. It's crazy, of course, but that's the bond of loyalty between officer and subordinate. He won't come and bother you again, I promise. I won't let him. This is Thirteenth, and nobody is going to force you to do anything until you feel up to it."

"You'll force me then, instead?"

"Koku-kun?" Kirio blinked, and Koku closed his eyes briefly, faint lines of pain crossing his brow.

"It doesn't matter, anyway," he murmured. "I don't know the information you want. I found an injured shinigami, and helped him. I didn't see how he came to be felled, and I never met him before that day. I certainly didn't fight off any killer. I have no weapon, and wouldn't know how to use one of those strange sword things of yours. I don't even have a knife to cut food with. I found him, and helped him, but he was bloody and hurt and we didn't spend a lot of time small-talking. He did something with his sword, but I don't know what it was, and that's all I can tell you. The next thing I knew, a kestrel was sharpening its claws on my body, and you were grabbing hold of me."

Kirio opened her mouth to respond, but then frowned, gazing at Koku in confusion.

A kestrel's claws?

"Well?" Koku opened his eyes, staring up at her with a challenge in his dark gaze. "Now you know that, will you still fuss and flap over me, or will you turn me out? I can't help you avenge your officer's death. I'm just a useless vagrant who was in the wrong place at the wrong time."

Kirio's eyes narrowed thoughtfully, then she shook her head.

"In an hour or two, we'll change your bandages," she said matter-of-factly. "Edogawa-san will be back then. She's the healer in charge of you, and we have to make sure you don't get infected. For now, it's not a good idea for you to get up, or worry too much about Soujadono. I'm not here to ask you questions about him, or anything else. I'm here to make sure your condition doesn't get worse and to ensure you don't need anything. You can tell all those things to Taichou in a few days when you're better — but I know you weren't very well earlier this morning, and Edogawa-san will be cross with me if I push you beyond your limits."

Koku's expression became unreadable for a moment, then he smiled faintly, and this time it briefly touched the dark brown eyes.

"All right," he responded grudgingly. "You win, this time. I'll believe you mean it, and let you look after me."

"Good choice," Kirio's eyes twinkled slightly, and she got to her feet, reaching for the ceramic jug of water and the mug that stood on the shelf beside the bed. "In that case, see if you can drink some of this. Edogawa-san thinks you should be able to eat something mild, later, if you want it — but water's good for you too and it will help if you're still feeling unsettled. She has herbs she can give you, if your injuries are hurting — but I can't give those, since I don't know much about them. I'm not a healer, just an ordinary shinigami — but I want to help, so I'm afraid you're stuck with me."

"I guess I could do worse," Koku murmured, as, with his companion's help, he pulled himself a little more upright, taking the mug in a shaking grip and drinking its contents. Despite the fragility of his injured body and his wariness for the unfamiliar environment, his thirst won out, and he quickly drained the vessel dry, handing it back. "If you're going to talk to me even on, though, you're going to wear me out. I'd like to sleep some more now, please. If you don't mind... I don't want to talk any more."

"I'll not take that personally, even though I'm sure I was meant to," Kirio said astutely, helping the youngster to lie back down, and pulling the blankets up to cover his body once more. "Sleep is good for you, too, so I'm not going to complain. Until Edogawa-san comes back, you're my responsibility, and nothing bad is going to happen to you on my watch."

"Mm," Koku grunted, but his eyes closed, and, as his breathing evened out, Kirio set the mug to one side, folding her arms across her chest as she considered their conversation. It had mostly been unremarkable — but one thing stuck in her mind and, despite herself, she could not shake it loose.

He definitely described Kikyue-dono's sword as a kestrel's claws.

Her eyes became near slits as she processed this.

I didn't know what nature her sword took until I heard Taichou talking to Kyouraku-taichou about her attack on Koku. It's not something that's in general knowledge — I don't know if even all of the Seventh Division know what kind of sword spirit Kikyue-dono has. Even given that all Endou have hunting birds possessing their swords...

She glanced back at Koku, who was now clearly lost to the world once more.

Yet a District boy who knows nothing of the Endou or shinigami described her sword as the claws of a kestrel without anybody telling him anything about it. A boy who shouldn't even be able to tell a zanpakutou from an asauchi discerned the nature of a stranger's sword in their split-second confrontation. That shouldn't be possible... so why is it?

The Second Division barracks were quiet when Tenichi stepped apprehensively through the gateway, glancing around him for any sign of an officer to whom he could report his presence. His conversation with Koku still foremost in his mind, he could not think why the Gotei's shadow division should have summoned him so randomly, yet even so he could not quite suppress the prickle of unease that ran up his spine as he stood in the middle of the pristine courtyard. Second Division was always like this, he knew — on the surface quiet and efficient, apparently harmless, yet the vast majority of its operations were carried out behind closed doors, justice dispensed in ways even the Council probably did not know.

"Kotetsu Tenichi."

The voice made him jump, and he swung around, registering the fact that from somewhere the division's Third seated officer had materialised silently, watching him with an even expression that gave nothing away. Hurriedly he bowed his head, and the young woman inclined her own in acknowledgement, then raised her arm to indicate the main entrance.

"Thank you for coming so quickly. Kai-dono would like to speak to you," she said simply, and Tenichi frowned, nodding his head.

"Kikyue-dono gave me the message, and I came as soon as I received it," he replied politely. "I don't know why Kai-dono might want me, but I'm at his disposal. Will you show me the way? I haven't been inside the Second before."

"I will. I think it's best," Saku's expression flickered thoughtfully at this. "It's probably better you don't get yourself lost. We don't get many visitors, so it's better I come with you. Some areas of Second are highly secure, and it would be a problem for everyone if you were to stumble into them by accident.”

“No kidding,” Tenichi glanced up at the proud Shihouin badge that hung heavy over the building, above the horizontal slashes of the number two, and stifled another shiver. “I’m not going to wander off, don’t worry.”

“Then it’s this way,” Saku crossed the cobbles purposefully towards a side-door set into the wood panelling, not far from the main entrance. Tenichi’s eyes widened slightly in surprise at the unexpected detour, but Saku took no notice, pulling a key from her belt and unlocking it before sliding it back and stepping aside to allow her companion to pass.

“This door is always locked,” she explained, as Tenichi hesitated, then bowed his head, stepping cautiously into the narrow tunnel beyond. “I have to lock it behind us, so if you don’t mind waiting at the end of the hall, I’ll be with you in a moment.”

“Of course,” Tenichi said quickly, hurrying to do as he was bidden and, as he did so, he realised what Saku had termed a ‘hallway’ was really little more than three feet of stone plinth which broke away at the far end into a long winding spiral staircase. Momentarily reminded of his visit to the strange underground lair of the silver-haired Kitsune people, Tenichi drew breath sharply into his lungs, turning to send Saku an anxious look, but the young woman was already returning the key to her waist, running elegant fingers along the wall to activate the series of kidou lamps that glittered to show their way down.

“Sorry to keep you waiting,” she said softly, stepping neatly past him and indicating for him to follow her once more. “Kai-dono is down here, and asked me to bring you to him. The steps are quite safe, but there’s a rail to your left if you’re unsure of your footing.”

“Where exactly are we going, Etsuo-san?” Tenichi asked hesitantly, but Saku did not answer, merely disappearing into the curve of the stair, and Tenichi hurried to keep up, not wanting to be left alone in this dark, claustrophobic place. Though the kidou lamps illuminated the stairs clearly enough to prevent accidents, they glowed and hummed with an eerie greenish light which did nothing to calm Tenichi’s jumping heart, and he was almost relieved when they found themselves in a small four-by-four foot plain stone chamber, a big door carved from old wood separating them from whatever lay beyond. This chamber was more brightly lit, and dispelled some of the ghoulish ambience that had shrouded them on their way down, and, as Saku moved to rap sharply on the wood divide, Tenichi took a moment to catch his breath and re-assemble his composure.

“Saku? Ah, Kotetsu, you’re here too.” The door swung back to reveal the Second Division’s Vice Captain and chief of Onmitsukidou, robed entirely in black except for the silverish adjutant badge that adorned his upper left arm and the thin band of gold at his waist that replaced the normal white obi of a regular service shinigami. Kai’s hair was knotted back in an utilitarian warrior’s tail, his golden eyes full of preoccupation, but he managed a slight smile for his guest, pushing the door back further and ushering him inside. “Thank you, Saku. You can leave Kotetsu with me and return to your other duties — I know my sister had plenty of things for you to do this morning, and I’m eating into them. Kotetsu will be fine with me, and I’ll see to him getting safely back out.”

These words washed like a wave of relief over Tenichi’s apprehensions, and the young woman bowed her head respectfully, withdrawing into the darkness as silently as she had come.

“I apologise for the suddenness of this,” Kai offered Tenichi an apologetic smile. “I feel guilty sending to Seventh for anything at present, with things in as much confusion as they must be, but it was unavoidable. Kikyue-dono’s been most gracious in sparing you — I promise not to keep you longer than I need.”

“Yes, sir,” Tenichi agreed. “Kikyue-dono told me to come and help in whatever way I can. How can I be of assistance?”

“Maybe you can, maybe you can’t,” Kai admitted, fastening the big wooden door behind them once more and leading the way along a longer, more brightly lit hallway. “It’s something of a long shot, but we had a prisoner delivered to our cells not so many days earlier. You might or might not be aware that my Onmitsukidou have been involved in investigating both the massacre in the Spiritless Zone and the more recent tragedy in your own Division, and I’m trying to pull together or discard loose threads that don’t seem to tie together.”

“Massacre?” Tenichi stopped dead, eying his companion in alarm. “I understood that a Hollow went on a rampage there — is there something to investigate other than that?”

“Ah, you must’ve been held hostage at the time that occurred,” Kai realised, shaking his head regretfully. “Two officers were killed by a Hollow, it’s true, and another took serious injuries — but the majority of the deaths in the Spiritless Zone were not carried out by Hollows at all.”

“Not... Hollows?” Cold dread settled in the pit of Tenichi’s stomach, and Kai sighed, shrugging his shoulders.

“Well, we’re still investigating what happened,” he said vaguely. “I wouldn’t say it’s a secure subject, but I don’t think it has any particular relevance to you or your being here. I’m more interested right now in the night you were abducted — if you can remember anything about it — and most specifically, the way in which you were taken.”

“My abduction?” Tenichi’s brow creased in consternation. “I’m sure you know, Kai-dono, but I don’t really remember...”

“I was told you recalled being pulled into a dark Gate, at least,” Kai cut across him, reaching to pull back a side door and leading the way into a further chamber, one wall of which was formed of thick metal bars separating a section at the back into a holding cell. As Tenichi entered, the cell’s sole occupant raised his head from the dogeared book he had been reading, and as their gazes met, Tenichi forgot all about the Spiritless Zone, staring in abject horror into Kurotsuchi Masaya’s empty golden eyes.

“He’s not a pretty specimen, I grant you,” Kai pulled the door shut behind them once more, “but he was captured in a border region by members of the Thirteenth Division and delivered to us as we have a past... shall we say, interest in him and his activities. I’m sorry to bring you so deep into the unpleasant part of the Second — normally, it wouldn’t happen, since this isn’t where we invite visitors, but we didn’t have much choice with this one. We were holding him in a glass-framed cell, but since he somehow managed to shatter the window from his side, we’ve had to move him down here where it’s a little more robust. We think that there’s a possibility he was the man who abducted you — and I wanted to know whether or not you thought you’d ever seen him before.”

By this point, they had drawn to within two feet of the cage bars, and the prisoner set aside his book, his gaze flitting from Kai to Tenichi expectantly.

“I... don’t really know... who took me, sir,” Tenichi was the first to drop his gaze, unable to meet the penetrating stare. “It was all a blur... and... even if you ask me now... I...”

He faltered, stealing a half-glance at Masaya’s thin, peaked features through his lashes, clenching and unclenching his fists beneath the sleeves of his shihakushou as he tried to stop himself from shaking. He had always been a poor liar, but, he reflected to himself grimly, in the past week he had had to do so so many times that he was beginning to lose track of what he had said and what he had not. And now, the demon who had haunted him in his own room with threats and promises was the prisoner of the Gotei's Onmitsukidou, staring at him through steel bars as though waiting for him to step out of line and break his composure.

Whatever I do, I cannot say I know him or anything about him. I must not. To do that would be to incriminate myself. I must do as Koku said, and distance myself from everything. It's the only thing I can do.

"I don't know," he said at length. "I'm sorry, Kai-dono, for wasting your time, but I really... don't know."

For a moment the spy remained silent, his strange, golden eyes running over Tenichi's features, a mocking glitter in their amber depths. Then, at length he spoke, his words soft and dripping with derision.

"Knowledge is power," he murmured, as though remembering something both important and ironic, and Tenichi stiffened, staring at him in apprehension.

Now what was he going to say? Would he give their secret away, to barter for his own freedom?

"Knowledge?" Kai arched an eyebrow. "If you think we're going to play games with you, Suzuki, you've another idea coming. I may have ridden to hear your case once, but unless you choose to cooperate and explain why you attacked members of a squad on patrol with no obvious motive, then..."

"Obvious motive." Masaya's eyes narrowed to slits, and his eyes slid across briefly to the Vice Captain. "You continue to call me as though we know each other, Shihouin Kai-dono... but I assure you, nothing could be further from the truth. Suzuki Naoto is dead. He died ten years ago. Your Clan had him put to death... and I will not answer questions put to his name."

Kai sighed, drumming his fingers impatiently against the bars of the cage.

"Kotetsu, I'm sorry. It seems bringing you here was a waste of time," he said wearily. "I thought maybe, if he was the one who took you from Inner Seireitei, you might recognise him, but I suppose not."

Masaya's eyebrows twitched, his head cocked quizzically in Tenichi's direction, and slowly, Tenichi shook his head.

"I didn't see them," he said firmly, keeping his tones low and even as he forced himself to meet the questioning gaze. “They grabbed me from behind like a coward, and put cuffs on me before I could react. It was dark, so I didn’t see anything, and the cuffs meant I didn’t get a sense of their reiatsu... I’m sorry, Kai-dono. All I know was that hands grabbed me and pulled me into something that felt like a Gate... otherwise... I don’t think I... I can be any more helpful. I don’t know... anything about anyone called Suzuki Naoto, and... and I don’t know this person, either. He looks odd. I think I’d know... if I’d seen someone like him before.”

A snort of derision came from the captive at this point, and it was all Tenichi could do to continue to meet the spy’s gaze impassively.

“I see,” Kai paused, pressing his lips together, then, “There’s no reason for you to have heard of Suzuki... that’s a Second Division matter which doesn’t concern you. If this can’t be identified as the person who kidnapped you, then it can’t. It doesn’t change our reasons for holding him — but those reasons no longer connect to you.”

“Then... can I go?” Tenichi looked hopeful, and Kai frowned.

“One more thing, before you do,” he said at length, and Tenichi hesitated, eying the Onmitsukidou leader warily.

“Yes, sir?”

“Have you heard the name Sakaki before?”

“Yes sir,” Tenichi spoke quickly, forcing himself to maintain his even, steady tone, “but only as a rumour. People are saying the person who killed Souja-dono was a girl called Sakaki, but I don’t know if it’s true. I’m only an Eighth Seat, so nobody’s told me anything officially. It might not be true at all.”

“I see,” Kai pressed his lips together, then, “and the name Kohaku... what about that one?”

“Ko... haku... sir?” Despite himself, Tenichi felt his face drain of colour as he recalled the hut and its surrounds of death, and it was as much as he could do to keep the dismay out of his tones. “I don’t... is... where might I have...?”

“Kohaku... huh.” Before Kai could respond, Masaya let out a chuckle, folding his arms across his chest and dropping back against the wall of his cell with a self-satisfied smirk on his face. “That’s a dangerous question, Shihouin Kai-dono. It’s one you’d do better not asking.”

“I see,” Kai’s brows knitted together, and he turned away from

Tenichi, leaning up against the bars and fixing Masaya with a long, hard stare. “You’ve heard that name before. You’re not willing to talk about anything else, but when I ask Kotetsu about Kohaku, you suddenly want to give all the answers? You don’t think that’s a little suspicious?”

“I don’t care,” Masaya said dismissively. “And you’re wrong... I don’t intend to give you answers. I’ve no reason to make your job that easy... besides...”

He smiled, a cold, sinister smile that made Tenichi realise with a jolt that the spy was not only unafraid of his current situation, but to the contrary, rather enjoying baiting the Shihouin Vice Captain with snippets of information.

“You’d do better not asking questions about Kohaku,” he said silkily. “That’s all.”

“Why would that be?” Kai demanded, and Masaya chuckled.

“Pray you never find out,” he said forebodingly. “Knowledge is power... but some knowledge brings death instead.”

“Are you thinking to threaten me, here, in my own territory, whilst you’re a prisoner in my cell?” Kai snapped, and Masaya’s amusement seemed to grow.

“I’m not afraid of you,” he said frankly. “I shattered one cage, and I can shatter another, even if it is made of stronger material. If you believe me to be Suzuki Naoto, it means your Shinigami operation is so inadequate it can’t even execute its own prisoners successfully. What is there to fear from that? And if I was him, and somehow I escaped your first assault, don’t you think I’d be confident of escaping a second? I’m not here because you want me to be. I’m here because, for now, it’s fun to see you scramble around. I won’t be here forever... so I feel no obligation to tell you anything. You had your chance to listen to Suzuki’s story ten years ago, but you never did. Now, in his place, I choose not to talk to you about insignificant little details. Why I was in the forest. Why I attacked the shinigami. Aizen Kohaku. All those things... are uninteresting to me.”

“Aizen Kohaku.” Kai latched onto this at once, and Tenichi froze, staring at the spy in abject horror.

“What did you just say?” He demanded, only just keeping from running to the cage himself and banging his fists against the steel. “Aizen? Did you just say... Aizen?”

“Kotetsu, calm down.” Kai sent him a dark look, and Tenichi bit his lip, distress still in his gaze.

“But sir, he said...” he murmured, and Kai nodded.

“He’s told us that he knows enough for us to keep him alive a little longer,” he said with a sigh. “Tidbits, useless by themselves, but enough to prolong his worthless existence a while longer. A dead man should stay dead, Suzuki — you know that, too, don’t you? That’s why you’re playing this game with me.”

“On the contrary,” Masaya got slowly to his feet, moving to the bars of the cage until he and Kai were a mere inches apart, separated only by the divide. “You mistake me. My reticence about Kohaku is a mercy, not a game. And you’re wrong about another thing. That... is no ally of mine. That... is no ally of anyone. Kill it, if it pleases you. I don’t care what you do. But I’m telling you... if you find it... and it hasn’t been hidden away somewhere beyond the reach of shinigami... if you find it, it will probably be your death first.”

“Meaning?”

“I’ve said enough,” Masaya shrugged his shoulders, moving to pick up the discarded book that lay against the pillow. “If you think you have shinigami to compare with power like that, then be my guest. There might not be much left of Soul Society when you’re done, but you know, noble sacrifices in the name of valour are always celebrated, aren’t they?”

He smiled unpleasantly, flicking the book open and thumbing through it to find his page.

“It might yet prove that here is the safest place for me to be. Well, wouldn’t that be an irony, if Second Division’s hospitality provided me with shelter from the fallout?”

Tenichi’s mind flitted back to the decaying landscape around the forbidden hut, and he swallowed hard.

He’s taunting Kai-dono, but he... isn’t lying. Keitarou-san said it too — that the one inside the shed was a monster... and that he was kept locked away because he was dangerous. But... Kurotsuchi definitely said Aizen Kohaku. Which means... that the one in the shed isn’t just another Plus soul on the verge of Hollowfication. Keitarou-san didn’t tell me that much... but... if Kurotsuchi’s telling the truth about that... it means... doesn’t it mean that the creature is Keitarou’s son... and the brother of the girl who killed Fukutaichou?

He drew a long, slow breath into his lungs, attempting to calm his racing pulse, for he was sure that across the chamber, Kai could hear his heart pounding in his chest.

Koku told me not to get involved with him any further, but this changes things. Kurotsuchi is a prisoner. Koku doesn't know that. More, if he's willing to drop hints about Kohaku, surely that's a message to me that he's willing to drop them about me, too, and maybe Koku into the bargain? Something has to be done about it... before that can happen.

His gaze flitted to Kai.

Even if I was given to killing people at whim, Second Division isn't the kind of place I could break into to do it -and Kurotsuchi's expression tells me he knows that too, damn him. So long as he's at the Onmitsukidou's pleasure, and they don't intend on executing him, he's probably in the safest place Inner Seireitei has to offer. Koku said Keitarou-san had another spy in the Gotei — but it's this one that's causing me the most trouble so far!

34. A Black Prophecy

Chapter Thirty Three: A Black Prophecy

The moon had risen to its full height, sending its gleaming silver haze over the rooftops and courtyards of the Gotei division barracks as a silent figure slipped from alley to alcove, crossing the streets with a nervous glance behind him as night patrols passed their assigned checkpoints unaware. It was a dangerous gamble, he knew that better than anyone, but even so, it was better than tossing and turning in his bed, and at length he reached his destination, passing through the rear pathway of the Thirteenth Division and making a bee-line for the small chamber in which slept the one person who would understand.

Kurotsuchi's empty golden gaze still lingered in Tenichi's memories, burned into his conscience and it had seemed forever before Nakata had fallen asleep, his soft snoring confirming that he would not easily wake. Leaving Seventh had not been a problem, for the Division was still not running night patrols, but it had not been easy to avoid the zealous squads from Ninth and Eleventh that had almost cornered him as he had reached the intersection in front of the Tenth.

Now, even though he had broken through into his former division stomping ground once more, he was on maximum alert. Thirteenth's security locks were not as fancy and expensive as those deployed in the more paranoid, financially buoyant Clan divisions, nor were the patrols as numerous due to the smaller number of personnel, but that did not make them inattentive to danger, and even though his was a familiar reiatsu, it did not mean that his presence there would be overlooked.

Still, he had come too far to turn back, and so he gritted his teeth, hunkering down by the wall of the small room and pulling his zanpakutō from its sheath, ignoring the indignant protests of his blade as he used the sheer silver edge to pry loose the lock on the window. It did not come free immediately, but Tenichi persisted, and at length he was rewarded by the sudden give of the wood, the shutters creaking slightly in the gentle evening breeze. Grabbing the edge to prevent it from making any further sound, he prised it open more firmly, pushing back the unlocked glass divide until there was enough space for him to squeeze through and into the room beyond.

"I thought I told you not to come here?"

Koku's words were soft-spoken and sleepy, as though he had been drowsing until Tenichi's reiatsu had penetrated his senses, and the shinigami paused, glancing around him cautiously before approaching the pallet bed and dropping down at its side.

"I know, and I didn't intend to," he muttered. "If I'm caught here a second time, I won't talk my way out of it, so I know I'm taking stupid risks."

"I trust that this time you didn't come armed with a pillow?"

"Shut up. This isn't time for smart remarks," Tenichi snapped. "I needed to talk to you about something, and I don't want to hang around longer than I have to. It's something that affects you and something that affects me."

"I see," Koku stifled a yawn, and in the dim light of the moon from the window, Tenichi saw his companion reluctantly pull his body up into a seated position, reaching for the over-robe that lay discarded across the bedcover and pulling it over his shoulders to keep out the night wind. "Then say it quickly and go back to where you belong. I wasn't kidding about the spy, you know. I don't know where they are or who they are. It could be someone in this division, or it might be someone far far away. It's not worth the risk."

"Kurotsuchi has been captured." Tenichi said quietly, and Koku sat back against the wall, folding his arms across his chest.

"So?"

"So? You don't think that's a big problem?" Tenichi only just remembered not to raise his voice, and Koku let out his breath in a heavy sigh.

"Kurotsuchi won't talk. He daren't talk... apart from the fact he's that person's lackey and won't hear or do a word against the orders he's been given. You've no idea how hard it is to convince him to do anything else... he owes his existence to that person, so he won't say anything. You're overreacting again, and..."

"He already did," Tenichi cut across him, and despite himself, Koku faltered, turning to stare at his companion in consternation.

"What?"

"I was called to Second to identify him by the head of the Onmitsukidou," Tenichi adjusted his position, agitation clear in his demeanour. "Second is a fortress... the one place in Seireitei that you don't go to unless you really have to, so being called there was out of the ordinary. I saw Kurotsuchi... and I heard what he said to Kai-dono."

"About you?" Koku's brows knitted together in consternation, "or about... that person?"

"Neither," Tenichi said grimly. "He looked at me in the kind of way that meant if I dared say anything he'd add his side of the story, but I didn't, and so he kept his mouth shut... about that. But Kai-dono asked me about Kohaku... and..."

"You know about Kohaku?" Now there was no mistaking the concern in Koku's voice, and Tenichi nodded.

"That person told me," he agreed darkly. "Or rather, I saw the hut and asked. The Rukongai people were obviously frightened, and I could see why... even with my reiryokuseal, I could tell it was a place of death. So I asked him about it, and he told me about Kohaku."

"I see," Koku was silent for a moment, then, "How much did he tell you?"

"That there was a monster sealed inside of it — a creature close to madness whose raging spirit power killed the surrounding wildlife and even a person in the village, so Kei... that person told me he'd banned anyone from going there."

"A monster? I see," Koku let out a humourless laugh. "I suppose that's one way of describing it. Yes. Perhaps that sums it up quite nicely. But you didn't see inside the hut... that person didn't take you to see it?"

"Why would he have?" Tenichi grimaced. "More, why would I have wanted to go? It seemed like a place nobody should go near, so I didn't. I didn't see the creature inside for myself, so I don't know any more. I figured you probably would, though — being that you lived in such close proximity."

"Mm," Koku's response was evasive. "That's not important right now, though. I'm more concerned about Kurotsuchi. You say he told this Kai-dono shinigami person about Kohaku?"

"Yes," Tenichi's lips thinned as he remembered. "He was baiting Kai-dono — taunting him with slithers of information, about how Soul Society didn't have anything to match the power of this Kohaku and that they'd all be killed trying, or some such thing... I don't know. But he wasn't the one being asked, Koku. Kai-dono was asking me about Kohaku, but Kurotsuchi decided to pipe in anyway. And more, he let something else slip — maybe by accident, maybe on purpose. He said... he said..."

He lowered his voice to a whisper, then,

"He said Aizen Kohaku, as though this Kohaku creature was... somehow Keitarou-san's son."

"That person," Koku corrected reprovingly, and Tenichi faltered, then nodded.

"Yes. Yes, that's what I meant. That person."

"Hrm. I see."

"Is it true?"

"Is what true?"

"This Kohaku... is it... I mean, is he... that person's son?"

"Telling you the answer to that might be worth more than my life, even if we are allies," Koku said ruefully. "We're not allowed to talk about it. None of us are and especially not here. Suffice it to say that that person considers this a project worth his scientific interest... that's all. I can't say any more about it... really, you'd be better off not knowing about Kohaku at all."

"Then he really is that person's secret weapon?"

"A weapon? Mm, I suppose that's so," Koku reflected, "but not one that's about to be unleashed on Seireitei any minute if that's what you're thinking. The trouble is what to do about Kurotsuchi. Did he happen to say anything else while he was making a nuisance of himself? He didn't mention any other people or any other names..?"

"Kai-dono called him Suzuki, as if he knew him from before, and Kurotsuchi denied it," Tenichi remembered thoughtfully. "Otherwise, I don't think so. Just Kohaku. Nothing else. Oh, and knowledge is power... but I think he said that to... Koku?"

For the younger man had muttered a curse, his grip on the robe around his shoulders suddenly tightening.

"So that's why," he murmured, more than half to himself, and Tenichi shot him a quizzical look.

"Koku? That's why what? I don't follow."

"Does Kurotsuchi know I'm here?" Koku asked, and Tenichi shrugged.

"I don't know. He didn't say anything about it either way, but he was taken prisoner before you were brought back here, so I guess probably not. I don't think anyone's connected him and you in any way, so it wouldn't be relevant. Why?"

"He doesn't like me very much," Koku admitted, "and the last time we spoke, well, it wasn't really cordial. I told him that I knew a little too much about him, and I think he took it the wrong way. I half wondered if he'd sent you to me with a message — but if he didn't know I was here... still, the effect is the same."

"But like I said, he didn't say anything about you. Just the creature from the hut. That's all."

"Yes, but I know... more than most people about that particular subject," Koku said simply, "and if your shinigami friends knew that, I'd be in a lot more trouble. Kurotsuchi is a jealous man and petty, too. He's fixated on serving that person's will but he's possessive of his right to be useful and he wouldn't mind eliminating other people who are close to that person in order to make himself the most indispensable. What he said to your Kai-dono is effectively a declaration of war... well, if he wants to play it that way, it runs both ways."

"I still don't see how, but all right. You know better than me," Tenichi shrugged. "The problem is, what to do about him?"

"Right now, nothing." Koku said pensively. "If he doesn't know I'm here, and if he didn't say anything about you when you were right in front of him, I think you're probably safe for now. Kurotsuchi might risk annoying me but I don't think he'll cross that person's wrath so easily, so for now the less reaction you provide the better. That includes coming here to see me, by the way. If it was bad before, it's now even worse... if he does drop any hints to your superiors, you want to make it look as though he's making up false claims to create ructions rather than speaking truth. Your flapping around in panic won't help you. The shinigami know you and mistrust him... well, what they know about him probably gives them more reason to mistrust him, if I'm honest. Therefore, your best bet is to act normally and deny anything with confidence. They are far more likely to believe you than someone who was supposedly executed for crimes against Seireitei once."

"Suzuki Naoto died ten years ago," Tenichi murmured, his eyes widening as he remembered the cryptic exchange between Kai and the prisoner, and Koku nodded.

“Suzuki Naoto is his real name. His birth name,” he agreed. “He was a shinigami, just like you were... only some bad things happened and he was suspected of involvement. He got arrested and appealed his case, but before it got a proper hearing, he escaped and was hunted down by the Onmitsukidou. They allegedly killed him — though they didn’t do as good a job as they thought. That person found him, retrieved what was left and fixed him so that he could make use of the skills and knowledge of one of Seireitei’s spy division.”

“So he’s a fallen shinigami?” Tenichi pondered.

“Nothing is ever that simple,” Koku smiled bitterly. “Suzuki Naoto was framed, Tenichi, by corrupt superior officers who used his past as a petty thief in Seireitei to scapegoat him for their own smuggling. They had his mother murdered because she tried to speak out on his behalf, and others who tried to defend him also got killed. The officer responsible was struck from his duty and locked away... but Suzuki was dead, so that was all that could be done.”

“How do you know that?” Tenichi demanded. “You said you never left... oh...”

He faltered, and Koku smirked.

“That person has a spy within the Gotei,” he repeated, “and of course, Kurotsuchi gave his own side of events, too. He’s always maintained his innocence. I hate the man, but I believe him. Ten years ago Seireitei turned him into an enemy... no wonder he took such pleasure in baiting that Onmitsukidou officer. Most likely it was as much for his benefit as for yours — two birds with one stone, or some such.”

“Why are you telling me this?”

“Because knowledge is power,” Koku said simply, “and, if Kurotsuchi speaks out against you, well, you can now say that he’s trying to smear your name because you discovered his real identity and there’s still a warrant out for Suzuki Naoto, because the case was never finally settled.”

“And Kohaku?”

“Whatever you do, don’t let on to them you know anything about that,” Koku said flatly. “It’s far, far more dangerous than you realise.”

“Then that... the monster is really capable of driving people to death with madness?”

“Oh yes,” a humourless smile touched briefly against Koku’s lips, and he inclined his head in agreement. “That rumour is quite true, I’m afraid. You were lucky that that day you found the hut, you had your spirit power sealed. Otherwise, with your shinigami sensitivity, it might have had a worse effect on you. You never know... it’s polluted ground, and twisted spirit power, so best left well alone.”

“But you said you knew more than most about it,” Tenichi objected, and Koku sighed.

“I do,” he agreed wearily, “but believe me, that’s not by choice. And I don’t intend on telling you anything else about it. It’s not information you want or need to have — believe me.”

“So you expect me to do nothing? Ignore it? Just hope he decides not to leak anything else?” Tenichi’s eyes became indignant slits. “I don’t want to know about any monster in a hut, and I didn’t ask to be dragged to Rukongai, but now with someone like that potentially about to spill everything... even if you’re right, even if they do believe me, it’s going to raise questions, and...”

“Shh,” Koku lifted a pale finger, pressing it to Tenichi’s lips as the older man’s voice threatened to rise. “Stop panicking. That doesn’t help anyone. Tell me instead — where is Kurotsuchi now?”

“I told you. With the Onmitsukidou.” Tenichi pushed Koku’s hand away, looking wary. “Why? What do you imagine you’re going to do about it? You can’t even get up, and even if you could, that’s not a place people break into.”

“I’m not doing anything,” Koku’s eyes widened in surprise. “Just gathering information, in case it’s useful at some point later. I thought we were allies, Tenichi-dono. I shared data with you, and now it’s your turn. Kurotsuchi is a former Onmitsukidou and it doesn’t necessarily follow that he can’t escape from their prison, not if he once worked there in some capacity. Therefore it might not be you and your pillow I need to fear, but...”

“I see,” Tenichi’s expression darkened. “You think, if Kurotsuchi finds out you’re here, he’ll come and...”

“It’s not impossible. He doesn’t like me, and probably knows too many things that I’d rather he didn’t — about that person and about me,” Koku twisted his fingers together absently. “Well? If I knew where he was, I might be able to sense his movements. My senses are quite sharp, I told you. If I knew what range I was dealing with...”

“Pretty sure you’d never find him, not where he is now, but it’s at the base of the Second Division,” Tenichi said with a sigh. “A door leads down there, but its locked and he's behind bars. The Onmitsukidou are trained as assassins and secret operatives. They're drilled to kill first and ask later if someone invades their territory, because they base their work on absolute secrecy. You might call them the Gotei's secure squad... I don't imagine Kai-dono is about to let Kurotsuchi out of his sight."

"Perhaps not. Not if there's a past between them," Koku said thoughtfully. "I feel happier, though, knowing where he is. I might not be in a fit state to escape, but if he makes a move, hopefully I can sense him before he does and raise some kind of alarm."

"For a minute I thought you planned to go after him and kill him," Tenichi admitted, and Koku snorted.

"With this body?" he demanded derisively. "As you said yourself, I can't move. I don't have weapons, nor training in how to use one. Do you rate my chances against a former secret agent? The only reason I could stop Sakaki from killing you in Rukongai was because of that person's influence. Without that, here, I'm more vulnerable than anyone. Don't be stupid. Unlike you, I don't immediately think of killing problems that get in my way."

Tenichi flinched, looking ashamed, and Koku tapped him lightly on the arm.

"Go, now," he murmured. "I'll remember what you've said, and you remember what I have. And no more of these clandestine meetings. We can't see one another again, under any circumstances. I mean it, Tenichi. For both our sakes — go."

"All right," Tenichi got to his feet slowly. "I just thought you should know... since we're allies, albeit in silence."

"I wish you hadn't ever called us that," Koku looked pained, "but since it's true, I have to honour it as well. Just don't make it more complicated than it needs to be. You panic easily and it's not pretty. You'll destroy more than your own life if you carry on like that... you need to get it in check."

"You sound like an old man, lecturing me like that," Tenichi objected. "I'm a good few years older than you, you know."

"Age isn't in numbers but in knowledge, and when it comes to death, I know more than any other, believe me," Koku rubbed his temples. "Now go, before someone walks in on us again. And close the window. I'm getting cold."

Tenichi shot his companion an indignant look, but did not make any retort. Instead he refastened the window, then slipped into shunpo, dropping out of the lightstep on the outskirts of the Thirteenth Division. For a moment he stood beneath the sign, gazing up at the snowdrop with a heavy heart, then he turned, preparing to make his way back home.

“Tenichi-kun?”

The sound of his former Captain’s voice made him freeze in his tracks and he swung around, half-frightened, half relieved that he was on the street side of the division boundary and no longer within Thirteenth’s compound.

“You’re out late. Did something happen — did you bring a message?”

Juushirou’s haori flapped around his shoulders, but in the dim glow of the moon Tenichi could make out the night robes that he wore beneath, and realised with a jolt that his former superior had been sleeping. Something — perhaps his own reiatsu — had disturbed the Captain’s rest, and he chewed on his lip, mutely shaking his head.

“I... know I shouldn’t be out by myself, not given what happened before,” he admitted softly. “Just... I’m not finding it easy to sleep tonight. I thought I’d come this way. I was sure that Kirio had said that Ketsui was on night patrol, so I thought I might see him and speak to him, but...”

“Ketsui?” Juushirou looked surprised, then shook his head.

“No, not tonight,” he replied pensively. “I see. So this wasn’t an official visit, but a personal one? A late hour, my boy, to be making inter-divisional calls. Particularly, as you said, given your previous experiences.”

“I guess that’s why I came, sir,” Tenichi mumbled. “I was worried... if he was on night patrol... that something might happen to him.”

His tongue fumbled out the lie, but even as he spoke it, he realised how much truth the deception cloaked. Though it hadn’t been Ketsui’s duty that had drawn him here, it had been a deep rooted concern for his brother that had pushed him to seek Koku’s advice a second time, and at his words, Juushirou sighed, compassion flickering in the kind hazel eyes. He rested gentle hands on his former subordinate’s shoulders, offering him a smile.

“You know, if things are troubling you, the best thing is to speak of them,” he said quietly. “I know that Seventh has had a good deal going on since Souja’s funeral, and that you’ve been busy there, but even so, one man can only take in so much before he breaks. You need your rest, too, and I am sure there are scarce few hours available for it at your barracks right now. Ketsui is quite all right, I promise you. Nobody here will let harm befall him — can you trust my word as your former Captain that I will keep him safe?”

“I do trust you, sir,” Tenichi admitted truthfully. “I always have, and always will. I know Ketsui is safe here, I just... sometimes...”

He paused, turning his gaze towards the barracks, then,

“Sometimes I think it would’ve been better if I had never left Thirteenth,” he murmured. “If I hadn’t, I wouldn’t have been abroad that night. If I hadn’t, Souja-dono wouldn’t have gone investigating, and wound up becoming hurt. If I hadn’t...”

“Ah. Souja.” Juushirou’s eyes became troubled. “Yes, Enishi and Kirio both reported to me how badly you reacted to his death. I’m sorry I’ve had no chance to address it with you sooner — but you must know, my boy, that it was none of your doing. What Souja was looking for the night he died may or may not have been connected to your case, but you didn’t ask to be abducted, and so have no blame to bear in the aftermath.”

“Taichou said he thought Souja-dono was following up a lead about me,” Tenichi said miserably, a sudden, overwhelming urge to confess all flooding his body as he met that gentle hazel gaze. “I respect Taichou, and I didn’t mean it, but I feel like I took his son away, and that somehow I’m cursed... because of those people... because of what they said to me...”

“People?” Juushirou’s eyes widened, and Tenichi’s hand flew to his mouth, colour draining from his features. Hurriedly he shook his head.

“I mustn’t tell,” he whispered. “I promised Souja-dono, and I promised Taichou. I wasn’t to talk about them... otherwise...”

“Hrm,” Juushirou’s eyes narrowed to near slits, and he pursed his lips together pensively. “Would these be silver-haired people, by any chance?”

“Sir?” Tenichi blinked, staring at his former superior with incredulous eyes. “You mean... have you... seen them too?”

“I don’t think it’s something we should be discussing, certainly not here like this,” Juushirou chided gently. “I know they were the ones who found you, yes. And I hadn’t realised you remembered them, but I think you’re wisest keeping your word to your Captain and Vice Captain and not discussing it — with me or with anyone else.”

“I will. I didn’t mean to. I just... before I left, one of them said something about curses, and then Souja-dono died... and... and I’m so tired,” Tenichi stifled a yawn, shaking his head as if trying to clear it.

“I can see that, which is why you should go home and get a proper night’s rest. Tomorrow, Hirata and Kikyue will need you on the ball, and you owe it to them to be there,” Juushirou said gently. “But before you do, let me set your mind at rest. Nobody has cursed you. Those people are just people, like you and like I. They’re not people we talk about, but they don’t have the power to curse you or Ketsui or Souja or anyone else. Souja’s death was a horrific murder carried out by a ruthless individual armed with a sword. That person will be caught and justice meted out — but it had nothing to do with them, and more importantly, nothing to do with you. You understand? You’ve been through a lot and I realise that — but if you keep blaming yourself, you’ll only do yourself harm.”

“I suppose I know that, sir,” Tenichi let out a heavy sigh, feeling half comforted, and half as though he had betrayed his former mentor by keeping so much still a secret. “Thank you. I’ll go back now. And I’ll remember what you said, I promise.”

And what Koku said, and try to find the balance of logic between them.

“Good lad,” Juushirou’s eyes twinkled. “Leave the difficult decisions to us Captains, and get on with what you can for your division. That’s the kind of shinigami I sent to Seventh, so make sure you prove it, all right? Don’t let me down.”

“Yes, sir,” Tenichi saluted, then turned on his heel, hurrying off into the night before the Thirteenth Division Captain could see the stricken expression that had flooded his gaze at these words of trust.

I’m sorry, Ukitake-taichou. I should’ve stayed in Thirteenth and all would’ve been a lot less complicated. But now I belong to Seventh and I have a whole lot of different things to consider. Neither Koku nor I can do anything about Kurotsuchi right at the moment, so I’ll have to hope for the best... but even if Koku isn’t willing to kill him, I know now that I am. If there’s an opportunity... if he should break loose of the Onmitsukidou’s clutches... he’ll find a sword waiting for him. Maybe Koku has no training and no weapon, but I’m not that way. And I’m sure I’ve spent enough time now in an Endou division with Kikyue-dono as my commander to know how best to carry out a kill.

Just past dawn.

Kikyue ran a weary hand through her tousled dark hair, fumbling at her belt for the key to her brother's office. It was still early and most of the division were not yet fully risen, yet since Souja's death Kikyue had regimented her days with late finishes and early starts. When she was busy, barking orders or sorting papers, she could channel her grief into more positive activities, but during the night hours, alone in her chamber it all returned, and even in the short time following Souja's funeral, she had learned to dread the restless nightmares that dogged her sleep.

Before they had left the Endou manor, her grandfather had taken her over to one side and, his pale eyes unusually sombre, he had rested a hand on her shoulder, meeting her gaze full on.

"Pain is a fact of life, and grief comes to the Endou more than any other Clan," he had said softly, his words even and calm despite the emotion that lingered in those eyes. "I know, and I have learned in my lifetime that those who live through that pain and continue to move forward are the ones with the strength to overcome it."

"Are you telling me to forget about it? Pretend it didn't happen?" Kikyue had demanded, throwing her usual respect for her grandfather out the window in her indignation. "Souja-niisama isn't someone I can just sweep away and forget about, Ojiisama! His death was murder... and murder by members of our family! I need... we need... Father and I, we must... we're the only ones who can chase this down and bring those people to justice. I must do that... Souja-nii would want it most of all!"

"Souja would want you to live on and support Hirata in his absence," Misashi's eyes had softened slightly at this, and he had sighed, sliding his arm around the young woman in an uncharacteristic show of open affection. "It hurts me too, Kikyue... the hunter sleeps inside of me more deeply than it does within you, but it is still there, crying out to avenge the hurt done to my Clan. He was a fine lad — the finest heir the Endou could have had, and nobody here would dispute it. Hirata and I both had high hopes for peace in District Seven if it were to be left in his hands — but this isn't a family where you can let down your guard for even a moment. Not even to bring back the head of his killer — you understand?"

"What other use am I?" Kikyue had demanded sullenly. "I'm a girl. The Endou won't recognise me. They didn't like me training with swords, and if Father and Niisama hadn't pushed it so hard, I never would've been able to enter Seventh and be like they are. I'm not prissy enough to be a pampered Clan hime, and I'm not male enough to inherit. What else can I do for the Clan than avenge my brother, Ojiisama? What else is there left for me to do but that?"

Misashi had been silent for a moment, then he sighed, a deep, heavy sigh that seemed to draw on emotions that Kikyue had not known the older man had possessed.

"When your aunt chose to abandon her family and flee with that man, it hurt your grandmother and I to the core," he said quietly. "We have never forgotten — the pain remains even so long after the event. For one of her children to have struck down my grandson brings me further grief — grief I hoped I would never have to feel again. But you're wrong if you think that because Souja was a boy and you are a girl, your purpose here is irrelevant. On the contrary, Kikyue, you are all Hirata has left. Just as he was all Sumire and I had to cling to — Hirata has you."

"I'm still a girl."

"And so was my mother, Lady Yayoi, your Great Grandmother and one of the most fearsome warriors ever to fight for this Clan," Misashi had told her firmly. "It is harder for a woman in the Endou, but you are strong and Hirata needs that strength. Sayuri is just a child, and she isn't ever going to fight and kill for her Clan the way you can and do. The only one left who really understands Hirata's hunting spirit is you, my girl, because it's awake inside you just as surely as it is inside of him. I want you to remember that, and go back to Seventh with it in mind. Your grief will always be there, but your life is still important to this Clan and I don't want you putting it at risk to avenge your brother's murder. We are dealing with dangerous enemies with ruthless hearts — remember that, when you return to Inner Seireitei."

Ojiisama.

Kikyue sighed, closing her eyes briefly and leaning up against the wooden divide.

I understand, and yet I don't. Be there for Father, which I will — but walk away from Oniisama's death — which I can't. I know you survived an Endou Clan whose members slaughtered each other for fun, and I know you and Father have tried to stop that... but to hunt is still our instinct, and now we all have someone to hunt.

"Kikyue-hime?"

The sound of Ohara's aloof tones made her start, opening her eyes and turning reluctantly to face the Division's Fifth Seated officer and her own patrol second in command.

"Ohara..."

“You look tired, hime. Is there nothing I can do to help?” Ohara bowed his head in acknowledgement, offering her a sympathetic smile that Kikyue greatly suspected had been constructed and carefully practiced to perfection just for this kind of encounter. “I am your second-in-command, and so if there is anything...”

“Onii... Fukutaichou’s office is mine to sort, and I will finish doing it today,” Kikyue cut across him, shaking her head. “Thank you, but I am quite all right. I had heard Father was looking for you, however — maybe you should report to him first, since his orders do outrank mine.”

“In that case, I had better go and see what Hirata-sama requires,” Ohara bowed again, fashioning another perfect smile. “But please, if you need anything from me... anything at all... don’t hesitate to send word. I am at your disposal — as a good second should always be.”

“Indeed,” Kikyue kept a hold on her temper, watching the young man turn on his elegantly polished heels and stalk away back down the corridor, clearly intending to cut an impressive figure as he withdrew towards the Captain’s office.

Maybe you were right about him, Oniisama. I thought he was just being a loyal second, and following orders, but you did used to tease me about his attentions and warn me to watch him. I know he’s ambitious — and maybe he sees me as the next divisional Vice Captain who might speak up for him with Father about rank, but there was something else in that look just now, and I didn’t like it.

Her eyes narrowed to slits.

It was the look of an Endou chauvenist sizing up the best prize to drag to the marriage market in order to advance himself within the social circle. Well, he’ll have a shock, if that’s what he thinks. An Endou hime loses all her rights and her freedoms when she marries, and I don’t have time for that, especially not now. And besides...

She frowned, pushing open the door and slipping inside the still cluttered office.

Besides, I have no aspirations for Niisama’s rank and badge. They’re stained with blood and I don’t want them. Father will have to give that honour elsewhere... I won’t be Vice Captain with Oniisama only just cremated and gone. Even if the Clan expect it — even if Father does — I won’t do it.

She turned to face the room, her eyes resting on a wrapped parcel that sat on the edge of Souja’s desk, a scrawled note pinned to the top in the spidery script of the Fourth Division’s Vice Captain, Unohana Eriko. She sighed, returning the key to her belt and rubbing her temples as she moved towards it, touching the brown paper wrapping gingerly as though it might jump up and bite her fingers. It had sat there for the past three days, gathering dust as she had copiously avoided anything that had had any personal connection to her brother's death, but even without removing the neat, clean wrapping, she knew that within were the folded remains of Souja's final uniform, returned to Seventh Division following his autopsy. Ruined beyond repair and with no master to claim them, Kikyue had not wanted to open the parcel, knowing that by doing so, she would be accepting that the office no longer belonged to Souja and her brother was never coming back.

Although I saw you cremated, Oniisama, I still can't let you go. Even though I know you're gone beyond my reach, I still don't want to face it and deal with it head on. Living my life without your guidance scares me too much... you never called me a coward, but I really know, now, how much of one I am.

She rested her palm against the brown paper, removing Eriko's note and glancing at it before setting it aside.

I wasn't there to help you when you needed it, and worse, I attacked the only person who was... the only one who tried to do something for your sake. He might have been a beggarly vagrant who didn't even have a weapon, yet he managed to bring you home and I thanked him by cutting him open. I wish you hadn't seen me do that, Oniisama. I wish... I could take it back. Even though everyone says he'll be all right... I still... I wish...

She faltered, fingers curling into the creases of the wrapping until her nails bore through to the fabric beneath, and in a sudden burst of frustration and rage she tore it open, tossing the ripped shreds aside as she surveyed the black and white uniform with a sense of bitter revulsion. It had been folded carefully and fastidiously, but even though Eriko had taken great pains to conceal the worst of the damage, it was not possible to ignore the ragged tears across the front of the fabric, nor the patches which, caught at the wrong angle in the light of the still-climbing sun, appeared darker from the saturation of blood. Souja's place of attack had still not been discovered, but Kikyue could tell from the uniform that wherever it had been, it would bear the stains of the encounter for a long time to come.

Oniisama.

Tears blurring her vision, she scooped the tattered clothing up in her arms, holding it tightly to her body as she allowed her emotions free reign over her body for the first time since the night of his death.

In the seclusion of her brother's office, where, if she closed her eyes, she could still picture him filing this report or giving her that gentle, chiding piece of advice, she let the tears fall, hugging the shihakushou as though by doing so she could reach the kinsman she had loved and admired so much. It smelt of herbs and Fourth Division, the stained sections stiff beneath her touch, and though she longed to bury her face in it and locate some shred of her brother's reiatsu, she knew that there would be none there left to find. Instead she dropped down into Souja's seat, her hold on her burden not loosening for a moment.

Why did you do this?

Anger and frustration welled up to drown her grief, as she pictured again her father's frantic behaviour the night Souja had vanished, and the sight of her brother, broken and bloody, crumpled on the forest floor.

Why didn't you tell someone where you were going? Why did you go alone? Who is this Joumei person you spoke to Father about? Why didn't you trust me? I would've come with you, and if I had... if I had...

She screwed up her eyes, throwing the shihakushou with some force across the room and watching with little pleasure as it thudded against the wall, sliding down onto the ground. As it did so, the obi fell from the centre of the bundle, its tattered ends proof that the healers had cut sections of it to send to Third Division's scientific team for analysis, yet it was the brownish smears that dotted the maltreated fabric that caught Kikyue's attention most of all. Whilst against the black it was harder to discern the bloodstains, against the white obi it was not so easy to conceal, and Kikyue got unsteadily to her feet, bending to pick up the expensive length of white silk.

They hurt you so much. What you must have gone through — yet you still came back to report to Father. Unohana-taichou said that it was only your will that got you back here. You kept going long enough to do what you knew you must.

She sighed, crossing her legs and leaning back against the wall, winding the obi absently around her fingers, folding and unfolding the crumpled cloth as her anger faded into a dull, empty ache.

I'm sorry. I shouldn't be angry. If you didn't trust me with something, then it was probably because you didn't think me old or sensible enough to know it. I wasn't reliable enough, and the fault was with me. I'm not angry with you, Oniisama. But I will find the one who killed you — I have to at least do that. I...

She frowned, as her fingers brushed against something other than silk and she glanced down, squinting at the battered sash as she tried to make out what she had touched.

Oniisama?

At first nothing was apparent, but as she held it up to the light, Kikyue realised with a jolt that pressed against the fabric was a scrap of torn parchment, soaked in blood to the degree that it had fastened itself to the inside of the obicloth. The healers who had stripped his body for examination and then embalming had not bothered to go over every inch of his clothing with a fine tooth comb, as personnel had been limited and the cause of death had been apparent from the state of the corpse, so after being removed, Souja's uniform had simply been folded and set aside on a shelf, waiting to be sent back to its Division of origin.

Waiting, and concealing something that, to Kikyue's eager eyes, looked like some kind of a clue.

Suddenly intent on her discovery, Kikyue tried to prise it free but the edge that was bloodsoaked was stuck fast to the inner crease of the obi. It had clearly been pushed there out of sight by her brother himself, she realised with trembling hands, for only he could have placed it so deep beneath the folds of his sash at a time before the attack had begun.

Pulling her sword from its sheath, she slid the silver blade against the scrap of parchment, cutting it free as cleanly as she was able and pulling it away from the obi, unfolding her prize and smoothing it out against her knees as she tried to make out what it said.

The script was unfamiliar, not her brother's, nor that of anyone else she knew, and though it was an educated hand, the note looked like it had been written in a hurry. The top corner was torn away, and sections of it were soaked through so thickly with dried blood that the characters had blurred into illegibility, but even so she persevered, squinting to work out what it said.

“Silver treasure... sleeps... branches... crimson... hunter... shadow... shroud. Bonds of life severed by a bitter blade, the wrong tree falls in a foreign forest, once uprooted, it is gone.”

She read it aloud, brow creasing further in confusion.

Oniisama? I've found your clue, but I don't understand it. I'm sure it's important, but I don't know what it means. It's all right, though. I'm sure it connects to Keitarou and Eiraki-basama and what happened to you.

She scrambled to her feet, her duties forgotten in light of this new tidbit of information.

I'm going to Father now, Souja-nii, so sit tight and watch over us, all right? You kept this because it was important somehow, so we'll figure out how. I'm sure we will — we must!

To think was to act, and she flung back the door of the office, not caring that her face was still glittering with tears, nor that she had left the remains of her brother's uniform scattered all over the floor. In her fingers she clutched the precious piece of paper as though it were made of gold, tearing through the halls towards her Father's office. As she reached it, Ohara was just leaving, and he cast her a concerned glance, clearly taken aback by her sudden, dishevelled appearance. He opened his mouth to speak to her, but she shoved past him, rapping eagerly on the door and pushing it open without waiting for her Father to summon her within.

"Kikyue!" Hirata's voice brought her to a sudden halt, and she swallowed hard, realising that her father was not alone. In the office's far corner sat the familiar figure of their neighbour, the gaudy pink haori that he generally wore absent in respect for their Clan's period of sober mourning, and despite herself she flushed red, bowing her head awkwardly towards the two Captains.

"Otosama, K... youraku-taichou. I'm sorry. I didn't... I thought... I should have waited outside."

"Kikyue-chan, what's wrong?" Shunsui eyed her keenly, getting to his feet and moving to brush the tears from her lashes. "You look shaken up — is Hirata making you sort that office by yourself? If so, you should get that idiot that was just here to take his share of the work. He seems very keen to offer his services, so you might as well take him at his word."

"No, sir. It's all right. I prefer to do it myself," Kikyue shook her head respectfully, bowing once again. "I just... I came to make report to... to the Captain. I didn't know he had a visitor."

"Report?" Hirata cast her a questioning glance, and Kikyue could tell by the lines of weariness that crossed her father's brow that he had probably had as much sleep as she had the night before. "Something important you think I should know?"

"Yes, sir," Kikyue agreed eagerly, taking a step forward and holding the mangled parchment out. "Fourth Division returned Oniisama's uniform, and when I was... was sorting it for disposal, I discovered this, tucked into the obi. It's not complete, sir, and it's not in great condition... but I think Oniisama brought it back with him and I think he wanted us to see it. I don't know what it means, but I thought you might... there's words written on it, and I think Oniisama thought them important."

"A clue from Souja?" Hirata looked startled, taking the scrap and peering at it through the lenses of his spectacles. "The Fourth didn't locate it? That was lax of them."

"I imagine they have their own problems, with eight officers dead and two out of commission," Shunsui pointed out. "Besides, Kikyue-chan's found it now, so no harm done. Possibly it's better that it's got straight to the people who knew Souja best — if it's a message from him, you'll be able to understand it more quickly than a stranger would."

"My son didn't write this," Hirata shook his head, holding the parchment out for his friend to take. "I don't understand it either — it looks like some kind of a riddle."

"A riddle, huh?" Shunsui squinted at it. "Hrm, I see what you mean. A coded message, maybe?"

"That would be my guess," Hirata agreed. "Kikyue, you're sure this was all of it?"

"Yes, sir," Kikyue agreed, looking crestfallen. "I'm sorry. I tried to cut it free as cleanly as I could, but..."

"No, you did well to find it," Hirata sighed, moving to rest his hand briefly on her head, and despite herself, Kikyue felt vaguely comforted at his touch. "If we don't know what it means yet, then we will. If Souja brought it back — and he must've, for it to have been where you found it and so stained with blood, then he wanted us to see it. If it's a code, we'll break the code. If it's something else, we'll work it out. You did the right thing, bringing it straight here. It was good work."

"It's been rough on you too, hasn't it?" Shunsui cast her a friendly smile. "I'm sure Souja knew you'd find it, though. He thought you were a smart kid, Kikyue... clearly he was right."

He tapped the note against his hand.

"Tomorrow is the Captain's meeting, and they'll decide who's going to Rukongai," he added, addressing this remark to Hirata. "You're still observing mourning, so I'm assuming you won't be there. Will you let me take this and see if I can get anything from it before then? If not, I can always report it there and get everyone's take — it might be significant considering where we're going. If Souja brought this back from there, then..."

"It might connect to Keitarou," Hirata's eyes blackened, but he nodded. "Yes. I must follow family convention, though it would be so much easier, I swear, to be able to fly free and fight this the way a shinigami should. Please, Shunsui — take it and do what you can. If you don't come up with anything, though, I want it back again after the meeting — understand? It's Souja's evidence, so it belongs here — with Kikyue and I."

"Understood," Shunsui offered a lazy salute. "I'll do my best and you have my word it'll be returned safely."

"Will I be able to go to Rukongai, Father?" Kikyue asked hesitantly, and Hirata cast her a stricken glance.

"Do you think mourning doesn't apply to you?" he demanded, and Kikyue shook her head hurriedly.

"No, sir, it's just..."

"I won't lose you too," Hirata spoke softly, but Kikyue could hear both fear and pain in his voice. "Even if it wasn't an Endou tradition, I wouldn't let you go anywhere near it. I know how you feel, but I won't let you. Souja went there without my permission and he paid for it with his life. Understand that, Kikyue. I can't and won't lose you too."

Kikyue was silent for a moment, then she bowed her head in contrition.

"I'm sorry," she whispered. "I won't do anything rash, sir. I promise. I'll stay here, just like you said."

"You can trust it to me, it'll be all right that way," Shunsui assured her. "Don't look so down — I promise that I'll do my best. Juushirou and I are your allies through thick and thin, remember? He's looking after the young stray, and now I've got something to follow up on, too. It's a step forward, even if it's only a little step so far."

"Shunsui's right," Hirata agreed. "For now, I want you to go back to Souja's office and finish what you need to do there. If you find anything else, bring it to me at once — otherwise, do what you can to get the sorting completed today. Tomorrow, I want to start talking about patrols and drills and how things are going to operate — at least in the interim — so I don't want anything hanging over us."

"Yes, sir," Kikyue saluted sharply, bowing her head again and withdrawing from the office. She closed the door behind her, leaning up against it as she considered what had been said inside.

I want to be doing something useful, but if all I can do is sort Nuisama's stuff and stay alive, then for now, it's what I'll do.

She clenched and unclenched her fists, then,
Shunsui-dono, please, crack Souja-nii's secret message. Find out what it means and why he had to be hurt... and please, lead us to his killer!

“Are we completely sure it's supposed to mean something?”

Sora set the scrap of blooded paper aside, casting her Captain a plaintive glance. It was later that morning, and Shunsui had retreated to his own Captain's office, calling on Sora's help on the way, but despite the best efforts of the both of them, as yet the scrap of parchment had refused to give up any of its secrets.

“It looks like a lot of random words to me,” the Vice Captain continued now, “maybe something poetic, but... I don't see what on earth it has to do with anything. I don't recognise the handwriting, and I don't know why you're so fixed on it, Shunsui. We've been at this for an hour, and we both have other things we could be getting on with.”

“I know, and I'm sorry to drag you in here too, but I needed a second brain to bounce mine off,” Shunsui groaned, loosening the tie of his long unruly tail of hair and running his fingers through it before winding it up behind his head and haphazardly looping the expensive pin through it so that ends stuck out every which way. “Kikyue was adamant that this came from Souja's uniform — the one he was wearing when he was killed — and so she thinks it's a clue but... if it is, it's an obscure one and I can't make any of it out. It would help if there wasn't so much blood all over it, but even without that...”

“Well, it's torn across here, to begin with,” Sora extended a slender finger to tap the edge of the sheet. “I think this word might have said guardian, but it might just as easily say something else. We don't know if this is the beginning of a sentence or not. Even if Souja-dono was carrying it, what use is it to us if we don't know what it means? Even if it is a coded message...”

“The idea occurred that Souja might have intercepted some kind of exchange of information, and that's how he got himself into trouble,” Shunsui reached across to pick up the sheet once more, screwing up his eyes as he tried to make out the characters smeared beneath the blood.

“You’re going cross-eyed!” Despite herself, Sora giggled. “And your hair looks like a hime after an encounter with a bush. You shouldn’t pull on it so much when you’re thinking — you’ll knot it and then you’ll have to go to the Captain’s meeting looking like an old crone.”

“You’re always so flattering and deferential when we’re alone,” Shunsui shot her a wry smile. “Fix it for me, would you? I’ll try not to pull it askew again, but this is driving me crazy. If it wasn’t that I thought Juu had enough on his plate with looking after our sole witness to this whole business, I’d send a Hell Butterfly his way, but I’d like to figure this one out on my own if I can. I can’t let him have all the excitement — but all I’m doing is twisting my brain in knots.”

“Well, your hair resembles your brain, in that case,” Sora said smartly, nonetheless getting to her feet with a sigh and reluctantly coming to fix the long wavy hair. “Honestly, I’m sure that hairstylist isn’t in the Vice Captain job description.”

“I’ll add it,” Shunsui offered blithely. “Being Captain allows me to do that. Although I think you’ll find in the small print that there’s an ‘any other duties’ clause. And you don’t want me to shame the Division by stepping out of doors like a scarecrow, so therefore this counts.”

“You should just cut it,” Sora snorted, pulling the pin loose with more force than was necessary and causing her Captain to let out a very undignified yelp.

“I won’t need to if you scalp me!” he protested, and Sora laughed.

“True, but it would save us both time in the morning,” she bantered back, looping the long waves over her hand and smoothing them down. “Why don’t you just cut it, anyway? You never used to wear it this long when we were students.”

“No, but I have a bet on with Juu as to who can get their hair the longest without resorting to the shears,” Shunsui admitted ruefully. “I didn’t think he’d take it this far, but now it’s a matter of pride. I won’t cut till he does. My honour depends on it.”

“Seriously?” Sora arched an eyebrow. “Sometimes I worry about the Gotei, considering the kind of things its Captains consider important.”

“Well, if you don’t have a certain amount of frivolous idiocy, you go nuts and start acting as poe-faced as Minaichi,” Shunsui pointed out. “Especially in a dark time like this — something has to lighten the mood, else none of us will feel motivated to do anything worthwhile.”

“Perhaps so,” Sora sighed, pausing to glance at the note again. “Shunsui, how is Hirata really? I haven’t been... right now, it’s difficult to know what to do regarding Seventh, because of the Clan and stuff there, but...”

“As good as can be expected,” Shunsui’s eyes became shadowed and he pressed his lips together pensively. “That’s another reason I want to resolve this for him. He won’t be at the meeting, because official Endou mourning demands he follow procedure, but I can tell that he’d rather be there taking action. I think... the idea of bringing Souja’s killer to justice is the only thing that’s keeping him focused and on track. His temper is short and he’s having to work doubletime to keep the Wind Hawk under wraps, but he’s hanging on in there. It’s still very raw, though. Kikyue — who I’ve never seen so subdued, by the way — was all for going to Rukongai herself because of this note, but Hirata forbade her to go anywhere and entrusted it to me. He’s lost one child, and I don’t think he could cope with losing another. They’re very dear to him — all of them — like small sparks of light in a dark and gloomy Clan full of death and ritual, and with one of those lights snuffed out prematurely...”

“I see. That makes sense,” Sora bit her lip. “I feel bad, not being a better friend, but Captain protocol doesn’t allow me to go flitting in and out of foreign divisions, not Clan ones. I’m glad you and Juushirou are able to.”

“Me too, though he knows that when Juu’s there, Enishi’s thoughts are with him, and when I go, yours are with me,” Shunsui assured her. “He’s said once or twice that having people’s support has stopped him from going out of control and launching himself into a do or die battle with Keitarou, wherever he is. That, and not wanting to give his poor wife more reason to grieve. Ai-hime isn’t a soldier, and Souja’s death affected her extremely badly... even though it was an arranged match, Hirata’s fond of her, and wouldn’t want to put her through more.”

“Which leaves us with the cryptic note,” Sora wound Shunsui’s hair neatly into its usual tail, fastening it with the expensive pin which had been a gift from his sister-in-law at the official inauguration of Eight Division, twenty five or so years earlier. “There, you’re done. Smart and Captainish once more. Don’t mess it up again, all right?”

“I’m lucky to have you, Sora-chan,” Shunsui observed. “Hirata’s loss makes me realise that even more. Not having a Vice Captain would create a huge amount of paperwork backlog.”

“Only because you leave it for me to do,” Sora dropped back down into her seat. “Right, so, back to the note. Read it out again— the bits you can — and I’ll try thinking on it afresh.”

“All right,” Shunsui nodded, smoothing the sheet out before him on the desk. “If we assume the first word is ‘Guardian’, then... of the... I think silver... treasure? Sleeps... on... something...”

“That character is red.” Sora squinted over his arm. “I’m pretty sure. Whatever this guardian is sleeping on, its a red something.”

“All right. Guardian of the silver treasure sleeping on a red thing,” Shunsui pursed his lips. “Some kind of branches hang... crimson... is that rain? I think it’s rain. The reflection? Or shadow?”

“Shadow, I think,” Sora’s eyes narrowed thoughtfully. “The shadow... something something something hunter’s passing something shroud.”

“And then the last line, which is intact,” Shunsui sighed. “Bonds of life severed by a bitter blade, the wrong tree falls in a foreign forest, once uprooted, it is gone.”

“Nonsense,” Sora groaned, flopping on the desk top in defeat. “No matter how much we read over it, Shunsui, it doesn’t make sense.”

“It doesn’t, but that makes me even more certain it means something,” Shunsui admitted. “I don’t know if this has anything to do with Keitarou, nor do I know what his writing looks like... but if Souja had it and it was with him when he died, chances are he died retrieving it. That makes it important... and Souja must have thought it so to keep it with him.”

“But he didn’t mention it before he died?”

“No, he didn’t,” Shunsui conceded reluctantly. “He was too focused on seeing to the stray and telling Hirata about the things he’d seen. The sword... Rukongai... the girl who looked like Eiraki. I guess he didn’t have enough strength to get to this.”

“Pity,” Sora grimaced. “If he had given even a clue about it...”

“I know, but he’s gone and that’s a closed road, so it’s left to us,” Shunsui responded. “Let’s try looking at it backwards. See if that helps.”

“Backwards?” Sora looked doubtful. “I don’t see how...”

“I mean, starting with the end line,” Shunsui offered her a lazy grin. “Bonds of life severed by a bitter blade. If we take that at face value, it implies death by sword. Yes?"

"Yes, but we don't know it means that. It's written so funny, and what about the treasure and all of those other bits?" Sora objected. "It's no use, Shunsui. I don't think we can read it so plainly. It's obviously a coded message... but we don't have the code, so we aren't going to get anywhere with figuring it out."

A knock on the door prevented the Captain from responding, and he glanced up, raising his voice to call in the visitor. The divide slid back to reveal Kaoru, her arms full of folders, and at the sight of both Vice Captain and Captain, she faltered, glancing from one to the other uncertainly.

"I'm sorry... did I disturb something?"

"Only us slowly losing our minds," Shunsui gestured casually for her to come in. "Put them down on the side there, Kaoru-chan. I'll sign them later, unless there's anything urgent to handle."

"No, sir. Most of them are from Eighth District, and Tokutarou-sama's messenger said they needed to be looked over by the end of the week, if possible," Kaoru looked relieved, doing as she was bidden with a grin. "I said I'd tell you, so you know, and well, now I have."

"Then that's fine," Shunsui returned the grin with one of his own. "And now you can help me with a puzzle of mine."

"Shunsui?" Sora looked startled, and Kaoru cocked her head on one side, cheeks pinkening in surprise.

"Taichou?"

"Well, we're not getting anywhere," Shunsui shrugged. "Kaoru-chan, what do you know about trees and forests? Your spirit power manipulates plant matter, so you're as good a person as any to ask."

"I beg your pardon?" The Fourth seated officer's eyes nearly bulged out of her head. "I don't understand, sir — what about trees?"

"The wrong tree falls in a foreign forest," Shunsui read the line from the scrap of paper. "What do you think that means?"

"A foreign forest?" Kaoru looked more and more bewildered. "Is this some kind of riddle, Taichou?"

"If it is, we can't figure it out," Sora shrugged in resignation. "It makes no sense to us either, Kaoru-chan — so don't look so worried. If you haven't any ideas, then it's fine. It doesn't make us any worse off."

"Or any better," Shunsui intoned darkly. "Well, Kaoru-chan? Any input?"

"Not really," Kaoru admitted apologetically. "Only, I think it sounds kind of strange, that's all, sir. Just... even if my sword can manipulate tree branches, it doesn't usually make them fall down. And if it did, I don't see how it would be in a foreign forest. Because a tree would be native to the forest it grows in, wouldn't it? Trees don't just up sticks and cross boundaries into different forests. They seed and grow in the same place. So it can't fall in a foreign forest... it must have grown there in the first place and then been cut down."

"Shunsui, now look. You've made the girl babble nonsensically about trees when she should be doing a thousand other things," Sora scolded. "I'm sorry, Kaoru-chan. You can forget about this and go do your scheduled duties. Leave the trees with Shunsui and I... it's our job to worry about them, not yours."

Kaoru hesitated for a moment, looking confused and uncertain, and Shunsui offered her an indolent grin.

"Sora's right. It's fine. Go," he assured her. "I'm sorry to have bothered you with it. Really, it's fine."

"She's going to worry about your trees for the rest of the day, now, most probably." Once Kaoru was gone, Sora shot her superior a reproving look. "You know how she hangs on your word — you should think before piling stuff on her like that."

"But what she said was interesting, and true," Shunsui pointed out, tapping his finger against the damaged fragment of paper. "Trees can't move between forests. They fall where they grow. Yet this one clearly says the WRONG tree in a FOREIGN forest. That's odd — it jars — and it reminds me of something else. Of another... wrong tree... in another... foreign forest."

"What now?" Sora stared, and Shunsui's grin widened, though his eyes were still clouded.

"Souja was in the forest when he fell, wasn't he?" he said softly. 'He was cut down by a blade, a blade held by someone who had a connection — probably — to Eiraki-hime and therefore to Keitarou. Murdered from Clan bitterness, perhaps. Juu always has some metaphor from his childhood about people growing into trees — the strong ones, the weak ones, and the ones who need support. What if that's the metaphor here? If we're dealing with Keitarou, then it makes sense to think that way, since the last pseudonym he adopted, when murdering his way through Niisama's district, was 'Masaki', which means something like "true tree'. I don't know if he got that from Juu, but he and tree-names link together. And here we have the wrong tree. The foreign forest. What if that tree is Souja?"

"Souja fell in District Seven. That's not foreign to him," Sora objected, but Shunsui shook his head.

"He wasn't attacked there. He fell somewhere else, and was brought here, through Senkaimon, with the help of the District stray Juu's protecting," he said grimly. "He was found in his forest, but he fell in a foreign one. And if we assume the last line refers to that, then the first..."

His eyes darkened.

"Souja was an Endou. A bird of prey, a hunter," he murmured. "I can't explain the first part, but I do think that the hunter refers to Souja, and that he was struck by the bitter blade of an exiled kinswoman from a broken branch of the Clan. Probably... probably in Rukongai, which means that the boy... Juu's boy... might have come through from there with him."

"From Rukongai?" Sora looked horrified, but Shunsui dismissed that with an impatient gesture.

"Not the thing we should be focusing on now, though it's obvious and common sense when you think about it. Souja opened the gate in Rukongai — foreign land — with the help of the lad. Come to think of it, it's just as possible that the last line of this could refer to Kikyue's cutting him down — the wrong tree, in the foreign forest. The Rukongai boy who was mistaken for her brother's killer and cut by her bitter sword in Seireitei, where he didn't belong. Yes, I think that fits. I think that makes sense."

"I'm glad it does to you," Sora muttered. "What about the rest? The silver treasure? What about that?"

"I don't know about that bit, but all the red references probably relate to blood, judging by the state of Souja when he was brought back. And, if I squint at it, I can maybe make out the bit about the tree branches." Shunsui's brow creased in concentration. "The character for 'tree' is very clear, but... this one before it... I think it's the character 'kami', deity."

"God's tree?" Sora blinked, and Shunsui shook his head, reaching for a blank sheet of fresh parchment and grabbing his writing brush from where it had been discarded at a haphazard angle, teetering over the edge of the ink stone.

"Ki. Kami." he said softly, sweeping the two characters across the paper in his familiar scrawling script. “Or if you squash them together into one character, Sora-chan, what do you get?”

“Tree God, then.” Sora pouted. “Or... or wait. Sakaki? Is that what you mean? Are we being specific to tree genres now — the Sacred Evergreen?”

“I didn’t hear much of Souja’s last words, but I did catch snippets when I was organising Tenichi and the others, and one of the things Souja said — one that’s so far been ignored, because everything else was more important, was Sakaki,” Shunsui nodded his head, setting the brush down. “Juu’s mentioned it too, so I’m sure I heard right. It might be a coincidence, but I don’t like those. Here we have a sacred tree and a fallen hunter. From Souja’s lips we have the name of his assassin — ‘Sakaki’. And if the wrong tree in the foreign forest is the boy, somehow, then...”

“Even if that did make sense, you realise what you’re saying?” Sora demanded. “Souja had that on his body when he died. It’s covered in his blood, so it couldn’t have been planted there after. It was with him and he brought it back. Before he died. Before he got to Seventh’s forest, before all the things you’re theorising about happened. Therefore...”

“I know,” Shunsui’s expression was grim, and he nodded his head, lifting the scrap and holding it up in front of him as if seeing it properly for the first time. “This isn’t a coded message, or some kind of secure assignation invite. It’s something deeper... darker than that. Something that maybe explains why so far Keitarou — if it is him, and I’m sure it is — has been a step ahead of the game. He doesn’t need a spy among the Gotei, not if this is anything to go by. Somehow — and I dread to think how — he’s got hold of a power that we hadn’t even dreamed he could.”

His eyes narrowed.

“This note is a prophesy,” he murmured. “A prophesy, outlining the events around Souja’s death. I don’t understand all of it, and if I did, maybe it would be clearer still how it patched together, but if the last part is how I think it is, it’s chilling enough. It means somebody knew, before Souja even got there. Someone knew who he was, and that he was going to be in Rukongai, even before he did. And more, that someone knew exactly how he was going to die.”

Author’s Note:

Those few of you who have read Mirror Flower Water Moon may see something familiar about the title of this chapter... o.O

Sakaki's name. If you don't speak Japanese, that might've been kinda confusing. I know I gave the meaning before, but if you assume the sentence in the prophesy is 神の木の枝(Kami no ki no eda) = Branches of the Holy Tree), then what Shunsui wrote down for Sora was as follows: 神 (kami — deity, God) + 木 (ki, tree) = 榊(sakaki, sacred evergreen). I don't know if you can see it, but the left hand side of the character is the tree, and the right hand side is the deity.

Finally, Juu really needs to invest in some better locks...

Oh, and whoever wanted Shunsui — here he is. One Shunsui, free of charge. Well, except for the sake tab...

35. Past Shadows

Chapter Thirty Four: Past Shadows

“And you’re quite sure this information is accurate?”

Keitarou leaned up against the wall of his shack, casting a cursitory glance around him at the barren environment he had left behind. His notes, his books, all his research had already been packed up and taken away by an apprehensive Katsura earlier that day, when his children and wife had gathered up the last stragglers amongst the local villagers, promising them food and fresh water if they followed to premises new. It had taken some persuading, Keitarou reflected, to convince such downtrodden people to venture outside of their native space, but Eiraki’s trust among them had finally won through, and at dawn that morning the last remenants of the Rukon community had crossed the divide into the Spiritless Zone. Keitarou alone had remained behind, mindful of the need to cover their tracks. It was not only security that had caused him to linger, however. His gaze flitted to the wooden box on the floor at his feet, and he frowned. The box contained the sword that Sakaki had retrieved from the scene of the shinigami murder, and its very presence made him think yet again of the missing Koku.

The haze of spiritual energy that connected him to Seireitei fluctuated slightly as his concentration threatened to break, and he furrowed his brow, forcing himself to focus back on the matter at hand.

“You’re sure the shinigami intend to meet this morning and that a trip to the Rukon is imminent?”

“That’s what I believe to be the case,” the voice of his contact, harried and unsettled flittered back across the divide. “It grows risky, Kei-dono. I don’t know how much longer I can keep contacting you like this. If it were to be known that I was feeding you information...”

The voice trailed off, and Keitarou sighed.

“There’s something else you’ve not told me, and I think it’s time you did,” he said frankly. “I can tell by the pitch of your voice that something serious has occurred on the other side of the Sekkiseki wall. You tell me abruptly that shinigami are planning to come here, but offer me no background or rationale for this sudden decision. I promised that you would not be implicated in anything I do, and I will keep that vow — but I need you to keep your side of the bargain. If you don't..."

"You didn't tell me that murdering a Vice Captain was on the cards," the voice came back accusingly, and Keitarou's eyes narrowed to slits.

"A Vice Captain?"

"Yes. Endou Souja of the Seventh. He was brought back here in some state and died of his wounds not long after."

"I see," Keitarou inwardly cursed Sakaki's hasty blade, then, "And you're grieving, are you, for the loss of a Vice Captain shinigami? You mourn his passing — he was known to you?"

"Barely at all," the voice snapped back impatiently. "I have no opinion of the Endou and had nothing to do with the boy himself — no, that's not my implication."

"An unpleasant reminder, then, perhaps?" Keitarou asked softly. "An officer's corpse in the Rukon is a little too close to comfort for you, even after all these years?"

"That's neither here nor there," the voice retorted, though Keitarou felt the ripple in the spiritual connection and knew that his contact's feelings were more unsettled than they were trying to let on. "A Vice Captain was attacked on your side of the divide, and then allowed to escape back here, bringing information about you, your daughter, and goodness knows what other facts and figures. If he had gone much further, would he have found out about me? Did he find out about me? I thought you at least had the weapons there to make sure that silencing an enemy was done swiftly and without mess. Then this happens, and all hell is let loose."

"I thought you told me you'd put your faith in me... that you were happy to find someone else who shared your vision of Seireitei," Keitarou challenged. "I thought we forged an agreement in light of that — was I wrong?"

"We made such a pact," the voice agreed flatly, "but Endou Souja was the only male heir of District Seven's Clan, and so his death isn't going to be ignored. You've hyped up the whole of Seireitei by letting him come back here in the way he did — and that makes me worry that you can't protect me after all. That was also part of the deal... my safety and rank preserved even when the rest of Seireitei comes crashing down. A lightning strike in the darkness, that was what you said — and why I entrusted you with so many secrets. Now this happens. You must understand my apprehension. Unlike you, I live here. If my real intentions were to be known...”

“Endou Souja,” Keitarou clicked his tongue against the roof of his mouth pensively. “I’m sorry, but the death of the boy wasn’t by my order. Unfortunately it was a vigilante killing... and I was unaware that it was going to take place, so could do nothing to prevent it.”

“I thought you had ways and means of finding out important information like that!”

“So did I,” Keitarou admitted, “but apparently I was mistaken.”

“Well? The boy made it back here and his dying words implicated you. Is there anything else I should know about what he discovered — what he might have told Endou Hirata?” The voice was bitter and wary, and Keitarou rubbed his temples wearily.

“I didn’t meet with him, so any connection to me is entirely circumstantial,” he said gravely. “Even my wife doesn’t know your name, nor do my children, so there is no way that any of this could be traced back to you.”

“You are sure about that?” The voice was tinged with doubt. “Time has passed and people have forgotten, but it wouldn’t take much to revive a memory, and maybe even more than that. If people started asking questions, they might put pieces together and realise... so if Souja-dono might’ve found anything that connected you to me...”

“If you have not already been slashed down by the Wind Hawk, I imagine your secret remains safe,” Keitarou said acerbically.

“Perhaps, but his people remain in mourning. I have barely seen anything of him... it’s hard to know what District Seven are planning and I wanted to be sure.”

“What could possibly connect you to me?” Keitarou’s voice was bitter. “Don’t we belong on opposite sides of the divide? You told me that the first time I met you — that you believed in my vision for the future, because it was a vision of chaos, death and revenge, and it suited you well to be aligned with it — but that was all. Why would anyone suspect you and I of working together? You’re becoming jumpy and paranoid — and it’s that behaviour which will create suspicion, nothing else.”

“Fine,” the voice conceded, and Keitarou was sure he heard a note of relief. “If it’s that way, then I’ll have to believe you. It’s true, you haven’t let me down yet... but this vision of yours is slow coming and now it seems to have hit a snag. It's your mess to clear up, not mine — but I just want to be sure that, when we strike... everything will be as you promised it would be. I've waited more than twenty years for the perfect moment to settle the loose ends, and I won't be happy if you let it slip away. Especially since I entrusted so much to you."

"Such brazen words from one so concerned about losing their own position," Keitarou said sarcastically, "especially from one in such a poor position they cannot act decisively for themselves."

There was a snort from the other end of the line.

"You know and I know that everything rests on you not screwing up," came the retort. "If you really mean to change the world, Keidono, letting Clan sons be murdered is a careless way of giving the Gotei undue warning and sending them scurrying into your territory looking for clues. I'll trust you to fix it — this time — but my position here is not a bargaining chip, and if I think it's under threat, I will pull out. We are not kin, and I am not one of your errant offspring. I owe you no loyalty, whatever you might think."

"You are grumpy today," Keitarou sighed. "I'm as aggrieved as you are that this happened the way it did. I have taken measures this side of the divide, and I trust they will be enough — but I have taken damage from this all the same. I am not worried about what the Endou boy might have said to his father, nor really afraid of Hirata-dono's Wind Hawk, not now. I am perfectly able to meet and tackle these threats head on, if need be, and have confidence in my ability to defend the Rukon territory alone, if that's what it takes. At present, other things concern me. Tell me, if you can, the circumstances surrounding Souja-dono's return to Seireitei? I am missing two of my agents and I would like to know what has become of them... perhaps you know."

"Two?" A humourless chuckle trickled across the connection. "That was very careless of you."

"I don't have time for you to mock me," Keitarou could not keep the impatience from his voice. "One of them matters little to my operation, and if he dies, so be it — in fact, it might be better should he do so, if, as I think, he has been captured by Seireitei's forces. I learned from Katsura that they had been tracking him — if he's become a liability, the sooner he's silenced the better. But the other..."

"The liability... the Onmitsukidou?" The voice became thoughtful. "I have heard that Second Division have such a creature in their care."

They claim to know him, though the Onmitsukidou are by nature reluctant to reveal information to outside authorities. I believe he was captured by Ukitake Juushirou, though, and things have slipped through the Thirteenth Division channels as a result.”

“As I thought,” Keitarou grimaced. “Ukitake Juushirou is going to be a problem for me... never mind. But you say the man was captured?”

“The same night that Endou Souja disappeared. Seireitei believe he was sent as a decoy to distract the shinigami from the attack on Souja-dono. Is that not the case?”

“Not at all,” Keitarou said blackly. “If I had meant to kill Souja, he would not have made it back to Seireitei. In fact, he would not have made it anywhere. I have made people disappear before, and I could have done so again. This was not my doing, and I am simply trying to limit the damage that the event left in its wake.”

“So your Onmitsukidou was working on his own?” The spy was startled, and Keitarou sighed.

“I don’t know what happened,” he said honestly. “He disappeared from Rukongai three, maybe four days before I noticed he was gone. I’m not worried that he’ll talk in captivity, nor that they will identify him, since that cannot be traced back to me directly. It just makes my job a little more difficult without him on the other side of the divide. I know I can’t rely on you to become actively involved in the things he did.”

“Decidedly not,” the voice spoke emphatically, and Keitarou’s lips twisted into a dry smile.

“So the Gotei have Kurotsuchi, and that’s all you can tell me?” he asked softly. “I said that two of my agents were missing — and one of them still has some material value to me. I would like to retrieve him — preferably unharmed — before the Gotei find him.”

“Another agent,” the voice mused slowly, then, “you believe him to have come here — but also not on your orders?”

“I haven’t a damn clue,” Keitarou muttered, fighting the flickers of uncertain rage that threatened to build up within his heart as he remembered Sakaki and Katsura’s accounts of the crime scene. “The last information I have of him is that he was in the vicinity of the Endou boy and that was all. I know he was there, and it’s possible the Endou took him as a hostage, but...”

“A peal of derisive laughter rippled across the connection, cutting

Keitarou off mid-flow, and it was all the scientist could do not to explode the kidou communication link with a flare of exasperated reiryoku.

“A hostage?” the voice was faintly amused. “I didn’t see the Endou boy when he was still alive, Kei-dono, but I saw him when he was dead. I know full well that he died of his injuries which were horrific to say the least. He was savaged — and in no fit state to stand up on his own, let alone take any of your people hostage. But there is something I might be able to tell you. It won’t please you to know it, maybe, but I’m only an informant, and I can’t help that. Like I said, cleaning up the mess is your problem — if you haven’t spoken to anyone about me, then the aftermath is no concern of mine. A young boy was with Souja-dono when he was found. Seventh’s Third Seat carved her blade into him, but he still lives. He is tight in shinigami custody, though... could that be the agent that you seek?”

“Maybe,” Keitarou responded cautiously, but his heart sank into his sandals at this confirmation of his deepest fear. “You say he was with Souja-dono? In what respect, with?”

“I don’t know all the particulars,” the voice reflected, “but I believe the Council decided he came as an ally. He helped the Vice Captain return here alive. That is why I hesitate to call him an ally or an agent of yours — but it is the only other individual I know anything about.”

“Does the lad have a name?”

“I believe they call him ‘Koku’.”

“I see,” Keitarou closed his eyes, pain rippling across his brow.

So it was you, Koku. Katsura was right. You are sicker than I thought — and that sickness drove you to attack Sakaki and follow a Shinigami home. I wish I had been more perceptive to the signs. That day I found you beating your fists on the wall till you drew blood, it should have told me that things were running more deeply inside you. Your fear of death has driven you to do something reckless and foolish — and if they discover who you are...

He opened his eyes.

“Did you say the boy was hurt?”

“He was, but he’s been treated and he will recover,” the spy responded thoughtfully. “I believe he’s in the care of a healer called Edogawa Mitsuki, within the Thirteenth Division compound.”

“Edogawa... Mitsuki?”

Ice trickled down Keitarou's spine at the sound of the name. I tried so hard to kill you, and yet now I owe you Koku's life? But at what price? And Thirteenth Division... dammit, Juushirou, what do you think you know? Are you really going to be as much of a problem for me as Kohaku's predictions said you would? All these things that are coming together in an ugly kind of pattern... but without Koku, without every piece in its rightful place, the whole plan will unravel. Bad enough the shinigami are coming here... I must do everything I can to divert attention from the Spiritless Zone whilst I work out a way to get Koku back.

Out loud he said,

"And that's all you can tell me?"

"All?" the voice snorted. "It seems plenty for now, don't you think?"

"Maybe," Keitarou pursed his lips. "All right. Then I'll break off the link — but I want you to promise me that if anything... significant occurs in the meantime, either within the Gotei or specifically with the Thirteenth Division's unexpected guest... you find a way to let me know. Without Kurotsuchi, you are the only source of information I have there... and it's important that I know what's going on."

"Thirteenth's boy does belong to you, doesn't he?"

"I'm very afraid that he does, and that he might be in very grave danger," Keitarou admitted. "I don't have time to explain more about it now — if the Gotei are coming, I have a lot of work to do. I'm grateful for your information, as ever."

He spread his hands, watching the glimmer of light fragment and fade as the connection broke, and for a moment he just sank down onto the ground, rubbing his temples as he processed everything the spy had told him.

Koku is in Seireitei. Koku is in Seireitei, with Ukitake Juushirou. And, worse than that, in close proximity to where the foxes are.

He buried his head in his arms.

Sakaki, I wish you'd kept your blade to yourself. Even had the Vice Captain escaped intact, that would've been better than this. Koku's phobia of death drove him to do something he shouldn't have done, and this is the result. I'm sure Katsura sees it too, although he hasn't said it in as many words. Koku's condition has been getting slowly worse, ever since the deaths in the Spiritless Zone. Since then, he's been more and more erratic, and seeing a dying shinigami before him on the ground must have proven too much for him to ignore. I should have seen it more clearly... should have protected him more carefully... but now all I can do is cover our tracks here and work out a way of getting him safely back before Juushirou realises...

He took a deep breath into his lungs, forcing himself back to his feet.

First things first. The sword, and then, the Senkaimon. Enough to buy us time... enough to allow the villagers we've protected to settle and integrate into the Spiritless Zone. We can swell our forces by extending our protection to the people there, and so we will. Some of them will know Katsura, anyway, and that will help. Koku is my problem to solve and I will think on it as I work... there are no problems without solutions, and if I think on it hard enough, I'm sure I can work this one out!

He pulled back the cloth door of his hut, stepping out into the weak light of the Rukon sun and pulling Chudokuga pensively from his belt, glancing at his reflection in its clear blade for a moment.

You allow your personal feelings to sway you too far. You will never triumph over the shinigami if all you do is fret over the loss of one or other of your pawns.

The spider's hissing voice scuttled across his thoughts, and Keitarou's brow creased, shaking his head impatiently.

That's not it, Chudokuga. You know... you understand why I can't sacrifice Koku to the Gotei. You understand what I would be giving up to them — if they knew...

It is not like you to put all your reliance on one individual.

Chudokuga's voice carried censure, and Keitarou's grip tightened around the hilt of the tantou knife, resisting the urge to throw the weapon in frustration against the trunk of a nearby dead tree. As though sensing his thought processes, Chudokuga let out a low chuckle, and the scientist was aware of the spider's shadow falling heavily across his consciousness.

You can act all you like. We both know that your reason for protecting that boy is more than just a matter of experimentation.

I need him. That's all.

Do you? I thought you and I needed nobody but each other.

Chudokuga was derisive.

First the hime, then the mewling brats and who knows what else? You foist your attention off on those who surround you and it weakens your resolve. You could have rent deeper wounds in Soul Society the last time, by tearing apart the Kuchiki, but instead you chose to retreat and protect your woman and as a result you almost died. True, in the long run those events proved unexpectedly beneficial to both of us, but after taking the effects of that Kinnya's blade, it's only the devil's luck that allowed you to scramble away with your life. Your ruthlessness is failing you, and if you lose that, you lose your only advantage over their swords and spells. You are not a shinigami like them — attachment is weakness. Trust is only a shade away from reliance, and only the weak rely on others to do their duty for them.

True, but this is a battle where numbers matter.

Keitarou rubbed his temples, a dull ache beginning beneath his skull.

I understand, Chudokuga. I haven't forgotten the emotions that summoned you, nor the hatred that forged my blade. But Koku is important. Retrieving him is important. He is the key... to whether we win or whether we lose.

Can you trust him? You only have those cryptic scraps of paper to suggest you are right.

I can't risk not trusting them. Even when I don't understand, all I can do is push forward and believe in them.

Keitarou raised his right arm, carving Chudokuga's blade through the atmosphere, slicing through the heavy air and splitting it into a yawning black divide.

For now, though, I must go to other places and prepare other plans. The Shinigami will come here, and then they must go somewhere else. I need your help in creating that smokescreen, and then I'm afraid we need to go somewhere else.

Ah.

Chudokuga's glittering, arachnoid eyes bored into the scientist's mind.

That's more like it. I thought you had put all your eggs in one basket, but it seems I was wrong. You intend on using them, then, even after all this time?

I had hoped there would be no need, but it seems that I was wrong.
Keitarou sighed.

We go to the Real World, Chudokuga... and then, with your help, I'm going to unseal Kusakawa's vault.

So, Keitarou had the power of prophesy.

Shunsui walked briskly along the wooden walkway that led to the big chamber given over to the Captains for their meetings, his brow furrowed in deep thought as he ran over the deductions of the previous day in his mind. Although Sora had pointed out to him all the weaknesses in his logic, as the hours had passed from evening into night, Shunsui had become more and more convinced that his hunch was correct and that the ripped, blood-stained piece of paper Kikyue had discovered in her brother's mangled uniform was something far more sinister than a list of apparently unconnected words.

The only trouble was that Shunsui could not work out how Keitarou had come by such a talent.

Chudokuga is a manipulative sword, and it can make other people do things at his whim, but I can't imagine him pushing it this far.

His eyes became slits as he pondered over the possibilities.

Hirata said he took reidoku and used that to enable him to escape with Eiraki, but according to the descriptions of his cousin Seimaru fighting under the influence of that potion, it only enhanced natural spiritual ability, it didn't create entirely new ones. More, the effect was only designed to be temporary — although there's no accounting for the advances he might have made in the formula in the two or three years between Seimaru's death and the murder of Kuchiki Ribari. It's also possible that the solution Seimaru had was deliberately dilute... without a sample for the Urahara to run tests on, all I'm working on is assumptions. But I'm sure I'm right. The whole idea seems crazy and farfetched, but I can't help but think it's the core clue to this whole business. What exactly am I going to bring up to the Captains this morning, though? My evidence is flimsy and it's all theorising and supposition. Still, I daren't keep it to myself. If it's important... if Souja died for it... then the other Captains need to know and quickly.

"You look deep in thought this morning,"

Juushirou's voice made him glance up in surprise, his expression becoming one of rueful sheepishness as he registered the fact that he had reached his destination without even realising it. His friend had clearly waited for him, and from the weariness etched into the other's pale features, Shunsui was sure his former classmate had also passed a restless night trying to patch together fragments of information. His mind flitted to the injured boy in Thirteenth Division's care, and he frowned.

"I had some things to think about, things I'll mention later," he said frankly, leaning across to pull back the divide and gesturing for his companion to follow him. “What about you? You learn anything from your waif and stray?”

“He’s regained consciousness, but I haven’t had a chance to speak to him yet,” Juushirou shook his head with a tired sigh. “Kirio has, and apparently he says he found Souja already injured and didn’t see any assailant — but she thinks there’s something he’s not telling us, and wants me to talk to him myself when Mitsuki gives the go ahead. She’s still trying to win his trust — but apparently the lad is understandably wary of shinigami at present and she thinks he’s holding back in case we hurt him.”

“Because of Kikyue’s strike?” Shunsui questioned, and Juushirou shrugged.

“Possibly that’s a part of it,” he agreed. “However, even if he is keeping something back, it’s possible he told Kirio the truth. I don’t see how he would have had a run in with a homicidal swordswoman who slew a Vice Captain and not pick up any injuries. Kikyue’s blade strike was the only wound on his body... so it suggests he wasn’t involved in any fighting before he encountered her.”

“Which means we don’t have a witness at the scene of the crime?” Shunsui asked.

“I wish I knew what we had,” Juushirou admitted. “Kirio said that the lad referred to Kikyue as a ‘kestrel’...and it startled her enough for her to report his exact words to me when she came to tell me he was awake.”

“A kestrel?” Shunsui pursed his lips. “Now how would he know that, after one brief encounter?”

“No idea, but apparently he said it quite naturally, as though he hadn’t realised it was strange that he should know, so I’m not sure what to make of it,” Juushirou sighed. “That coupled with the fact he apparently called Mitsuki by name the first time he saw her...”

“I see,” Shunsui’s eyes darkened. “That is peculiar. One might say conveniently coincidental.”

“I think so too,” Juushirou admitted, “and yet Mitsuki is adamant that there’s no aggression in his aura. More, he was frightened by her presence, as though he thought she would hurt him, not the other way around. As for the kestrel, I can’t explain how he knew that, especially since Kikyue didn’t release her sword when she took him down. All in all he’s proving confusing and that confusion is costing me sleep. I want to figure out what's what before I meet with him, but it's proving hard."

"Well, maybe the information I'm bringing to the meeting will help, though I doubt it," Shunsui sighed. "Between you and me, Juu, I don't really understand what I've found — or think I've found. If I'm right about it, the whole idea is terrifying. But the things you've just said to me about your waif... make me think about it all the more. I just wish I knew if I was veering off on an odd angle."

"I'm all ears," Juushirou shot him a curious look, but the other man shook his head.

"I'll share it inside, before the others," he said evenly. "I think it's better that they think this particular insanity is all my own."

"That bad, huh?" Juushirou asked, and Shunsui inclined his head in a sad nod.

"Fraid so," he confessed. "I don't know how they'll take it. Even Sora's not fully convinced of it."

"Well, there's a lot going on, so even wild guesses are better than blank faces," Juushirou observed. "Especially now there's this meeting. The trip to Rukongai worries me. It could be dangerous, it could be a trap, and..."

"A trap?" Shunsui arched an eyebrow. "You think Souja's murder was an invitation for the rest of us to 'come and get slaughtered'?"

"Like I said, I don't know," Juushirou rubbed his temples. "It's all too bitty and we don't know enough. Which brings me back to your news — at least tell me it has some kind of foundation?"

"It's about something disturbing Kikyue gave me, that she found on Souja's uniform," Shunsui said grimly. "I have a hunch about it and it's a hunch I don't like. I'm not sure if I'll convince the other Captains, but I can't think of it in any other light. Even if you don't agree with me when I explain, Juu, do me a favour and back me up? It is insanity, and terrifying insanity, but I can't shake the feeling it's important, and if you second it, it might prevent the others from rolling over me roughshod."

"Well, I'll try. Your hunches usually pan out," Juushirou looked surprised. He moved to enter the big meeting chamber, but Shunsui grabbed his arm, pulling him back.

"Shunsui?"

"You know what a dangerous game you're playing, don't you?" The Clansman murmured, and Juushirou's eyes widened in consternation.

"Dangerous... what do you mean?"

Shunsui glanced about him furtively, making sure that nobody else was around, then lowered his voice.

"You realise that kid of yours... your stray... is probably from... the other side?"

Juushirou's expression clouded, and Shunsui nodded his head.

"I thought so," he muttered with a sigh. "You do know, only you're playing like you don't because you know that crossing the Rukon divide is a death sentence."

"This is a bad place to talk about it," Juushirou retorted. "I don't see why raising that subject matters right at the moment. Yes, I'm pretty sure the lad's from the Rukon, and that's why Souja was so hot on protecting him... but it's not like he came here to break the law. He was helping one of ours — in those circumstances..."

"Agreed, but it makes what I'm going to tell the Captains a little tricky," Shunsui grimaced. "I'm sure it hasn't escaped you either that there's a possibility he knows about Keitarou, and that's what he's holding back?"

"Yes, but that doesn't automatically make him Keitarou's ally," Juushirou pointed out. "He tried to save Souja, and from Souja's own words, the one who killed him was probably Keitarou's daughter. If anything, if Koku did know Keitarou in any capacity, he put himself in a lot of danger to help a shinigami. If he's holding back, and he's afraid, then that's just as likely to be the reason."

"Even despite the information he seems conveniently in possession of?"

"Yes..." Juushirou pressed his lips together, a troubled look entering his hazel eyes. "I don't know. My angle on it at present is that he stumbled into something he shouldn't and it frightened him enough that he's unwilling to talk too much to us in case it lands him in danger. Mitsuki was in Rukongai, don't forget. True, not the same part of it — probably — but if the killer of Souja was as Unohana-taichou believes, the same as that who killed Mitsuki's enemies, it's possible information trickled over the divide. And I'm growing more and more convinced that the wasteland Rukon isn't as abandoned as we've been led to believe it is."

"We agree on that point, at least," Shunsui grimaced. "I only hope that habitation doesn't indicate that Keitarou's set up his own kingdom within a jurisdictional loophole."

"It looks that way, doesn't it?" Juushirou rubbed his temples. "Or he imposed himself on the people who were living there, and subjugated them, knowing we weren't looking his way and wouldn't show up to defend them. Maybe Koku is one of those people and he helped Souja for that reason... but right now, there are still more questions than answers. I just can't believe he's an enemy, when he took such a risk coming here."

"You don't think he's a spy?"

"A clumsy kind of spy, to be sliced up by someone's sword the moment he appears in Seireitei."

"True," Shunsui conceded. "I admit it does seem a little haphazard. Maybe you're right."

"In any event, his actions shouldn't be ignored and I gave Souja my word that Thirteenth would look after him," Juushirou concluded. "I'm sure Souja knew just as sure as you or I where he came from — I'm sure they met in the Rukon. That's why he was so adamant, and why I won't let him down. It's all I can do for him, so I'll do it right."

"I can see you've taken this on principle, and I won't change your mind, so all right," Shunsui sighed. "If I worked it out, though, I think it unlikely others won't come to think of it, too. I'll try and bluff it out for now, because what I have I can't hold back — but Juu, be careful, all right? You know there are Captains who will pounce on you for any irregularity they can find, just to shunt you out of office and shielding a Rukongai interloper is a pretty serious thing."

"I know, but right now he's the only witness we have and I'm going to protect him," Juushirou said simply. "I appreciate your concern, but it'll be all right. If there's a storm, I'll ride it out. It won't be the first time, and I'm sure it won't be the last."

"Well, just be careful. Not all storms live inside your blade," Shunsui reminded him, nonetheless releasing his grip on his friend's sleeve. "Then if your mind is made up, we should go inside. The sun's getting higher in the sky and I imagine we're some of the last to arrive, judging by how quiet it is out here."

"You're usually the last to arrive, so its almost certainly the case," a wry smile touched Juushirou's pale lips. "Come on."

As Juushirou had surmised, they were the last Captains to take up their positions in the long, high-ceilinged hall, but although Atsushi shot them a grim glare at their entrance, he was given no opportunity to voice any petty grumbles. The mood of the chamber was sombre, made all the more so by the fact there was no representation from the Seventh Division, and once the two late comers had made their apologies and taken their places, Urahara Nagesu stepped forward. As leader of the Council he was also currently in authority over the Captains, as no formal agreement had been made regarding divisional seniority, but Shunsui could tell the reluctance with which the quiet, pragmatic man took the floor. He removed his glasses, rubbing them on his haori absently before returning them to their perch atop his nose, and then let out a heavy sigh.

“There’s no point beginning this with niceties,” he said grimly. “We’re here because of Souja-dono’s death, because of his evidence and because of the matters discussed and authorised by the Council of Elders in regards to further action. The decision — as many of you already know — is to go to Rukongai. We are here this morning to decide, therefore, who will go and when.”

There was a brief pause, then,

“I think it should be sooner, rather than later. If Keitarou is behind the Endou Clan’s tragedy, then we cannot waste any time in tracking him down.”

“I will send Kai and others from the Onmitsukidou, if so required,” Midori spoke up, her own expression grim. “I think it would be as well, given the nature of the mission, that some of our operatives are dispatched. Also, it’s no secret, unfortunately, that a former member of our division has been implicated in this business in some way. Therefore the grudge is ours as well as the Endou Clan’s and we must investigate that to the best of our ability.”

“The man you have in custody is confirmed as one of the Onmitsukidou?” Guren asked quizzically, and Midori’s expression became even darker as she shrugged.

“He hasn’t confessed, but it seems very likely,” she said at length. “What is for certain, though, is that he has some knowledge of matters that Souja-dono also raised in his final testimony. My brother reported to me that he had mentioned Aizen Kohaku — who the Council believe to be Keitarou’s son and heir. The prisoner taunted Kai with threats about the power levels this ‘Kohaku’ person possessed, and intimated that it was a level and nature that could destroy Soul Society completely.”

“Are you serious?” Mareiko’s pale eyes widened in dismay, and Midori grimaced.

“What is truth and what is fiction is hard to tell at present, but he meant us to know about it and I’m reporting it because we can’t take the chance it’s not true,” she said reluctantly. “What nature of power this is I don’t know... but if our prisoner spoke true, it’s something we want to tackle with extreme care. I imagine that it will be necessary to kill this Kohaku person if at all possible. Kai reported that the prisoner referred to him as a ‘creature’, and an ‘it’...I’m not sure what significance that has, but it has an ominous sound to it that we don’t really like. It’s possible that this Kohaku is a hollowfied experiment of Keitarou’s.”

“Perhaps in the line of what he did to my brother some five and twenty years ago,” Guren’s eyes darkened.

“There is that possibility,” Midori agreed gravely. “I didn’t encounter Seiren-dono in his altered state, but from what I’ve heard of it...”

“Seiren-dono’s native spirit power was unfortunately allowed to overload his natural reserves and defences,” Retsu agreed sombrely. “He is a man of fierce resolve, else I am sure he would not have retained enough rationality to be brought back from the brink. I understood Seiren-dono’s condition to have been the result of unsealing his native spirit power in which there were already imperfections — but Keitarou was indeed involved in the breaking of the seal. It is possible that he did more than just unleash Seiren-dono’s reiryoku— and that he is capable of doing the same to other individuals.”

Atsushi’s eyes narrowed, and Shunsui took in the sudden tension that flickered through the man’s lean frame.

“Rukon individuals with higher than average spiritual power,” he murmured, more than half to himself, but Retsu nodded.

“It is possible,” she agreed sadly. “Discussion at the Council has indicated that he has carried out such experiments on Seireitei District individuals. There is no reason to suppose that he would not spread his interests to souls in the Rukon... whether they possessed natural spirit power or they did not.”

“Exactly,” Midori nodded. “Therefore we think it best to deploy forces trained in the darker arts of combat just in case.”

“I will also go to the Rukon,” Nagesu said heavily. “I feel that I should — or Mareiko — because of the need to analyse scientific evidence at the scene.”

“I would sooner stay out of such a mission, Nagesu-sama,” Mareiko tugged absently at her wild blond hair, looking distressed. “If Midori-sama is right... sending my people to the Rukon... and they might not come back...”

She faltered, chewing on her lip, and Atsushi snorted.

“We are a military organisation, Sekime-taichou. Your subordinates are trained fighters, or they should be.” he said, his tones unusually sharp. “Unless, of course, you have other reasons not to want to send Twelfth Division to the Rukon.”

Mareiko raised her gaze, shooting him a reproachful look, and Shunsui saw her left hand inch unconsciously towards her right shoulder, before dropping back down at her side.

“I am an expert in Kidou, Atsushi-dono, and my team put all our effort into supporting Nagesu-sama’s scientific research,” she said quietly, “but not all of us are combat fighters of the same calibre as yourself. If Nagesu-sama requires Twelfth to deploy to Rukongai, then we will, of course, do as we are bidden — but there are surely squads better suited to that kind of deployment than our own.”

To Shunsui’s surprise, Atsushi flinched, opening his mouth as if to speak, but then pausing, as though he thought better of it, and Nagesu held up his hand to prevent the conversation from continuing.

Funny. I thought the Eleventh and the Twelfth had a good working relationship... but there was something in Mareiko-chan’s eyes then that I haven’t seen there before. More, Minaichi felt it — whatever it was she said, he felt it right to his core. I’ve never seen him pull that face before. He looked haunted... as though he was carrying a heavy burden and someone had come far too close to unravelling it.

Shunsui met Juushirou’s gaze across the chamber, and his friend gave an imperceptible shrug of his shoulders, clearly just as flummoxed by the exchange.

“It is my duty, given the nature of my relationship with Keitarou and my position as Chair of the Council to go myself, and I am willing to do so,” Nagesu was speaking now, so Shunsui turned his attention back to the matter at hand. “Mareiko, your concerns are noted and accepted. Twelfth need not send representation to Rukongai, but instead I will ask you to put your people to analysing some of the data that comes back. There will likely be too much for Third to manage on their own, given the wide space I believe we will have to cover.”

“With pleasure,” Mareiko looked relieved. “That we can do, and will do, to the utmost of our ability.”

“Is it a good idea for the Head of the Urahara Clan to take such a risk?” Kyouki looked doubtful. “Nagesu-kun, what if Keitarou takes a pot shot at you whilst you’re there? The Endou have already suffered grievously — it wouldn’t do for your family to take a similar blow. The Rukon is an unknown quantity — and more losses there at officer level would be unfortunate, not to mention catastrophic.”

“I have sons,” Nagesu said matter-of-factly, and Shunsui was surprised at the glittery of steely resolve that glinted briefly behind the spectacles. “My Clan’s succession is not in doubt, and my sons will not accompany me on this mission. Shiketsu already knows that I feel a certain amount of personal responsibility in this case, as it is Keitarou we are dealing with. I will go, Kyouki-dono, and if I find him, I will try and take him in Seireitei’s name. I am decided on this — it is my duty, just as it always has been, so I will go.”

“Then it’s a matter of deciding who should accompany you,” Retsu looked thoughtful. “Nagesu-sama, with your permission, I should like to send healers with you to the Rukon. You do not know what trouble you may encounter there.”

“If you can spare them, I would be grateful for their inclusion,” Nagesu looked somewhat relieved, and Retsu smiled.

“I will send my Vice Captain and one of my young members whose skills are extremely reliable,” she decided. “I do not think I can spare more than two at present. Mitsuki-san is still not healed, and nor is Seri-san, whilst I would rather not send Madeki-kun back to Rukongai so soon after his recent experiences there. My numbers remain depleted, but I believe that Eriko-san and Shikiki ought to be enough.”

“Shikiki?” Juushirou looked startled, and Retsu nodded her head.

“Shikiki’s spiritual aura is gentle and will not cause any further contamination within Rukongai,” she agreed gravely. “Her skills may also be in demand. I am already aware, Ukitake-taichou, that had she been on hand in Inner Seireitei the night of Souja-dono’s assault, she may have been the only one capable of saving his life. She was not here and I regret that fact. It seems certain now that Souja-dono was attacked in Rukongai. Therefore it seems wise for me to learn from that previous insufficiency and to send such a healer over the divide in the hope of averting a similar tragedy.”

“That does make sense,” Hakubei admitted. “Ukitake, she might be your sister, but in the circumstances...”

“I wasn’t going to say otherwise,” Juushirou shook his head, though Shunsui picked up on the flicker of his friend’s aura and knew that the other Captain was not entirely happy with the decision. “It’s as Unohana-taichou says... her skills are unique and best suited to this kind of expedition.”

“I think it’s a pretty for sure thing that you won’t be going with her, however,” Kyouki reflected, and Juushirou stared at her in surprise.

“Kyouki-sama?”

“Kyouki-sama is right,” Midori said briskly. “You have a history with Keitarou, and besides, your reiatsu is far too potent for the Rukon. Your control over it is a lot better than it was the first time I met you, but I think we all know that sending you over the divide when the enemy is someone you have personal knowledge of is a bad idea. Sougyo no Kotowari is a fine blade, and also one that should not be inflicted on the people of the Rukon valley.”

“I thought this mission was into abandoned Rukongai space?” Yuuichi protested, but Juushirou sighed, rubbing his temples.

“If Keitarou is there, it’s not abandoned,” he said wearily. “Kyouki-sama is probably right about my sword... and that he might try to goad me or worse, if he and I were to meet face to face. Besides... we don’t know how many people he has around him. It’s clearly not just him any more — not even just him and Eiraki-hime. There are the two children to account for, and who knows how many other allies. It’s all right. I don’t intend to ask to go along.”

“I, on the other hand, want to,” Shunsui said lazily, and everyone turned to stare at him, surprise and disbelief mirrored in their gazes. At their expressions he laughed, holding up his hands in mock surrender.

“What? Is it so strange that I’d volunteer for work?”

“Pretty strange,” Hakubei recovered himself, offering the man a wry smile. “Well? Is there a reason for this sudden bolt of lightning? Rukongai’s not much of a holiday destination, and I’m sure that it won’t be a sake-filled trip.”

“I think I should, there are things I want to look into,” Shunsui replied simply. “I don’t think that Nagesu-sama should be left to deal with it all himself, either — given that he’s a Clan head and has personal involvement. Well, I’m no Clan head, and though Aizen is an old Kyouraku name, the bloodlines between Keitarou and my family are so tenuous they’re practically invisible. I’m probably dispensable, in the worst case scenario. Sora's a good Vice Captain, the squad would listen to her and all would be well even if something befell me. Most of you have Clans to look after, and so I figure it's time I stood up and did my bit."

"And the real reason?" Kyouki arched an eyebrow.

Shunsui attempted a hurt look, but as the Shiba Clan leader's gaze bored into his he sighed, shrugging his shoulders.

"I received something from Hirata yesterday," he admitted. "It's a bit messy, and I don't know entirely what it's about yet, but it's a note that Kikyue found in Souja's uniform. I don't have the note any more — Hirata wanted it returned and so I didn't bring it here — but I think it's something the lad picked up in Rukongai and that it's a sort of a clue."

"A clue? From the Rukon?" Juushirou stared. "That's your important evidence — what kind of a note?"

"One that doesn't make much sense if read cold," Shunsui admitted. "It's very poetic and cryptic and talks about shrouds and hunters and trees growing in the wrong forest. I admit I don't have a lot to base my conclusions on at the moment, but when Sora and I were going over it yesterday, it struck me that it didn't sound like a normal coded message. There were things in it — themes — that were eerily familiar to recent events. A hunter being struck down — Souja being an Endou, with a hunting bird as his spirit. A holy tree with blooded branches — Souja said the girl who killed him was called Sakaki. And then the last part — about the wrong tree being cut down by a bitter blade. I think that refers to Kikyue's sword slicing up the poor waif Ukitake's taking care of. In short, I think it's a potted summary of Souja's murder and its aftermath."

"But you said Souja-dono brought it back from the Rukon with him," Mareiko murmured. Shunsui nodded.

"Which is why I said I have nothing to base my hunches on," he replied. "It sounds crazy... really far-fetched, but that element of it makes me certain I'm right. And if I am, it's a terrifying prospect. It means that someone knew what was going to happen to Souja before it happened, and Souja found and pocketed a description of his own death — probably without even realising what he'd found. I don't know where he found it, but I want to go poke around and see if I can't locate any more similar scraps of paper. It might be a long shot, but I feel like with Keitarou you can't take risks of ignoring long shots. If I'm wrong, well, it's just one of my crazy ideas and it didn't pan out — so much to the good. But if I'm right..."

"If you're right, Keitarou has a way of predicting the future?" Juushirou asked, horror clear in his hazel gaze, and Shunsui pulled a graphic face.

"It's what it looks like. I can't work out for the life of me how, but the note is too sinister to be a coincidence."

"Hirata-dono has this note now?" Guren asked, and Shunsui nodded.

"Yes. He said he wanted it after the meeting, but I didn't think it was my place to pass notes in a Captain's meeting, especially ones that might prove precious. I sent Sora to take it back to him this morning, when I was getting ready to come here."

"Then I think we should ask him to bring it before Council in the very near future," The Kuchiki said quietly. "In normal circumstances I would dismiss such a wild idea, but this is Aizen Keitarou and I agree with Shunsui-dono. There is nothing to be gained by underestimating this man — and much to lose, as Hirata-dono and myself have both learned in the most costly of ways."

"I agree," Juushirou said solemnly. "It sounds mad, but Sh... Kyouraku's right. That isn't a reason to doubt where Keitarou is concerned."

"Then Kyouraku-taichou will also accompany Nagesu-sama and my agents to the Rukon," Retsu said softly. "May I suggest that both of you take a few of your trusted subordinates to assist in the search? We have no specific bearings to follow, so the more numerous the force, the better."

"Too many people might constitute a target," Nagesu said thoughtfully, "but I think taking one or two individuals might be a good idea. Shunsui-dono, you should probably leave Sora-dono behind, but I'm sure you have other higher ranked officers you might take with you — ones with good spirit power control?"

"Probably," Shunsui agreed reluctantly. "I'll talk it over with Sora later, and we'll work out who'd be best to go. I had only factored in my own inclusion, and I don't really want to put my squad members at risk, but Unohana-taichou is right. We don't know what we're going into, and back up might be needed."

"Are no other squads sending representation?" Kyouki asked softly. "In the circumstances..."

“We have so far members from Third, Fourth, Eighth and the Onmitsukidou. I think that will suffice,” Nagesu shook his head. “There is no need to evacuate Seireitei to pursue this threat — on the contrary, if all our best fighters left this area, it would be an invitation to Keitarou to take advantage.”

“But with such a wide area to cover...” Guren mused. “Perhaps Kyouki-dono is right. Maybe we ought to be dispatching officers from our squads, too, for you and Shunsui-dono to command as you see fit.”

“That might not be necessary, Guren-sama,” Juushirou spoke up at that moment, and Shunsui cast him a questioning look.

“If you’re going to suggest deploying Thirteenth en masse, Juu, I’m not taking them,” he said pointedly, and Juushirou snorted, shaking his head impatiently.

“Don’t be stupid. I wasn’t going to say anything so reckless,” he said bluntly, “and don’t use that name here — we’re at a Captain’s meeting, not playing shougi in Ugendou. Whilst I would like to offer the services of my officers, I wanted to raise something of my own that came to my attention by coincidence following Souja-dono’s funeral.”

“Thirteenth doesn’t need to be a part of this, Ukitake,” Atsushi said disparagingly, clearly having regained his earlier lost composure, and Ukitake’s lips thinned.

“On the contrary, I think we should have representation on this mission, bearing in mind that Thirteenth Division has so far been involved in investigating the abductions and were responsible for the apprehension of the prisoner currently in Midori-sama’s custody,” he said coolly. “I will not go myself, because I accept Kyouki-sama’s reasoning — but with Nagesu-sama’s permission, I’d like to send my Third Seat with a couple of officers, just in case its of use.”

“Naoko-chan?” Shunsui let out a heavy sigh, but nodded. “Nagesu-sama, what do you think?”

“Thirteenth have had involvement in the other issues up till this point,” Nagesu acknowledged. “Very well. We will take three officers from Thirteenth, and they may report back to you on their return... Shunsui-dono, since you are acquainted with the officers in question better than I am, I will entrust them to your command.”

“That’s what I was afraid you might say,” Shunsui rubbed his temples, shooting Juushirou a rueful smile. “All right. Just promise me, J... Ukitake, that the ones you send with Naoko can act as a cushion between me and her sharp tongue?”

“You can have Atsudane and Kira,” Juushirou nodded. “Though I’m quite sure Naoko will cause you no trouble. She’s a good officer and listens well to commands.”

“Yours, perhaps,” Shunsui muttered, but he held up his hands in resigned acceptance, and Nagesu’s gaze flitted back to Juushirou.

“You had something else you wanted to raise, Ukitake?”

“I did,” Juushirou nodded. “Something I think might be of use.”

He fumbled at his obi, pulling out a rough sheet of paper. At least, it doesn’t make very clear sense to me, because I’m not scientific, but...”

“Scientific?” Mareiko’s pale eyes widened, and she held out a slender, soot-smudged hand. “May I see?”

“With pleasure,” Juushirou nodded, passing the document to his neighbour, who scanned over it thoughtfully, her brow creasing as she digested the data it contained.

“This is very detailed,” she murmured. “Where did you get it from, Ukitake-taichou? This style of theorem is extremely outdated, but perfectly legible and coherent.”

“I can’t answer that,” Juushirou admitted. “It came to me via a contact of Hirata’s, and I’ve taken responsibility for it in his absence. I wasn’t sure whether I would bring it before you today, but in light of the other discussions, I thought it might be important.”

“Not from the Rukon, then?” Atsushi snorted. “What value has it to us if it doesn’t connect to this meeting’s main theme?”

“Why would it be from the Rukon?” Juushirou looked taken aback at the vehemence in his companion’s voice. “If Keitarou is there, Minaichi-taichou, I assure you he isn’t sending me secret notes through his illicit Spirit Gates in order to help me crack his intentions.”

“What are you trying to imply?” Riled, Atsushi’s fingers twitched close to the hilt of his sword, before dropping down at his side, as though he had remembered where he was and in whose company. “I asked a reasonable question about the importance of random scientific data on top of everything else we have to look at. I simply wanted to know if it had come from the Rukon. Is it such a foolish question?”

“I’m not sure,” Juushirou was bewildered now. “I don’t see why whether it came from there or not matters, if it has relevant data to our investigation.”

“And you’ve yet to prove that it has any such value!” Atsushi exclaimed. “If it has such value to you, then I thought Souja-dono must have brought that back too, along with the data that Kyouraku-dono talked about. Your saying that’s not the case makes me wonder why you bothered to bring it here at all, and how it could have any bearing whatsoever on the work we’re embroiled in?”

“I’m sure Souja had no time to bring back a whole library of incriminating evidence with him,” Shunsui said lazily, “As it was, the scraps I had to look at were blooded and not in very good shape. Ukitake’s sheet is clean and crisp, if not exactly fresh. Logic suggests it came from a different source — so how about we save discussions about its worth until after we’re done hearing what it is, Minaichi-taichou?”

Atsushi bit his lip, his cheeks red with frustrated anger, but he made no further demur, and Juushirou sighed.

“Sekime-taichou, what do you make of it?” he asked softly.

“It’s certainly very thorough,” Mareiko admitted, passing it across to her Clan leader with a shrug. “I’m not sure whether it is relevant or not, though — Atsushi-dono might have a point in what he said. It looks as though it relates to the Seventh Division boy who was abducted — and we have no proof that that was connected to Souja-dono’s murder.”

“On the contrary, I think it likely there’s a strong connection between the two events,” Midori interjected, even as Nagesu’s brows twitched together in consternation at the neat lines of scientific data. “Kai reported to me that Tenichi became quite distressed when we called him to see our prisoner. He claimed not to have seen him before, but Kai wasn’t entirely convinced by his denials. And I’ve heard from Hirata that Souja was probably investigating Tenichi’s abduction when he was killed. There’s a link there — we just don’t have the proof to take action over it, that’s all.”

“The proof is probably here, if we find that this correlates with the part of Rukongai Souja-dono visited.” Nagesu glanced up, waving the sheet of paper and eying Juushirou quizzically. “You won’t tell us who gave you this?”

“I can’t say anything else about it. I gave my word,” Juushirou shook his head, meeting Shunsui’s eyes briefly, and the Eighth Division Captain’s eyes widened slightly as he realised where the mysterious sheet of notes must have come from.

Juu? Have you been playing with wild foxes in the time I've been wrestling with that note of Kikyue's? No wonder you look so harried — if you're juggling that and trying to hide that kid's Rukon roots... not to mention taking on new recruits... I'm glad you're not going to Rukongai as well. I think it might just be the last straw if you did... I need to remind Enishi to make sure you get some rest before I take Naoko-chan into the abyss.

"I also think that Souja's death has something to do with Tenichi's abduction," Juushirou was continuing, "but the information I received indicated that those tests were carried out when Tenichi was unconscious... after he was dumped back in Seireitei by whatever powers took him hostage. I didn't bring this here to imply he was complicit in anything — especially not Souja's murder."

"Nobody's saying that he was," Midori shook his head. "Right now we don't have evidence to make those kinds of assertions against an officer who has no record of insubordination, let alone anything more sinister. We believe that the memories he'd lost — or suppressed — as a result of his experiences may have started to come back. Kai said that Tenichi became particularly agitated when the name Aizen Kohaku was mentioned. So far that name has been kept to the highest level of security... but Tenichi acted as though he was fearful of it. I wonder whether he saw our prisoner and recognised him, but was frightened by the recollection. Which begs the question..."

"What happened to him to make him so afraid?" Retsu murmured. "I have read the assessments of Kotetsu-kun's condition following his return, and at that time he was disorientated and suffering from a degree of amnesia. However, suppressed memory in a case of severe trauma is not uncommon. It is medically possible that Kotetsu-kun is beginning to remember those things his brain wanted him to forget."

"Well, this data suggests he was taken to Rukongai. And if these mineral readings are correct, I might be able to work out a rough location for us to begin our search," Nagesu tapped the paper absently with his index finger. "Whoever wrote this knew their scientific principles. Mareiko is correct — the mode of approach is severely outdated, but the work itself doesn't seem to be inaccurate. Whilst I'm extremely curious to know what source could have produced it, Ukitake, following up the lead is more important at present."

"Thank you," Juushirou inclined his head. "I gave my word not to reveal where it came from, and I must keep that promise, no matter what, so I appreciate you not enquiring any further."

"Does Tenichi know you have all this data on him, by the way?"

Kyouki asked, and Juushirou shook his head.

“Like I said, he was unconscious at the time the samples were taken,” he replied. “I really don’t think that he’s anything more than a victim in this, Kyouki-sama. Even if he did see something that frightened him, and Midori-sama’s theorising is correct... I know him and can’t imagine him doing anything subversive.”

“Well, he certainly didn’t abduct himself, and he didn’t kill his Vice Captain, so I agree that it looks more like a case of wrong place, wrong time for the lad,” Hakubei rubbed his chin. “Midori-sama, were you wanting to interrogate Kotetsu about this?”

“Let’s see what the Rukon raid turns up first,” Midori shook her head. “If I’m right — and Tenichi did see this Kohaku — the fear might have been enough to make him forget about it. Alternatively, and given the nature of Keitarou’s sword, it’s not impossible that Kohaku has spirit power that relates to manipulation of memory. If that were the case, it might explain why Tenichi — and the minnows taken before him — remembered nothing of the experience.”

“But why take them?” Anabomi of the Ninth asked plaintively. “There seems little to be gained by that. Perhaps Kotetsu Tenichi was taken to Rukongai, but I still feel his kidnapping was not the same as the ones Minaichi and I experienced with our members. There was no demand made to the Endou that I recall...”

“There was,” Shunsui said grimly, and Juushirou nodded.

“A demand relating to secure Clan-related data he could not give,” he agreed blackly. “I agree with Anabomi-taichou, though. I think the kidnaps are different. I think Tenichi was taken for another purpose, and that purpose had the unexpected effect of taking Souja’s life. I don’t think Souja was the original target, though... he just found more than he bargained for and then had to be silenced. I think that Tenichi was used as bait in another trap.”

“A trap for what, Ukitake?” Yuuichi asked, and Juushirou shook his head.

“Only Keitarou knows for sure,” he replied with a shrug. “I’m not going to try and estimate how that man’s mind works. I’ve not yet managed to outthink him, and assumptions are dangerous things when he’s involved.”

Shunsui’s eyes narrowed slightly as he absorbed the evasiveness of this answer, and he knew his earlier assumption had been correct.

So it is the Kitsune you’re protecting. I wonder if it was Hirata who put the two of you together... or if it's something you've begun on your own. I hope it's not a dangerous gamble, courting foxes and protecting Rukon strays at the same time. Something bugs me about your stray and what you said earlier on — until I work out what it is, Juu, please be careful.

“Then the next step is to go to Rukongai,” Nagesu folded the sheet of scientific calculations, casting Juushirou a glance. “May I take this? I'd like to look over it in more detail.”

“Please, do,” Juushirou agreed. “The time for concealing evidence is past. One life too many has been lost, and we need to pool whatever resources we have to prevent any more tragedies.”

“In which case, we should leave as soon as possible,” Shunsui observed, and Nagesu nodded, sliding the parchment into the folds of his shihakushou.

“Tonight, at Third,” he said frankly. “I'll prime the gates... we'll leave at midnight. Meeting dismissed.”

The moon was cloaked by a heavy layer of cloud that evening, and an owl hooted mournfully as it flitted above the trees that grew to the south of the Kyouraku's Eighth Division compound. Shunsui locked the door of his office with a heavy heart, making his way along the short walkway towards the main entrance of the barracks and the path that would lead to Third Division's domain. Whilst he was eager to go and investigate on his own account, he was not looking forward to being in command of Juushirou's feisty, opinionated Third Seat, and he let out a rueful sigh as he stepped out into the cool night air, glancing up and hoping inwardly that it wasn't going to rain.

Although I don't know whether Rukongai will have the same kind of weather we have here. I've never been on that side of the divide, even if I did meet one or two women who'd escaped from there in my time as a reckless teen.

“Taichou?”

Kaoru was already waiting for him at the Eighth gateway, hopping excitedly from foot to foot as she contemplated the adventure ahead, and at the sight of her, Shunsui felt his heavy heart lift slightly.

“Well, you're ready right on time,” he greeted her warmly. “You're sure you don't mind coming into this with me? It might be dangerous, and whilst I've faith in your skills, I don't know what we might be going into.”

"I'm fine, sir, really," Kaoru's cheeks flushed and she nodded her head. "If I can be of help, I want to come. Fukutaichou has to stay here, and she said she wanted Shindou-san to help her with the final supplies paperwork, so he can't go, but I'm the next highest rank and I don't have any assigned duty this evening so I'd like to be useful. I'm not on early morning patrol, either, so it really fits in quite fine."

"I see," Shunsui eyed her fondly. "Well, then I suppose that's all right. I thought I asked Sora to find me two officers, though — right now it looks like it's just you and me."

"Mm, no it's not," Kaoru shook her head. "Nakamura-san is coming, too. She just went to get her cloak from her chamber, because she said the wind was cold."

"Nakamura... Hanako?" Shunsui's eyes widened in consternation, and Kaoru's gaze became big as she interpreted the man's expression.

"Taichou? Is something wrong?"

"No, not at all," Shunsui gathered himself, inwardly wincing at the combination of Naoko's sharp tongue and Hanako's legendary obstinacy on such a delicate mission. They had sparred often as students at the Academy, and although it was widely known that Hanako held him in high respect, Shunsui felt certain that her opinion of the former Unohana hime had not tempered any with time. Reuniting them had not been his intention, and inwardly he berated himself for not telling Sora that Naoko was also coming along.

I thought if I told her that she'd want to go, or she'd fuss at me for complaining about Naoko-chan's attitude, but it was a bad oversight on my part. Hanako I can handle. Naoko I cannot. I'm not Juu — I can't weave miracles over her and expect her to treat me with respect. This might be a disaster waiting to happen, and there's nothing I can do about it.

"Are you sure?" Kaoru was still eying him curiously. "You seem like something's bothered you — are you worried about Nakamura-san's duties? Because I checked the scheduling myself and she's on my shift tomorrow. It shouldn't be a problem. And she's Ninth Seat, but it was Sora-dono's idea, so I assumed you would agree."

She frowned, pursing her lips.

"Shizuka-chan wanted to come, too, but Sora-dono didn't think you'd let her," she added thoughtfully. "She's on night patrol tonight, anyway, so I figured you'd not want to upset the timetable. Nakamura-san and I were the obvious choices, so that's fine, isn't it?"

"You're right," Shunsui sighed, running his fingers through his long hair as he saw Hanako running across the courtyard towards them, thick woollen cloak wrapped around her shoulders and the silver-threaded hilt of her sword glittering in the dim haze of the moonlight. “Shizuka’s not experienced enough for this kind of mission, but I find it hard to argue with her, so it’s convenient that the schedule intervened. I think if I take you and Hanako, everything should go smoothly. And speaking of which, here’s our third now. Ready to go, Hanako?”

“Ready, sir,” Hanako bobbed her head forward in a decisive nod. “I’m sorry if you thought I was lagging. I did tell Nagasata-san...”

“It’s all right,” Shunsui assured her. “Kaoru told me, and in any case, we’re a little early still. It is nippy out, and no harm’s done. We should be at Third in good time.”

He pulled his own cloak around his body, gesturing for his two companions to follow along behind him as they stepped out onto the late night cobbles.

“How much did Sora tell you both about what tonight’s mission entails?” he asked softly, and Kaoru frowned.

“We’re crossing into Rukongai to investigate and bring back evidence, if we can find it,” she said slowly. “Evidence relating to the exiled criminal who’s top of the Council’s wanted list — Sora-dono said I shouldn’t say his name outside of barracks, just in case people are listening in.”

“Good advice,” Shunsui muttered grimly. “Though I don’t think in this case it matters overly if we talk. I think he already knows everything he needs to know about us and our movements, and I think it’s unlikely we’ll run into him on the other side unless he’s in a position to attack — but bringing back evidence may be key in tracking him down. Hanako, you’re all right with going through to the Rukon? I realise it’s something we don’t do generally, and I think the area we’re going to isn’t going to be pretty and polished like the Spiritless Zone.”

“You should know already that I’m not some sissy Clan himewho needs fuss or protection in grim situations,” Hanako said matter-of-factly. “I’m quite prepared for whatever we’re going to face. That’s why Sora-dono asked me to go with you. She said that I was thick-skinned when it came to grisly things, and since we might find the place Endou-fukutaichou was murdered, there could be blood. She didn’t want to send someone who’d faint at the sight of the red stuff.”

“Whilst that’s reassuring, I think your greatest strength with us tonight is your navigation skill,” Shunsui said honestly. “Nagesu-sama is trying to find some kind of coordinates to work out where we should begin our search best. It’s going to be sketchy — so I think your abilities are going to be vital if we stand a chance of finding anything important. Kaoru-chan, I want you to keep on your alert, too. I’m told that the Rukon’s atmosphere is a little different from here, but your senses are sharper than your sight so I’m sure you won’t be easily fooled. Between the two of you I want us to cover all bases, so don’t think it will be an easy ride.”

“Not a chance,” Hanako assured her Captain with a firm smile, and Kaoru dimpled, nodding her head.

“Nakamura-san’s map-reading and navigation is the best in the Division,” she agreed. “I’m glad you’re coming with us, Nakamura-san, if it’s the way Taichou says it is.”

“Will it just be us and some of Third?” Hanako asked, and Shunsui sighed, shaking his head.

“Thirteenth, Fourth and the Onmitsukidou are also sending representatives,” he admitted. “Nagesu-sama and I are the only Captains being spared, so I imagine we’ll split into two teams. I don’t relish trying to give orders to Onmitsukidou, so I imagine Nagesu-sama will take on that task. He has higher Clan authority and Council authority to back him up if he needs it. I’ve already been assigned the members of Thirteenth thanks to the meeting earlier — and I think we’ll have a healer with us, too. That makes a team of approximately seven members in total.”

“It’s not many,” Kaoru chewed on her lip. “Not if we’re going to be covering a wide area and not even if there are two teams. Fourteen shinigami in the whole of the abandoned Rukon zone? We’re going to be there a lot longer than I thought.”

“No, we’re not,” Shunsui said firmly. “We’re going in, and we’re coming out. If there’s nothing to see then there’s nothing to see. We’re an investigation team, Kaoru, we’re not spies and we’re not scientists. If it looks like it’s going to take a long time, we’ll bow out and pass it over to the Third’s experts to examine with fine tooth combs. We have other duties and we’re not going to set them aside — don’t look so worried, I’m going to insist on that being the case.”

“Then seven really isn’t very many,” Hanako sighed. “I hope that means the ones from Thirteenth are going to be on their mettle. Do we know who they are, Taichou? Or does it depend on who Ukitake-taichou sends?”

Shunsui hesitated for a moment, then he grimaced, holding up his hands.

“Don’t shoot the messenger,” he begged, “but Juu... I mean, Ukitake said he was going to dispatch Naoko, Atsudane and Kira to our little mission.”

“Shikibu Naoko, huh?” Hanako’s brow creased momentarily in displeasure, then she shrugged. “Oh well. I suppose there’ll be a reason why he did that, and if you’re in charge, she’ll have to defer to you, so I don’t suppose she’ll be able to do as she likes and boss us around, even if she is a Third Seat now.”

“I would like it very much if the two of you didn’t choose to reignite your old school disagreements,” Shunsui agreed lightly. “I don’t want to be refereeing this business. I asked J... Ukitake after the meeting, and he said that Naoko’s been heavily involved in some of the investigation into the abductions and other suspicious elements relating to Hollows, so it’s important she goes, just in case there’s a connection and she can find it. I’d like you to show her — and the other two, of course — how efficient and professional Eighth Division’s shinigami are... all right?”

“Of course,” Kaoru looked startled. “We wouldn’t do otherwise. Besides, Thirteenth Division are nice. I like them.”

“That’s because — Shikibu-san aside — they’re pretty much as District as we are and so don’t have false airs and graces about themselves,” Hanako said matter-of-factly. “Even Houjou-fukutaichou acts with District sense, despite his Clan background. They treat people as people, not as bloodlines, and that’s the difference.”

“But most of Eighth are Clan, and they’re not like that,” Kaoru objected. Hanako pursed her lips, nodding reluctantly.

“True, but that’s because of Taichou and Sora-dono not allowing it, and you being Fourth Seat,” she acknowledged. “Eighth is pro-District, so there’s none of that discrimination nonsense lurking in the shadows. It wouldn’t be tolerated. Even if there are only you, me and Shizuka-chan who are District born, it doesn’t feel like we’re a cornered minority.”

“I can’t imagine you ever being a cornered anything, Hanako-chan,” Shunsui observed ruefully. “But you’re not wrong. Eighth will always be pro-District whether the Kyouraku Clan like it or not, because it happens to be the way I like to run things.”

“Taichou fought the system to let me be accepted to Eighth when I graduated the Academy,” Hanako cast Kaoru a triumphant grin. “It wasn’t supposed to happen, but he said that if I wanted to go to Eighth, I should be allowed to go to Eighth. And the Council backed him, so I did.”

“I didn’t know that,” Kaoru absorbed this, then grinned. “Taichou is nice, that’s why.”

“Much as I’m enjoying this ego massaging, it’s an old story from a long time ago, and all I did was point out that if I didn’t object and Hanako wanted to come here, it was our business and nobody else’s,” Shunsui interjected dryly. “Meantime, the important point is that Eighth and Thirteenth have a good working relationship, and so I expect no trouble on the other side of the divide.”

“So long as the him doesn’t get any pretensions of grandeur, I’m sure we’ll be fine.” Hanako said frankly, folding her arms across her chest emphatically as if to underscore her point. “Nagasata-san and I are more than capable of holding our own, and we’ll not do anything to let the Eighth Division name slip.”

“Let’s hope that’s true, because we’re here,” Shunsui paused to gaze up at the imposing marigold that hung resplendant above the three slashes of the Third Division, and he sighed. “I’m understanding right now why that flower belongs to this Division, make no mistake — but the sooner we begin, the sooner we can finish. Come on, you two. Let’s go find our Rukongai playmates.”

Author’s Note

Because I thought some people might be curious to see Hanako again... she got assigned to the Rukon. Naoko was not best pleased with me, but sometimes these things have to be done.

This is also a very Shunsui chapter, following on from the end of the last, because I felt he was being unfairly neglected. Whilst I’m sure he’d rather be napping with sake in his chamber, I decided he was going to Rukongai with Naoko and Hanako. Lucky him...

36. Into the Rukon

Chapter Thirty Five: Into the Rukon

Well, so here they were.

Shunsui stepped out of the black chasm, setting his sandalled feet down on the parched earth of the outer Rukon and gazing around him with a mixture of anticipation and apprehension. Behind him, he was aware of the spiritual presences of his companions following his example, each one of them primed and ready to launch into attack if they came under immediate threat. In the midst of the group stood Nagesu, his eyes unreadable behind the lenses of his glasses, and Shunsui glanced at him, inwardly relieved that he was not the only nor the most senior member of the Gotei present on this mission.

Upon arrival at Third Division's barracks, the Eighth Division shinigami had found that all but the Onmitsukidou officers had already gathered and, as the Second Division's secret operatives had emerged silently from the shadows around their neighbouring Division, Nagesu had begun calculating the calibrations to open the door to the Rukon beyond, checking every spiritual emission with his usual meticulous care. Whilst Naoko and Hanako had greeted one another with wary glances, both had seemed to understand the gravity of their current mission, and so, to Shunsui's relief, neither one had made any snide remarks. Instead, Naoko had come right up to him, bowing her head curtly and then raising resigned green eyes to meet his wary brown ones.

"Taichou's dispatched us to be of use to you in whatever way we can," she had said quietly. "We'll do our best, over the divide."

"I've no doubt," Shunsui had acknowledged. "I know Juushirou has had you investigating several things of late — I'm hoping your knowledge will prove useful when we arrive at our destination."

"Mm," Naoko had turned her gaze towards Nagesu and the gate, her entire body tense, and Shunsui's eyes had narrowed, interpreting the things that the Third Seat had not bothered to say.

You want to go find Keitarou and use that poison sword of yours to rip holes in him, the way he ripped holes in you. Your aura is tightly controlled, Naoko-chan — but I can feel it. I know the hatred you have for this man and his sword — but that knowledge and that experience might be enough to flush him out. I know why Juu really sent you, and it has nothing to do with your Hollow investigations. It's because, him aside, you know Keitarou's reiatsu best. Even Nagesu-dono and I, who've met him, haven't experienced Chudokuga's power at such close quarters as you two. If Juu can't go himself, sending you was the next best thing — but his sending you with me means he's asking me to look out for you and make sure you come back in one piece, no matter what the provocation.

I didn't expect to be going back to Rukongai so soon, "Kai's voice at his right shoulder had brought him back to himself, and he offered the Onmitsukidou leader a grimace." It wasn't that appealing the last time, but I'm told the wasteland Rukon is several times worse. I hope you're prepared for whatever we're going into, Kyouraku — at the very least, I think it's likely we'll find the site of Souja-dono's last stand."

"I'm counting on us doing exactly that," Shunsui had admitted. "It's not a nice mission, but I volunteered for it. I want to see where Souja went, and what he did before he died. If I can pinpoint that, maybe I can find something of use to the Gotei in tracking down his killer."

"Neesama said you had some idea of him being able to predict the future," Kai had observed. "Is that true?"

"That's what I'd like to prove," Shunsui had responded grimly. "One way or another."

Nagesu had unleashed the seal on the Senkaimon at that point, preventing any further conversation as one by one the shinigami disappeared into the blank chasm. Nagesu's meticulous work on both coordinates and release meant a short, uneventful journey between regions, and as Shunsui inhaled, he was aware of something stale in the air, heavy and cloying yet intangible to his senses. He raised his gaze to the sky, taking in the hazy cloud cover that cloaked the weak sun from view, and he sighed.

"Picturesque, isn't it," he murmured, and Kai snorted, shrugging his shoulders.

"I warned you. It's no picnic here, not considering there's been no resources of any kind in these parts for a long while," he said frankly, then, "Nagesu-sama, how close to the Spiritless Zone have we emerged?"

"Not close at all, if my coordinates are correct," Nagesu looked up from a scroll of parchment that he had clutched between his fingers. "I followed the scientific data from Ukitake's mysterious source, and tried to pitch my Gate's opening as close to that area as possible. With any luck, my sword releasing the Senkaimon won't have been easily detected — I took every precaution to make sure that was the case. Even though it's true that a Bankai sword releasing a Senkaimon should in theory be untraceable, Keitarou is more knowledgeable about this science than I am, so I didn't want to take any risks."

He cast Shunsui a glance.

"We should divide here," he decided. "Kai-dono, I should like you and your men, along with Eriko-dono to accompany my officers and I as we comb the scene for any evidence of Souja-dono's place of attack. I believe there should be a trace of a broken Gate in that area, and I should like to conduct tests on it while the Onmitsukidou investigate the crime scene more thoroughly."

"I shall accompany you," Eriko agreed soberly, nodding her head. "If I can be of help, I will."

"Which leaves us to take the other direction?" Shunsui turned, putting his hand up to shield his eyes as he squinted across the barren landscape. "I can see something hidden in the dip of the land — something that looks suspiciously like shacks of some kind, yet I don't sense any kind of living presence. That being the case, it seems a good place to start looking."

"It could be an abandoned settlement from when the Rukon was evacuated," Nagesu warned, and Shunsui nodded.

"It could, but if so, we should tick it off our list," he said firmly.

"All right," Nagesu acquiesced. "Then we'll meet back here. Send a message if you need help — or flare your reiatsu, and we'll come."

"Understood," Shunsui agreed, and as the seven other officers disappeared into shunpo, he turned back to the group that remained. "Hanako-chan? We don't have a map, so I'm going to rely on you to be at the top of your game navigating us through this place when there's a good chance a lot of the scenery will look very similar. That's your key task on this mission — understand? Most importantly, tracking a route back to this gate as quickly as we can in the case of trouble. I have no intention of leaving anyone behind, nor any limbs or other extraneous parts, and it might not always be possible to rely on shunpo in such an unstable atmosphere. In fact, I'd rather we used that as little as possible, since flurries of spirit power in this environment will make us easier to locate for any enemy lurking in the shadows. We don't know who or what is waiting for us, so discretion seems the better part of valour."

“Yes, sir,” Hanako nodded her head curtly, and Shunsui grinned.

“Naoko-chan, you’re the highest ranking Thirteenth member here, so I’m going to entrust Kira and Atsudane’s safety to you,” he said blithely.

“Kyouraku-taichou, we can think and act for ourselves!” Makoto protested, and Shunsui offered him a smile.

“That was a Captain’s order, not a request from a former classmate,” he said lightly. “Naoko-chan, is that all right with you?”

“I’m used to it,” Naoko said dismissively. “Are you planning on splitting our group further, then? Because we only have one healer, and we’re already few in number. If Nakamura-san is going to be occupied with navigation, that’s one less fighter, and...”

“I can navigate and draw my sword if I have to, Shikibu-san. Don’t you worry about me,” Hanako interjected sharply, and Shunsui sighed.

“We’re not splitting up,” he said with a little shake of his head. “I’m delegating simply because you’re more familiar with the styles and skills of your members and it might be that we don’t have much time to make a decision. Well, you know what enemy we’re facing... so I’m sure you’ll understand without me spelling it out.”

“I do,” Naoko’s greenish eyes darkened. “I accept the order, Kyouraku-taichou. If we meet trouble, I’ll know how to act.”

“I’m sure,” Shunsui pressed his lips together for a moment, then, “Shikiki-chan? Are you all right with this? I realise it’s not long since you were last dispatched on a mission like this, but...”

“I wanted to come, when Retsu-sama spoke to me,” Shikiki shook her head, a pained look in her aqua gaze. “More than anyone, I should be here, Kyouraku-taichou. I wasn’t able to save more of my squad-mates. I was on manouevre in Sixth when Souja-dono needed me to heal him. And we’re here... looking for...”

She faltered, chewing on her lip, and Shunsui nodded gravely.

“No individual heroics,” he said firmly, gesturing for his companions to follow him. “There’ll be no unexpected corpses on my watch... you can all consider that the firmest order of any I’m going to give on this little jaunt.”

“Do we think he’s really hiding out here?” As the group made their way cautiously through the undergrowth, it was Kira who voiced the question, glancing around nervously as if expecting a rag-clad plus soul to materialise from each nook and cranny, wielding a sword. “The exile, I mean. Do we think that he’s really here?”

“If he’s sensible, he won’t be anywhere near here,” Shunsui said frankly. “He’s not a foolish man and he always knows more than you think he does. It’s impossible to me that he wouldn’t know of Souja-dono’s death and that the shinigami are interested in his actions. If I were him — which thankfully, I’m not, but if I were, I’d go underground. Deep, deep underground, to a place that was impossible to find.”

“Underground?” Makoto’s eyes automatically strayed to the barren turf beneath their feet, and Naoko snorted.

“Kyouraku-taichou means figuratively, not literally,” she said derisively.

“Though I suppose we can’t rule out the literal possibility,” Shunsui sighed. “It’s all right, Makoto-kun — I think Naoko-chan’s probably right. Wherever he is, it will be in the last place we’d ever think of. And that being the case...”

“We should start thinking of places,” Kaoru murmured, “so we can get to the end of the list quickly and find him before anyone else has to die.”

“Something like that,” Shunsui nodded, pausing at the crest of the rise to gaze down on the ramshackle cluster of shelters that he could now see made up a rough, haphazard kind of a village. “Beginning with here. I don’t sense any life signs from this place, even though we’re as close as this now, but I want to go over it with a fine tooth comb anyway. There might be lingering Plus souls without a reiatsu signature. Also, I want each and every one of you to be on your guard against attack. The girl who killed Souja-dono had no discernable reiatsu, either. She could be here, or she could be miles away — but it’s better to be safe than sorry.”

“There are seven of us, and one of her. She’ll find herself at bad odds if she tries to cause us trouble,” Makoto said decidedly, but Shikiki shook her head.

“It’s not as simple as that, Atsudane-san,” she said grimly. “If Retsu-sama is right, and this is the same girl who slaughtered my comrades in the Spiritless Zone, then she singlehandedly took out almost a whole patrol without the need for any backup.”

“But Fourth aren’t trained in the same skills that we are,” Hanako said bluntly. “No offence to the Fourth, Shikiki-san, but I’m not sure how healers would defend themselves against that kind of assault.”

“But it doesn’t hurt to be prepared,” Shunsui interjected quickly, before Shikiki could find a response. “So we’ll be prepared. Stay in range of one another and don’t disappear into any buildings or shelters on your own... enter in pairs or not at all. This isn’t a drill exercise, and nor is it like an average patrol into District territory. The enemy we’re dealing with is very, very dangerous, and any who associate with him must be considered similarly unpleasant. I am absolutely serious about taking everyone back in one piece.”

“I don’t think there’s anyone here,” Naoko pulled Dokusou Houshi from its sheath, using the tip of the blade to nudge aside a tattered piece of cloth and wrinkling up her nose at the squalid conditions beyond. “Not now, anyway — but I don’t think this was abandoned when the Spiritless Zone was formed. I think people were here till quite recently — it’s not dusty enough for anything else.”

“Suggesting a quick evacuation?” Makoto rubbed his chin, and Naoko nodded.

“Take Kira and go check those squats over there,” she instructed. “Be careful — remember what Kyouraku-taichou said.”

“We’re on it,” Makoto agreed, grabbing the more reluctant Kira by the arm and disappearing in the direction of the cluster of huts Naoko had indicated. Shunsui cast her a quizzical look, and Naoko sighed, shaking her head.

“He isn’t here,” she said curtly, and Shunsui could sense the disappointment in her aura. “I think... he might have been, at one point. Dokusou Houshi would be able to tell, if I released him, but you said you didn’t want to draw attention to ourselves...” She trailed off, eying the Eighth Division Captain doubtfully.

“Nakamura-san and I could check the houses over there,” Kaoru suggested, glancing at Shunsui. “It’s not far, we’d not be out of sight, and if there were the two of us, we’d be fine. I don’t think there’s anyone hiding there, but there might be clues, and if Atsudane-san and Kira-san are exploring that patch, we ought to do some investigation too. That way if Shikibu-san wanted to release her sword, she could, since we’d be splitting the work between us and we’ll be done twice as fast.”

“All right, but be careful,” Shunsui nodded. “Kaoru, you’re in charge. Hanako, if you find any Pluses quivering in corners, please don’t slice holes in them until you’ve ascertained why they’re there... it’s possible that Keitarou came here and forced people to obey him.

Those people might be able to tell us things, so try not to kill anyone you don't have to. All right?"

"Promise," Hanako's eyes twinkled with wry amusement and she nodded her head, hurrying off after the Fourth Seated officer in the direction of the shelters.

"I didn't realise Nagasata-san was so perceptive," Shikiki murmured, her gaze following the two officers across the patchy, yellowed grass, and Naoko pulled a face, leaning up against the trunk of a dead tree.

"I'm not sure if it's perception or just an eagerness not to be standing around waiting for something to happen," she remarked. "I know how she feels, too. Kyouraku-kun, did you have to bring Nakamura-san with you? I realise her navigation is good, but..."

"We are still on official business, Naoko-chan, and much as I like being called affectionate names by a pretty girl in uniform, I'm still your superior officer on this mission," Shunsui said lightly, reaching out to tap her on the head. She flinched back with a scowl, and he grinned, holding up his hands.

"Sora selected Hanako. Not me," he admitted. "I had other things to prepare so left that job to her discretion. I may have failed to mention to her that you were coming with us, though, so probably it is my fault. I wouldn't have put you two together by choice, but it's done now and you're both old enough and experienced enough to manage. Besides, Kaoru's smart, and Hanako likes her. They work well together, and we can trust them to do their part of the job. If you trust Kira and Atsudane to do theirs, that leaves us to do ours. And we both know why you're here, so while there's just us, there's no sense in pretending otherwise."

"Taichou sent me here because I was possessed by Keitarou's sword," Naoko acknowledged bluntly. "He thought I'd have the best chance of tracking it and he told me so before I left. I should have known you'd realise that, too — though it's not a memory I'd like dragged up too many times before the Gotei as a whole. And especially not before Nakamura-san. You're right — we're adults, and as adults, we can both do our jobs. But I'd rather not remember what happened between Keitarou and I, or between Keitarou and Suzuno — and having Nakamura-san know about it would be worse still."

"I have no intention of doing anything of the kind," Shunsui assured her. "Nor should you worry about Shikiki's discretion — she's met Keitarou too, albeit in a different way from you, and I don't believe she's one to gossip about the shadows lurking in people's pasts."

"That's true?" Naoko's gaze flitted to Shikiki, who nodded reluctantly.

"He took me in when I was small, and raised me till I met J... Ukitake-taichou," she admitted at length. "I was with him for about four years, and lived with him in hiding. He protected me from the Endou purge, because he thought my skills were worth nurturing. Retsu-sama didn't say as much to me, but I think she chose me to come here because she knew that. Like you, she probably thinks I can sense him more easily than others — or maybe work out his movements. But I was just a kid, and I'm not sure... whether I ever really understood Kei-nii at all. I thought I did, but then... some of the things he's done since don't match up with how kind he was to me, and so maybe I didn't know as much as I thought I did."

She shrugged.

"I agree with you, though," she added. "I don't think he's here now."

"Likewise," Shunsui admitted. "But I didn't think he would be. I want you to release Dokusou Houshi, Naoko-chan. I know that I said it was a risk, but I think it's an important one in this case. Your sword's spores are intimately acquainted with Keitarou, and even if it can't pick up his trail, it might pick up other important things."

"All right," Naoko pursed her lips, but nodded, gripping the hilt of her weapon more tightly in her right hand as a faint greenish glow began to shimmer up the weapon's silvery surface. She raised the sword, holding it so that the tip pointed out across the abandoned village, and Shunsui watched as the faint flickers of light became more and more concentrated, giving the air around it an eerie, ghoulish appearance. Slowly Naoko spread her left hand out over the blade, her brow flickering slightly in concentration.

"Inotte," she murmured, "Dokusou Houshi."

Almost as soon as the words had left her lips, the weapon glimmered strongly with emerald light, then, bit by bit, the tiny particles of reiatsu that had clustered around it began to spread out into the ether, creating a cloud of spiritual vapour that lingered for a moment around the group of three shinigami before dispersing over a wider area. Shikiki's brows knitted together in consternation, and Shunsui saw her take an instinctive step back, as though wary of what the weapon could do.

“It’s all right,” Naoko had clearly seen her unease, too, for she cast the healer a faint smile. “Dokusou Houshi likes to understand its surroundings, that’s all. It won’t hurt you. Not like this.”

“I’m sorry,” Shikiki reddened, looking embarrassed. “I didn’t mean... I just... I thought...”

She faltered, then,

“Someone told me you were from the Unohana Clan,” she said awkwardly. “I didn’t know what kind of a sword you had, even though I knew you weren’t a healer, but I didn’t realise...”

“It’s not the kind of weapon an Unohana should be holding, huh?” Naoko acknowledged, a faint note of bitterness in her tones. “It’s the opposite of everything the Clan stands for. I can’t bring life with this sword, Shikiki-san. I can poison, intoxicate, or steal spirit power like a parasite. Maybe, if I was to push myself, I could do far more horrible things — but they’re things that leave a bad taste in my mouth, and I won’t even try to do them. Dokusou Houshi hasn’t a single cell of healing reiatsu anywhere in its spiritual make-up. It’s designed to kill, and to do so in unpleasant, perhaps cowardly ways. But they say a sword is the reflection of the one who wields it, so I suppose that tells you why it is I don’t make my home with the Clan any more.”

She lifted the weapon, sweeping it sharply through the cloying atmosphere.

“As a tool for spiritual detection, however, it’s a useful ally,” she acknowledged. “Kyouraku-taichou, Keitarou’s reiatsu is definitely here. It’s faint and I can’t get a clear lock on it — so he’s not here now, and I don’t know where he’s gone. But he was here. I’m quite sure and so is my sword. This is where he was lurking — Nagesu-sama’s coordinates were right.”

“Thanks to Juu’s secret source,” Shunsui, who had been trying to work out how to respond to his former classmate’s self-critical little speech decided that it was safer not to attempt to cross into Juushirou’s territory, instead focusing his attention on Naoko’s last sentence with a measure of relief. “Can you tell how long ago he was here, or is that too difficult for Dokusou Houshi to make out?”

“Mm. A day or two. Maybe longer, but not much,” Naoko’s eyes narrowed. “It’s very fleeting, but stronger in some places than others. There are other reiatsu signatures here too... but they’re meshed together and I can’t single them out. I don’t think they’re presences I recognise — and most of them are very weak.”

“Perhaps the villagers?” Shikiki suggested, and Naoko nodded her head, a sudden grim expression crossing her proud features.

“Perhaps,” she said cautiously.

“Naoko-chan?” Shunsui eyed her keenly, and Naoko pressed her lips together, driving her sword once more through the air and closing her eyes as the haze of green energy flickered and danced around the silver surface.

“Maybe I’ve imagined it,” she said slowly, her words almost too soft to make out, “or maybe it’s because Houshi-sama didn’t get a proper lock on it before, so it’s only at the edge of our awareness... but I could’ve sworn...”

She opened her eyes, shaking her head in exasperation.

“I can’t pin it down,” she said frustratedly. “Just like before, it’s there but not there.”

“What is?” Shikiki looked confused, and Naoko cast her a hopeful glance.

“Shikiki-san, you were in the Spiritless Zone. You were there when Mitsuki was found, weren’t you?” she asked eagerly, and Shikiki nodded.

“Yes, I was, but...”

“Was there any foreign reiatsu around? Anything you noticed out of the ordinary? Anything at all?”

“I wasn’t really looking,” Shikiki looked chastened. “I’m sorry, Shikibu-san. Maybe I should’ve been, but with trying to get Aomori-san and Edogawa-san to safety, and making sure Madeki-dono was stable... my senses aren’t as perceptive as most of the healers in my squad, either. I was focused on what I was doing, and I didn’t think to scan the area for any reiatsu.”

“But the killer of Souja-dono and the killer of the healers had no reiatsu.” Shunsui pointed out. “That being the case, Naoko-chan, what’s got you so agitated?”

“Hrm,” Naoko gave her weapon a little flick, sealing it and returning it to its sheath with a sigh. “It’s hard to explain, especially when I don’t really have solid evidence. I picked up the faintest hint of reiatsu investigating the Hollows. It was really no more than a ghost of a presence, and I didn’t recognise it, but it was... odd. Meshed in with the remains of the Hollow, as though...”

“It was manipulating them?” Shunsui asked sharply, and Naoko nodded.

“You remember that conversation?”

“I do,” Shunsui agreed. “And you think you sense that spirit power here again now?”

“Maybe,” Naoko agreed hesitantly. “I also picked it up at Thirteenth Division, though. The night Mitsuki was stalked... the night Kuchiki-kun took her back to Sixth, before Souja-dono was killed.”

“Wait a minute,” Shunsui’s brows twitched together in consternation, and he held up his hands. “Are you telling me that someone who is manipulating Hollows also followed Mitsuki right into the heart of Juushirou’s division without being detected — except by you, after the fact — and that person was also here in Rukongai, where nobody is meant to be?”

“I think so. Yes,” Naoko looked troubled. “I know it doesn’t make sense, but Dokusou Houshi thinks it and my sword is usually right when it comes to things like this. We’ve picked up that sensation before. It was fleeting and I can’t get a lock on it... but it was there all the same. Someone’s reiatsu. Not a sword... but something else.”

“The Onmitsukidou, perhaps? The one Juu took into custody?”

“No...” Naoko faltered, then shook her head. “No, I don’t think so. An Onmitsukidou would train with a sword. No, it’s more than that. An Onmitsukidou would train, period. There was nothing really... trained about this spirit power. It’s raw and rough and that’s what’s wrong with it. It’s as though someone’s using it on instinct — and there’s no way one of Shihouin-kun’s people would ever be in that position, no matter how dead he was meant to be.”

“Dead?” Shikiki blinked, but Shunsui ignored her.

“So someone in association with Keitarou — someone from here?” he asked urgently. Naoko shrugged helplessly.

“It’s all I can think of,” She admitted. “How else could he get through to Seireitei to follow Mitsuki? I can’t explain all of the details, but I’m sure it’s the same person. Here and Seireitei. Which implies that we have a serious people leak, and Keitarou is exploiting it.”

“No kidding,” Shunsui grimaced. “All right. We don’t know who’s manipulating the Hollows, but now we can make a good guess at it being Keitarou, by proxy. And if I’m right that he’s able to predict the future, maybe he can operate in particular areas in readiness for a certain patrol's arrival. Perhaps in the Spiritless Zone, too. Maybe he knew in advance when they would be divided into two groups — and sent two agents to do the killing. The Hollow attack was probably murder just as much as the slaughter at base camp. Shikiki wouldn't have noticed anything even if she did go to the camp site, because the Hollow attack happened somewhere a long way away from there, so just because she wasn't aware of it doesn't mean it didn't happen. I'm hypothesising wildly of late and it's not good, but if this person was manipulating Hollows in Seireitei, it stands to reason he or she did it in the Spiritless Zone, too. Mitsuki said the Hollow behaved strangely. Juu's been flapping about it since she first mentioned it and it looks like he's right to pinpoint the Hollows in all of this."

"Maybe whoever it was came looking for her because someone intervened in the Spiritless Zone and killed the Hollow," Naoko agreed bleakly. "Perhaps he was trying to finish the job, only it was too close to the heart of Taichou's division to try, so he pulled back. But he could try again. Mitsuki thinks there's no danger, but if it wasn't the Onmitsukidou — and I don't think it was — then the person in question is still out there. Somewhere."

"Mm," Shunsui rubbed his chin. "Though if he's not willing to make a move so close to the heart of Inner Seireitei, she's probably safe enough so long as she's at Juu's place with all of you. Using the Hollows is the kind of tactic I'd pin on Keitarou, though. It's sneaky and indirect, and his sword has controlling properties. But you're sure it's not Chudokuga, which means..."

"His son?" Naoko asked quietly, and Shunsui eyed her keenly.

"You know about that, then?"

"Taichou told me everything before we left. He thought I should know," Naoko said simply. "It occurred to me that the reiatsu I sensed might have been the mysterious Aizen Kohaku that Souja-dono mentioned. Manipulation could've been inherited, and there's no reason to suppose he'd use a sword — Keitarou isn't a traditional zanpakutou wielder, and he'd have other priorities."

"But then there's the sword Souja saw," Shunsui remembered. "Unless it's as Guren-sama said, and that's a decoy to make people think Kohaku is in a place that he isn't. It could be a prop or an experiment of his. It doesn't have to have anything to do with Kohaku — in fact, because it says his name on it, I'm tempted to assume it doesn't."

“Well, it’s certainly not being used to manipulate Hollows,” Naoko said acidly, “because Dokusou Houshi would’ve identified a fellow zanpakutou’s presence, and he’s adamant that whatever controlled those creatures, it wasn’t a sword.”

“Hollows scare people,” Shikiki said darkly. “They can’t fight them, so they run, scared. If you’re right, Shikibu-san, then this is the ultimate way to intimidate the populace. If shinigami don’t protect them, then they turn against the shinigami and fear them, too. I know... I was like that. My village was destroyed by shinigami, so I hated and I feared them. They took Dai-nii away from me and forced Kei-nii and I into hiding. If I hadn’t met Juu-nii, probably I’d have always been afraid. I certainly wouldn’t have become a shinigami myself. It’s easy to understand how they think and feel, and Kei-nii would know better than anyone how to play on that emotion. He understands the Districts far better than a lot of the Clan shinigami do.”

“He’s creating an army, isn’t he?” Naoko murmured, and Shunsui sighed, shrugging his shoulders.

“We’ll need more tangible evidence of that before we can create mass panic,” he said wearily. “Enough on this subject, now. We’ve already discussed enough in front of a lower seated officer without her Captain’s clearance for her to hear it — I’m sorry, Shiki-chan.”

“No... it’s all right,” Shikiki sighed heavily. “I won’t discuss it with anyone else — and like you said before, I know Kei-nii. It’s a little different, where I’m concerned. I was there... in the snows in District Seven that day, so I know... the worst of what Chudokuga can do to a soul.”

“If you don’t mind, let’s let that memory stay buried,” Shunsui asked plaintively. “I can hear Kaoru’s voice, and it looks like Kira and Atsudane are heading this way too. We’ll move on — Naoko, did your sword spot out any likely places for us to investigate whilst it was doing its sweep?”

“Mm. That way,” Naoko pointed. “I don’t know how to read what Dokusou Houshi is telling me, because whatever it is, it’s dark, broken and decayed. It’s... I feel as though I should know it, but it’s all in the wrong order and Houshi-sama says he can’t decipher it properly because of that. Still, if we go that way, we might find out more. Houshi-sama thinks whatever caused it is no longer there — the reiatsu is old and beginning to break down. It’s significantly twisted and strange, though... and Houshi-sama definitely sensed Keitarou’s reiatsu meshed in with it somehow. I think we ought to check it out.”

“It’s possible Keitarou was using it for experiments,” Shunsui agreed. “Whether you can or can’t pinpoint the other reiatsu clearly, Naoko-chan, your sword has told us unequivocally what poor Souja was trying to tell his father the night he came back. Keitarou is here — or more importantly, was.”

“There’s nobody in the huts we searched, Taichou,” at that moment, Hanako and her companion returned to the group, Hanako dusting down her shihakushou with a grimace. “How anyone can live like that is beyond me, but there were signs that the houses had been lived in at some point. Nagasata-san found footprints in the dirt outside the back of one — but there was definitely nobody hiding there now.”

“We came up blank too,” Makoto agreed, casting Kira a rueful glance. “Kira tripped over a cooking pot and almost got it stuck on his foot, so I guess that told us there had been people here... but not now. Not a soul. It’s a ghost village.”

“A ghost village which Keitarou was lurking around up till a day or two ago,” Shunsui mused darkly. “He clearly did know we were coming and so cleared out.”

“Maybe he didn’t expect Souja-dono to survive and escape,” Kira suggested, his cheeks still a vibrant scarlet from his comrade’s blunt account of his exploits. “Perhaps he wasn’t meant to go back at all.”

“Or he didn’t mean to kill him in the first place,” Shunsui reflected, pressing his lips together as he gazed in the direction Naoko had indicated. “Perhaps Souja showed up here, saw something he shouldn’t have done and then had to be silenced. Or someone decided to silence him, just in case.”

“But they botched the job, and he escaped,” Hanako interjected. Shunsui nodded.

“Well, if it’s any comfort, it means that Keitarou’s schemes aren’t foolproof,” he said heavily. “The Spiritless Zone and Souja... in both instances people escaped and were able to leak information back to Seireitei. Keitarou’s agents are not as thorough as Keitarou himself probably would be, and his trusting them to carry out those tasks implies his own attentions are focused somewhere else. Whilst I still have concerns, I think we should press on. Naoko’s sword indicated a likely place of investigation up ahead — we should begin there, and this time I want everyone staying together. It might be dangerous.”

It did not take long for the group of seven shinigami to reach the stretch of land set aside from the makeshift village, and it was clear as they approached it that even without Dokusou Houshi's sensitive analysis, the area reeked of decay. Where they had seen patches of yellowed grass bravely trying to struggle through the dry ground around the settlement, here the ground was brown and dead, littered with the chalkish remains of bird skull fragments and other unidentifiable objects that to Shunsui's troubled gaze seemed to have once been other living things that had simply fallen out of the sky, never to move again. The curled branches of gnarled trees twisted like sentries warning them to keep out, and a coarse wall of thorns and briars acted as a barrier between them and what was clearly a world of death. To one side, water bubbled in a freshly broken spring, and Shunsui bent to run his fingers through the cool water. Though the liquid seemed clear and pure, he was reluctant to put it to his lips, instead getting to his feet and wiping his hands dry on the fabric of his hakama.

"There's a hut through the briars, Taichou!" It was Hanako's voice which broke the uneasy silence, and Shunsui turned to look in the direction his Ninth Seat had indicated, seeing that there was indeed a roofed building set deep into this world of decay, almost hidden from view by what now appeared like a deliberately designed divide. His eyes narrowed as he remembered the testimony Souja had brought back with him that night, the fleeting, gasped words he had heard through the door of the chamber as he had marshalled the members of Seventh Division here and there, ensuring they were kept too busy to either intrude or panic. It had been faint, and difficult to make out, but Shunsui had keen hearing, and what he had heard had lingered in his mind.

"...A hut... in the hut... the sword... said Aizen."

"A hut," he said out loud now. "Souja-dono mentioned a hut when he came back to Inner Seireitei. I don't suppose that there's any doubt this is the same one he meant. There's something very nauseating in the atmosphere around here — like you said, Naoko-chan, it's broken and decayed, yet somehow familiar."

His eyes darkened, becoming almost black with suppressed emotion as he moved to the narrow gap between the briars.

"I can sense Keitarou's reiatsu too, now," he added grimly. "I couldn't, before, but now I can. He was here, and very recently, I'm sure of it. I'd never forget that taint of something twisted in his aura, even after so many years. Dokusou Houshi was right to point this out, Naoko-chan. That was good work."

"Do we have to go in there?" Kira looked apprehensive. "It doesn't look very... friendly.”

“There’s nobody in it, though, so why should we care?” Makoto responded with a shrug. “So there’s some dead stuff — Kira, we’re shinigami. Our job is dealing with dead stuff. There’s no sense getting squeamish about it. Taichou told us that the Rukon might not be pretty... well, this is the not-pretty he was talking about. That’s all.”

“Don’t you feel the creepy vibes in the atmosphere, Atsudane-san?” Kaoru stifled a shiver, wrapping her arms around her body as though suddenly cold. “It’s not what the place looks like, but how it feels. It feels like death itself lives here... and if we go inside, we might never come out again.”

“So it feels a bit Hollowish,” Makoto conceded. “But we fight Hollows all the time, Nagasata-san. It’s no different from how it feels facing them, surely?”

“I’m not bothered if we go in,” Hanako said pragmatically. “I can feel the nasty atmosphere but it doesn’t bother me. Like Atsudane said, we’re shinigami. More, we’re here because someone’s dead who shouldn’t be. This is where he came, and because he came here he died — therefore we need to go where he went and see what he saw.”

“So long as we don’t get to the dying part, I tend to agree,” Shunsui sighed, resting a reassuring hand on Kaoru’s shoulder, and she turned to send him a doubtful glance. “I know, it’s not nice, I feel it too. It’s something deeper than a Hollow’s essence, something darker and more unwelcoming, but we can’t just walk away. I’m certain Souja came here. He told his Captain and Ukitake both about a hut, and a sword within that hut with the name Aizen on it. If that sword is here now, we need to find it and take it as evidence. And if it isn’t... we need to explore the scene and see what we can learn. I don’t want us splitting up again, not here. We’re all going in there together — I’m afraid you’ll just have to grin and bear it, Kaoru-chan, Kira-kun.”

“Keitarou was here, which means we need to investigate,” Naoko agreed solemnly. “Shikiki-san, are you all right about going into this place?”

“I’m sure that I’m more prepared than you think to face something ugly,” Shikiki said softly. “Besides, the place might feel like death, but it isn’t death. I spent the first eight years of my life in District Seven when people were being hunted and killed and I saw death on a regular basis, but this isn’t it.”

“I could release Dokusou Houshi again, and see if Souja-dono came here?” Naoko suggested, but Shunsui shook his head.

“I don’t want you or your sword picking up anything from here,” he said firmly. “Juu... I mean, Ukitake wouldn’t thank me if I sent you back with some kind of spiritual poisoning because I’d let you dabble in dark matter. We’ll use old fashioned investigative skills and see what we can find. Nobody is to release their zanpakutou here unless we come under direct attack and it’s unavoidable. It’s bad enough as it is — I imagine it’d be even worse to handle with swords released.”

He pushed the briars aside, making his way purposefully across the barren land towards the hut, gesturing for his companions to follow him. They did, though he was aware that some were more reluctant than others, and he pressed his lips together, hoping they could not detect the misgivings in his aura.

Because I agree with Kaoru and Kira. Whatever I say about it, this place gives me the heebie-jeebies and if I had a choice in the matter, I’d be turning in the opposite direction. Shikiki’s right — this isn’t death, but something else, and if Naoko was right, that this is reiryoku, it must belong to someone. Someone... or something.

He frowned.

Maybe we’re thinking about this all wrong. Naoko would’ve said if this was the same reiatsu as she sensed before, but she didn’t. So this person isn’t the one controlling the Hollows. Yet this feels like the kind of power Kai mentioned at the Captain’s meeting... the one with the potential to destroy Soul Society. Perhaps the Onmitsukidou’s threats aren’t idle ones — and this is Aizen Kohaku. Maybe it’s not the Hollows that Kohaku is connected to, but this place. But if that’s the case... who other than Keitarou has the power to manipulate in a wasteland like this? Maybe the hut and the sword are something else completely. Oh, I wish I understood how Keitarou’s twisted brain worked!

His brows furrowed together in consternation.

Have we overlooked something? Assumed something we shouldn’t have assumed? If this is just residual spirit power and it’s giving good officers the shivers, what would it be like if someone unleashed it at you full tilt? And yet it doesn’t feel... as though it was released in any kind of confrontation. It feels as though it’s just... here. I don’t think someone released it intentionally... it just... leaked.

He reached the door of the small wooden shack, registering the scorched, melted lock on the door and brushing his finger against it with surprise. Someone had been here, then, and had forced their way through to get the door open.

Souja, perhaps. I imagine Keitarou has a key, and this looks like kidou.

Still, it saves me vandalising it to get it open. The less reiatsu I deploy in this atmosphere the better.

He pushed back the door gingerly, glancing back at his companions before tugging the divide firmly open and gazing for the first time into the dim interior. The decay in the ether was yet more potent here, and he put his sleeve over his mouth, stepping hesitantly within the small, squalid shack.

It was empty, and as Shunsui's eyes became more used to the dim light, he realised that it too had been evacuated at short notice. Though the back of the room was partitioned with a ragged curtain, anything else the chamber had ever contained had been carefully removed and, as he crossed the faded mat floor to inspect the fabric, he noticed the chains and ties hanging loose against the wall. He paused, frowning.

A place just big enough for a sword. So it's more than just a decoy. Keitarou thought it important he took it with him, so it matters somehow.

His sleeve still pressed to his face, he used his free hand to rip back the curtain, the rotting fabric coming away in his hands as he surveyed with some dismay the bamboo cage that lay beyond, the scraps of food matter still littering the floor, and evidence of ropes or some other kind of restraint clear from a crude hook that had been drilled into the wall. The cage door was no longer locked shut, the fastening having been sheared through by some kind of sharp-bladed implement, and at his action it creaked slightly, swinging eerily on rusted hinges.

A... prison? Something was kept here? Someone...? Good grief, what have we walked into?

"Something was here. Something horrible." Kaoru's trembling voice made him turn, seeing his Fourth Seated officer standing in the middle of the room, her features chalk pale and her arms wrapped protectively around her body. "I don't know what it was, Taichou, but even though it isn't here any more, the air is full of something bad."

"Mm," Shunsui glanced at the ripped fabric in his hand, folding it in half and half again with a sigh before tucking it into his obi. "I don't understand it any more than you, Kaoru-chan. The place obviously had some significance, just as Souja said — but it looks as though the one piece of evidence we came looking for has been taken away too."

"The sword," Naoko murmured, moving to touch the loosened ties with a grimace. "Whatever Souja-dono saw here, it's not here now."

"But the fact it's gone indicates it mattered," Hanako said astutely, putting Shunsui's own thoughts into words. "Otherwise they'd have left it for us to find. This Keitarou person is good at leaving false trails, isn't that what the brief said? If the sword Souja-dono saw wasn't important, it'd still be here, so we could get excited about it and not focus on what really matters."

"Such as the fact someone was kept confined here?" Shunsui indicated the cage, and Kaoru let out an exclamation of dismay.

"As a prisoner? In a tiny place like that, with all this horrible stuff in the air? Who would do something like that?"

"A man who spent a good portion of his exile experimenting on turning village people in District Seven with reiryoku into various levels of Hollow," Shunsui said blackly, and Shikiki nodded her head.

"I think that's possible," she said sadly. "It's the kind of thing... he did... when he was working on reidoku. I never knew that, when I was small... but since... I guess it became clear."

"So he's making reidoku again?" Naoko demanded. "Is that what this is?"

"It would explain the atmosphere," Shunsui said slowly. "The aura is very Hollowish, and that would make sense... but... I don't know."

"I don't know a damn thing about reidoku, except the stuff Kamitani told us when we were students," Makoto reflected, "but if someone was kept prisoner here, wouldn't Souja-dono have mentioned it? If he came here, and he saw the sword that isn't here now, and he talked about the hut... wouldn't he have mentioned a prisoner? If the place was vacated after he was here, it'd make sense for there not to be anyone here now. But nobody was anticipating his coming, right?"

"We don't really know if they were or weren't, but it's a point of thought," Shunsui rubbed his chin. "You're right, Makoto-kun. So either Keitarou wasn't using it for experiments always, and so there wasn't always someone here... or..."

"Maybe it was set up to look like someone was here, when actually it was somewhere else," Kira suggested.

"That sounds like Keitarou," Naoko agreed darkly. "It'd be just like him, to play the game that way. In which case, nothing Souja-dono told us matters at all. The sword might've been moved to make us think it was important. It could be a double bluff. We just don't know."

“Perhaps Tenichi-dono was held here?” Kaoru wondered, but Naoko shook her head.

“Tenichi-kun was one of my recruits. I’d know his reiatsu if it had been in here, and it hasn’t.” she said firmly. “Keitarou’s is all over the place, but Tenichi’s isn’t. He wasn’t held captive here... and we don’t even know that he was taken prisoner by Keitarou or brought to the Rukon. There’s no proof to suggest anything like that.”

“But Souja-dono was attacked because he came looking for clues about that abduction, I thought?” Kaoru frowned. “Sora-dono said as much — was that wrong?”

“No... not wrong,” Naoko shook her head, “just that it’s dangerous to jump to conclusions that things are connected when there’s nothing to suggest they are. Tenichi-kun wasn’t inside this hut. Whoever was being held captive here, I think it would make more sense for Keitarou to experiment on people he found wandering in the Rukon. There’s nobody to notice if they go missing... whereas shinigami disappearances are noticed.”

“Tenichi might’ve been brought to Rukongai though, Naoko-chan,” Shunsui pointed out. “Did Dokusou Houshi detect any sign that he was?”

“Maybe,” Naoko admitted reluctantly. “He thought he detected the faintest of presences — but he wasn’t totally certain of it. Tenichi was cuffed and probably drugged, so if he was brought here...”

“So there is evidence, you’re just trying to conceal it because this Kotetsu Tenichi person was a former division member of yours?” Hanako’s eyebrow arched, and Naoko bristled.

“I’m not concealing anything!” she objected indignantly. “I said he wasn’t held in this hut. He wasn’t. That’s all I can be absolutely sure of. Detecting reiatsu that was here a long time ago is more difficult than you think, Nakamura-san... and I’d like to see you do better!”

“Well, so we’ve established that someone might’ve been held here at some point in the past, but we don’t know who or why, or what happened to them,” Kira said despondently. “We don’t have much to take back to Urahara-taichou, do we?”

“I wonder.”

Shunsui eyed the cage again, a sudden chill touching his spine as the rest of the phrase he had overheard Souja’s faint voice mumble flickered suddenly to mind.

“Called her... Saka... ki. And a hut... in the hut... the sword... said Aizen...”

Called her Sakaki? Who called her Sakaki? Maybe someone who was in this cell... someone you set free? Someone who then helped you... when you were hurt?

He bit his lip.

Someone... now in Thirteenth Division custody? If Keitarou was using this place for experiments, and was kidnapping people in the wasteland Rukon to experiment on, maybe Juushirou's waif and stray was his latest captive. Maybe Souja rescued him before he was poisoned with the reidoku, but if that's even remotely close to what happened, it's possible that Juu's witness knows a heck of a lot more about Keitarou and his operations here than any of us imagined he did

And more, if he was chosen as an experimental subject, like Juu was all those years ago, it's not impossible that Keitarou will decide he wants him back.

Juushirou padded along the narrow corridors of the Thirteenth barracks, his expression preoccupied as he made his way to the small sickroom currently inhabited by the Thirteenth Division's unexpected guest. A silver-winged Hell Butterfly early that morning had told him that Joumei's preparations had been completed, and that Izumi would arrive at her new location the next day. That being the case, he had decided that he could not postpone his meeting with Souja's samaritan any longer, and so, after consulting Kirio on the boy's coherence, he had sent word to Mitsuki that he intended to hold that discussion that morning, if at all possible.

Shunsui's progress in Rukongai was also playing on his mind, and inwardly he wondered what kind of danger his friend might have stumbled into. Sitting in his office dwelling on the progress of people so far out of his reach was a pointless endeavour, however, so he had buried himself in his work, glad that, at times such as this, he had the reassuring responsibility of Thirteenth Division to turn to.

“He's awake,” As he reached the end of the hall, Mitsuki slipped her slender body around the thin frame of the door, pulling the sliding divide shut behind her and casting the Captain a grin. “He knows you're coming, and he says he'll speak to you. I don't know how much he will be able to tell you, but he seemed to be resigned to the fact you were going to talk to him sooner or later, so I don't think he'll freak out when you go in there.”

She patted his white haori contemplatively, then,

“Unlike me, he probably doesn’t know what this is, so he’s not going to get a shock if he sees you wearing it.”

“Mitsuki...” Juushirou snorted, pushing her hand away from the pale fabric, looping his fingers briefly through hers before releasing his hold. “You’re not offended by it now, though, I trust?”

“I’m not,” Mitsuki agreed contemplatively. “I’m starting to get used to it, and the idea of so many people hanging on your every word.”

“They do not!” Juushirou protested, and Mitsuki grinned.

“They do,” she said lightly, cocking her head on one side to look at him. “If you don’t realise it, you’re being dense. You always said you’d make your division a family, but I didn’t realise you’d go wholesale into succeeding. I’m almost jealous of it sometimes — I’m here, but I don’t belong here, and you have all of them to fuss around after you.”

“Mitsuki...” Juushirou’s brows knitted together, and the healer laughed, shaking her head.

“I’m teasing you,” she assured him, “or at least, mostly I am. I like your division — I just know I don’t belong in it. And this isn’t getting your work or mine done, so I’m going to have to beg leave to return to Fourth for more supplies. I’ll take Hikifune-san with me, if I may — she’s helpful, and she’s taking this duty very seriously. Who knows? It might not be a bad thing if one of your division members picks up some more practical first aid than the theory lectures new recruits are apparently expected to sit through on joining a squad. I’ve been meaning to talk to Retsu-sama about that, but I haven’t had a chance... maybe I will do so, if Hikifune-san finds it helpful.”

“You’re sounding a lot more like yourself,” Juushirou remarked, putting his hand on the door and turning to glance at her. “I’m glad. You worried me for a while.”

“Koku needs me, and it helps to be needed,” Mitsuki replied pragmatically. “I’m serious, though. We don’t have time for this kind of discussion. I know we’ve hardly had a chance to talk lately, but considering the situation...”

“I know,” Juushirou’s expression became grave. “Thinking about anything else is impossible when Souja’s killer is still at large, especially when Shunsui, Naoko and two of my other officers are deployed into unknown, potentially dangerous territory. You’re right, and I won’t keep you any longer. I’m just glad to see you fit and well — and if Kirio’s going with you to Fourth, I needn’t worry any about your safety.”

“I don’t expect to be jumped en route,” Mitsuki scolded, shaking her head in amusement. ‘It’s not far to Fourth, and it’s broad daylight. The Second have a prime suspect in Tenichi-kun’s abduction in custody, so I understand, and nobody has threatened me since I’ve been here. I’m being useful, and that’s what matters most — and worrying about Naoko-chan and Kyouraku-kun helps nobody, as I’m sure you realise. Now you be useful and go put that young boy at ease. He is very young, Juushirou,’ she added, her tones becoming serious as she glanced back towards the chamber. “He hasn’t said much to me — I don’t know why. He looks at me... as though he’s not quite sure whether I’m there to help or hurt him, and he hasn’t let his guard down around me once. The more I consider it, the more I think Ryu and I must have been mistaken when we thought he said my name, because he’s given me no indication that he’s even interested in me, let alone that he knows me from somewhere before. It sounded like it, but perhaps it really was just a case of randomly assigning a name he’d heard to the first female face he saw. He’ll let me treat him, but it’s fairly clear that he doesn’t want me around. I think he spoke more to Hikifune-san, from what she said, but even then he was very wary and uncertain of his ground. It’s more than just wariness, though. There’s something else in his aura.”

“Fear?” Juushirou asked softly, and Mitsuki shrugged.

“That, maybe,” she agreed pensively. “Sadness. Resignation. Pain from his wound. All of those things, too. But no, perhaps it’s something else altogether that I pick up from him most of all. I think it’s loneliness. Hikifune-san said he was on his own — she thought maybe he’d been abandoned like she was, and perhaps she’s right. I’m not sure... it’s hard to know what kind of a background he came from, but I get this impression from him that although he’s holding back as much as he is, he’s really very lonely underneath the wariness. You’re possibly the one person who can reach through to him... so give it your best, all right? Be kind to him. It strikes me he’s not used to people treating him with kindness.”

“I was going to be, anyway,” Juushirou assured her. “I want to know what he knows about Souja, of course, but I also want to make sure I keep my promise to that poor boy and protect his rescuer from unwelcome attention. Hirata would like to interrogate him, but I’ve held out and I’ll handle this myself. You needn’t worry. I’ll be gentle.”

“I know you will,” Mitsuki hesitated, then reached up on tiptoes to kiss him on the cheek. “I’ll see you later. Maybe then there’ll be time to talk, but right now, we both have important things to attend to.”

With that she was gone, shooting him a playful grin, and Juushirou’s fingers strayed to his cheek, a smile twitching at the corners of his own mouth.

In this climate, such shows of affection are inappropriate... and even if we wanted to talk about how things are between us, there are too many other things pressing. Yet even despite that, I feel that the girl staying at my division now is the Mitsuki I went to school with. Whatever she went through in Rukongai, the emotions are still there. She’s strong and she’ll overcome it. Perhaps when all this is over, we can look at where to go from here. Right now, there’s no chance of her going back to the Rukon, since the Spiritless Zone is suspended... and if she were to stay here... maybe...

He frowned, lowering his hand and turning his attention back to the door of the small sick room that had been Koku’s makeshift home since his arrival at Thirteenth’s barracks.

Right now, though, I have to talk to the only person who might know what really happened to Souja in Rukongai. Get a grip on yourself, Juushirou! You’re a Captain, not an adolescent schoolboy! No matter how pretty she looks, Mitsuki can wait. This is more important, so put it out of your head and get to work!

To think was to act, and he gathered his composure, pushing open the divide and stepping purposefully into the chamber beyond. A figure was huddled up in the far corner against the wall, curled up on the bed with a blanket wrapped around his shoulders like a shield against outside intrusion and, at Juushirou’s entrance, he raised his head, brown eyes meeting the Captain’s hazel ones. For a moment the two just looked at one another, and Juushirou thought he caught a glimpse of sadness in the youngster’s gaze, but then the next minute it was gone, and Koku glanced away. His body language was tense and unwelcoming, but he made no objection as Juushirou closed the door behind him, crossing the tatami mat floor until he stood a foot or so from the edge of the bed.

“How are you feeling?” he asked the question softly, and the young man gave a little sigh, stretching pale fingers out against the fabric of his bed covers.

“A shinigami tried to take my guts out,” his voice was low and flat, lacking in any particular emotion, but he made no attempt to meet Juushirou’s gaze a second time. “I can’t exactly say I’m fine.”

“No, I know,” Juushirou sighed, perching himself on the stool beside the bed and folding his hands in his lap. “It was a rash action and I'm sorry for it. So is the shinigami responsible. Souja-dono was her brother, and in the panic she jumped to the wrong conclusion... but you won't come to any more harm here now, I promise."

"Mm," the response was non-committal, but Juushirou was determined to persevere.

"You're name is Koku, I've been told," he observed, and the young man's head jerked into a faint nod. "Just Koku?"

"People like me don't tend to have all the fancy names and titles that people like you do," again, there was no resentment in the boy's tones, just a flat, emotionless edge, and Juushirou was reminded of Mitsuki's words about the youngster's wary attitude and lonely aura. He sighed, sitting back to regard his companion carefully. Despite the hunched figure that Koku presented, it was clear that the boy was underweight, the slight hollowness of his cheeks giving away the fact that it was unlikely he had had a stable diet for some time. His long hair had been carefully brushed and tied in a neat tail by one of his attentive carers, but the ends were uneven and ragged, splayed out against the rough surface of the blanket wound tightly around his shoulders. Whether his posture was out of defensiveness or pain from his injury Juushirou wasn't sure, but although he did not have Mitsuki's sensitivity for other people's auras, he was suddenly struck by how right her judgement appeared to have been. Frightened and wary he might be, but overriding all of these things was a sense of lonely melancholy.

If I was in any doubt about his motives for crossing the divide, his behaviour now would seal my convictions. This boy doesn't want to be in Seireitei. He didn't want to come here, and now he is, he's unhappy. I don't know what kind of a world it is on the other side of the Sekkiseki wall, but in comparison, this one must seem alien and dangerous. He came here because of Souja. That being the case, it's doubly important for me to find a way to keep his real origins a secret until I can work out better how to handle them.

Out loud he said,

"You'd be surprised, you know. Not all of us come from fancy, titled backgrounds."

"You're shinigami, aren't you?"

"Yes, but not all shinigami belong to Clans." Juushirou said frankly.

"Kirio-san said she was abandoned." Koku seemed to respond to this, although he still made no attempt to meet the Captain's gaze, and Juushirou nodded.

“That’s true,” he agreed. “People come into the Gotei from all walks of life. There are good and bad in all strata of society — and shinigami from almost all of them. When I say you won’t be hurt here, I mean it. This is Thirteenth Division, and I’m its Captain. My name is Ukitake — Ukitake Juushirou. Thirteenth is also known as the District division, since most of its members are District born. The people here aren’t so very different from you, Koku.”

A little snort, but no verbal response, and Juushirou pursed his lips, rallying himself to try again.

“I wanted to talk to you about Souja,” he murmured. Koku’s head twitched into another jerky nod.

“I know,” he said flatly. “Edogawa-san told me you were coming. I’m not going to be able to help you, though. I found him after he was attacked. I don’t know how he brought us here. I don’t understand shinigami techniques and I don’t have anything else I can tell you.”

Juushirou eyed Koku long and hard for a moment, then he let out a heavy sigh.

“You know, Souja was a fine young man,” he said gravely. “Not just as a shinigami, but in other respects too. I knew him from when he was a small boy, and his father and I are old friends. I understand that to you, Souja is a shinigami, and because you helped that shinigami, you were hurt. I know you must be angry about that, and wary of what we might do to you. But we haven’t brought you here in order to plug you for information then discard you. Souja wouldn’t have wanted that, and it’s not what I intend to do.”

“Souja-dono wouldn’t have done anything about it,” now Koku raised his gaze, and Juushirou was taken aback by the sudden cold gleam of bitterness that surfaced in the young man’s eyes. “He was a shinigami. He couldn’t possibly understand anything about me. And even if he did, he’s dead, so that door’s closed.”

“The first thing Souja said to his father when he returned to Seireitei was to ask about you,” Juushirou said evenly, taking in the look of surprise and consternation that flickered across the boy’s expression. “He was adamant that we made sure you were all right. Out in the field, too — it was Souja who stopped his sister from attacking you. Not me. Maybe I held her back, but it was Souja speaking through the pain to tell her that you helped him. He was that kind of man. His loyalty ran deep. He saw you as his ally, and he used precious last breaths to convey to us how important he felt that was.”

Koku bit his lip, letting out a shaky breath of air.

“I think he understood more than you think,” Juushirou continued, resting a hand gently on Koku’s arm, but the young man pulled it back, rubbing it absently and lowering his gaze once more. “I think he was as frantic as he was because he knew that if people discovered you came from the Rukon, not District Seireitei, you’d be hurt. I think he wanted to make sure this didn’t happen, and so he entrusted your safety to us.”

This got a reaction, for there was no hiding the dismay in Koku’s expression now, and Juushirou offered him a smile.

“I haven’t reported it,” he said lightly. “I don’t intend to, and nothing you say about it will go outside this room. I promise — you have my word. But I know you met with Souja in Rukongai. I know that’s where he was hurt. And right now, he can’t do anything to help you. But I gave him my word that I would, and I keep my promises. This is the last thing I can do for a lad I was very fond of, and so I intend on doing it properly.”

“What do you want from me?” Koku’s words came out in a hoarse whisper, and Juushirou pressed his lips together pensively.

“I want you to tell me what you can, for his sake,” he said at length.

“I already told you. I don’t know the things you want to know,” Koku shook his head impatiently, though there was a note of agitation also in his tones. “I can’t fabricate something I don’t know, Ukitake-dono. He was a stranger to me. I didn’t know him before that day and I’ll never know him now. That’s the truth. We met for the first and last time that day.”

“I don’t want you to fabricate anything,” Juushirou shook his head. “I want you to tell me as clearly as you can what you remember. Even if it seems unimportant, it may carry some resonance.”

“And if I don’t remember?” Koku demanded. “Are you going to use what you think you know about me as a threat?”

“I already told you that I wasn’t going to mention the Rukon outside of this room,” Juushirou reminded him. “I said it was a promise, and I keep promises.”

There was a long silence, then Koku frowned.

“What happens to you, then, if it’s found out you’re sheltering someone who you think is from Rukongai?” he asked softly, and Juushirou shrugged.

“I’ll deal with that if and when it happens. It won’t change my intentions. I’m not afraid of the Council’s censure, and I’ve made up my mind what to do about you, so I’ll see it through. Thirteenth Division is a safe place and you have nothing to fear here. Whether you can or can’t help us investigate Souja-dono’s death, I intend on seeing his last wishes properly carried out. That means making sure you’re safe, regardless of your role as last witness.”

Koku buried his head in his hands.

“I should’ve not got involved. It’s better not to get involved,” he murmured, his words muffled and more than half to himself, but Juushirou heard them.

“Then why did you help Souja? If you knew it would put you at risk, why do it?”

“What else can you do, when you find someone helpless and bleeding on the ground?” Koku raised his gaze, looking hopeless. “I know it’s wrong... I never meant to leave that place and come here. I never would’ve! I don’t belong here, and I didn’t want to come. Only... he wasn’t able to get up on his own. At first, I thought he was dead. But then he groaned, and I knew he was alive. I couldn’t just leave him there. I didn’t know any way of helping him, though. I can’t... I don’t know any shinigami magic, and I can’t fix people. I can’t do anything useful at all.”

“But you decided you should try?” Juushirou pressed, and Koku nodded.

“He had dropped his sword,” he murmured. “He asked me to give it to him. His fingers were all broken, his wrist too, and he couldn’t hold it right, but he... he did it anyhow. He couldn’t stand up, so I helped him. He was bleeding a lot. He did something with the sword, and the black hole opened. We had to go into it. Then... then we were here. I don’t remember... it’s blurry.”

He rubbed his temples.

“He fell down, and I was trying to help him up, and then the girl came with her sword,” he concluded bitterly. “That’s as much as I know. I told you. It’s useless.”

“But this was in Rukongai?”

“You already seem convinced that it was.”

“I know, but I’d like to know for sure,” Juushirou pursed his lips. “Friends of mine are in Rukongai as we speak, and if there’s a crime scene there, they will find it whether you tell me it's there or not. I wanted to know whether you'd trust me enough to tell me that it was."

"I don't know, yet, whether I can trust shinigami," Koku pointed out. "If you think you know where it happened, you don't need me to tell you. Maybe it's all right, and you won't get me into trouble — but maybe it's a trap, and you will. I don't know who you are, Ukitake Juushirou. We haven't met before, so I don't know if you're a good person or a bad one. I'm not going to admit to anything until I know the answer to that question. I might not have shinigami skills, but I'm not foolish."

"No," Juushirou acknowledged, folding his arms loosely across his chest. "You're right, and I won't expect you to trust me or any of my people until you've decided for yourself what our motives are."

His gaze softened.

"But I am grateful to you, all the same," he added, causing the young man to gaze at him in surprise once more. "You helped bring a much loved son home to his family. Without you, they would never have been able to say goodbye. You took a big risk, and because of it, his family could at least cremate him with honour and find some kind of closure."

"I couldn't save him, though," Koku's words were numb. "I wanted to, but I couldn't. I don't like... death. I didn't want to see someone die. I didn't want to, but I couldn't save him. Because I couldn't..."

He trailed off, clamping his mouth shut as though afraid to allow his true feelings to come out, and Juushirou sighed, patting him lightly on the shoulder.

"Nobody likes seeing death, even those of us who wear its robes and do its bidding," he murmured. "We purify Hollows to free them from the taint of negative emotions and despair, and I believe a sword should only be used for that purpose. To see someone killed in the way Souja was is hard to stomach. He was young and he had promise for a future that was taken from him. Even finding justice for him doesn't make that easier to bear."

"The future, huh?" Koku's expression became wistful, and Juushirou was sure he saw regret in the other's brown eyes. He nodded.

"It would be twice as unforgivable, don't you think, if another young man had his future stolen from him too?" he asked gently.

“Right now you’re stuck here with us and I’m sorry, since you clearly don’t like being around shinigami such a lot, but bear with it and let Mitsuki... I mean, Edogawa-san treat your wounds. You will heal, even if it takes time, and then, after that, we’ll talk about what you want to do.”

“I can’t go back,” Koku’s eyes were sad. “There’s no way to... I can’t go back.”

“But you want to, all the same?” Juushirou asked, and Koku sighed, shrugging his shoulders. The tension slipped from his body as he sank back in resignation against the wall.

“It’s not a matter of going back to a place. It’s going back to a time, and it can’t be done,” he murmured. “I can’t undo this. I can’t not have come here. And I can’t go back. There’s no place for me now... maybe there never was one, but now it’s so complicated and I don’t know what to expect. All I know is that I can’t go back... not ever. I knew it when I helped Souja-dono, and whether I’m here with you or out there on my own, the same is true. I can’t take back the past... and as for the future...”

He closed his eyes.

“Sometimes it’s better not to know what that holds.”

Juushirou eyed him keenly for a moment, then,

“Have you told me everything you think I should know about Souja’s death?” he asked quietly. “Bringing justice for that boy is all any of us can do now. If you’re from the Rukon, I understand how scared you must be, and I also know that there are probably things you saw there that you don’t want to talk to me about. Maybe there are people there who you’re afraid of, too. I won’t ask you to talk about those things right now, but if they are there, Koku, and they relate to Souja’s death, I hope you’ll come to trust me enough to tell me about them later.”

“I’ve told you all I can.”

“The Endou have a tradition, that the cremated soul of the dead wanders looking for its killer,” Juushirou added. “They can’t rest until that person has been brought to account. I don’t know if I believe in superstitions, but I would like to be able to put this business to rest, if for no other reason than to alleviate his family’s pain. Souja’s mother is quite unwell as a result of his murder — I’ve understood from Hirata that she’s more or less collapsed since his funeral and doesn’t leave her room. His youngest sister is confused and bewildered about why anyone would hurt her brother. His other sister is beside herself, trying to cope with the grief of his loss and the guilt of hurting you, and his father is struggling to hold it all together for all of them. Maybe you feel that Seireitei has abandoned you and people like you, and I can't deny that there's probably been an oversight somewhere. But Souja had family and that family loved him. You helped him come home to them, so I think you understand that impulse, at the very least."

"Meaning what?" Koku's eyes were expressionless, his demeanour somehow more defensive than before, and Juushirou sighed.

"I thought you perhaps understood being part of a family," he admitted. "Even though they're not here now."

"Rukon souls don't have 'family'."

"I'm sure that's not true," Juushirou shook his head. "Thirteenth Division is a family. There's no blood between us, but we are one all the same. For some of my officers, this division is their only family. Their comrades are their brothers and sisters. I'm sure that, even in the Rukon, that system operates. Mitsuki's told me that in the Spiritless Zone, souls gathered together for company and formed friendships. I know... I believe you're not from the Spiritless Zone, which concerns me, because I didn't know any souls lived outside of it — but even so, I can't imagine you've always been alone. If there's someone worrying about you back home..."

"There's nobody."

"You seemed miserable... I wondered if you were homesick."

"For a world with no sunlight? No life? Nothing?" Koku's words were cold. "I might not want to be here, but I told you, I can't go back. There's nothing to go back to. Nobody to go back to. And even if Souja-dono had family and you think you can elicit more information from me by talking about it, it doesn't change anything. I told you what I know. I don't know anything else. I can't invent something I didn't see."

"Fine," Juushirou got to his feet, smoothing the white fabric of his haori, before turning to glance once more at the boy. "But in your own words you just confirmed for me that you came from Rukongai. So who knows what other things you might decide to tell me as time goes on."

The stricken look that entered the young man's eyes was unmistakably genuine this time, and Juushirou offered him a faint smile.

“You’ll have to trust me, now,” he said evenly. “I hope that when you realise you can, we’ll talk again... but for now you should rest. You’re still very pale, and I don’t want to be nagged by the people looking after you for pushing you too hard so soon after such a bad injury.”

With that he took his leave, striding from the chamber without looking back and closing the door behind him. Tsunemori waited in the passageway, clearly assigned sentry duty in Kirio’s absence, and he cast his Captain a questioning look.

“Is he... all right? I mean... I know he’s awake... but...”

“He won’t hurt you. I don’t think he’s that way inclined, and if he was, I’m sure your training would soon put him right,” Juushirou assured him. “Keep an eye on him till Kirio comes back, Tsunemori. Since he’s prone to go wandering if he’s unsupervised, and since Mitsuki will be cross with me if he’s allowed to do that again so early into his recovery, I want you to be extra vigilant this time.”

“Yes, sir,” Tsunemori said fervently, saluting his superior officer before scuttling to take his place inside the sick room, and Juushirou sighed, leaning up against the panel wall of the hallway as he replayed the conversation in his head.

There’s a lot you told me, Koku, and a lot you did not. I’m not as talented as Shunsui at reading between the lines and putting together nuances, but you tensed when I talked about family.

Mitsuki is right, too — you’re lonely. Maybe you have been abandoned. Perhaps it’s a sore point. I wish I knew more about Rukon souls and what they remember from their past lives — but I can’t very well ask Mitsuki about it when it’s a secret and I promised to keep it that way. If I want you to open up to me any further, Koku, I have to prove that I can be trusted both to keep my word and be discreet. That being the case, I’ll just have to muddle it out on my own.

He pursed his lips pensively.

Still, Souja was definitely attacked in Rukongai, and Koku came back with him through the Senkaimon to the place Kikyue found them. So long as Shunsui and the rest bring back evidence that tallies with his story, the chances are I won’t need to interrogate Koku again. If he didn’t see the assailant — and how he’d have escaped unscathed from a Vice Captain’s killer with no weapon of his own and no knowledge of shunpo or kidou, I don’t know — then maybe there’s no more he can tell me. At least, not about that. Maybe not about anything.

His gaze flitted back in the direction of the chamber door.

So why do I feel as though I want to speak to him again? Is it what Mitsuki said about him being lonely? Was it because he was so prickly and withdrawn? Getting involved personally in investigations is never a good thing, and I took this on for Souja's sake... but... having met the lad, maybe I feel differently about it. Perhaps I want to do it for his sake, too... so that, at the end of all of this, he has a chance to live a proper life, without needing to be so wary and afraid. He's the proof that people are living unnoticed in the wasteland Rukon, and that means something needs to be done about it... but right now, my job is to protect him specifically and that's what I'll do.

He ran his fingers through his lank white hair.

And prepare myself for Izumi's imminent arrival. I only hope the Thirteenth Division will prove to be the safe haven Joumei imagines it to be.

There was a bitter edge to the atmosphere of the wasteland Rukon as Nagesu and his companions made their silent progress through the clumps of wilted plants and greyed out hollow trunks of dead trees that flanked their path on either side. It wasn't a breeze exactly, Nagesu mused, rather a sense of antagonism towards their presence, as though the whole of the world beyond the Sekkiseki divide was screaming its defiance to the shinigami regime that claimed sovereignty over all of Soul Society.

It was a naive perspective, he realised, to assume that, by inaugurating the Spiritless Zone, the problems of impurity and pollution in the Rukon would be overcome. On the contrary, if Keitarou had really been making a base of this place, it suggested the opposite — by opening a judicial black hole, the Gotei had allowed a poison known as hatred to seep into the area left behind. Nagesu did not know whether the sad state of the environment through which they now walked was Keitarou's doing, or simply the result of constant pollution in the ether left over by the many fierce battles between shinigami and mutated soul in the years leading up to the Spiritless Zone's first blueprints, but whichever it was, the result was the same. Rukongai was empty and unwelcoming — and the perfect place for a man like Keitarou to conceal himself from prying eyes.

“Taichou!”

As they reached a stretch of more open land, Yunosuke, the division's Third seat let out an exclamation, raising his hand to indicate the dark, seeping stain of something colouring the dying blades of grass. Before Nagesu could even react, Kai had darted forward, crouching at the edge of the patch and eying it with a grimace, putting black gloved hands against the substance and bringing them to his nose, sniffing them disdainfully.

“Blood,” he confirmed grimly, “and what’s left of Souja-dono’s reiatsu. I think we’ve reached our murder scene, Nagesu-sama.”

“Nobody’s made an attempt to clean up, if that’s true,” Nagesu himself approached the patch of land reluctantly, eying the extent of the bloodspill with dismayed eyes. “My goodness. I knew the reports said he’d lost a lot of blood — but can this all belong to the one individual?”

“It’s smeared around a bit, but you’re right. Nobody’s tried to clean up,” Kai wiped his hands clean on his uniform. “As for whether it’s just Souja-dono’s blood, I guess that’s where scientific tests come in — the reiatsu is too degraded for me to try and speculate whether one or two people bled out here.”

“If I might interrupt, Kai-dono, Nagesu-sama,” the slender form of the Fourth Division Vice Captain joined them at that moment, eying the land with grave eyes. “I believe perhaps I might be of use in this matter.”

“Eriko-dono?” Nagesu cast her a glance, and Eriko nodded, kneeling carefully on the ground beside the worst of the blood and hovering her hands over it, closing her eyes. For a moment she was silent, then she sighed, opening them and raising her gaze to the Third Division Captain.

“I only detect blood belonging to Souja-dono,” she admitted. “I think proper tests would be needed to absolutely confirm I’m right, but even degraded, I sense only his aura here.”

“So all of this,” Kai indicated the blood, “is Souja-dono’s? How in hell did he get back alive, if that’s the case?”

“I can’t guarantee that,” Eriko said cautiously. “The person who attacked him is not in possession of reiatsu. Therefore her blood would not be significant to me at the scene. However, Retsu-sama was of the opinion that Souja-dono lost a potentially fatal amount of blood before he returned to Seireitei. This scene would support that hypothesis.”

“Meaning that Souja-dono ought to have died here, but for some reason, managed to live long enough to get his message back home?” Nagesu asked. Eriko nodded.

“The strength of will and resolve of some shinigami when faced with death is an incredible thing,” she admitted. “Medically, if all of this does belong to Souja-dono, I would not expect him to have been able to move, let alone open a Senkaimon and return to Seireitei. Yet I know that that is what happened. He must have been possessed of incredible determination, to stave off death long enough to do his duty.”

She sighed.

“Retsu-sama did all she could to revive him, but looking at this, I think anything even she could have offered him would’ve failed,” she said regretfully. “I’m not certain that even had Shikiki returned in time to tend to him with her exceptional and unique barrier magic, she would’ve been able to save him. Even now, Shikiki takes longest reconstituting blood. It cannot be done instantaneously, and sometimes requires multiple sessions to succeed. Souja-dono was already living on borrowed time following this attack. His organs had undoubtedly begun to shut down before he left Rukongai, and forcing his sword to release the Senkaimon would’ve only put them under greater stress. I do not believe Shikiki could have healed him quickly enough — he lost too much blood for her to be able to repair quickly enough to prevent an irreversable level of organ failure.”

“You’re essentially saying he was dying... no, he forced his body beyond the limits of life and death and his doing so also cemented his fate.” Nagesu murmured softly. “Such courage in such a young officer is both awe inspiring and, in these circumstances, terribly tragic for all concerned. Hirata-dono had a son to be proud of... perhaps there is truth in the old adage that those who shine brightest burn out the most quickly. I did not know Souja-dono well, but my son has spoken very positively of him and his general attitude to his duties. Perhaps in time that knowledge will be of some comfort to the family, though I confess at present the whole thing appears so very bleak.”

“I agree. He would’ve made a good Onmitsukidou,” Kai commented. “Seeing this makes me realise how true it is, when they say the quiet ones are the ones that surprise you the most.”

He turned to his companions.

“There may be further clues around here,” he told them briskly. “Karaki, you go left. Doihara, you go right. Scour the horizon for anything of use. If you find anyone, take them for interrogation but don’t kill them. I will speak to them myself. Understood?”

“Yes, sir,” the two officers saluted in sync, disappearing into subdued shunpo steps as they hurried to carry out his bidding, and Nagesu sighed, rubbing his fingers against his brow as if trying to offset a brewing headache.

“Yunosuke, I would be grateful if you and Kamitani would take some samples from the scene here,” he said wearily. “I realise it is an unpleasant sight, but we must be certain, as Eriko-dono said, that we have found the site of Souja-dono’s last stand. It’s clear to me that events were as he said they were — he fought his enemy here in the Rukon, and then returned home. That being the case, there is almost certainly a Senkaimonin these parts, and I would like to find what traces of it exist on this side.”

“I understood that the Gate had been destroyed, Nagesu-sama?” Eriko asked quizzically, as the two Third Division members hurried to do their Captain’s bidding. Nagesu nodded.

“Certainly to the point where nobody else could enter it,” he agreed. “Souja-dono appears to have forced it open using his zanpakutou, but his doing so activated some kind of self-destruction impulse within the Gate and it imploded on itself. If I’m correct, however, there should be spiritual remains of that doorway on this side that match the one on the other. I’m afraid it might become a little tedious for you, waiting for us to collect fragments of data — but in the absence of so much information, every little piece we can gather is progress.”

“On the contrary, it is preferable to me to be somewhat superfluous to requirement,” Eriko offered a faint smile. “I am a healer, Nagesu-sama. My being deployed into active service means someone has been hurt. As a healer, one hopes for that eventuality to be prevented. If I can be of material use to you in obtaining your spiritual samples, please, don’t hesitate to ask. Retsu-sama requested me to be of as much use as I could be.”

“That is reassuring,” Nagesu offered the woman a smile, curling his hand around the hilt of his sword and pulling the weapon from its place of rest at his side.

“Well, Sekizanha,” he murmured, more than half to himself, but at the sound of his words the katana glittered slightly, as if anticipating his next command. “I wonder if you can sense the Gate, even in your sealed form.”

“You don’t intend to release, Nagesu-sama?” Eriko was startled, and Nagesu shook his head.

“Sekizanha was always quite a powerful sword,” he said frankly, “and releasing it into this atmosphere would corrupt the spiritual samples my men are taking. Besides, now that it has attained Bankai, it no longer needs to be fully released to detect or open a Senkaimon of this nature. I think, therefore, that the less I disrupt the spiritual balance the better — Sekizanha's techniques are a little violent, and I should rather save them for a time when they are truly needed."

He turned his back on the crime scene, extending the weapon slightly and closing his eyes as he centred his concentration on his sword's spiritual aura.

Well, Sekizanha? Do you detect anything of use?

You really shouldn't use me as a spirit detector, Nagesu. The woman is right — I'm not just a tool for your scientific endeavours. Besides, this place is thick with unpleasant auras. Just because there are no enemies in plain sight, I wouldn't assume there's nothing for us to fight against.

I understand, but this isn't that kind of a mission. Keitarou isn't here, and I'd sooner save our strengths for him, if possible. The more he learns about us, the more of a disadvantage we find ourselves at. He already knows our shikai. I would sooner he didn't have a chance to scientifically examine our potential for Bankai, so for now, let's just find the Gate.

Hrm.

The sword was silent for a moment, but Nagesu could feel its presence humming against his own thoughts. Then,

There are two gates here. One matches the spiritual aura you had examined at the scene in Seireitei. The second... is different.

"Two?"

Nagesu's eyes snapped open and he glanced around him in surprise.

"Nagesu-sama?" Eriko looked quizzical, and the Third Division Captain reddened slightly, shaking his head.

"Sekizanha detected two Senkaimon. Not just one," he explained hastily.

"Two gates?" Eriko looked thoughtful. "One that Souja-dono escaped through, and a second that Keitarou perhaps used for his own escape?"

"Perhaps," Nagesu agreed. "Sekizanha's indicating that it's somewhere in the close vicinity. It believes this one is different from the other, though how I'm not quite clear."

Between the dead trees, Nagesu. About ten paces to your right. Though I cannot open it. It is barred with a level of Kidou that would require a higher level of release to slice through — even in Shikai I do not think I could manage it, and if we were to use Bankai, it might well be the kind of trap you are afraid of. More, I think that the Senkaimon might implode on itself if too much pressure was applied — it seems very precarious to me.

Hrm.

Nagesu moved carefully around the splashes of blood in the direction his sword had indicated, putting his hand against the trunk of one of the trees and running the tip of his sword briefly through the atmosphere inbetween. As he did so, something glittered, then pushed his weapon back, and he let out an exclamation, only just managing to keep himself from falling headlong.

“Taichou? Are you all right?” Yunosuke’s concerned exclamation made him turn, nodding his head.

“Yes. It didn’t attack me, it simply repelled. It seems the second Senkaimon is indeed sealed with some kind of Kidou barrier. Keitarou does not intend us to follow wherever he’s chosen to go.”

The spiritual emissions leaking from the gate suggest the Real World. I don’t know if that matters, but I think this gate goes there, rather than back to Seireitei.

“The Real World, huh?” Nagesu sheathed his weapon, running both hands lightly through the air that separated the two trees. “A gate barred and locked against us, leading, as we feared, out of shinigami jurisdiction and into the great unknown.”

“Can you open the Gate, Nagesu-sama?” Eriko asked softly, and Nagesu shook his head.

“It’s a powerful seal,” he replied. “Sekizanha believes trying to neutralise it would almost certainly destroy the Gate completely, and I think I agree, judging by how quickly it reacted just to the presence of my sword sealed. No, I think Keitarou’s done his best to keep us out this time. If of course, that is what this gate signifies, and this really is Keitarou’s doing.”

“If I can suggest, maybe we should summon the other group here and let them examine the scene too,” Kai stood up, casting Nagesu a pensive look. “Much as I hate to admit it, I think we need Shikibu’s sword to find out for sure.”

“Shikibu Naoko?” Eriko stared, and Kai nodded.

“Shikibu’s zanpakutou has been controlled by Keitarou before, but more importantly, it picks up reiatsu on a terrifyingly in-depth scale,” he said frankly. “It’s not a nice sword by any stretch of the imagination — in fact, it wouldn’t look out of place in my secret ops unit, but in a case like this, I'm sure it could tell whether or not it was Keitarou who set the seal on that Gate. Even given that he has a Bankai level sword, and his power levels being as they are, I'm sure that Shikibu out of everyone has the best chance of confirming or negating his presence at this scene."

Nagesu frowned, his brows knitting together thoughtfully.

"Very well," he agreed, after a few minutes of deliberation. "If it will settle the matter one way or another, Kai-dono, then I would like you to go find Kyouraku's party and explain to him what you just did to me. With his consent, I should like to deploy Shikibu's sword in the manner you suggested, and see whether or not we can't make a firm link to my prodigal cousin, Keitarou."

Author's Note

The return of Nagesu's sword, Sekizanha in this chapter. It's a little nostalgic — I haven't written about it in a while, but it actually got to speak a bit in this chapter. There's a good chance Sekizanha will see a full scale release before the end of this story, too!

Also, no sake for Shunsui — the entirety of his scene in this chapter he made me write in an entirely different way to how I first intended it. Silly boy...

37. Izumi

Chapter Thirty Six: Izumi

“Ketsui-kun, when you’ve done eating, the Taichou’s looking for you.”

Ketsui gulped down his mouthful of green tea, turning to stare at the speaker with a look of apprehensive confusion. It was early morning in the Thirteenth Division barracks and all members, bar those on patrol duty were at breakfast — all, that is, except for Naoko, Atsudane and Kira, who had not yet returned from their top secret mission to the Rukon. It was a top secret mission, at least officially, but unofficially everyone in Thirteenth knew about it and Ketsui was no exception, so it was with any amount of consternation that he met Tsunemori’s gaze.

“Me? Right now? Are you sure?”

“As soon as possible, that’s what he said,” Tsunemori nodded his head, offering the boy a grin as he seemed to understand his companion’s concern. “I know, being summoned these days has all kinds of undertones, doesn’t it? But I don’t think it’s anything bad. In fact, I think it’s the opposite. Taichou said he had a training assignment for you and I was to send you to his office right away.”

“A training assignment?” Ketsui set down his chopsticks, placing his mug on his tray and getting to his feet. “I’m about done now, so I’ll go right there. Did he say anything about what kind of assignment? I mean, I’ll do it, if he wants me to, but...”

“You need to have more faith in yourself,” Tsunemori told him firmly, resting a hand lightly on his subordinate’s shoulder. “You’re Tenth seat — there’s no reason why you can’t take on training with a lower ranked member. Besides, Kira-san said yesterday before he left that he’d heard Naoko-san and Fukutaichou talking about us taking in a new recruit out of the normal timetable. Probably it’s about that. With everything else going on, Taichou probably doesn’t have time to see to them himself. It’s a good chance for you, if I’m right... you haven’t trained a recruit before, have you?”

“No,” Ketsui agreed slowly, stacking his tray with the others to be cleared and following the skinny Ninth Seated officer out of the mess hall and along the corridor that led towards the Captain’s Ugendou.

“A recruit out of season? I remember. Kira-san said he didn’t know the circumstances, but that it sounded like a special case — someone who would benefit more from squad placement now than waiting the year through. That kind of thing doesn’t happen very often, does it? And if they came here, it must be a District student — so even less so.”

“True, but I suppose it can happen,” Tsunemori reflected. “What a time to join a division, though. Being a recruit is intimidating enough, but to come at such an unusual time, and in the midst of all this chaos...”

“Hopefully nobody’s told the kid that one of the Gotei’s higher officers just got murdered,” Ketsui said darkly. “If I was recruiting, and someone told me that, I’d run a mile. Seriously. It’d be the first thing to put me off.”

Tsunemori grinned, shaking his head.

“I don’t think so,” he reflected. “I think I know you quite well now, Ketsui-kun. We share quarters, so it’s easier to get someone’s measure when you spend so much time together. I don’t think you’d have run away from the Thirteenth — not then and not now.”

“Not now, certainly,” Ketsui ran his fingers through his messy blond hair, eying his companion anxiously. “Do I look all right? I haven’t really time to go upstairs and smarten up, not if Taichou sent a direct message... but I want to make a good impression. There was a time, though, when I really didn’t think I’d make it as a shinigami.”

“Likewise,” Tsunemori mused, and Ketsui’s eyes widened in surprise.

“You?” he demanded. “Ever since I’ve know you, you’ve been one of the most level-headed, settled people in the division! All right, maybe you don’t shout at everyone...”

He paused, reddening as he realised how cheeky his words might sound, and Tsunemori laughed, nodding his head.

“Thirteenth is my family,” he said frankly. “Ukitake-taichou and Houjou-fukutaichou were the first two people in that family that I knew and trusted, back when they were my senpai at school. When I began at the Academy, though, I couldn’t even read, and could barely manage to speak two words together, even when people were being kind to me. My mother had died, and I was all by myself in the world for the first time, with no place to go but the school. I tried once to run away. Between the two of them, Taichou and Fukutaichou helped me out a whole lot. I don’t know if I decided then that I could be a shinigami, but I definitely decided somehow I was going to repay them for being so kind to me. So I worked hard, and as I did, I realised that I was starting to really like what I was doing. I'd never go anywhere other than Thirteenth Division, now... not even if it was dangerous to be here. Being on your own is more frightening to me... and I think you feel that too, don't you?"

"Mm," Ketsui reddened, nodding his head. "It's silly, really. Tenichi-nii is the one in the family with the courage, the drive, the determination. He's the one with the plaudits, the former Anideshi, the one people talk about maybe being a division adjutant at some point in the future. My name might be Ketsui — resolve — but I don't think I have all that much of it. I like being a shinigami, but I don't always think I'm very good at it. And when something like this comes up... do you really think it will be all right, if Taichou really does hand me a recruit?"

"I don't see why he wouldn't," Tsunemori reflected. "I've trained you in Kidou and I've done some training work with Kuyashima and a couple of the others, and I only rank up on you by one place."

"I guess I'm still not confident of Tenth seat," Ketsui admitted, "but I don't want to let anyone down, so I'm doing my best. I know Ten-nii left Thirteenth so I could do that, and he's dealing with a whole lot more than I am right now, with Seventh in the state it is — so I don't want to create any trouble for him, either. Maybe... I suppose if it's a recruit, maybe I will be able to teach them something. My sword skills are quite good, and you said my Kidou was getting better."

"There," Tsunemori grinned at him. "And here's where I have to leave you. I promised to relieve Hikifune-san so she could get her breakfast and she's been with our mystery patient since before dawn."

"All right," Ketsui returned the grin. "Thank you for bringing the message and for walking this far with me, Tsunemori-san. I'm sure you're right — I'm sure it'll be fine, else Taichou wouldn't have asked for me, would he?"

"Right," Tsunemori agreed. "I'll see you later. Try and make a good impression!"

With that the Ninth Seat was gone, disappearing along the twisting, turning passageways towards the side room which had become Koku's sickroom since his arrival at Thirteenth Division, and, left alone, Ketsui once more attempted to smooth his hair, pulling his hakamashita as straight as he could manage and checking the knot on his obito make sure it was not squint. Once reassured that he had spilled none of his morning meal across the crisp black fabric, he pushed open the sliding door that led out onto the planked walkway over the koi pond to the Ugendou, striding more purposefully than he felt across the slatted wood and raising a clenched fist to rap three times sharply on the bamboo divide.

Juushirou's voice called him in, and he obediently pushed the door back, stepping into the office-cum-living quarters and bowing his head properly towards his senior officer.

"You sent for me, sir?" he said evenly.

"I did," Juushirou's voice sounded part relieved, part harried, and as Ketsui raised his head, he realised that his Captain was not alone, but in the company of a tall, gangly man of about his own age, with a shock of red hair, robed in the plain browns and beiges of a District settlement. For a moment the two men gazed at one another, Ketsui curious and the man clearly wary, then the stranger spoke, bowing his head curtly towards Juushirou and taking a step back.

"I'll leave Izumi-hime in your hands, then, Ukitake-sama," he said softly.

Izumi... hime?

For the first time, Ketsui caught a glimpse of a third person, standing silent and almost completely hidden behind her taller companion. This one, he realised with a jolt, was neatly robed in black, albeit not the normal regulation shihakushou of the Gotei. Her obi was also a strip of ebony cloth, neatly knotted, and the whole apparel made a stark contrast with the girl's silverish fair hair, which fell mostly loose down her back, aside from a few beaded strands that strayed carelessly over her shoulders. She was tiny in stature, her full height not even reaching to Juushirou's shoulder, but as the redhead turned to glance at her, she merely nodded her head, as if she was unaffected by his clear unease of the entire situation. Her lashes were lowered demurely, the picture of a porcelain doll, but as she raised her head to meet his quizzical stare, Ketsui was struck by the vivid light that lurked in the depths of equally argent eyes. She was robed in common clothing, but as they locked gazes, Ketsui had the sudden impression that he really was looking at a 'hime', and that the redhead's term of address had not been exaggerated.

A District hime? That doesn't make sense, but even so, it's the only way I know how to describe her.

The redhead bowed his head in Ketsui's direction, a sombre, troubled look on his features, and then, with a backward glance at the young girl, he left the room, leaving a confused Tenth Seated officer alone with Juushirou and the silver-haired sprite. He eyed her critically, unable to take his gaze off the ghostlike delicacy of her countenance and the shrewd, intelligent contradiction that lurked deep within that deceptively innocent gaze. She could not be more than eighteen or nineteen at the very most, yet despite her elfin frame, Ketsui did not think that she was weak. In fact, unlike the troubled redhead and the harried Juushirou, the young woman seemed perfectly calm and composed, as if being there, in the middle of the Thirteenth Division's Captain's office at a time of year when new recruits were rare, was the most normal and natural thing in the world.

She met his gaze again, a faint smile touching her lips at his attention, and he reddened, suddenly discomfited about how much he had been staring. She lowered her lashes once more, tilting her head forward in perfect imitation of a Clan hime, and Ketsui had that strange sense of the surreal once more — the princess in rags, surveying her new dominion.

"Hiko-kun will return safely, I'm sure," Juushirou cast the young woman a fleeting glance. 'In the meantime, this is Kotetsu Ketsui, our Tenth seated officer. He will take care of you and show you around the division. He's been with us a long time, and will know all the things you'll need, so you can trust him to help you settle in. Ketsui,' he turned to his subordinate, "this is Ichimaru Izumi. She is a recruit with the Thirteenth Division starting today. It's an unusual time of year for her to join us, and as you're aware, we've been very busy, so I'm going to be relying on you to mentor her and show her the ropes. When Naoko comes back, you must ask her for a proper uniform for the girl and of course, for her to be shown the female quarters and her sleeping arrangements — but for the time being, I would like to put her under your mentorship."

"Yes, sir," Ketsui forcibly tore his gaze from Izumi, nodding his head. "I can try, sir. I mean, I'm not a girl, but..."

"No, you are not," despite his weariness, a faint smile glimmered at the corners of Juushirou's mouth, and Ketsui was mortified to see it mirrored on Izumi's delicate features. "However, with Kirio engaged with looking after our patient, and Naoko in the field, there are no female officers I can entrust Izumi's induction to. You don't mind going with Ketsui, do you, Izumi?"

The girl shook her head, offering Juushirou a reassuring smile. Juushirou returned it with a relieved one, patting her companionably on the shoulder, and nodding.

“Then I’ll ask you to step outside for a moment, while I speak to Ketsui alone,” he said lightly. “Don’t go far — just on the walkway. The ponds are quite pretty in this light, and there are quite a lot of fish in them at this time of the year.”

Izumi bowed her head respectfully, then, without making a sound, she picked her way daintily across the tatami mat floor, slipping the door open and disappearing outside. Juushirou waited until the divide closed, then turned his gaze on his Tenth seat with a rueful grin.

“You don’t mind, do you, that I’ve asked you to do this?” he asked softly, and Ketsui faltered, then shook his head.

“It’s a big responsibility. I’ve never had a recruit before, and, well, with her being a girl... but Tsunemori-san said that with everyone so busy... I want to be helpful too. And well, it won’t be... hard, will it? I mean, just showing her where to go, what to do, and things like that...? I can manage basic drill training and stuff, too... I think. And, well, I want you to think I’ve earned being Tenth Seat, so I... I will try.”

“Mm,” Juushirou hesitated for a moment, then crossed the floor, resting his hands on the younger man’s shoulders.

“I know you’re worried about Tenichi. I am too, but there’s nothing for us to do there,” he said solemnly. “Your brother’s division is in a bad state and he has to work out for himself how to deal with that. I want to give you this responsibility for that reason, too. That, and I know you’re kind. You won’t be impatient or judgemental with the girl — which I think is important. She’s not like any recruit we’ve had before, so...”

“In what way, sir?” Ketsui’s curiosity was piqued, but Juushirou shook his head.

“It’s complicated,” he said vaguely, and Ketsui had the impression his Captain was keeping something back. “Izumi is not yet formally in adult years, but it isn’t possible for her to remain with her family, nor with the Academy. Her... gifts... are not compatible with her being in either place, and it’s hoped she’ll find a better niche here. I want to give her that chance.”

“I see,” Ketsui absorbed this thoughtfully. “The man who was here... he called her ‘hime’...?”

“I would rather you didn’t ask me too many questions,” Juushirou admitted. “As I said, it’s complicated. Izumi might be... in danger if I were to try and tell you any more, and so might you. Remember, we are in a high-tension situation, and a dangerous killer is on the loose. I want you to give your attention to Izumi's well-being as a mentor and a senpai within the division. I'd rather you just absorbed that and took it forward, even if it's not a satisfactory answer."

"Are you asking me to train Ichimaru-san, or are you asking me to protect her?" Ketsui's eyes widened, and Juushirou sighed, rubbing his temples.

"Training is a form of self-protection," he answered at length. "I want you to be of help to her in whatever way you're able. I trust you, Ketsui-kun. I know you won't repeat anything I've said to you here outside this room, as some things are sacred to individual people and their privacy. I just wanted to give you some background, even a very little, so that if things she does seem at odds with you, you'll understand it's because her situation is different, and will, I hope, make allowances to compensate for them. I believe, for example, that she has excellent kidou and shunpo, but her sword skills are poor at best. You'll understand too if I say that she has some connections that she would rather didn't become public knowledge, because you do too — and for that reason, I think you will realise best how you can help her fit in."

"Well, I'll try," Ketsui's eyes burned with curiosity, but he nodded his head. "I won't ask any more, Taichou, and I won't ask her, either, I promise. If it's an order, then I'll carry it out as best I can. And if it turns out that it's sword training she wants or needs from me, well, I could do that, I think. I'm quite confident of my skills in that discipline at least."

"Good lad," Juushirou grinned. "That's what I knew you'd say. Although... there is one other thing I ought to tell you, before you take her off to show her the division. Something quite important, that I didn't know till she and her escort arrived here."

"Taichou?" Ketsui looked quizzical, and Juushirou's pursed his lips together.

"Izumi doesn't appear to have the power of speech," he admitted at length. 'I know,' as Ketsui looked startled, "it makes communication interesting, if not highly difficult. I understand she communicates using a sophisticated form of sign language, but outside of her family circle, that is difficult to comprehend. You may have to be considerably patient. I am assured — no, I know for a fact that she is an extremely intelligent young woman, and will be a great asset to us here at Thirteenth. But we will have to make... adjustments to fit her needs. I want you to protect her in that regard, at the very least — try and make her feel welcome in a place that is, almost certainly, very foreign to her at present.”

“It’s the same for all of us, when we recruit, even if we recruit in numbers,” Ketsui said wisely. “When Shizu-chan and I first came here, sir, I remember wishing we were both in the same Division, because I was terrified of coming into Thirteenth without her. I relied on Ten-nii too much, and forced him to feel he should move elsewhere, but everyone was kind to me, so now it’s my turn. I’ll do my best to make Ichimaru-san feel like this can be a second family to her — I promise.”

“Then you’re dismissed,” Juushirou indicated the door. “Take her and show her the... what now?” as there was a hurried pounding at the divide, followed by the rough sound of the wood being forced back to reveal the broad frame of the Thirteenth’s hefty Vice Captain, his face red as if he had been running.

“Taichou! I’m sorry to burst in like this, so early in the morning, but Shikibu and the others have returned from the Rukon, just!” he exclaimed breathlessly. “Shikibu’s wanted by the Third — something to do with her sword and reiatsu detection — but Kira and Atsudane are back at base and I’ve taken a brief...”

He paused, glancing at Ketsui as if seeing him for the first time, and Juushirou grinned.

“Go on, Ketsui. Enishi, it’s fine. If they’re back, I’ll see them myself.”

“Well, that’s the other thing,” As Ketsui bowed, moving to excuse himself from the office, Enishi continued earnestly. “Kyouraku... Kyouraku-taichou’s here, too. I mean, he wants to see you. Here. In Ugendou, now. That’s what I came to tell you — he said that even if you were undressed, he was coming, so make sure you had the sake ready.”

Ketsui did not hear his Captain’s response to this startling demand, closing the door hastily and turning to search for the division’s mysterious new recruit. She stood a few feet away, resting her hands against the bamboo railing as she gazed down into the clear blue waters below, apparently unconcerned by the fact her new Vice Captain had just thundered past her across the wooden walkway. At his approach, she glanced up, meeting his gaze briefly, before bowing very properly towards him.

Ketsui swallowed hard, gathering his courage, then offering her what he hoped was a professional grin.

I dunno how we’ll talk, though, if she doesn’t speak. I don’t like awkward silences, and I don't know the first thing about hand signals. Oh well. I guess we have to begin somewhere.

"I'm Kotetsu Ketsui, like Taichou said," he said firmly. "It sounds like our Third Seat is back from her mission, so later I'll introduce you and she can help you find where you sleep and change into proper shihakushou and things like that — but for now, shall I show you around the Thirteenth Division? I can introduce you to people — some of the other recruits are bound to be around, and, well, even though they're all guys at the moment, they're nice enough."

Izumi tilted her head on one side, considering his words, then greeting them with a smile and a nod of approval, and Ketsui let out an inward sigh of relief.

Here goes. My first recruit to mentor... and I hope to God with everything else going on I don't screw it up. Taichou made it sound like this girl was someone important, but not in a necessarily good way — and a way I don't need or want to know about. I only hope I'm not taking on more than I can handle, agreeing to take her on.

"You know, I didn't expect the first place for you to call would be Ugendou, following your return from the Rukon."

Juushirou poured the last of the green tea into the second cream ceramic mug, pushing it across the low slung table towards his companion before taking his own and putting it contemplatively to his lips. "I would've thought Eighth were eager to speak to you, not to mention your official debrief."

"I've left Sora to debrief Hanako and Kaoru on the important things, and no doubt Naoko will speak to you herself later, when she's finished talking to Nagesu-sama about the things her sword picked up on the other side," Shunsui sat back against the wall of the small hut, taking a gulp of his own tea and letting out a heavy sigh. "No sake, not even for a weary traveller? You're a hard taskmaster, Juushirou — I've been seeing and sensing horrors unimaginable and all you can manage is tea?"

"We have no sake. You drank the last of it, and there's been no time to order fresh," Juushirou said unsympathetically. "Besides, you might want to drink it away, but I'd rather have you clear headed. You obviously came here for a reason. Enishi spoke to Kira and Atsudane and they apparently gave him a brisk appraisal of the searches they carried out and so on — but your appearance makes me think there's more to it than what they encountered. You only drop in on me like this when something's on your mind — so spill."

"If I did that, your nice clean table would get ruined and Naoko-chan would scold me," Shunsui said lightly, offering his friend a benign smile, and Juushirou sighed, shaking his head in defeat.

"What's on your mind, not what's in your mug," he said wearily. "Now I know something's wrong. You're only this infuriating when you're dancing around a subject and the more irritating you become, the more serious it obviously is. What happened in the Rukon, Shunsui? What did you see there that's brought you to my door so soon?"

"Mm," Shunsui took another slurp of tea, setting the mug down on the table with a grimace. "You always did read right through me, and you are again. Though I think it's extremely hurtful of you to suggest I only come here when something's on my mind. I assure you that quite often nothing is on my mind, and I still come by to say hi, see how you are and play shougi."

"You come here to hide from Sora when your paperwork is due, or to coerce me into drinking the latest sake you've received from your brother, you mean," Juushirou corrected, and Shunsui beamed.

"Yes! I'm such a good friend that I bring and share my gifts! You shouldn't doubt my generosity, and..."

"Sora doesn't like you drinking sake in the office when she's trying to work, and you stop changing the subject. It isn't going to work so you might as well save your breath," Juushirou cut across him, holding up his hands. "I have a lot of things of my own to do, so I don't have time to play games with you. Much as I welcome your company — at times like this I'd rather you got to the point."

"Fine," Shunsui let out a gusty sigh, but nodded his head, folding his arms across his chest pensively. "I wanted to talk to you about a couple of things, but first of all, about the Kitsune."

"Kitsune?" Juushirou's eyes narrowed, and Shunsui nodded.

"I'm not asking detailed questions," he assured his friend, "but I know that you got the data you produced at the meeting from them. Did Hirata put them in touch with you, or was it all on your side?"

"Neither. It was theirs," Juushirou shook his head. "I can't really tell even you that much. Honestly, I'm not sure what I even know. But yes, the data did come from them."

He lowered his voice, glancing around him as if expecting someone to be eavesdropping from the shadows, then,

“Enishi and I met with one of them. He came to us, and offered us his help,” he said quietly. “If I tell you any more, then it could put them at risk, since I can’t guarantee what techniques Keitarou has at his disposal. If he’s corrupted a former Onmitsukidou, anything is possible, so I’ll play safe. They’re willing to continue cooperating with us, though — so if that’s what you want to know, you can consider them an ally in the shadows.”

“Good. That’s what I hoped,” Shunsui admitted. “The coordinates Nagesu-sama pulled from the data you gave was very accurate. Strikes me we’d never have landed in such close proximity to Keitarou’s former base if not for their work, so if there’s any more where that came from, make sure you bring it forth. Does Hirata know you’re in touch with them?”

“No, but when he returns to the Council and meetings proper, I’ll tell him,” Juushirou responded. “They’re his people, so it’s only right.”

“Understood. As far as I’m concerned, this conversation didn’t happen,” Shunsui grinned, but Juushirou could see the clouding in his dark eyes and frowned.

“And?” he pressed. “You said Keitarou’s former base. He’d upped and left?”

“Are you surprised?” Shunsui snorted. “A wounded victim escaped back to Seireitei. His location was bound to be discovered. Nagesu-sama found a locked and barred Senkaimon that seems to lead to the Real World. Naoko-chan’s sword confirmed that Keitarou’s reiatsu was all over it. Third and Twelfth are taking apart the science of it now, trying to pinpoint a new set of coordinates to open a door there and extend their search — but the Real World is huge, so doing so might take some time. I’m leaving that to him, although it bothers me a little.”

“Too obvious for Keitarou? You think it’s a red herring and he’s still in Rukongai?” Juushirou questioned. Shunsui shrugged.

“All I know is that he’s not in the bit we searched, but was till recently. And he definitely opened a gate to the Real World, but a shinigami with a Bankai sword doesn’t leave traces of himself on a gate unless he wants to be followed. He might be there, but I’m not sure if he’ll stay. The thing is, I don’t know where else he might have gone. The camp in the Rukon is cleared out. There’s evidence of people living there, Juu — not much, but enough to theorise that there was a settlement and Keitarou was at the heart of it. Wherever he's gone, he's taken them with him. Naoko-chan called it an army... maybe she's right."

"Including children we know very little about," Juushirou murmured. Shunsui nodded.

"I have some problems on that score, too," he admitted. "Naoko-chan detected the same reiatsu over there as she picked up here at Thirteenth and controlling the Hollows in District Seireitei. She thinks the person who did that is one of Keitarou's agents, which fits in with your own suspicions, doesn't it?"

"Yes, sadly," Juushirou agreed, "but it's not the Onmitsukidou?"

"No. Naoko-chan didn't think that the reiatsu felt right. It wasn't controlled enough, or something... very raw, very undermanaged. Onmitsukidou are the opposite — even ones like your corpse in the forest."

"Then we have someone else? Do you think Mitsuki is in danger?" Juushirou's eyes widened with horror, and Shunsui shook his head.

"I think where she is now is probably too close to the heart of things here to be a viable target. Since that person, whoever they are, came here once and then never again since, I imagine they were scouting out possibilities, decided it was too great a risk and left. That would suggest they wanted to finish the job begun in the Spiritless Zone, but didn't think it worth risking their own safety just to finalise their tally. Especially now Seireitei is on high alert."

"Mitsuki didn't see the killer of the healers, though. Madeki-dono did, but Mitsuki was across the other side of the area," Juushirou protested.

"Well, I'm thinking maybe that Hollow was also being controlled. Perhaps those deaths were murder too — no, in fact, I'm certain of it, though I can't prove it and nobody's really bothering to investigate with so many other things going on," Shunsui responded. "If the young lad hadn't stepped in and rescued your Mitsuki, who knows what might have happened?"

"You think I should stop being suspicious of him?"

"No, I think being suspicious of anyone is a good thing in this climate," Shunsui responded. "Whoever he was, and whyever he was there, I think we can rule out his intent to hurt Mitsuki if he helped her escape and then someone came after her here. What other reason he might have had for being there I don't know... yet. It might not be important, but I hate discarding detail. Still, for now, we'll let that rest on your lovesick paranoia and move on to more tangible things. The long and the short of it is, Hollow manipulation bears a spooky resemblance to soul manipulation, which we know is one of Keitarou's party tricks. That suggests to me..."

"This is Aizen Kohaku?" Juushirou's brows furrowed. "But what about what the Onmitsukidou said? Should we discard that as nonsense, or designed to lead us off track?"

"Goodness knows, but I think whoever is controlling those creatures is probably a child of Keitarou's," Shunsui replied matter-of-factly. "It's not the girl, because she has no reiatsu presence. That leaves... either Kohaku, or..."

"Or?"

"Character X," Shunsui sketched out the characters for unknown on the table with his index finger. "If the Onmitsukidou is telling the truth, but if the person controlling the Hollows is Keitarou's child, and if we know the girl with the sword is not either one of those, then is it not possible Keitarou has more children than we've assumed? There's not much to do in the Rukon. It's more than possible he's been keeping Eiraki-hime busy by populating that world with his willing servants."

"Oh lord," Juushirou whitened, his throat tightening as he realised the truth of Shunsui's words. "We've assumed that what Souja said was complete, but you're right. We've jumped to that conclusion but have no basis for it. It's possible Keitarou has other children. The Kitsune who came to see me intimated that a child of Keitarou's could claim the Endou Clan legitimately by challenging Hirata in battle. He thought that Keitarou might be keeping his son's hands clean of blood so that he would be prepared for such an eventuality. Apparently he warned Souja of that fact, too — but Souja didn't heed it as carefully as he should've done, and we both know the end result. If you're right, and there's Kohaku controlling the Hollows and this Sakaki girl slicing up shinigami... maybe there's a third in the shadows, waiting for a time to strike."

"Ugly thought, but very possible," Shunsui agreed. "Let's not share that one with Hirata just yet, though. In his current mood, he'd vaporise anyone who dared challenge him before they'd even uttered their name, so I don't think we're in imminent danger of any such attack."

"The Onmitsukidou definitely referred to Aizen Kohaku, though," Juushirou rubbed his chin. "A smokescreen? Good grief, how many of them are there?”

“Like I said, Rukongai’s a boring place to be stuck for the best part of thirty years,” Shunsui said darkly. “Eiraki-hime was pregnant when they crossed over there. Who knows how many they’ve spawned since?”

“Not good news for us,” Juushirou finished his tea with a sigh. “All right, I can see your line of thought more clearly now.”

“There is one other thing,” Shunsui eyed Juushirou hesitantly, and Juushirou furrowed his brow in consternation.

“Yet more? Isn’t this enough for one session? At this rate I’m going to be the one needing sake!”

“I told you that tea wasn’t a strong enough drink,” Shunsui reminded him, then sighed, shaking his head. “No, it’s no good. The jokes just don’t flow without the right spiritual lubrication. I shall have to give it up as a bad job and go back to my main subject — which is, I’m afraid, your waif and stray, Koku.”

“Koku?” Juushirou’s lips pursed thoughtfully. “What about him?”

“Well, I was hoping you’d tell me,” Shunsui admitted. “You must’ve spoken to him yourself by now — what are your impressions of him?”

“Scared, lonely, young and a little feral,” Juushirou looked pensive. “Wary of me, definitely holding things back... I don’t know. He was a little like I expected and a little different. You remember I told you Kirio had mentioned him identifying Kikyue as a kestrel, among other things?”

“Yes,” Shunsui confirmed. “What of it?”

“Well, we didn’t discuss that, particularly, and he didn’t say it to me, but he did... when he was caught off guard, he said things that gave away more than he meant to. He was very unwilling to talk about Rukongai, but ended up admitting that he came from there completely by accident. I’m doing nothing about it — that’s my decision and you won’t change my mind,” as Shunsui opened his lips, “so if you do, I’ll be very cross with you. I made him a promise not to report it and I need to win his trust.”

“Even if his coming from Rukongai is important?”

“I think it probably is important,” Juushirou admitted. “But if I want him to tell me the things he’s still keeping a secret...”

“You think he is definitely covering something up?”

“Mm,” Juushirou nodded. “I’m not quite sure of why, yet, but I’m pretty sure there’s something. I can’t read people in the same way you do, and my instinct is to help him, not manipulate him, but there’s something there all right.”

“I see,” Shunsui stretched his arms up over his head contemplatively. “Well, if you think like that, what I have to say might shock you or it might vindicate you. Either way, I have a theory. You know the hut that Souja mentioned?”

“Yes,” Juushirou agreed. “What about it?”

“Well, we found it. It was empty. Any sword, or anything else that was there was long gone,” Shunsui recounted with a grimace. “It had a horrible, Hollowish atmosphere over it — dark, cloying... Kaoru and Kira were very unwilling to go near it and I couldn’t blame them. Inside, it looked like someone had been held captive.”

“Captive?” Juushirou’s expression became one of dismay, and Shunsui nodded.

“I wondered if Keitarou might’ve been using people in the Rukon for his reidoku experiments,” he admitted, “just like he was in District Seven when you first got entangled with him. I wasn’t privy to that atmosphere, but I couldn’t shake the feeling once I saw the restraints and felt the aura. Then it occurred to me that when Souja talked about his killer, he said that someone had called her Sakaki. Not that she’d identified herself, but that someone else had identified her.”

“How did you know what Souja said? You weren’t even in the room!” Juushirou objected, and Shunsui offered him a benign smile.

“I was outside with Tenichi, making sure he understood his duty to stand guard and be at your beck and call,” he said blithely. “I happened to overhear bits.”

“Well, I don’t remember exact grammar constructions, so I’m amazed you did,” Juushirou retorted. Shunsui shrugged.

“I didn’t, not until I really thought about it. I was trying to remember what I’d heard him say about the hut, and it just popped in there. It sounded odd, and then I realised why. What if the person who called her Sakaki was your Koku?”

“You think he’s Keitarou’s spy?” Juushirou immediately tensed, and Shunsui sighed, shaking his head.

“I think he’s involved with Keitarou, certainly,” he said matter-of-factly, “at least to the point he knows the man and probably this Sakaki girl too. The odds are that if someone else was at the scene other than Souja and his killer, it was your unexpected guest, which means he must know something. But hear me out before you savage me. I can see in your eyes that you're already thinking of Koku as your latest waif and stray to protect against all logic and reason, but just hear what I have to say. It occurred to me that if Koku was one of those Rukon people, and Keitarou took him prisoner to experiment on him, maybe Souja rescued him from the hut. And then, in return, Koku helped Souja to come back home. How he escaped Sakaki's blade is another question entirely, but if Sakaki knew he was one of Keitarou's specimens, perhaps she chose not to hurt him. Maybe Koku did also want to escape Keitarou, so took the gamble. Who knows?"

"No... I don't think he wanted to come here. If I didn't know better, I'd think he was homesick," Juushirou relaxed, tucking a wisp of pale hair behind his ear as he considered his friend's theory. "At the very least, completely out of his depth. I'm quite sure he's never been in Seireitei before, nor really knows a damn thing about it or about us. But the rest, I suppose makes sense. If Keitarou was experimenting, Koku's the kind of person he'd pick. He has reiatsu, and it's uneven, but substantial from what I can tell. It would also explain why Souja was so adamant about protecting him, if he was Keitarou's prisoner. Koku's not ready to talk to me fully yet, though. What he told me about Souja's death doesn't contradict anything you've suggested, but I had a feeling it wasn't the whole story. Even if you find an injured man and want to help him, I wonder if it's normal to plunge into the unknown and risk your own neck to save him when you don't know who he is or whether you'll be arrested the moment you step down on the other side. It was pretty clear Souja's chances of survival were low... do you normally do that? But if Koku had a debt to Souja as well..."

"Then it would make sense to try and repay it. Yes," Shunsui agreed. "But if I am right — and I have no evidence for any of it — we need his testimony."

"Which means my winning his trust?" Juushirou sighed. "I intended on doing that already, like I told you."

"To solve the murder case, Juu. Not to take him under your wing," Shunsui warned. "I know you, and it worries me how much you might end up risking if you decide to protect him from the Council and from full interrogation without knowing all of his thoughts and motivations. I don't want you in trouble for this... so be careful, all right?"

“If there’s a storm, like I said, I’ll ride it out,” Juushirou said comfortably. “It’s all right. But you mustn’t speak about his Rukon links. Even if it seems like a clue, and even if you think its important, right now if he knows something about Keitarou, we need him to tell us in his own words. If you’re right, I want him to want to tell us.”

“Rather than us pressing it on him, in case he decides to use it as an excuse or explanation,” Shunsui muttered. Juushirou frowned.

“Do you think Koku’s more involved with Keitarou than you just suggested?” he asked sharply, and Shunsui shrugged.

“The only thing Keitarou has taught me is not to trust anyone I know nothing about, and especially not to take them at their word,” he said frankly. “As for your stray, we’ll see how and where his position is. If he’s an innocent victim, I will do everything I can to help back you up in protecting him from the Rukon Execution law — but if he’s not...”

He shrugged.

“I’ll be protecting you, at his expense if need be.”

It was cold and damp in the depths of the Real World mountain, and the air was musty and heavy with the scent of mildew. Keitarou coughed, reaching down to pull a strip of fabric from his obi and wrapping it firmly over the lower half of his mouth in order to prevent him from inhaling any unsuspecting Real World spores. The atmosphere was weak and devoid of spiritual life, but that did not mean that it could not harm him, and his brows knitted together as he contemplated what he might find in this cavern deep within the bowels of the earth.

Kusakawa Daigo, huh. That name brings back memories.

His lips pressed together beneath the folds of fabric as he made his way over an uneven curve of land, negotiating with a little difficulty the sloping steps that had been hewn into the volcanic rock with more haste than careful accuracy. As he reached the bottom he paused, resting his hand against the wall of the cavern and bending to rub his aching leg with his other hand. Damp weather was never good for his rheumatic bones, he mused darkly to himself, and doubtless he would pay dearly for this trip when he returned to the Rukon.

Reidoku might have saved my life and bolstered my arsenal, but it couldn’t heal all of my physical ills. Much as I patched myself back together, there are still scars left from that Kuchiki’s cursed storm sword. And yet I can’t do anything about it. Not this time. Kuchiki Kinrya may still live or he may have died — but courting his anger is not on my agenda. The targets I seek are all gathered conveniently in one place, now. Inner Seireitei is the only place I'm interested in — a place where geriatric relics of the Kuchiki past do not tend to tread.

His eyes became grim as he rolled down the leg of his clothing, setting off ahead once more. The Real World was a place he knew well, for he and Eiraki had hidden here several times during their initial flight from Seventh District, yet all the same he disliked it. Though the Rukon was wretched, he mused bleakly to himself, it was at least a world in which he existed and had purpose. Here, in a place where the native citizens paid him not the slightest bit of notice, he could not help but feel severed.

You should be glad of that anonymity. You don't want to be noticed here — or had you forgotten?

Chudokuga's voice cut acerbically through his thoughts, causing a wry smile to twitch at the scientist's lips.

True enough. I can't argue with that. I suppose that it's not a case of wanting to be acknowledged, or even to be noticed. It's the overwhelming emptiness of this world... the dullness of its life-forms, and the pointlessness of its entire construction. It depresses me to know that I'm nothing more than a ghost here. Superior knowledge could transform this savage land into a place worth calling a domain — and yet there is no way to break through their thick skulls and reach them. Why their dead fascinate the shinigami so much I'm loath to understand. True, the Plus Souls have their uses, but only once their auras become tainted do they have any real worth to a scientist.

You include your daughter in that assessment?

No.

Keitarou pursed his lips, shaking his head.

No, Sakaki has plenty of worth, if not much perception to political danger. She is reckless and often foolish, but she has proven herself useful. Besides, she is not a Plus soul. Perhaps she is similar to them — but she is my daughter, and so she is not the same.

Mm.

Chudokuga's grunt was somewhat derisive, but he did not push the point, and Keitarou felt the spider's essence scuttle back into the recesses of his brain. He sighed, reaching up to tighten the knot of his makeshift facemask before ducking down into a narrower tunnel with jagged, uneven walls and a ceiling that bowed and rose at random intervals.

I must focus on the matter at hand. Koku is in Inner Seireitei, so I must go there... but it's not safe to go there yet. I have to be patient a little while longer, and hope that no harm befalls him in the meantime. I have to make sure all angles are carefully taken care of... which means coming here, even after I swore I never would.

At that point he reached a heavy stone door, thick with cobwebs, and he spread his hands, allowing them to light up with the gentle hum of a Kidou flame. Searing through the ancient remains of dessicated spider legs and severed fly wings that littered the greyish net-like web, he fumbled at his belt for the small, silver disk that he had brought so carefully through the Senkaimon and down into the depths of the earth.

Well, lets see if the rumours were true. Let's see if the things you brought me as surety when you promised to be my eyes and ears on the other side of the wall were as important as you said they were. A place you never saw, notes you couldn't read, information you couldn't validate or even really explain... yet on studying them, I knew what they were right away. Kusakawa Daigo's legacy to Soul Society — written in the shorthand taught him by my father, before he decided to go his own way. I thought your science had died when you did, Daigo-dono... until that point, I hadn't known that, like my father, you had a son and heir to continue your work on the other side of the divide. The only difference was, I had to work in exile, whilst you did not. I had to barter, beg and cheat for my study materials... whereas if those notes are truly accurate, you had something far, far more interesting at your disposal.

A derisive smile touched his lips.

You'd squirm in your grave if you knew I was treading your hallowed ground like this, wouldn't you, Daigo-dono? You, who escaped being tainted by the reidoku scandal. You, who erased all your history with Father after his downfall, in order to ingratiate yourself with powerful figures. You would hate to know that a son of Keitsune stood here, about to break into your world... but then, you should have expected it.

His eyes narrowed, the muddy orbs becoming suddenly cold.

Had you bothered to tell me about this place when we met in District Seven, I might have spared your life. Unfortunately, I didn't know you'd left anything so valuable in a place such as this one, and so I allowed my personal feelings to overstep my rationality. You were the first test of my Bankai's technique — proof that I had fully mastered its manipulative power — but had I known... oh well. They say you live and learn, and it might well be that the information falling into my hands when it did will prove opportune.

Who knows? Perhaps your son believed you were killed by the ruthless antics of the Endou Clan. Certainly he never thought to come after me. Not that it matters. Dead lips do not tell secrets... and nobody else will ever come here, save for me. I didn't intend to ever need to fall back on the work of someone I eliminated, but this is not the time to be squeamish. It is here, and I can use it. More, I must use it... to even the score.

He ran his fingers along the smooth surface of the stone door until he found the almost imperceptible circle shaped dent, and carefully he slid the disk into it, placing the palm of his right hand over it and closing his eyes as he summoned the words to the correct kidou spell. Muttering the incantation, he felt his reiryoku swell up inside of him, and then there was a creaking, splitting sound as the heavy door cracked across the middle, shattering as if made of no more than glass. As he stepped over the debris, Keitarou realised that it had not been stone at all, but a powerful kidou barrier set in place by someone who knew their magic, and he clicked his tongue against the roof of his mouth in approval.

Nicely done. To all outside observers in this spiritually dead place, a heavy rock that refused to move would be an adequate deterrent. I understand now why it was buried here... though what I might find in the chamber beyond makes me wary. I feel I am stepping over the enemy divide.

He paused, remembering the hooded, cloaked figure who had first approached him, speaking Kusakawa's name, and bringing the silver seal and the wadge of documents written in the almost unintelligible shorthand scrawl. Keitarou had not known, then, whether to believe it. He had not known whether it was a trap, or whether he had found an alliance that he had not expected to encounter. But at the time, he had not been in a position to be choosy. They had found him, and they could betray him. He would have to trust them, and hope for the best.

And now, more than twenty years on, he had entered into that trust once again.

"Why bring it to me?" he had asked. "You must know that Kusakawa had no regard for me, nor I for him. You too — you must look at me with doubt and revulsion — why come here, and expect me to believe you seek my alliance?"

At this the figure had bowed its head, as if trying to hide the glitter of emotion that reflected in their gaze.

"The words you say are true," it had admitted in a low murmur, "but the things I have always trusted in have been shown to me to be false. I cannot read these documents, but he always treated them as though precious. He always said they were the work of his father, and the prelude to genius. He always promised to teach me, but it turned out there wasn't time. Now there is only me... and when I heard that you'd escaped the Kuchiki lord, I came here."

"How did you find me?"

"I know this land better than you do," came the wry response, "and I have clearance to be here. Nobody would be suspicious, no matter how long it took me to find you. Here or the Real World — I would have tracked you down. You were the only one I thought might be able to do what I never will — take the vengeance I'm not able to take, and put things to rights."

"You realise I won't stop at just taking your vengeance?" Keitarou's question had been acerbic, and the hooded figure had nodded once more.

"The world I thought I believed in has been turned on its head for me," the voice had whispered, trembling slightly as those emotions threatened to seep through again. "I've lost my faith in it and all the things I was ever taught. If that's the case, maybe your way of seeing things is the right one. So I'll help you, and in the process, you'll help me find a world in which I can once more put my faith. The enemy of my enemy is my ally, and the ally of my enemy is my enemy. Need there be an explanation greater than that?"

And then, in short, uneven phrases, the truth had spilled out, and Keitarou had come to understand the full extent of his visitor's bitter emotions.

But to think I'd really come to Kusakawa's vault. I thought to use you only as a spy and a contact, but to think I'd be forced to use the work of someone like that to further my cause. Sakaki's careless blade and Koku's naive judgement have created a lot of extra work.

Keitarou sighed, glancing up at the smaller, wooden door that now blocked his path, a distinctive crest adorning the criss-crossed beams. Beneath it he could make out the two characters for 'grass' and 'river' that spelt out the name Kusakawa, and then, beneath it, the ones for 'great' and 'enlightenment' that inscribed the name Daigo. Placing his hands against the wood, Keitarou frowned, trying to draw an image of the man into his mind's eye, but despite the fact they had met face to face not so many decades ago, he found the recollection blurry, cloaked by his obsessive excitement over perfecting his zanpakutou's ultimate skill.

You were no friend of my Father's. You studied under him then sought to overreach him, mocked his theories and argued with his science in public on more than one occasion. Mother would say so — that you were a hateful, arrogant man who smarmed his way to favour and who never had half of the talent Father did. She said that she hoped you'd come to a bad end, and so, for her sake, I made sure you did, just so that I could be sure her spirit was put to rest.

His eyes narrowed.

But at least I can say one thing for you. Your name was not included on the list of those who testified in my Father's hearing. Your name was not listed among those who spoke to condemn Father's work. Maybe now I understand exactly why.

He flexed his fingers, and a neat burst of kidou flame engulfed the wooden divide, turning it immediately to ash.

Because you knew about it, didn't you? The reidoku — just like everyone else. But you didn't betray Father... was it because Father could betray you, too? You wrote your notes in a shorthand Father developed — is that because he knew about this project in the Real World — your vault, your experiments? Maybe Mother was wrong about your talent, if that's the case. Perhaps Father knew you were trying to do what he was trying to do — to increase and stabilise spirit power. Maybe he even knew you were experimenting on the criminals that were sentenced to execution in the Urahara cells — the ones your family were put in charge of dispatching. Perhaps Father felt forced to bring reidoku to light because of you — but maybe also you kept quiet because he knew about your work. Father never betrayed you though, Daigo-dono. Perhaps I did, when I used you to test my sword, but father didn't. And now I intend on putting that work of yours to good use — building on all the things I learned from watching that fool Kuchiki Seiren break the divide between shinigami soul and Hollow monstrosity without needing to ingest reidoku at all.

He dusted the ash from his fingers, stepping forward into the gloom and absently activating the kidou lamps set deep into the carved wall alcoves as he walked. The discomfort in his rheumatic leg slipped his mind as for the first time he surveyed the underground chamber — more of a laboratory than a vault, he decided, though one that had not seen active use for some time.

Twenty or more years, if my information is correct. To think this was here when Eiraki and I hid in the Real World, and I was unaware. I'm losing my touch — it seems even a scientist of my calibre has things yet to be discovered.

He ran his fingers along the shelves of dusty books, recognising the titles of some and not of others. Alongside the shelves on one wall of the squarely cut, stark chamber there were a series of wooden units small enough to hold animals or small children, but not great enough to hold an adult, and, after ascertaining that all were empty, Keitarou chose to ignore them, moving further into the lab. On the opposite side was a stone unit, cut into the wall of the mountain, its surface thick with volcanic dust, and Keitarou knew this had once been a work-surface, though it too was now devoid of any tools or equipment. The remains of a broken vessel lay scattered across the top, a deep, seeping stain colouring the charcoal surface in a sticky residue, but on closer examination Keitarou realised it was nothing more than a discarded drink vessel that had corroded from age and shattered, depositing its congealed contents across the unit. Above the unit was another shelf, this one containing a number of small boxes just big enough to house paper scrolls, and Keitarou manoeuvred himself into a position where he could reach them, bringing down a cloud of dust on himself as he finally managed to dislodge them from their resting place.

The first box was empty, but, as he prised up the lid on the second, he realised that his hunch had been correct. Neatly bound within were the unmistakeable traces of ancient scientific notes, and, as Keitarou unrolled the first one, he found that these too were written in the convoluted shorthand script that his father had devised. It was more of a code than a script, really, he reflected absently, running his finger down the side of the columns as he absorbed the contents. It relied on logic and understanding to break it, and Keitarou had spend his teenage years working hard to do so, buoyed by scraps of cipher and the incomplete memories of those who had managed to flee into exile with them. Eventually he had succeeded, and as he read through the second scroll, he felt a sense of smugness that although Daigo had imitated Keitsune's writing style, he had not employed in it as well thought out a manner.

Reidoku notes were far harder to crack than these. Perhaps you didn't learn everything from my father.

Most of the scrolls related to more mundane scientific premises, none of which were of particular interest to Keitarou, but as he dug down more deeply into the bottom of the box, he found a scroll tied with newer lengths of ribbon, suggesting it had been written or rebound within recent memory. Unknotting the ties, he carefully smoothed the document out on the work surface, being careful not to contaminate it with the sticky remains of the drink.

The hand was the same, but, as Keitarou's gaze roved over the document more carefully, he realised that at a point in the middle the writing changed, a younger, more elongated script writing in darker ink. Though it too was written in the shorthand, Keitarou understood that this was the proof he had looked for — the evidence of Daigo's work being continued by his only son — and his heart skipped a beat with excitement.

Well well. Even without knowing what you were giving me, it seems you were right. Kusakawa's son was working on things his father began, and, judging by this, perhaps he finalised them, too.

"Kamen no Gunzei," he spoke the words aloud, re-tying the scroll and sliding it into the rough sash at his waist. "The Masked Militia. Such a grandiose name for such a small scale experiment. According to these notes, only three specimens remain. Perhaps originally there were more... but it looks like I'm missing some data. Militia for what purpose, I wonder? Was Daigo planning a hostile takeover of the Clan? Was his son? Either way, I suppose we'll never know, Chudokuga. All we can do is benefit from what they left behind."

All you have found so far is a single scroll, from which you draw such grandiose dreams. Besides, have you learned from your encounter with Kuchiki Seiren? Monsters lose all reason and simply kill. If you believe such things are in existence somewhere within this laboratory, do you not think you ought to be careful how you proceed? You are not their Master, nor their Creator... they will see you as prey and savage you the moment they meet your gaze. It sounds like you're worried about me.

Keitarou's lips twitched into a smile of amusement. Surely you don't think that I'm going to be killed by a few experimental subjects? I'm not the person I was when I encountered Kuchiki Seiren in all his monstrous glory — and he would never have made a good subject, anyhow. His power was too unstable, and he wasn't designed to be useful. It was a simple biological flaw that made him that way — I capitalised on it, but this is not the same.

He patted his waist.

Kusakawa's document indicates that there is a chamber beyond this one, and all I must do now is find the door. Within that place are sealed the experiments that I need to occupy the Gotei and throw them properly off my scent. There is really no need to worry... if they prove violent, then we shall have to use our particular talents of persuasion and convince them otherwise. I could not control Kuchiki Seiren — but things are different now. We... are different now.

As usual, you'll get your way.

Chudokuga sighed, but Keitarou could tell that the spider's senses too were tingling with anticipation.

If it's that way, you know I'll help. At least you're thinking constructively, rather than worrying about the pointless satellites that serve you.

You should be more respectful towards my wife and children.

Keitarou chided lightly.

They are family to me, as you are.

No, I am not family.

Chudokuga's eyes bored briefly into Keitarou's mind.

I am you. I am part of you, all the more now than I ever was before. Find your monsters, Keitarou, and use them to kill the obstacles in your way. But never forget that your true weapon lies within you — within both of us, and it is that weapon and no other which will bring Seireitei to its knees!

Author's Note: Formatting

Okay, for some reason FFnet keeps taking out random sections of my italics and moving my bolded text around. I have no idea why... but please don't think I don't bother to proofread things like that. I do. Honest. I think this chapter is sound, but I've had to fiddle with others recently and I'm sure there are other bits I've missed...

38. Unwanted Memory

Chapter Thirty Seven: Unwanted Memory

“It seems wrong, somehow, holding a meeting in an atmosphere like this.”

Enishi pushed open the door of the Vice Captain meeting chamber with a sigh, sinking his broad frame down into his usual seat and resting his elbows on the polished surface of the desk. “Nothing’s been the right way around since Souja-dono’s funeral, and that’s a fact. Now we’re having a Vice Captain’s meeting? Seems messed up to me. All our divisions are on high alert as it is.”

“For that reason, I suppose,” Sora followed her former classmate into the small, brightly lit chamber. “I know what you mean, Houjou — it’s a strange feeling, isn’t it? Walking in here and knowing that even if everyone on roll shows up, we’re one short. All those things he said about security in Seireitei, and the next thing we know...”

“Too young,” Enishi said gruffly. “That’s all I can think about it, Sora. Too young. The youngest of all of us shouldn’t be the first to go. I’ve had to keep up face in front of the young’uns — Thirteenth have been sent a bit scatty, what with Kirio’s stray and now a new recruit turning up in the middle of it all — but I really don’t like it. Souja wasn’t more than a kid himself — and Hirata’s a friend. This kind of thing shouldn’t happen to anyone, but it’s roughest when it’s to someone barely out of training hakama.”

“That’s how this world is,” Shirogane’s voice came from the doorway, and both adjutants turned, taking in the grave features of the Sixth Division deputy. He crossed the mat floor towards them. “Unless you’d forgotten, Houjou, Souja-dono isn’t the first nor the youngest of Aizen Keitarou’s Clan victims.”

“Ribari-sama,” Sora’s features became shadowed, and Shirogane nodded.

“As you say,” he replied shortly. “I doubt there’s a single division right now who isn’t focused on bringing this particular felon to heel. That’s probably why we’ve a meeting right now. We’re not just individual divisions or Clans facing this threat. The more split up we are, the more he’ll harpoon our weaknesses. It’s how he works, playing with people’s minds and jumping in to take advantage while we're scattered and confused. We should be sharing information, and working out what we can do. Even if Keitarou isn't the kind of enemy we can take down ourselves, the more we know as a collective, the stronger we are behind our Captains, and right now that has to count more than anything else."

"I suppose that's true," Enishi rested his chin on the back of his hands with a frown. "That was the vein in which Souja himself was talking, wasn't it, last meeting?"

"Mm," Shirogane nodded. "He said to me afterwards that he was determined to get to the bottom of it. I can't help thinking that he was killed on purpose because of that intention."

He shrugged helplessly.

"Guren-sama's talked to me a little about the Council and the Captain's meetings, but Sixth didn't send representation to the Rukon, so I don't know if we're any further on than we were in that regard. This is what I mean about pooling information. Surely there's something we can do?"

"Father is hard at work trying to decipher the coordinates of the Real World Senkaimon he found in the Rukon, in order that they can get a rough fix on where Keitarou might've fled to," Shiketsu pushed back the door of the chamber, slipping over the threshold and revealing Ryuusei and Hyakken in his slipstream. "We were just discussing it. Father hasn't asked me to keep anything from this meeting, but there's not much conclusive to talk about. I know Twelfth have been asked to look at the Rukongai evidence in the meantime... but it feels as though we're grasping at straws."

"Sora-chan, if your Captain's said anything to you, it might be a good time to share it," Ryuusei added, glancing at his sister, and Sora let out a heavy sigh, shaking her head.

"He's not told me anything much at all," she admitted. "The fact he hasn't makes me certain there's something he hasn't said. I mean, I debriefed Kaoru and Hanako, and they said they'd found an abandoned settlement and so on — signs that Keitarou was there, but wasn't there now. I've not had a chance to ask Naoko-chan, either. Shunsui's clearly got something on his mind regarding this, but whatever it is, he doesn't seem to want to share it with either of our other two, or with me. He might have told J... Ukitake-taichou, but other than that..."

She trailed off, shrugging her shoulders.

"I guess I don't have high enough clearance. Shunsui and I are close friends, Anieue, but there are times he can play the Captain and pull rank too. I think this is one of these times."

"Houjou? What about you?" Shirogane asked. "Has Shikibu said anything?"

"Mm," Enishi pressed his lips together. "To be completely honest, I haven't spoken to Shikibu since they came back. We've both been too busy. Kira pretty much reported the same as you've just said — an abandoned settlement, an empty hut, signs of having been cleared out... that's all. Nothing else."

"No Vice Captains went to the Rukon, either," Hyakken pointed out. "Maybe none of the Captains felt it a good idea, considering what happened to Souja-dono, but it means nobody here has a direct idea of what was seen there."

"That's not the case, Hyakken-dono," Shiketsu said matter-of-factly. "Two Vice Captains went to the Rukon. Eriko-dono and Kai-dono were there."

"Kai-dono never comes to these meetings, though, or hardly ever," Shirogane grimaced. "Onmitsukidou isn't quite like the other divisions. As for Eriko-dono, the Fourth are so busy at the moment after what happened in the Spiritless Zone. I don't expect either of them to show for this meeting."

"Well, today is an exception," Kai's own voice prevented any of the others in the chamber from commenting, and Enishi turned, seeing his friend wearily cross the room towards the often vacant Second Division seat. "I'm here, and I'm here because of the Rukon. Nagesu-sama told me that I should report to you what I felt was wise. That's why there's this meeting, now. Midori-neesama arranged it with the other Captains and sent through the memos... I'm hoping that most of us turn up."

"Eriko-dono said she was coming, too. She was just seeing to a couple of patients and would be late," Shiketsu offered Kai a faint smile. "She asked me to bring her apologies, but she felt that coming late was better than not at all."

"So now we just have to wait and see if the others appear?" Sora reflected. "It would be a tragic irony, wouldn't it, if the first Vice Captain's meeting where everyone else showed up did so because one of ours got killed."

"It's not the first time that's happened," Ryuusei reflected. "It's been a while since a Vice Captain died in action, true, but I remember the last time. Shirogane-dono, Shiketsu-dono, I'm sure you do too."

"You mean Sakanoue, I suppose?" Shiketsu grimaced, nodding his head. "Yes, though it's not an incident I like to recall. We lost kinsfolk in that incident, too. It was a messy business."

"I haven't heard this story." Sora's ears pricked up, and Ryuusei sent her a pensive glance.

"Gossip you haven't picked up on? I'm surprised," he observed wryly, and Sora pulled a face.

"I don't know everything," she defended herself. "I don't know much about the Urahara — so sue me!"

"Sakanoue was a Yamamoto, actually," Enishi scratched his chin. "Not that I really know much about it, either. I know he died, and had a formal funeral. That's about it. Total different branch of the family and older t'boot. Well, I guess you can say I wasn't much for social Clan functions, and begged out of them as much as possible, so I don't see how I'd have met him anyway. To be truthful, the only reason I know even his name is because it came up briefly when I was originally invited to be Eleventh's Vice Captain after graduation. Since I chose against it, I never heard any more. I figured it was a Hollow or something — was it not?"

"Hollows of a sort, yes," Shiketsu confirmed. "In the Rukon. I don't know all the details — just that he was killed in action over the divide and he had a hero's funeral on account of it. There was a lot of spiritual pollution in the Rukon then — a lot of Hollow incidents there that the Eleventh and Twelfth saw to cleansing. It was one of those things which, on another occasion, could've ended differently."

"But the meeting after he died, everyone came together and talked like this," Ryuusei reflected. "Sakanoue was respected by pretty much everyone, just like Souja-dono."

"Some people say that his death was murder, too." Hyakken added, and Sora turned to eye the Ninth Division Vice Captain in dismay.

"What? I thought Shiketsu-dono said he died in action!"

"He did," Hyakken nodded. "It was just a rumour... that there was something off about the Hollows in the Rukon. They were more... humanoid than normal, and apparently, capable of independant thought to a limited degree. But the subject got shut off and they never investigated it. Minaichi-taichou and Sekime-taichou both wanted it that way, I think... well, they both lost people they were close to, and there was no proof of anything. I know there was suspicion, though.”

“Of Keitarou?” Shirogane asked sharply, and Hyakken shrugged.

“There was that rumour,” he agreed pensively. “It was within memory of Ribari-sama’s death, and of course, the incident with Seiren-dono. People wondered... well, whether he’d escaped Kinnya-sama’s blade and taken up his old tricks again.”

“So maybe this is the same as then, then?” Sora wondered, but Shirogane shook his head.

“Sakanoue died before I was inaugurated as heir of the Kuchiki,” he said quietly. “It was too soon after Keitarou’s run-in with Kinnya-sama’s blade for him to have begun any kind of operation anywhere else. Even if we do now have proof he was in the Rukon, and he’s been there the whole time, he wouldn’t have been able to orchestrate the sheer quantity of Hollows that were being deployed in that region. He took a severe injury — both Kinnya-sama and Hirata-dono testified to that effect before the Council. Besides, the original Hollow incidents began before Keitarou stopped stalking my family. Much as I don’t like to give him an alibi in any of this, I think it unlikely there’s a connection since his focus was clearly on destroying us, not unleashing random unknown experiments in the Rukon valley. You’ve let your imagination run away with you, Hyakken-dono, because of the Kuchiki-ke’s feelings following that business — but in reality it seems more likely that Real World pollution slipping through the soul burial process caused the contamination.”

“Father’s enquiry into the matter came to the same conclusion,” Shiketsu agreed. “He could find no reason to open a full scale investigation. Sakanoue died as a result of his deployment in the field as an active member of Eleventh Division... and we should leave the past in the past and move to the present. Souja-dono’s death was definitely murder, and we have to focus on justice for him now.”

“Yes, let’s drop the Sakanoue subject before Ikata and the others get here,” Enishi suggested. “I agree with Shirogane-dono. It was a bad incident, but the kind of thing shinigami are geared up to face and it sounds like he acquitted himself in the way an officer should. Let’s not slur a good war record with intrigue we can’t prove when there’s already enough grim stuff to be going on with.”

“Ikata’s his cousin, isn’t he?” Ryuusei remarked thoughtfully. “I remember thinking how it was impossible two such different people could be so closely related. I was surprised when Atsushi-dono selected him as Sakanoue's replacement... I guess it's probably still a sore point."

"As we see regularly, with Ikata's general attitude towards his Captain," Shiketsu sighed wearily. "I can't imagine Ikata has the sensitivity to care about such a distant event, though. We see proof of his attention grasping attitude and blatant arrogance on a regular basis. He was probably glad that the competition was removed. Though I remember Minaichi went through a few candidates before he was forced to fall back on the one he did... you included, of course, Houjou."

"We'll drop the subject." Ryuusei said firmly, before Enishi could respond. "I can sense Ikata and Michihashi at least heading this way, and Kai-dono said he had things to report."

"Kanshi's on his way, too," Sora added, settling herself more comfortably in her seat. "I guess you're chairing this meeting, Shihouin, since your Clan called it in the first instance."

"If nobody else has an objection, I think I should," Kai looked troubled, but nodded, moving to the front of the room. "It's not generally the Onmitsukidou's way to divulge information, but when it comes to Keitarou, all rules change. If it gets us even an inch closer to what we need to know, I'm prepared to tell what I can — beginning with the testimony of a Second Division prisoner currently in custody known to us under the name of Suzuki Naoto."

"This is everything that you got from the Rukongai visit?"

Mareiko rested her hands on the unit of Nagesu's laboratory, her quick, dreamy gaze flitting over the reams of scrawled notes her Clan leader had scribed hurriedly down in the hours since the mission's return from the Rukon. Nagesu himself had not yet rested, even though the investigation had taken place through night hours in Seireitei, and it was drawing on towards midday. On the contrary, he had sent messengers to Twelfth Division as soon as he had been able, summoning the Twelfth Captain to help him go over the results.

"There's a lot written here, Nagesu-sama. You must have been working non-stop."

"There isn't really time to think about resting, not when Keitarou is on the loose, and besides, my mind is too jumpy to step back from the investigation," Nagesu ran his fingers through his sandy blond hair with a sigh of acknowledgement. "I'm sorry for the abrupt summons too, Mareiko — but two heads are often better than one and I wanted your opinion. I'm quite sure that we discovered the scene of Souja-dono's murder, and I had Kamitani and Yunosuke collect samples to prove it, but those will have to wait for the time being. More important are the readings from the Senkaimon — both the one that Souja-dono must have destroyed to make it back here, and the other, which was barred with Kidou."

He moved to stand behind her, leaning across to indicate a particular passage.

"Sekizanha warned me against trying to open that gate. He thought it was unstable, and that it might implode if I used any significant level of power on trying to break the Kidou spell. It wasn't childish magic, though. From the little evidence I was able to glean through Sekizanha's senses, it was a complex barrier designed from Bakudou but — I have to admit — a spell to which I could give no name. Perhaps it was a custom technique... which would marry with the evidence Shikibu Naoko's sword gave about Keitarou having been in the vicinity."

"Shikibu Naoko?" Mareiko looked startled. "From the Thirteenth Division? She was with you on this trip, too? I thought you went with Onmitsukidou?"

"I did, but Shunsui-dono's group had assigned members of Thirteenth, if you recall, and she was one of them," Nagesu responded wearily. "It turns out that she had a personal encounter with Keitarou some several years ago, and as a result, her zanpakutou is keenly sensitive to any trace of his lingering reiatsu. She detected his presence all around the area that Shunsui-dono patrolled, and when Kamitani told me about her zanpakutou's ability, I sent for her to come do the same at the crime scene. Keitarou's reiatsu was not present in Souja-dono's blood, which supports the idea he didn't kill the boy himself, but the gate... that was different. I had thought that Keitarou's presence was there, but suppressed and not quite tangible to me. Shikibu's Dokusou Houshi was far more concise. She said that there was no doubt — Keitarou had gone through the gate, and, almost certainly, had set up the Kidou around it. That being the case, investigating it became priority number one."

"I see," Mareiko stood back, pursing her lips thoughtfully. "And you think he went to the Real World?"

"Sekizanha was convinced that that was where the gate led to, yes," Nagesu nodded. "I only have a vague sense of coordinates, and I've tried to note them down as best I can, but I don't know how accurate they are. The Real World is a big place, and although I have sent Yunosuke and Kamitani with coordinates ahead of me to fix a gate and stabilise it for frequent transport between here and the Real World to one of our usual Urahara encampments, I may well miss our target by a wide range. I also don't want to leave them alone for long — I can't spare other officers, and I wanted to hear Shiketsu's report before I join them, but his meeting seems to be running on longer than I expected. For that reason, I want you to take command of the data and continue to work on it. Anything you can glean from it that might tell us about Keitarou's whereabouts or anything else you deem appropriate to our resolving this situation, I will welcome with gratitude."

"I can try," Mareiko eyed the notes doubtfully. "I would offer to come with you to the Real World, Nagesu-sama, but in the circumstances..."

"Your brain is my greatest ally and support in this," Nagesu rested a reassuring hand on her shoulder. "You often see things that I do not, and I trust in your ability to work this through. If my mission to the Real World proves fruitless, at least I know that there is a back-up plan being put into operation and there will be other options to investigate on my return."

"Well, creating other options is becoming a Twelfth Division speciality," Mareiko, whose pale eyes had become rather tragic brightened at this, nodding her head. "I'll do what I can, and that's a promise. Also, if you want me to analyse the readings from the Kidou, perhaps I can come up with a less volatile way to break the bond on the original gate than releasing Sekizanha would achieve. It's possible that, even if the spell has been custom designed for the purpose, my research might indicate the base spells it has been formed from, and so the best way to neutralise it."

"That's why I sent for you," Nagesu sent her a wry smile. "I knew you'd reassure me with suggestions like that, and at present I think there's nobody in Seireitei who knows as much about Kidou as you do. It might come to it, that we have to go back to Rukongai and try and breach the gate, so that would be helpful. Also, there's one more thing I need to leave with you."

"Yes, sir?" Mareiko's gaze burned with curiosity, and Nagesu nodded.

"The information Ukitake gave me at the meeting. The sheet you saw... the data that he produced out of nowhere," he said pensively. "It turns out that that research was not only thorough, but extremely accurate. We opened our gate very close to the area where Keitarou had, indeed, been operating, and found the site of Souja-dono's murder, clues to follow Keitarou's path, and signs of a settlement, including — if Shunsui-dono is to be believed — a location Souja-dono himself mentioned before he died. That kind of accuracy does not come by fluke. I don't know how Ukitake came by it, but thanks to that work, I was able to hypothesise coordinates that took us right to where we needed to be. I don't know how much interaction you have with your neighbour, but if you should find the time..."

"You want me to talk to him about it?" Mareiko tilted her head on one side, then nodded, her grin widening. "That's no problem. As it happens, I'm quite fond of the Thirteenth — they've always been polite neighbours, and I find Ukitake-taichou is friendly enough. These days I don't have much reason to call by Eleventh, but I've been to Thirteenth once or twice to do scientific analyses of his sword's release and he's been very accommodating of my geekish curiosity. I'll go see him, and see what he says. He might not reveal his source, though — it sounded in the meeting like it was something top secret."

"Mm, which bothers me just a little bit," Nagesu admitted. Mareiko's eyes widened.

"Do you think Ukitake-taichou has links to Keitarou?" she demanded, and Nagesu laughed despite himself, shaking his head.

"No. Out of all the potential figures in Seireitei who might plot rebellion, he's bottom of my list," he said, amused. "I remember the sorry state Keitarou's blade left him in following an encounter in the snows of Seventh District — no, I think it's fair to say that Ukitake would choose to have nothing to do with my misguided cousin. It's more a concern that he got to that information and we didn't. I can't explain it, but it seems... strange."

"Midori-dono was saying similar things about Ukitake-taichou and Onmitsukidou business," Mareiko pondered. "I guess he has a more accurate information network than anyone thought, considering he's from the Districts."

She shrugged, offering a happy-go-lucky smile.

"Maybe it's because he's nice to people, and it makes him easy to trust," she suggested. "In any case, I will go there, I promise. If I can, I'll find out his source, but if not, shall I trust some of this information to him, in case there's a chance he can pass it to those contacts? With the Real World being such a big place, and with us not knowing so much... even if he isn't an Urahara, I think maybe... we should."

"In the current climate, unity is the only weapon we have against chaotic genius,” Nagesu agreed grimly. “Do what you think is best, Mareiko. I trust you.”

“Then I’ll do what I can,” Mareiko dimpled. “Don’t look so worried, Nagesu-sama. It will be all right. Really.”

“Let’s hope so,” Nagesu responded darkly. “Now, I must go and see whether Shiketsu has returned yet from the Vice Captain’s meeting. It’s a long one, today, so hopefully that means some useful information has come to light. Michihashi will probably be looking for you, too, before long — so I’ll keep you here no longer.”

“All right,” Mareiko gathered the notes up in her arms. “You’re probably right — I don’t want him to think I’ve got locked in the supply basement again... last time he clean blew the door off its hinges and organising repairs at Twelfth is such a hassle.”

She sighed, rolling her eyes expressively.

“You’d think the craftsmen would be glad of the business, especially since we’re such frequent patrons, but they always seem so reluctant to come calling,” she added. “Good luck in the Real World, Nagesu-sama. I hope you find what you’re looking for.”

“So do I,” Nagesu nodded, “and more, that this time I can stop him before he causes any more harm.”

Well, so Nagesu and the Kyouraku idiot had made it back safely from their trip to the Rukon.

Deep furrows lined Atsushi’s brow as he considered this, disapproval touching his expression as he placed the last of the documents in the pile for distribution and let out a heavy sigh. It was mid-morning, and, thanks to the summons of the Shihouin, his adjutant was busily engaged in a Vice Captain’s meeting, leaving him free to go about his work in peace and quiet. Atsushi relished these brief scraps of sanity time, as he thought of it, for though Ikata’s skills were good and his drive genuine, it was no secret between them that he was not the kind of second Atsushi would’ve chosen given half a chance. In fact, Atsushi reflected, as he got to his feet, stretching his arms over his head to release the cramp setting up home in his long, bony fingers, he would have sooner worked without a Vice Captain, had the Clan been willing to allow it. Ikata was not the smartest man he had ever known, but he was sharp enough to know that he got on Atsushi’s nerves, and his strident voice and swaggering figure were often the causes of Atsushi’s late night headaches.

They were chalk and cheese, sun and moon... and had it not been for the firm pressure of the previous Clan leader, Hashihiko, he would never have even considered the man as a candidate.

Even Enishi would've been a better selection than this, had the fool remembered his responsibility to his kin.

Atsushi rested his hands on the windowsill, gazing disgruntledly out towards the direction he knew Juushirou's Thirteenth Division were based. The jagged shape of the Twelfth Division barracks, with its frequent reconstructions blocked his view, but Atsushi could just make out the sloped roofs and the briefest outline of the Captain's chamber stretching out over the koi lake. Thirteenth had been built so close to the edge of Inner Seireitei's land that they had been forced to build it partially over a puddle, he told himself derisively, and yet, instead of being put out or righteously embarrassed by that fact, Juushirou had declared the location beautiful and welcomed it with genuine delight. There was a reason Thirteenth Division came numerically last in the list of divisions, yet the infuriating white haired Captain, with his District airs and interfering habits seemed completely oblivious to the fact his squad ranked below all of the others. For him to have had the temerity to accept the position of Captain at all had grated on Minaichi's Clan-proud nerves, but then, to appropriate his own potential Vice Captain candidate... no, there were some insults that were not to be forgiven.

His gaze fell on the Twelfth Division once more, and the cross expression in his eyes softened slightly, a faintly sad look entering the normally harsh gaze.

He had hardly been there in years, either. There had been a time when the Eleventh and Twelfth Divisions had worked in such close partnership that he had known the names of most of the senior officers within the Urahara Division, but now he no longer knew nor cared who was working under its auspices. Only Mareiko remained of the people he had once worked with so closely — and even where she was concerned, things had moved beyond the point of no return.

"Well, Atsushi-kun, we're ready to go when you are!"

The image of her robed in the black uniform of a Vice Captain, silver and white badge glittering on her upper left arm flashed into his thoughts, her eyes bright and eager and her hair sticking out around her head like a straw halo. She had been scatty and disorganised, rarely wearing a proper pair of tabi, or turning up with a Clan obi instead of a shinigami one holding her shihakushou together, but the infectious sound of her laughter had always helped soothe any nerves

Atsushi might've had on entering the Rukon or the Real World, and so he had overlooked these imperfections in favour of the bigger picture. Well, maybe then they had been friends, he reflected grimly. Even though rank had separated them by one position, she had never bothered to speak to him formally, treating him more like a former playmate than a senior officer and teasing his rigid, stick-in-the-mud approach. He was not a popular man — Atsushi himself was under no illusions about that fact, for hard disciplinarians were rarely well liked, and he believed in running his squad in the proper way, without any of the emotional claptrap he knew the Thirteenth went in for. Mareiko had been an exception — even now he did not know why or how — but everything had changed after their last joint mission — everything, beyond the point of no return. Now, when she called him Atsushi-dono, and adopted formal, polite language, he was aware of the gap between them and how much that gap now hurt.

But how could it be otherwise? He had worked to make it that way — he had intended to build that separation. Because everything had changed that last day. Everything.

Atsushi sighed, grabbing his light, functional cloak from its hook behind his desk and pulling it over his shoulders, determined to push the cobwebs from his brain and clear his head. His division were all hard at work at their various drill exercises — he knew that even in Ikata's absence, they would not dare be otherwise, for Atsushi had always been a hard task master and his demands for physical prowess had increased ever since that last mission over the divide. He would expect nothing but military perfection from his officers and so showed them no kindness or affection, barking orders and inflicting swingeing criticism, but seldom offering praise. They would be stronger, fitter, ready to face anything and everything, no matter what the ask. He would not make the mistake again of allowing one of them close enough to him to skew his judgement — perhaps, in that sense, having Ikata as a second had been a positive move. There was no risk of him becoming fond of this subordinate, he mused to himself grimly as he made his way along the thin, twisting path that led around the side of the Eleventh to the stretch of green at its rear. Not this time around.

He paused as he reached his destination, his gaze flitting across the grass to the hewn squares of grey stone that divided the sea of green. Most were small, only big enough to carve a name on, and not much more, and Atsushi ignored these, stepping over them as he crossed the garden towards a taller, more polished slab that stood at the very rear. It was nothing more than a memorial, he knew, for the funeral and all other formal arrangements had taken place in District One, where his body had been interred, yet it had seemed right all the same that there be mention of it here, alongside those of his fellow, fallen comrades. Especially, Atsushi reflected bitterly, resting his hand on the top of the stone plinth that reached up almost to his waist, since it had been his idea to begin this garden in the first place.

Atsushi had never been a man to bother with sentiment, and so the whole exercise had seemed a pointless one to him, yet in the end he had given in, allowing this small, insignificant scrap of Eleventh Division's barracks to be turned over into a memorial garden for those officers that had fallen in the line of duty. Recognising their sacrifice was a way of building divisional unity, was that what Sakanoue had said? Atsushi rubbed his temples, attempting to remember the man's words, but it was so very long ago now, and all he could do was draw forth a faint recollection of his face.

It was hardly surprising, since he had spent twenty five years trying to forget.

He stood back from the memorial stone, his gaze running down the five characters that made up Sakanoue's full name.

Another person he had been weak enough to like, to respect, to train... another person who had gone far far away, leaving him behind.

Atsushi's eyes narrowed to slits, as another, less welcome image suddenly flooded over his brain.

"Tai... chou..."

The words were forced out with difficulty as gasps of air from sword-slit lungs, the bloodstained fingers clawing at the fabric of Atsushi's shihakushou as the man struggled to make himself understood. The thick dark hair, normally so neatly pinned back in straggling, matted clumps around his shoulders, specked with whiteish chalk that even now made Atsushi feel nauseous, and his wild eyes rolling and staring in desperation as he fought to make himself understood.

"Help... me..."

The glitter of sword blades, Sakanoue's, Atsushi's own, in the dim haze of the weak Rukongai sun, and then that prickling awareness that they were not alone, that someone else was watching them with burning, judging eyes. Sakanoue's incoherent groan, his eyes fluttering shut for the last time, and then, the most awful of sounds that not even the loudest of Twelfth Division's explosions could erase... the final death rattle, as life escaped the Vice Captain's body for the last time.

He had slumped on the grass, blood pooling all around him, and Atsushi had thrown his usual austere demeanour to the wind, abandoning even his own weapon in his distress. He had tried in vain to revive the man, but it had been to no avail, and the crimson-soaked, shredded corpse had lain heavy against his arms. He had heard rumours that the dying saw flashes of memory before their eyes in the moments their soul left them, but even though he did not know what Sakanoue's eyes had seen in those last moments, his own head had become an unbearable morass of recollections, each one coming unwelcome and unbidden to unsettle his usual composure.

Images of the young boy he had selected as an apprentice had flooded him, the lad's hard work and dedication inspiring Atsushi's grudging respect. The Captain had never married, and had not had any interest in children, but the careful, efficient diligence with which Sakanoue had learned every skill had, in time, forged a bond between them, a bond which had been the closest thing to father and son that Atsushi had ever known. When Eleventh Division had come his way, there had been no hesitations on selecting Sakanoue as adjutant. He had prided himself in being able to set up the division to run smoothly and effectively and had even boasted at Captains' meetings how having an adjutant he had trained himself meant a superior level of performance. Yet, cradling Sakanoue's broken body, he had, for the first time, known the helplessness that grief placed on the flipside of absolute trust, and at the same time, he had vowed that he would never, ever forgive.

Twenty five years on, the world had moved on and changed, but Atsushi's convictions had not.

He patted the stone pensively, turning back towards the barracks.

Mareiko was lucky. She never saw what I saw. Never knew what I knew. She never had to live with the things I've lived with for all these years. Perhaps I pulled away from her, but it was for the best. Having friends makes you weak, it lays you open to vulnerability and attack. She never has understood the need to become stronger, that all her science and research can't possibly protect her from the evil in this world. Evil that wears the colours of the Gotei, and taints everything it was ever designed to stand for.

"Taichou!"

Ikata's bellowing tones cut through Atsushi's reverie, and he grimaced, quickening his pace towards the main military complex so that his adjutant did not find him in such a place. Ikata had mocked its existence the first time he had seen it, and Atsushi had no mind to reveal his deepest thoughts to his second.

Your cousin, Sakanoue, and yet in all ways inferior. Still, if I can hate him, so much to the good. If the enemy kills him, I will simply march on and cut them down... and this time, there will be no looking back.

“Taichou, where are you? I have to report to you — about the meeting this morning!”

Ikata’s yells were getting louder, and Atsushi was sure they could probably be heard at both Twelfth and Tenth, but as he rounded the corner of the courtyard, he saw the broadset man standing there, hands on hips, gazing around him with a mixture of irritation and insolence.

“There you are, Taichou. I was looking for you.”

“Yes, I heard, and so, I believe, did the rest of Inner Seireitei,” Atsushi replied waspishly. “Well? I trust this morning’s meeting had a purpose other than to get you out of my hair -tell me at once and don’t delay. What discoveries from Rukongai? And don’t leave anything out. Even your small brain must have absorbed a good amount of it, and I want to know as much as you can tell me.”

Ikata glanced at him for a moment, then he snorted, shrugging his shoulders.

“Yes, sir,” he said frankly, a touch of familiarity in his tone. “Whatever you say... you’re the boss.”

39. Aki

Chapter Thirty Eight: Aki

There were birds singing in the skies of the Real World that morning, wheeling and arching as they chirruped their greeting to the sun below the lazy wisps of white cloud that drifted across the blue. The dew had dried quickly, leaving an expanse of green that stretched from the river's edge far into the mountain valley, and the shadow of the volcano's snow-tipped peak watched over everything, serene and dignified, as though self-appointed Emperor of the lands below.

The girl stretched out her arms, slipping her hands behind her head as she gazed contentedly up at the sky, her bronze eyes watching the sway of the tree branches as they moved back and forth in the gentle breeze. The air was fresh and clear, and there was no sign of bad weather on the horizon. All in all, it was a perfect day — a perfect day which was all her own.

She closed her eyes, allowing the mottled rays of the sun to brush over her skin through the wooden boughs.

It had been a long time since she had had any day which was all her own, let alone one in such aesthetic harmony.

Her lips thinned slightly as she tried to draw the memories together. They were not altogether coherent, she reflected, but then, apparently that was to be expected. She recalled a lot of screaming — perhaps her, perhaps others, she couldn't be sure. A place of gloomy darkness, where there had been rats rustling in the shadows, and the imposing lines of steel bars shadowed faintly against cold stone. When she thought of these things, she felt a mixture of emotions, but piecing those things together was difficult when everything was so out of context.

She opened her eyes, frowning as, once again, she forced her thoughts back to the beginning and tried to build a sequence of events.

There was a big manor house, she remembered. It had been tall and impressive, and she had stood before it many times, the bitter winter cold whipping through the thin fabric of her clothing. For some reason, she had come here, although the big, bulky man who had guarded the gate had given her a clip around the ear and sent her packing into the snowy night. She had kept returning, staring up at the furthestmost tower as if looking for someone, but in the hazy darkness, she had never managed to locate what she had sought, and eventually, she had stopped looking.

She had returned time and time again, but in time, her reasons for going had changed. She had felt... something.

Her eyes narrowed.

What had it been?

Something that had driven her there, but not hope, nor plaintive desperation. It had not been hunger, and she had not gone there to beg. It had been something else. Something that had lit... fire through her body.

She sat upright, leaning back on her hands as she reflected on this.

Yes, there had been fire. A red shadow looming down through the night. Screams of fear and panic... maids flying this way and that. Had she been inside the gates, then, that time? Inside when the fire had begun?

She frowned, scratching her head in frustration as the answer was not forthcoming.

It was because she had slept so long. That was what the man had said. She had slept for a long, long time, and so she was confused. It would take a day or two to remember, and she shouldn't panic in the meantime. Everything was all right, because he would help her. That was what she had told him... he would help... her.

She rubbed her temples.

He called me Aki. Is that my name? Am I called Aki? If he knew my name, then he must know who I am. If he knows that, then he must be able to help me. He said he was a friend — and he knew how to help me. Me and the others... the ones still sleeping when he opened my cage. Do I know them, too? Maybe I do. Maybe... but everything is so muggy and dim. Faces, names, places, colours... and none of them mean anything much to me at all.

She got to her feet, turning to gaze up at the mountain with a pensive, considered expression on her young face.

He told us not to go far from the cave, but when I heard the birds singing, I wanted to see the sun. It feels as though I haven't seen sun in such a long time... I suppose he won't be mad, not if it was only for a little while. It can't hurt, can it, walking around these parts? He said we'd get lost, maybe hurt — but I saw people when I was walking down and not one of them even turned to look at me. I'm not dressed strangely, and I haven't grown an extra head. Maybe I can't remember everything, yet, but I'm sure I won't come to harm just seeing the local scenery. It's so very beautiful here...

She tilted her head on one side, examining the mountain more carefully.

Though I'm certain this wasn't where I came from. The memories I have... none of them show a mountain. The land is flat. A dry river estuary leading to a ruined harbour, and then that big imposing house... but no mountains. I'd remember one as beautiful as that one, I'm sure I would. Maybe that's why he doesn't want me wandering around too much... that... what he did he call himself? Oh yes. Keitarou.

A smile lit up her features and she nodded, remembering her disorientation as she had stumbled from the dark depths of what had seemed like a cocoon, his gentle voice and reassuring hand guiding her forward onto the cold stone floor. He had been nice to her... warm and unthreatening, and although she didn't know why, she felt as though it had been a long time since anyone had spoken to her with such kindness. He had led her through into an odd looking chamber, surrounded by carved units, shelves and scrolls, and at the sight of it she had gasped, a suffocating swell of fear lodging in her throat and threatening to paralyse the entirety of her body, yet he had caught her, patting her comfortingly on the arm and assuring her that she would come to no harm so long as he was there. It was then he had called her 'Aki', and promised that he would help her, if she helped him.

Of course, she had agreed. Though she didn't know who he was or even who she was, yet, she knew that he had rescued her from something. Something terrible had happened in that room, a morass of kicking, struggling, biting, screaming and the fair haired demon who had borne down on her, weapon in one hand and cold, empty pale eyes staring through her as though she were no better than a captive animal. She had fought, spitting and hissing, scratching and struggling against the restraints that had dug into her fair skin and left angry red weals. She could remember none of his physical features clearly, they were nothing but a blur to her, but those eyes... they still bored deep into hers, every line and fleck of their unusual pale colour tattooed onto her recollections.

Automatically she glanced at her wrists, but the marks of her most recent restraints were already fading, thanks to Keitarou's kindness. He had cut through them, one by one, being very careful not to cause her more discomfort than he could manage, and his soft, muddy brown eyes had been a welcome change from those cold orbs that had gazed at her so impassively whilst causing her so much pain.

Fair hair, pale eyes. Keitarou called him... what did he say now? Ah yes. Kusakawa.

Aki clenched her fists briefly, a shadow clouding her bronze gaze. I wish I remembered why that name mattered, or what exactly happened to bring me to that place. Perhaps I will remember, soon enough. Keitarou thought I would. He said I'd have companions, then, too. He said there were others... others like me. The ones still sleeping — I wonder what he meant, like me? I wish I knew. He said that the seals were hard to break — harder than he anticipated — and so he only managed mine, but he'd come back. I should return to the cave... he might think I've run away, if I don't, and even though I don't like being there, I don't want him to think I've gone. He said he'd help me, and I believed him. He was kind to me. I want to... trust him.

To think was to act, and she turned on her heel, making her way purposefully back up the pathway that led towards the inner depths of the volcanic mountain. It was so beautiful from the outside, yet so bleak and dark within, and the dichotomy puzzled her. Could something so pretty really conceal such a cold, ugly heart? But then Keitarou had said that the heart of the mountain was far, far hotter than she could even imagine — so perhaps it was just another of those things she didn't understand, yet. Coming outside to see the sun had helped, but it had created so many more questions. Maybe Keitarou would answer them. Surely he would, when he came back?

As she rounded the path that led to the clutch of trees that shielded the cavern descent, the air suddenly warped and wobbled in front of her, making her jump back in surprise. Her body knocked against the trunk of a young elm tree, sending two or three birds flying in startled indignation up into the air above her head. Gathering her wits, she stared with a mixture of fascination and disbelief as the air warped again, then, very definitely began to split open, a black line that became a gaping hole yawning wider and wider until it was easily as big as the cave entrance through which she had stepped only that morning. Curious, Aki skipped cautiously forward, eying this odd phenomenon with eager, inquisitive eyes, but as she drew within a foot or so of the opening, she heard the sound of voices and sprang back, alarm flooding her gaze as she realised something was coming out of the hole.

Was it another cave into the mountain? Was it Keitarou, returning to wake her companions from their sleep? Or was it something...

someone else? Was it an enemy? All the hairs prickled up on the back of her neck for a reason she did not understand, and she hugged her arms tightly to her body, staring with apprehension at the opening yet somehow unable to flee into the surrounding undergrowth. Whatever that thing was, and wherever it had come from, she needed to know what was coming out of it. She had to see it for herself, although beads of cold sweat had begun to form across her brow and she knew that her body was trembling.

What was she afraid of? She couldn't tell. Had she seen one of these before? Somewhere in her memories, had bad things happened in one of these strange black holes, or was it just the unnaturally surreal sight of the air itself being parted, forced asunder to allow something or someone entry into this tranquil place?

The next moment, an individual stepped out of the hole, and Aki's entire body froze with disbelief as she took in the man's appearance.

Fair hair. Pale eyes.

She swallowed hard, taking a step back, but feeling only the hard trunk of the tree up against her spine.

He was dressed in black... black and white. Black and white like the demon who had cursed her and chained her and treated her like she was his property. In his slipstream followed another, similarly dressed, with the same fair hair and pale eyes that frightened her so much. One of them moved in her direction, and as he did so, Aki could make out the hilt of a weapon sheathed at his waist.

Was he going to... hurt her? Had he come to... kill her?

She dragged air into lungs which suddenly felt stifled and reluctant to obey her body's command to breathe. The memory of a silver sword, its sharp edge against her skin flashed to the forefront of her mind, coupled with pain and fear, a childish voice begging him not to harm her. It was her voice, she realised detachedly. She had begged someone to stop, and yet they had persisted, pinning her down when she fought to get free and deriding her behaviour, those eyes looking at her as though she were no more than an animal intended for slaughter. A stinging sensation as rough cloth was pressed against the wound, something being forced down her throat, and then an explosion of emotion, a kaleidoscope of one harsh sensation after another, blurring and confusing her till she felt dizzy and disorientated. Her hands were burning, dripping blood as her nails ripped away, the bones erupting through the torn skin of her fingertips into the open air, and then the whiteness closing in over her face, blinding her eyes, choking shut her airways and muffling the sound of his voice till it became an eerie roar.

Tears glittered on her lashes and she grabbed her head, trying to force the images away, but they continued relentlessly, a tide of pictures washing through her like a tsunami, leaving nothing but devastation in its wake.

And then, somewhere deep inside of her, something dark and cloying reached out to grab a hold of her heart, pulling it down, down down deep into blackness until she could no longer see or feel anything but the dull throbbing of anger and hate against her senses.

Urahara.

The voice in her head was no longer her voice, but at the sound of the word her body tensed, the fear replaced by a stifling wave of hatred.

Kill them. Kill them all. You must kill them. Kill them all.

Suddenly calm, Aki raised her head to meet the gaze of the foremost blond demon, her bronzish eyes glittering strangely as the pupils twisted and distorted, the pretty shade of their natural colour becoming harsher and more feral with every passing moment. The demon was speaking to her, she could see his lips moving, but she could no longer hear his words. Through her head rippled only the murmurs of this voice, this dark voice, urging her to kill.

She clenched her fists, then flung her left hand out in the direction of the demon, and there was an explosion of crimson light as the two made contact, the man falling back with a gasp of surprise and pain at her sudden hostility.

No, perhaps it had not been light. Perhaps it had been an explosion of blood.

Aki raised her fist to glance at it, noting the long sharp claws that now extended through the skin of her slender, delicate fingers, their surface coated in the slick red liquid of her memories. She tilted her hand slightly, watching mesmerised as the blood ran down over the knuckles and across the palm to stain the edges of her ragged sleeve. Slowly she brought the limb closer to her face, examining it for a moment, then licking the tips of the claw-like nails clean.

The substance was tinny and strangely sweet, and the taste of it sent another swell of memory through her slight form.

Now she knew. Now she understood. These were Urahara... the fair haired demons she had sworn on her mother's grave that she would kill, and again, in that dark cell, and again, deep under the mountain, every time she had been beaten and prodded and forced to do things she did not want to do. Time had flowed for everyone else, but for her it had often seemed to stand still. To kill the hours, she had spent each passing second planning, plotting, even dreaming about it — that one day she would take this Clan and rip them limb from limb. She did not care who, or why, or where... just that they were Urahara, and that was reason enough.

And now they were here, before her.

Aki smiled, her bloodstained lips in direct contrast to the strange, chalk white substance that had begun to spread like a shield across her features, fangs protruding down over her teeth and shell like discs flattening over her ears like horns.

Yes. It was a good day. A day in which she would finally take her revenge.

“Are you sure it’s all right for us to go on ahead like this, without the Taichou with us, Yunosuke-nii?”

Kamitani Jun fastened together the last of the long trailing pieces of wire, turning to cast a glance at his companion, doubt glittering in his pale eyes. At about the same time Aki had decided to take her stroll away from the mountain cave, the two Third Division officers had been hard at work setting up the coordinates for their Real World trip. In the absence of firm data, Nagesu had decided that it was best to make a base in familiar territory, and so had instructed Yunosuke to set the gate coordinates for a region frequented by scientific field parties for the collection of minerals and other substances. For this reason, both Yunosuke, who frequently headed such parties, and Kamitani, who, at Sixth seat was also a regular participant on account of his quick brain and good analytical skills had been sent on ahead, but there was a definite sense of unease hanging over the small courtyard.

Unlike the other divisions, who used their equivalent space for drills, Third preferred to keep their military practices under cover, and instead this stretch of paved land had been turned over to Senkaimon research. Though Gates now littered Seireitei, it was this Gate which was the most stable and secure way of travelling between Soul Society and the Real World, and so all of Nagesu’s senior officers had been well drilled in how to not only activate the opening but also control and stabilise it upon arrival. But, despite it being a common state of affairs, Yunosuke could read the tension in his subordinate’s lean frame and, if he was honest with himself, he had felt it keenly, too.

"I know he said he'd join us as soon as Fukutaichou was back, and that the place we're going to is a familiar location for scientific field trips," Kamitani continued now, "but even so, if we're really going looking for..."

He faltered, then mouthed the word, and his companion sighed, leaning up against the frame of the archway and folding his arms across his chest.

"Taichou's orders, so there's no time for us to wonder about it," he said softly. "I know, after our trip to the Rukon, I didn't expect us to be flung out again so soon... but I think it's for that reason Taichou's leaving it to us to form the vanguard. He's said very clearly that he won't risk Fukutaichou, and we've got the background from Rukongai to be going on with."

"But just us two?" Kamitani looked troubled. "I'm not undermining your skills, and it's not like I don't feel confident in my own, but... a Vice Captain was killed by one of... them. If we really think..." he mouthed the name again, "is in the Real World, shouldn't we be sending a whole army out looking for him?"

"I think that's what Taichou's got in mind, to be honest," Yunosuke glanced over the last of the data settings, pulling his zanpakutou from its sheath and turning it over so that the flat of the horizontal blade glinted in the sunlight. "Make sure you've got everything, because we're not going back and forth like we do on a scientific run. Keitarou's a slick customer and he always thinks in ways we don't expect. He's probably imagining a whole flotilla of Shinigami will go to the Real World after him, and so... conversely..."

"Only we're going," Kamitani murmured. "I see. But it's still dangerous, isn't it?"

"Very, I imagine, if we stumble onto him," Yunosuke said matter of factly. "But Rukongai was dangerous, too. Listen, Jun — I know how you feel, because I feel it too, but the truth is that we don't know where in the Real World to begin looking. If we go, and we hunt around, and we find him, well, at worst the two of us might get killed, and that's not awesome for us. But, in terms of the Gotei, it's less damaging. We're soldiers and this is a war. We accept the possibility of giving up our lives for our uniform every time we put it on. Soujadoso probably felt that way, too. I don't really want to die, but if my doing so helped in some way, well, so be it."

He shrugged.

"For an Urahara, dying in the service of Nagesu-sama, under the Third Division banner... there's no fate more honourable," he added. "You remember Shougo-dono, don't you? Oh, wait, you weren't with the squad then,"

He paused, looking thoughtful.

"Do you remember? I wonder if you do."

"I remember," Kamitani's pale eyes clouded, and he nodded. "I was still at the Academy, so not in a squad sense, but yes, I remember. I remember his dying, and I know what you're saying. If we don't find Keitarou, sending two of us on a wild goose chase doesn't break down resources in Seireitei. Nagesu-sama is coming too, so we should be safe enough, and if we're unlucky, then, well, this is our job. I'm apprehensive about going, Yunosuke-nii, but I won't run away from it. You're right — this is our duty and I'll do what I can to help."

"Good lad," Yunosuke offered him a grin. "Right. Then let's go."

He drove his sword into the gate release, feeling the soft hiss of spiritual energy as his zanpakuto released composedly into its shikai shape and activated the perimeter, disabling the security safeguards and causing the atmosphere to fragment and split apart, revealing a line of ebony that expanded gradually from the top of the frame to the foot. Kamitani pressed his hands together reluctantly, forging a small, if stable butterfly which fluttered and flapped slightly into the wind before making a bee-line for the black void. He cast a glance at his superior, who nodded, taking a step into the darkness, sealing his weapon once more and returning it to its normal position at his side.

"It's ironic that it's Keitarou we have to thank for being able to go hunting him like this," he observed, an amused look on his clever features. "When I graduated, Senkaimon were still a bit shady, and coming to the Real World a life and death scramble. Nobody ever attempted it without a Captain in attendance, and even then it was a bit hit or miss whether you made it safely. That's one of the reason Shougo-dono spent so much time in the Real World — he was about the only Urahara other than Nagesu-sama who had a chance of opening the gate without killing his whole platoon."

"I thought Shougo-dono died in the Rukon?" Jun frowned, but Yunosuke was glad to see some of his companion's apprehension fade with the introduction of a new subject. "Is that not the case?"

"No, you're right, he did," Yunosuke agreed pensively. "First and Third generally took care of mopping up the Rukon and the Real World, basically because the Urahara invented Senkaimon and the Yamamoto had Genryuusai-sama to open gates safely when things were really at their most hairy. I think it was about a year or two after I graduated, when Nagesu-sama made all the improvements based on Keitarou's notes. Before that, Shougo-dono was the only other Captain who led frequent patrols to the Real World. Then when the Gates became safer, and as the squads grew and developed, Shougo-dono and Atsushi-dono of the Eleventh became effective caretakers of the Real World and the Rukon. Shougo-dono died in the Rukon... but he spent as much time cleansing the Real World of Hollows and transient souls as he did sweeping Soul Society. He wasn't afraid of the Gates... he'd laugh and say there were worse things out there that were more likely to eat him than the Dangai."

"Maybe he was right," Kamitani pressed his lips together thoughtfully. "I wish I'd known him better. I haven't heard a lot of things about his work — I didn't know he did so much."

"Nagesu-sama relied on him a lot," Yunosuke agreed. "Well, now he has Mareiko-dono, who everyone knows is just as clever, so the Urahara moved on... but he was a loss to us. He was smart... and he wasn't scared to try new things or go to new places."

He added a wry smile.

"Plus, he managed to work successfully with Atsushi-dono," he added dryly. "I've heard that's quite a job, though it's only a rumour, so don't go around repeating it."

"No... I've heard the same," despite himself, Kamitani laughed. "But the Eleventh and Twelfth don't go to Rukongai any more, do they?"

"No. Not at all," Yunosuke shook his head, his expression becoming grave. "After Shougo-dono's death, the Twelfth pulled out. Their clearance to go was never revoked, just Mareiko-dono really didn't want to. Atsushi-dono flat out refused to consider returning there, and I think Fukutaichou took me and a couple of others there on speculative missions after that happened, to make sure the danger was eradicated... but all in all, it stopped. Fourth wanted to extend their healing projects over there, and the Spiritless Zone concept was created. A lot of things has happened in a short space of time... but I think it's no bad thing that all those changes came out of Shougo-dono's death. That's what I mean about dying for the uniform — if your death carries the rest forward, it's not in vain."

"And it's why we have to stop Keitarou from interfering, so the Spiritless Zone can get back on track," resolution glittered in Kamitani's pale eyes. "All right, I'm ready. I'm fine now, Yunosuke-nii."

Thank you for putting it into perspective for me — I know what we need to do.”

“Good, because we’re there,” As the darkness began to part to reveal daylight and the chirping of birds, Yunosuke clapped him on the shoulder reassuringly. “Let’s go do what our Captain sent us to do, all right?”

“Yes, sir,” Kamitani saluted sharply, hurrying forward after the Hell Butterfly as it broke into the hazy summer atmosphere of the Real World, and Yunosuke grinned, following along behind him at a more leisurely pace.

As he stepped out of the opening, he saw that they were not alone, for beneath a tree stood a young girl, no more than her late teens. She was slightly built, with dreamy bronze eyes and wavy, tousled auburn hair, her attention apparently captured by the beauty of nature that surrounded her. Despite her countenance, there was something slightly surreal about the girl’s presence, and as he stepped out of the gateway, Yunosuke saw her turn, her eyes widening as she took in both the Gate and their shihakushou.

She can see us. Is she a Plus Soul, then? Or one of those humans who can allegedly see shinigami?

Yunosuke’s brows knitted together in consternation.
She’s young... but she has reiatsu. I can sense it. She doesn’t seem like the suspect in Souja-dono’s murder case, but even so...

“Are you all right? You look lost.” Kamitani was speaking to her now, walking forward with his hand on the hilt of his zanpakutou, and Yunosuke realised with a jolt that his companion had also sensed her spiritual presence, making the assumption she was a Plus soul who had not yet experienced Soul Burial.

As Kamitani approached her, however, something in the girl’s aura changed, sending chills rippling down Yunosuke’s spine and making the whole of his surroundings appear to fluctuate into a world of black and white before jerking rudely back into vivid technicolour. The girl’s eyes had changed, he realised in alarm, and then it dawned on him what it was that was so surreal about this unknown individual.

She looked like a Plus Soul, and she could see them, but there was no chain at her chest. She had not died in this world, which meant...

“Jun, get back! Get away from her, she’s not what you think!” Yunosuke’s words ripped out across the clearing, but even as they left his lips the pulse of darkening reiryoku around the girl’s body intensified, and with a sweep of her arm that came too quickly and viciously for either shinigami to do anything about, she raked her fingers ruthlessly through Kamitani's uniform to his body beneath, sending a spray of blood into the ether.

No, they were no longer fingers. Yunosuke's blood ran cold as he realised that shafts of bone had erupted through the girl's fingertips, elongating into sinister looking claws, which had ripped across his companion as if he were no more than a rag doll, his body cloaked in a sinister cloud of red. The force of the blow sent Kamitani flying backwards, a mixture of surprise and fright glittering in his pale gaze, and Yunosuke darted forward, sword already half drawn from its sheath as he moved his own body to defend his wounded comrade. The world slipped into wobbly black and white again, yet the pooling droplets of Kamitani's blood on the ground seemed to remain a vivid, blazing crimson, and despite himself Yunosuke felt nauseous, his mind racing as he contemplated the severity of injury his companion must have suffered. Kamitani was not moving, having struck his head on impact with the ground, but Yunosuke knew that if he let himself be distracted by his companion's plight, it would be doom for both of them.

I can't focus on it now. If I let my guard down, we're both dead. If he's still alive, his only chance is me. I have to deal with this... this...

His eyes widened in consternation as he realised the girl's face was slowly being obscured by the white of what was unmistakably a Hollow mask, the chalk-like substance spreading down into fangs that concealed the top half of her jaw from view. Across her brow and over her ears the mask flattened into horns that jutted upwards in spikes as sharp as those which had penetrated Kamitani's body, and Yunosuke swallowed hard, his grip on his weapon tightening so hard that he did not even notice he was drawing blood.

What the hell is that?

And then the creature spoke.

"Urahara,"

The word was faintly muffled by the overhang of the mask, and there was a sinister, echoey quality to it that rattled around Yunosuke's shattered senses. "Well? What are you waiting for? I'm done with him. It's your turn now."

"Who or what the hell are you?" Somehow Yunosuke stood his ground, the anger and indignation that had flown through him at the sight of Kamitani's body being tossed through the air fragmenting and distorting as the noxious reiatsu began to penetrate more deeply into his senses. It was as though he was suddenly drowning in a mire of choking, seeping energy, washing away his composure and his conviction and sweeping him over the edge of an emotional waterfall before sending him plunging like a stone to the depths below. Try as he might he could not put together the words in his mind to release his sword, and though he could hear his zanpakutou calling out to him, the words were garbled and sounded more like the cries of a frightened child than the reasoned advice of the weapon he had worked so closely with for more than thirty years.

“Nemesis.”

The girl laughed, every syllable clawing through Yunosuke’s nerves. He was trembling, he realised in dismay, but although he tried to calm himself, his body was not listening. The pulsing waves of reiatsu that had been trifling and inoffensive a few moments before were now growing thicker and more cloying with every passing moment, and as he gazed at the half-hollow, half-human creature that stood before him, he could read the madness that now glittered in those once dreamy eyes. Whatever she had been when they arrived, she was not it now. Had she been waiting for them? Was this another of Keitarou’s traps?

“Nemesis?” Somehow Yunosuke managed to force out words, though he knew he was already breathing heavily, struggling to absorb enough air in the reishi-deprived atmosphere of the Real World. “What do you mean, nemesis? I don’t know who you are, or why you attacked Jun. Hell, I don’t even know what you are... so how can you be nemesis, when we haven’t even met?”

“You’re an Urahara,” The girl scowled, flexing her claws as she took a step or two towards him. Her feet made no sound against the grass, but to Yunosuke’s frightened wits it was as though the vibration of each step pounded through his entire frame. “I don’t care which. I don’t need to know that. I’ll kill all of you, and then I’ll find the one I want.”

“Which is who?” Yunosuke demanded. The girl snorted.

“I don’t need to tell corpses secrets,” she said dismissively, raising her right hand and, to Yunosuke’s alarm he saw a glitter of red begin to form against the palm, raw and unfinished yet clearly some kind of reiatsu attack. It was not Kidou, however, but, like the mask, the dark edge to its aura made it seem more like a Hollow’s cero, and Yunosuke racked his brains for any study he might ever have done which explained this encounter, coming up blank.

“I only need to kill you,” the girl added. “Stand still and I’ll do it quickly. I don’t have much time to waste with you.”

“Jishin o yobe, Sekizanha!”

The words sliced through the darkness of the atmosphere, bringing blessed relief to Yunosuke’s ears, as the earth beneath his feet wobbled and split apart, creating a deep cavernous divide in the ground between him and his would-be assailant. The girl leapt back from the widening crevasse, hissing like a feral cat at the interruption. She swung around, Yunosuke momentarily forgotten as she unleashed her Cero-like attack in the direction of the newcomer, but unlike Yunosuke, Nagesu was neither intimidated nor overwhelmed by the flare of malevolent reiatsu, and he glanced the raw blast off his blade, sending it searing harmlessly into the trunk of an unsuspecting tree. It blazed right through the wood, splitting the unfortunate tree in half, but Nagesu did not even flinch at the sound of the upper boughs crashing down, nor at the raucous complaints of the now homeless birds who had been nesting there. As Yunosuke managed to turn his head to look, he saw his Captain’s gaze was fixed on the half-girl, half Hollow, and the cold impassiveness that glittered behind his glasses made the Third Seat realise that for once his serene, measured Captain was actually angry.

“Yunosuke, take Kamitani and move back,” Nagesu did not turn to look at him for one moment, his words spoken in soft, even tones that somehow terrified Yunosuke more than the girl’s reiatsu had moments before. “This is clearly a matter I should deal with, and I will, so I want you to sheath your sword and fall back.”

“But Taichou...” Yunosuke began to protest, but Nagesu raised his weapon, sunlight glittering eerily off its released blade.

“That was an order,” he said, his tones carrying an edge Yunosuke had never heard before. “Take Kamitani and see what you can do to help him. Unless you want to be disciplined for insubordination, I’ll hear no more questions. You studied long enough with that Unohana boy — prove to me that friendship has some material use and do as you’re told! I’ve no need for you to remain in combat position. I am putting his life in your hands.”

Yunosuke stared at Nagesu for a moment, eyes huge and jaw dropping at the harshness of the command, but he did not press the issue any further. In silence he sheathed his weapon once more, hurrying down beside Kamitani’s still body. A cursitory glance told him the man was alive, but deeply unconscious, and he slipped an arm beneath Kamitani’s shoulders, shunpoing the pair of them a safe distance from the chasm that now split the peaceful valley in two. He laid Kamitani down on the grass, then turned to glance once more at the confrontation below. Here they were out of the immediate range of that toxic reiatsu, pulsing forward in waves of black despair and rage, yet though the thought of it still made him shudder, Nagesu did not seem overly troubled by its presence.

Taichou is always so calm and composed and conservative, but I've heard from other people that when one of his men is down, he takes particular exception to it. I don't know if he blames me for Jun's injury, or if he's just tired and frustrated with everything we've had to do lately, but like this, he's not someone I want to argue with, let alone confront.

He turned his gaze back to Kamitani's injuries, pulling away the ripped obi and tugging back the black cloth to examine the extent of the wound. Though the gashes were ugly, they were not as deep as he had first feared, and whilst blood still gushed from the wound, it was simple work for him to fashion a tourniquet from what was left of his junior's sash. For a few moments he focused all of his attention on stemming Kamitani's bleeding, binding the wound as neatly as he could with the sleeve of his own shihakushou.

Taichou might have been harsh, but he's also right. Studying so closely with Madeki at the Academy means I learned things about healing that most militant shinigami don't get to know. We all do basic first aid, but having a friend so high up in the Unohana was an advantage I used to help secure my place in Third in the first instance. If I can't use that to save Jun now, it will have been pointless. I should have sheathed my sword and dealt with this the moment Taichou appeared — hopefully he'll forgive my insubordination, when we get back to Soul Society.

Checking once again to ensure the blood had stopped flowing, he put red-smudged fingers carefully to Jun's throat, nodding in relief and approval at the steady beating of his companion's pulse. The bloodloss had made a mess of them both, but had not been severe enough to affect Kamitani's blood-pressure, and already colour was returning to the man's pale cheeks. He smiled faintly, patting the younger boy's arm in a gesture of reassurance that he knew was more for his own benefit than his unconscious subordinate.

"Nothing more I can do for you, now," he murmured, fingering the ripped ends of his sleeve absently. "Better you stay out for the count, Jun-kun. That's gotta hurt like hell, and from all the reiatsu swirling down there, I don't suppose either one of us would stand our ground. That girl is out for blood... and Taichou... this time, Taichou means business.”

Well, so far, so good.

Juushirou glanced over the provisions list, scrawling three or four notes alongside particular entries before finalising it with his particular Captain’s seal and placing the document on the top of the others ready for them to be delivered to the relevant suppliers. He let out a sigh, resting his chin in his free left hand as he contemplated everything that had happened over the course of the last twenty four hours. Shunsui’s comments and the foreboding in his warning still bothered him, for he knew how perceptive his friend was, and yet no matter how he considered it, he knew that he had already made up his mind where Koku was concerned. Winning his trust was the priority — that, and protecting the hime of the Kitsune Clan whose life had been entrusted to him by Joumei’s sober-faced, wary associate Hiko.

So young, and so fragile to look at. Such a child, really...

Juushirou watched the black ink drip slowly from the end of his brush back against the inkstone.

Though I suppose she’s not a child, is she? Joumei said the Kitsune’s lives are shorter, and there’s nothing wrong with her intellect, either. I understand that Joumei wanted her out of danger — I’m sure she’s far from helpless, but I wouldn’t be confident of her chances if Keitarou was to launch an attack. Her life really is in our hands... and I’ve given my word, so I can’t let anyone down. More, I can’t let the rest of the Division know I’m watching her especially. I want them to consider her just one of the team... but with her muteness and her lack of sword skills, is anyone going to believe she attended Sensei’s Academy?

It had been Naoko’s idea to assign Ketsui as Izumi’s mentor. As she had prepared for the trip to the Rukon, she had mentioned acerbically that, at Tenth seat, it was about time he showed himself responsible for junior officers. More specifically, though, she had pointed out to her doubtful Captain that of all of Thirteenth, Ketsui was the one who might most understand Izumi’s position.

“I’ve trained the lad, and he hesitates to begin with, but when he’s made up his mind, that’s it,” she had said, as she had slid Dokusou Houshi’s sheath through the crisp fabric of her obi. “Besides, he needs a distraction. Thirteenth is far too busy for him to spend spare time worrying about his brother or what’s happening in Seventh. This is a way he can be useful to us and prove the skills he’s learned are worthy of his rank. I think he’s the best choice for the job, Taichou. I’ll see to her uniform, and all of that, when I get back — but in terms of mentorship, I think it needs to be Ketsui.”

“Taichou?”

The sound of Kira’s voice at the door startled him from his reverie, and he turned, seeing the skinny, fair haired officer standing apprehensively in the doorway of Ugendou. Juushirou had left it open, wanting to waft a breeze through the stuffy chamber. From Kira’s expression it was clear the Seventh Seat had been debating how to politely interrupt his Captain without anything to knock on, and despite himself, Juushirou smiled.

“What is it, Kira? Something I need to know about?”

“I’m sorry to disturb you, sir, but Sekime-taichou is at the gate.” Kira bowed his head, relief flooding his blue gaze. “She wants to know if you’re free to discuss something with her — is it all right for me to show her in?”

“Sekime-taichou?” Juushirou frowned, then nodded. “Of course — does that mean there’s news from the Real World already?”

“I don’t know, sir. She didn’t say,” Kira admitted. “She just said it was something of importance and she hoped to consult with you.”

“Then please, assure her she’s quite welcome,” Juushirou instructed warmly.

“Yes, sir,” Kira turned to go, then hesitated, turning to glance at his superior officer.

“Taichou, I’ve finished the written report on the Rukon Investigation. Fukutaichou asked me to put it on his desk when I’d done, but his office is locked and he’s not there. What should I do with it?”

“If Naoko is about, ask her for the key. She has a copy,” Juushirou grinned. “Enishi won’t mind... I suspect he’ll be back soon enough, but if you’ve other things pressing, speak to her. You can tell her its on my instruction. All right?”

“Yes, sir,” Kira looked relieved, bowing fervently before hurrying away across the wooden walkway to obey the commands.

Juushirou sat back on his heels, setting his brush aside.
I wonder what this visit is in aid of? I suppose I shall find out soon enough, but if Nagesu-sama’s team are still investigating the Real World, I don’t see how anything can have changed since Naoko and the others came back. I can’t imagine she’d come in person unless it was important... I hope it’s not a negative kind of important.

“Ukitake-taichou?” At that moment the fair-haired Captain of the Twelfth Division appeared in the doorway, offering him a sheepish smile as she took in the confusion in his expression.

“I’m sorry, I’m descending on you unawares, and I should’ve probably sent word that I wanted to speak to you,” she apologised. “Your subordinate told me it was all right for me to come now — I’m not interrupting anything important?”

“No, only authorising Enishi’s routine supply order sheets as I do every month, whilst considering the information my officers brought back from the Rukon,” Juushirou shook his head, indicating for his colleague to come into the office. She did so, closing the door carefully behind her before stepping neatly over the tatamimat floor to take a seat. “You’re always welcome, Sekime-taichou, advance memo or otherwise — but I don’t suppose this is a social visit.”

“Unfortunately, Captains don’t seem to have time for such things, these days,” Mareiko groaned, shaking her head. “No, it’s on another matter — and it connects to the Rukon trip. Did your officers say anything of interest? Your Third Seat was, I believe, of great help to Nagesu-sama in processing data relating to the Senkaimon they found at the scene.”

“Naoko’s told me about that,” Juushirou agreed, “and the official report is, I believe, about to be submitted to my adjutant for review and overall consideration.”

“Fast work,” Mareiko looked impressed. “In that case, I hope you won’t mind that I’ve come with more work along the same lines.”

“What kind of work?” Juushirou looked curious, and Mareiko smiled.

“Nagesu-sama passed the data back to me before he left for the Real World,” She said, fumbling around in her obi, then pausing for a moment with a look of consternation on her face. “The data you gave to him, at the Captain’s meeting, I mean. I was sure I brought it with me... maybe I left it on the desk in my office? Perhaps I should’ve sent Aoi to check, but I was sure that... ah, no, here it is. I have it.”

She pulled out the battered sheet of paper, offering Juushirou a rueful smile.

“I know you can’t confirm the source that gave you this,” she said matter-of-factly, setting the sheet down on Ugendou’s small table between them, “and I won’t ask questions about it if it’s really not possible for you to answer them. What I’m interested in is the sample material that was used to generate this data. Nagesu-sama asked me to do some investigating under my own steam, and I confess I've gone a little beyond his original request because some small details were bothering me. I went to Seventh but Kitabata-kun told me that Tenichi's damaged uniform from the night of the kidnap was incinerated because it was beyond repair. Since these notes clearly indicate that samples were cut for tests to be run, I wanted to know if there were any further pieces remaining."

"Ah. That I don't know," Juushirou said regretfully. "I realise it's unhelpful of me, but all the information that I have is in that document. I didn't write it and I only understand enough of the theory to realise it relates to Tenichi and the likelihood that he was held in Rukongai. How the samples were tested or even where any extra material might be kept is beyond my knowledge."

"I see," Mareiko sighed, running an absent finger through her wild fair hair and sending the black clip that had been forced into it pinging loose as though unleashed from a catapult. It struck the doorpost with a clatter before dropping to the floor, and the Twelfth Division Captain jumped, swinging around as if trying to locate the source of the noise.

"Did you hear something?"

"I believe you dropped your hair-clasp," Juushirou reached out a hand to retrieve the clip, glancing at it before holding it out. Mareiko took it in apparent surprise, glancing at it, then shrugging her shoulders.

"Thank you. I wonder how that got there," she murmured, more than half to herself, and Juushirou frowned, turning his gaze back to the sheet of paper.

"The truth is that I wish I could give you more data," he admitted. "I really wish I could answer all your questions and ensure that Keitarou is found more quickly — but I don't and I can't."

"Hrm," Mareiko turned her gaze back to the notes, reaching into her sleeve for a rolled up wad of parchment which she dumped down on the table with a thud.

"These are preliminary analyses that Nagesu-sama did when plotting the course for entering Rukongai," she said pensively. "He left them with me when they went into the Rukon, and since he came back, I've been trying to patch together his notes and the samples he took — but I feel as though there's a great yawning hole between the two and I'm struggling to fill it. Before he went to the Real World, we went over this data with a fine tooth comb and added about twenty pages of research to the back of it..information which we need to break down and analyse as quickly as possible. Using all available sources.”

She pursed her lips.

“Your data suggested that someone went to the Rukon and took samples, but I can’t see how that could have been done. Still, to be so accurate with the mineral deposits...”

“Have you ever been to the wasteland Rukon?” Juushirou asked curiously, and Mareiko frowned.

“Why do you ask?”

“You just seemed overly against the idea, when Nagesu-sama mentioned it at the meeting,” Juushirou explained. “You reacted as though the very thought of it frightened you — as though being dispatched there was a fate worse than death.”

“I see,” Mareiko was silent for a moment, then she nodded her head.

“Twenty-five years ago,” she said softly, and Juushirou was surprised to see the sudden clouding that filled the Twelfth Division Captain’s usually scatty gaze. “It was a time before the Gotei gathered in official barracks like we do now, so I’m not surprised you didn’t hear of it. You must still have been deployed in Seventh District at the time — or no, perhaps it was even before your inauguration took place — but it was not long before I was forced into accepting my haori.”

“Forced?” Juushirou blinked, and Mareiko shrugged her shoulders.

“I felt that way, at the time, so soon after,” she agreed pensively. “Tell me, did you ever meet my predecessor?”

“I don’t know,” Juushirou mused, “If I did, I don’t believe we ever exchanged words. It wasn’t until Thirteenth’s base here was permanently established that I really got acquainted with those Captains and Vice Captains I hadn’t yet crossed paths with. By that point, you must have been Captain of the Twelfth Division.”

“Then perhaps it was before you were appointed,” Mareiko reflected.

“Perhaps so,” Juushirou agreed. “I remember very well how warmly you welcomed us as your new neighbours and how kind you were in sharing officers to help put together those final bits and pieces because we were still quite small in number. I’m not sure I ever did really know any other Captain of Twelfth Division than you.”

“Well, the Gotei is supposed to operate as a team,” Mareiko’s eyes twinkled, but there was a sadness in them that Juushirou was not used to seeing. “Truth to be told, I welcomed the change and the distraction. Eleventh are such... combative neighbours, noisy and often abrasive. It was so much more pleasant to learn that the Thirteenth Division appreciated other things than fighting... and I had heard much about you from Nagesu-sama. I knew he had ratified your zanpakutou...”

She grinned, looking abashed.

“I suppose the scientist in me was curious to see another double-bladed weapon in close proximity,” she admitted sheepishly. “Kyouraku-taichou doesn’t seem to like the idea of a scientist poking and prodding around at his too often, so I’d only heard rumours, but never been priveleged to encounter the phenomenon first hand. You were kind enough to show and share Sougyo no Kotowari with me, and so sending over officers to help was the least I could do. Twelfth had had its fair share of upheaval, and it was a sign things were maybe beginning to settle down.”

She frowned, folding her hands absently in her lap.

“But I avoided the crux of your question, and that wasn’t polite,” she murmured, and Juushirou had the impression that she was scolding herself for her ill manners. “You asked if I had been to the Rukon, and though it’s a memory I don’t like very much, in the current circumstances, I feel I should try and answer fully.”

She pursed her lips, and Juushirou sat back, waiting for her to continue.

“Whilst the Gotei didn’t have assigned territory, divisions like ours were surplus to requirement within Clan lands,” Mareiko reflected softly. “The inauguration of Eighth Squad meant that Eighth District had its own shinigami once more, and your own people were taking care of the Seventh — both District and squad. Ninth, Tenth, Eleventh and Twelfth were considered... additional forces. Supplementary, if you like. Whilst the Ninth and Tenth spent most of their time in and around Seireitei, mopping up extra work wherever they were needed, Eleventh Division and Twelfth Division came to take on other duties — sometimes to the Real World, and sometimes to the Rukon. For the most part, we were involved in cleansing both areas of corrupted spirit matter, and we would take it in turns to be dispatched wherever we were needed. Sometimes we would work in tandem... and I’m sure you can imagine, working in partnership with Atsushi-dono's Eleventh was never the easiest of tasks. But then, it wasn't me who had to liaise with him, but my Captain... and he had a way with difficult people, far more so than I."

She pressed her lips together.

"I was Vice Captain of Twelfth Division the last time Eleventh and Twelfth were dispatched in force to Rukongai, and it was... not a pleasant mission," she recounted sadly. "We were attacked by mutated residents and my Captain was killed, along with three or four other seated members of my squad. I took an injury..."

She faltered, putting a hand to her right shoulder, and Juushirou frowned, inwardly berating himself for raising the subject.

"I'm sorry," he murmured. "I didn't mean to pry... I didn't know."

"Seireitei decided it would be better if people didn't talk about it too much." Mareiko lowered her hand, offering him a sad smile. "I think that was largely thanks to pressure from Atsushi-dono, since he felt the whole business cast a bad light on the Eleventh Division. Atsushi-dono lost his adjutant Sakanoue-kun in the same incident, you see, and the rumours were that the Vice Captain had died defending the Captain."

"I see," Juushirou's eyes became slits. "I remember when we were about to graduate, Minaichi-dono was looking for a new adjutant and Enishi was one of his candidates. Enishi turned him down and came with me instead, and there's been bad feeling between us ever since. I wonder if Minaichi-taichou thinks Enishi refused him on account of this business — but I'm sure I never heard any of this before today, and so I doubt Enishi did either."

"Atsushi-dono is a proud man," Mareiko agreed, "and would have hated to think such stories would spread. Well, you saw how he reacted at the meeting just when the Rukon was mentioned... though he doesn't like the subject raised, I think it's still very fresh in his mind, even now. Sakanoue-kun was one of his own hand-picked and trained officers from before the time Eleventh was even set up — they had a close working bond."

"That's true," Juushirou acknowledged. "Minaichi-dono did seem unnaturally agitated when the subject came up."

"Whatever the truth of it is, I suppose only he knows," Mareiko shrugged her shoulders. "Wherever he and his force were fighting, it was far enough away that I wasn't a witness to any of it — and even if I had been, it wouldn't have mattered. We had enough on our hands. I was cut down and I lost consciousness. When I came to... Atsushi-dono and his remaining men were with ours, and the Taichou was..."

Her lip trembled slightly and she paused to regain her composure.

"The deaths were officially recorded as having happened in active service, but more than that was hushed up," she said at length. "My Captain was a principled man, and because of him, I believe some of us were able to escape. Truthfully, I understand the feelings that drove Atsushi-dono's adjutant to battle how he did, if indeed the rumours are true. I would have happily done the same for my Captain — we all would have. The mutated residents were stupidly powerful, though, and more than half Hollow when they attacked us. They weren't... normal hollow souls. They were something... else."

"Something else," Juushirou echoed. "Something Keitarou might have created, maybe?"

"I never had the opportunity to personally analyse the remains of any of these creatures," Mareiko said regretfully. "I don't know if they formed naturally or someone mutated them on purpose. My Captain was convinced that they were someone's handiwork, but all the effort we put into trying to link their appearances with Keitarou's known locations following the assaults on the Kuchiki... came up with no matches. We had to give up, so really all I know is that they were there and primed to attack. One of them ripped a claw through the ligaments in my right shoulder. I can wield my sword adequately, if I need to, in my right hand, but it lacks the strength it once had and I'm not like you, I can't swing a sword with my left. That's why Twelfth Division focuses its attentions more on the pursuit of Kidou, Ukitake-dono... because in that respect at least my strength remains undiminished."

"I see," Juushirou rested his chin in his hands. "Then that's why you wanted to avoid the Rukon, and why Nagesu-sama allowed it."

"Yes," Mareiko agreed. "He knows that I'm probably no match these days for an individual that killed a Vice Captain. I am a Captain because I am an Urahara, and because I have scientific knowledge and good Kidou skill — but I am no longer a combat fighter, and he would prefer not to have to bury another member of his kin on account of actions in Rukongai. If Keitarou is the enemy, Ukitake-dono, I am completely helpless. I am not a match for him — unlike yourself, I am only a Captain because there was a need for someone to fill the post, and I was the only candidate available from the correct Clan. It seemed a bad way of doing things to me — so I work as hard as I can to deserve a status that deep down I know I shall never properly earn.”

“I’m sure that’s not the case,” Juushirou looked startled. “Your research into Kidou has been pivotal and continues to be groundbreaking, and everyone likes and respects your work a good deal. Holding a sword isn’t all of being a Captain of the Gotei, Sekime-taichou — and I’m sorry I raised a subject that makes you feel that way. You came here on scientific grounds — I didn’t mean to be insensitive about the past.”

“The past is what it is, what it always was,” Mareiko said philosophically. “I took the haori in my Captain’s memory, to finish the things he began. Whether I’ll succeed or not remains to be seen, but it’s the only way I can keep him alive within me and within Twelfth — so I do. And to that end, I need to try and get to the bottom of this mystery. The area of Rukon that Nagesu-sama and Kyourakudono investigated appeared to have been inhabited but whoever was resident there left the area not long before we arrived. We have to consider the disturbing possibility that Keitarou and his allies fled to the Real World. If so, tracking them down there will be next to impossible. I hoped that, if samples of Kotetsu Tenichi’s clothing remained in storage somewhere, I could run additional tests on it for foreign reiatsu.”

“I thought those tests were run and came up blank?” Juushirou questioned, and Mareiko looked troubled.

“What we had came up negative,” she agreed, “but now we know we didn’t have a complete sample. If someone was scientifically astute enough to take these kinds of readings, I expect they were also astute enough to take samples which were saturated in interesting spiritual data. It’s quite possible that the evidence we need to prove or disprove Keitarou’s involvement — or the involvement of anyone else — remains with the samples that are currently out of our hands.”

She eyed Juushirou expectantly, and the Thirteenth Division Captain sighed.

“I don’t know anything about it,” he said slowly, “but if I can find out the answer, I will try. I can’t reveal my source, Sekime-taichou, not even to a trusted colleague. I haven’t even told Shunsui the name of the contributor, and I haven’t discussed it with anyone more than was mentioned at the meeting. But I understand what you are saying and I will do my best. That’s all I can say — the material isn’t here within Thirteenth, or I would pass it over to you right away.”

“I thought that might be the case, in which case, I’ll leave it in your hands,” Mareiko’s pale features took on a look of relief and gratitude. “In fact, that’s why I brought that data with me. The Rukon data is probably not so vital now, but the Real World findings are important, and we’re potentially running against the clock to crack them. Even if you can’t reveal your source, Nagesu-sama hoped... maybe you could find a way to ask...”

She faltered, but Juushirou had read the intent in her question, and he nodded.

“I’ll do my best,” he repeated.

“Then my visit has been worthwhile,” Mareiko looked reassured. “This whole business is messy and unpleasant and I’d like it to settle down again.”

“We all feel that way,” Juushirou said fervently.

As Mareiko got to her feet to leave something small and green scuttled out from the hem of her hakama, and she let out a muttered exclamation, bending to pick it up and slide it back beneath her obi.

“I’m sorry, I seem to have brought a lab experiment with me by mistake,” she said apologetically, offering the bemused Juushirou a sheepish smile. “We were doing some tests on the transference of reiryokucells into basic organisms, and it seems that I wasn’t as careful as I thought when I returned them all to their confinement units.”

“I’m sure there was no harm done,” Juushirou managed, and Mareiko laughed, shrugging her shoulders.

“No, because I caught it, but sometimes they can chew rather large holes in bamboo,” she reflected. “We’ve had to line their cages with harder material, else they gnaw their way out. You should see the chaos when they get into the dormitories — they’re so much harder to catch once they’ve found a hiding place in the blankets of a slovenly recruit. Oh well, I suppose that’s why we operate such firm discipline about tidiness and organisation, isn’t it?”

“I imagine it might be?” Juushirou blinked, his gaze flitting automatically to Mareiko’s obias if expecting an army of green minibeasts to invade and consume his precious Ugendou. As soon as she had left, he decided to himself grimly, he would get Enishi into the office and together they would do a firm and thorough sweep for anything vaguely resembling an insect.

Mareiko reached the door, turning to look at him pensively.

“I have one other question I wanted to ask,” she said slowly, and Juushirou jerked his thoughts away from the scuttling critter, forcing him to meet her gaze.

“Yes? What about?”

“Your waif and stray. The boy... Koku?” Mareiko leaned up against the doorpost. “I wondered if you’d managed to speak to him?”

“Mm, somewhat, but not particularly productively,” Juushirou shook his head with a sigh. “He didn’t see Souja-dono’s attacker, and I tend to believe his story. He has no weapon, and wouldn’t have been able to fight off someone capable and determined to end the life of a Vice Captain level shinigami. I’m afraid that Koku might be a dead end... we’ll see him healed, but more than that... I think we’ll probably end up just letting him go.”

“Back to the Rukon?” Mareiko’s eyes were suddenly sharp and focused on Juushirou’s face, and the Thirteenth Division Captain started, staring at her disconcertedly.

“Sekime-taichou?”

“Koku came from Rukongai with Souja-dono,” Mareiko said simply. “There’s no need to look so startled, Ukitake-dono — it’s common sense. Apply scientific logic and there’s only one conclusion. Souja-dono was too badly hurt to get back here alone, so he had help. Koku was with him, so Koku was the help.”

“Do you think I should report it to the Council?” Juushirou asked quietly. “Shunsui warned me other people would think of it too, and I knew he was right, but... I feel bad that the kid was struck how he was when he was only trying to help bring Souja home. He didn’t come here on purpose. The death penalty for crossing the divide is strict and inflexible. I wanted to protect him from that, because he only tried to help one of our colleagues. I want to win his trust — so I told him I’d keep it back, and I don’t want to betray that promise when the stakes are so high. I don’t know how much he does or doesn’t know about anything — but making him feel we’re hounding him or wanting to hurt him won’t induce him to confide in us about anything.”

“I don’t really want to see anyone get executed, either,” Mareiko reflected. “Nor do I want to see a young boy harassed to reveal information about anything — interrogation under stress often produces false results. My interest in him isn’t for that purpose, don’t worry. I’m sure there are others who know, but if there are, they’ve had other priorities, and I don’t see the need to burden the Council with unimportant technicalities. No, I was wondering what had happened to his clothing when he first came here. I was hoping that I might examine them to see what traces of spiritual energy I might find there. If we theorise that Kotetsu Tenichi was held in the same location that Souja-dono was attacked, then it also makes sense that Koku was in that vicinity, too. It's possible that some of the spiritual data I'm lacking from Tenichi's case might be present on Koku's clothes instead."

"I see," Juushirou rubbed his chin with a sigh. "I'm afraid that I'm fairly certain his clothes were also destroyed. They were in bad shape and bloodstained — I'm sorry. I didn't realise they would have a deeper purpose."

"Oh well. It was just an idea," Mareiko pursed her lips. "I would say I'd like to see him myself, but that might frighten him... I've heard he's a little skittish of shinigami, and I wouldn't want to put him on his guard."

"He's wary. A little feral, perhaps," Juushirou agreed, "but understandably so given the provocation. I'm sorry, Sekime-taichou. I'll do what I can about the scientific data, but I think that's all I can manage."

"Then that will have to do," Mareiko smiled, her usual, happy-go-lucky smile, and Juushirou returned it hesitantly. "I'll leave you alone, then. My apologies for intruding and making so many demands — I'll just have to work with what we have until I hear from you."

The air was thick with hostile reiryoku, the scent of blood mingled with the fragrance of the many flowers that dotted the lower slopes of the fertile mountain peak.

Beneath his feet, Nagesu could feel the flowing lifebeat of the earth, hot and impatient to burst forth into an explosion of seismic energy, but he gritted his teeth, resisting the urge to allow his spirit power to answer the enticing call of the Real World's lava pulse. It was so much more difficult, he mused darkly, holding back Sekizanha's hungry spirit when the living soul of the Real World's core belched and spat from deep within the crevasse. His sword's release had carved through the soulless ground, splitting it in two with the sheer force of its reiatsu, and now there was a veritable river of molten rock separating him and the masked apparition that had materialised on the mountain slope.

It had been close to here, on a scientific foray into the Real World with his late father Rikaya, that he had first heard Sekizanha's voice call out to him. His father had told him then that the mineral composition of the Real World was a mirror reflection of Nagesu's own reiryoku nature, with a thin and fractured crust concealing the furious magma fighting to bubble and spew over the landscape. Those elements lived within him too, Rikaya had told him gruffly, as they had surveyed the scenery together, watching the sun set over the mountains before returning to their training and hard work, Nagesu too would someday command the fiery elements that lurked beneath the surface of his calm, cautious composure. Sure enough, before he had reached his eighteenth birthday, he had achieved his first shikai release and, after long and gruelling training with Kyouki of the Shiba, had mastered the basics of his weapon's power to a level even the demanding Rikaya had been forced to acknowledge.

In sealed form, Sekizanha was, like Nagesu himself, unassuming and quiet, often mistaken for an asauchior a common training sword by recruits when lined up with the other weapons in the Third Division Captain's office. In release, however, there was no mistaking the golden lustre of the blade nor the gleaming obsidian guard which curved in tongues of volcanic rock towards a hilt it seemed determined to devour. Nagesu was known among his peers for his caution, his reason and his reserve, but Sekizanha was not a quiet weapon, and, with Keitarou's presence always at the back of his mind, he had worked tirelessly to master all aspects of his blade, at last nailing the elusive Bankai release that was the root of the earth blade's true power.

Rikaya's words echoed back to him now, one of the rare warm moments he and his father had shared, for Rikaya had been strict and demanding and Nagesu had never fully forgiven him for the decision that had killed his uncle and exiled his cousin Keitarou. Now, so many decades on, the ramifications of that decision were still heavy over the heads of the Urahara Clan and Nagesu knew that, for all his hard work and compromises had forged peaceable settlements with his neighbours, the matter of Keitarou was still unresolved.

Because of that, Endou Shouichi, Kuchiki Ribari and Endou Souja had died. And, standing here now, taking in the malformed figure, blooded, razor sharp claws protruding from delicate finger tips and glittering reptilian eyes that darted out from behind a swathe of sinister white chalk, he felt certain that this creature was the shadow of his cousin returning to haunt him once again.

Nagesu knew that Keitarou had turned souls to Hollows before. Although his cousin had left not a single trace of his scientific theory relating to these trials, reams of witness reports from the Eighth District refugee camps of thirty years before, coupled with testimony from those among the shinigami squads had left the head of the Urahara in no doubt. Whether Keitarou was deliberately trying to create Hollows, or simply searching for a test subject strong enough to manipulate his chemical reidoku formula, Nagesu neither knew nor cared. At the moment he had exited the Senkaimon and seen his Sixth Seated officer flung halfway across the grass in an explosion of blood, he knew that he had had enough.

Whatever his reasons, whatever his past grievances, Keitarou would be stopped. There would be no mercy, no negotiation, not this time. As Rikaya had done before him, Nagesu knew that the last of his emotional ties to his cousin had been sliced away.

He glanced at Sekizanha's blade, twisting it slightly in the sunlight to examine the gilted surface. The cero-like attack had not done any particular damage, though it had left a thin line of soot against the normally polished surface, and Nagesu was sure his weapon's proud spirit would protest heatedly about this indignity once the battle was over. There was no time to worry about such details now, however, for although his appearance had initially surprised the girl, her hesitation had not lasted for long and with a shriek of rage that sounded more animal than human she launched herself towards him, speeding over the break in the ground as though it were no more than the tiniest crack. Landing nimbly on the tip of her left foot on Nagesu's side of the bank, she used it as a springboard to dive towards him, extending her clawed hands once more. There was nothing but madness and hate reflected in her gaze as she drove the needle-sharp protrusions towards Nagesu's eyes and throat.

"Tsuchi no Tate!"

Nagesu flicked Sekizanha's blade at the ground, sending a mound of earth up to block her attack, yet she made no attempt to stop, hitting the eathern wall with force and determination strong enough to send a spider's web of cracks right through its dense structure. A second flare of crimson light exploded through the crumbling earthwork shield, and Nagesu found he was forced to leap backwards to avoid being singed by the intensity of its flare. It was indeed like a cero, he realised with some consternation, forcing his scientist's rationale to take precedence over his sword's hunger to attack. Like a cero, but not quite the same as a cero — the edges ragged and malformed, yet powerful enough to kill a lower level shinigami on impact.

His mind flitted briefly to the incapacitated Kamitani, momentarily thankful that it had been her claws, not a deadly flare of spiritual energy that had cast him to the ground. Now more sure than ever that this girl had something to do with his missing cousin, Nagesu readied himself for the next attack as she finally broke through the wall completely, those blood-specked claws coming at him once again. She let out a growl, her spiritual energy flaring around her body and momentarily foxing Nagesu's senses, for one instant she was coming at him from the front, the next she was behind him, and only a sixth battle sense drummed into him through years of Kyouki's unforgiving training regimes allowed him to duck out of her way. Her claws scraped against the fabric of his haori, staining the white with Kamitani's blood, but even as Nagesu swung Sekizanha in her direction she was once more gone, zipping in and out of a flash-step that looked like shunpo, but clearly was not. This was no shinigami, nor had it ever been. This was a monster, like the ones who had killed his kinsman in the Rukon twenty five years before, and at the recollection of this fact Nagesu's frown deepened.

There were always rumours that Keitarou was involved in that. I dismissed them due to lack of evidence, but perhaps I am about to be proven wrong.
"Why won't you just die?"

The girl re-materialised three or four feet away from him, and to Nagesu's surprise she was breathing hard, her gleaming eyes frustrated as she glowered at him through the eyes of the mask. She had used more energy than he had thought in breaking through his wall, he realised with a jolt, noting the chips and cracks at the edge of her mask, and, even more disturbingly, how her thick auburn hair was disintegrating at the ends, fragments blowing away from it like ash on the wind.

"You can't defeat me," he said frankly, not adjusting his hold on his weapon for a moment as he tried to gauge whether or not this was a trap. "I'm far beyond your level and I haven't really begun to release my sword, not yet. If you don't want me to carve you into pieces for your attack on my officer, you'd better tell me the things I want to know."

The girl's body tensed, indignation prickling through her entire form like a cornered cat determined to stand its ground. She hissed, claws flexing threateningly in his direction, but although the flow of reiryoku from her body was just as intense and noxious as it had been before, Nagesu's sharp senses now picked up on its instability. She was pushing herself beyond her means to fight with him, yet she showed no sign of giving up, and Nagesu knew she had been primed to fight till the end, even if it destroyed her.

He frowned, eyes narrowing behind his glasses as he put the pieces in place.

Kyouraku Shunsui's testimony about Ukitake Juushirou's fight style was much the same, when he was under the influence of Keitarou's sword. He fought as though he would destroy himself and keep fighting. True, Ukitake was never turned Hollow, but that was a long time ago. There is the matter of Seiren-dono's transformation, too — in which Guren-sama remains convinced Keitarou played a part. Though I have no evidence to connect this with the events that killed Shougo-dono and hurt Mareiko, it is becoming increasingly possible that such a link is there.

"Aizen Keitarou," he said aloud now, raising his sword and allowing the faintest amount of reiatsu to flow forth from his body into the surrounding ether, causing the ground to tremble and shake slightly beneath his feet. "Tell me what I want to know about him. You know, don't you? Where he is."

"I won't tell an Urahara anything!" The girl spat back, apparently preparing to make another assault despite the increasing instability of her spirit power, and Nagesu swung his sword around, pointing the tip of the blade against the grass.

"I can bring this whole mountain down on top of you," he said softly. "I can bury you under so many layers of stone and ash that you will never, ever see the light of day again. You will be crushed into nothing more than dust, unless you answer my question. Your body is already under strain. Your cells are breaking down, bit by bit, and there's no way that you can fight me any further. Tell me what I want to know about Keitarou... else the mountain falls and so do you."

"And kill your own men?" The girl's gaze flitted to the ledge where Yunosuke was still sitting protective guard over Kamitani, and Nagesu's lips thinned.

"They're soldiers. They're trained to give their lives for the sake of Soul Society," he said quietly. "Finding the answer to my question is more important."

He lowered Sekizanha slightly, allowing the blade's very tip to penetrate the topsoil, and as he did so, the ground lurched and shook again, the waves of seismic energy pooling out from where the Captain stood. Though Sekizanha was barely touching the land, the force of the suddenly jerking earth was enough to make the girl stumble, and rocks shook loose from the mountain slopes, clattering down towards them with an ominous rattle.

"Last chance," Nagesu murmured, his eyes darting briefly towards Yunosuke as he said an inward prayer that his Third Seat's shunpo and reactions were as good as he hoped they were. "Aizen Keitarou. I want to know what you know about him."

"Kill your men for me," the girl folded her arms across her chest, but further fragments of bone-like chalk began to break away from the mask around her eyes, and to Nagesu's dismay, he could see tears of blood forming against her white-dusted lashes. "Bring down the mountain, I don't care. This mountain is my friend. It won't hurt me. Kill your men and kill yourself too. I won't tell you about Keitarou. I won't give him to demons like you."

"So you do know who he is," Nagesu's heart sank, but he lowered Sekizanha's blade deeper into the soil, meeting her gaze with a grave one of his own. "Believe me, child, what I do now is a mercy, no more than that. I don't know what he did to you, or whether you understand the severity of your situation, but if he promised you salvation, he was lying. He'll kill you to satisfy his own ends — that's the way he works."

"Did to me?" The reptilian eyes widened, then a peal of muffled, sinister laughter echoed out from beneath the fangs of the girl's mask. "He didn't do anything to me. He's not a demon. He's not like you. You and the rest of your family... Urahara scum. People like you should be clawed into pulp and mashed into the ground, and that's what I'm going to do. If it kills me, so be it. I don't care. If you're dead too, then it's all worth it."

With that she launched herself at him again, zipping into the shunpo-like movement and re-emerging at his left side. Nagesu flung up his left hand instinctively, muttering the words for a basic kidou deflection, and the girl tumbled back onto the ground, struggling to pick herself up and renew her offensive. The earth shook again, a stronger tremor radiating out around the whole vicinity and Nagesu cast his sword a look of dismay, for this time he had not given the direct command.

*What are you doing? You'll destroy the whole valley!
It's not me, Nagesu. It's the valley itself.*

Sekizanha's voice snapped back, indignant and a little on edge.
The Real World's soul is different from Seireitei's. There I can control the earth in any number of ways, and pour fourth molten rock to support your cause. Here, though, the world has its own mind. We've woken it from its sleep, and its acting of its own accord. You mean?

An earthquake... perhaps more. That mountain is a volcano... and one over which I have no power. I've tried negotiating with it, but it doesn't seem to hear my voice.

Nagesu's gaze flitted once more to Yunosuke and Kamitani.

"Yunosuke!" he exclaimed, and the Third Seat glanced up, meeting his Captain's gaze with a questioning one of his own. There was no sense of apprehension in his expression, and Nagesu realised that he had mistaken the tremor for one of Sekizanha's trademark attacks, rather than the threat of an impending natural disaster.

"Yes, sir?"

"Can Kamitani be moved?"

"Yes, sir," Yunosuke looked startled. "He's stable, just knocked out. I stopped his bleeding. He's fine."

"Then prepare to open the Senkaimon!" Nagesu's expression became grim as he yanked Sekizanha from the earth, using the flat of his weapon to push away the desperate stretch of the girl's claws to reach his upper body. She was staggering now, her speed gone and at the contact she stumbled, unable to steady her balance as quickly as she had before. Nagesu, now aware of the impending threat beneath their feet knew he had no more time to spare in questioning her, nor holding her at bay, and he swung his weapon up through the edge of her mask, causing a network of hairline cracks to split through the white surface before it crumbled into dust, causing the girl to collapse unconscious to the ground at his feet.

Alive or dead, I'll take her back with me. We can restrain her properly if she turns violent, and maybe we can learn more. She's still breathing, but there's no time for me to do examinations here. Not if Sekizanha is right about the seismic activity.

He gave his sword a shake, sealing it and returning it to its sheath as he hurried to crouch at the side of the collapsed figure. Crumpled on the ground, the claws crumbled into powder beneath the red-spattered curl of her hands, she appeared fragile. She was clearly little more than a teenager, tears of blood drying on her cheeks and the ragged ends of her hair splayed out like a shock of flame across the ground. The earth shook again, however, a tremendous roar that sent a jagged crack zig-zagging from the valley beyond towards the foot of the mountain, and it was answered by an ominous rumble from the volcano itself, a slight curl of smoke beginning to twist and settle closer to the peak.

"Taichou! Look out!"

Yunosuke's shriek jerked him back to the matter at hand, just in time as a searing bolt of Byakurai cut through the thick, spirit-drenched atmosphere, causing him to hop back and grasp his weapon once more as he searched for the person who had fired it.

"It's not like you to let your guard down, Nagesu-nii."

The words were at his right ear, softly mocking, and as the Third Division Captain swung around, Sekizanha more than half pulled from its scabbard once again, he heard a chuckle of amusement. There was a whoosh of shunpo, and then Nagesu saw his attacker for the first time, his pale eyes widening with disbelief behind his glasses as he registered the rough tail of sandy brown hair and the mud-slurried eyes that could and did belong to only one individual. Those eyes had once looked up to him in adoration and admiration, but now, so many years on, they were filled only with derision, and Nagesu's body tensed as he struggled to place his cousin's tightly suppressed reiatsu in the Real World atmosphere.

Try as he might, he could not. Even though the man was standing before him, he could not pick up even the faintest flicker of his companion's presence. Despite himself his grasp on his zanpakutou loosened, as confusion and consternation momentarily distracted him from the urgency of the situation. Keitarou had snuck up on him entirely unawares — despite the fact Nagesu had achieved Bankai and honed his skills, he had still been taken off guard yet again by his enigmatic cousin.

Does this mean he's moved beyond my level of reiatsu awareness? Or has he lost so much spirit power since taking that reidoku that all he can manage now is a basic spell like Byakurai to make me pull back?

"You look surprised," Keitarou seemed amused, and at length, Nagesu found his voice.

"Kei-kun."

The word dropped from his lips, half stunned, half angry.

"As ever, your memory seems to be your best functioning faculty," Keitarou was at the side of the collapsed girl, lifting her up into his arms as the earth juddered violently once more beneath their feet. Fresh cracks seared through the ground, uprooting two trees that creaked and crashed down onto the cero-severed remains of their fellow. "I had credited you with more scientific common sense, though. Your sword is an earth type. Using that power in a place like this... are you really ready to kill yourself and your subordinates to track me down?"

“I’m willing to do whatever it takes if it means you don’t hurt any more people!” Nagesu exclaimed, Kidou glittering from the fingers of his left hand, but Keitarou chuckled, shaking his head.

“So uncharacteristically impetuous,” he chided gently. “You’ve become impulsive in the years since we last saw each other, Nagesu-nii. Well, this from the man whose sword has probably just sounded the death knell for whole settlements in these parts...” he shrugged nonchalantly. “If you don’t mind, I’ll take what’s mine and leave you to enjoy your natural disaster in private.”

“I’m not going to let you go anywhere! Not this time!”

“Why do you think I chose this place?” Keitarou grinned, hopping neatly aside to avoid a fresh split forming in the earth. “I knew that you would come and follow me. I knew your sense of responsibility and duty would drive you to investigate on your own behalf. I’ve seen your sword, Nagesu-nii. I know what it can do, and where it is most useless. Here, you can’t possibly fight me — not unless you want to destroy the whole of this area for miles around. You know it, and I know it. So I’ll take Aki, and I’ll go. And you can wonder and regret the fact that, yet again, I’ve proven too smart for Seireitei’s primitive scientific understanding.”

With that he was gone, as the entire section of grass between Nagesu and the scientist’s former position erupted and collapsed into a bubbling, seething lake of magma, and Nagesu dropped into shunpo, re-materialising on the slope of the mountain proper and gazing up at the darkening curl of smoke which had begun to spew forth from the peak. Slowly he drew his weapon, watching the surface shimmer from dull silver to bright gold. He dropped to his knees, checking briefly to see where his two subordinates were. To his relief, Yunosuke had obeyed his instruction to the letter. They were just about within earshot — but, judging by the wind direction, out of the direct line of fire should the volcano decide to unleash its worst, and there was a good chance of Yunosuke being able to open the gate and escape before any lava flow reached them.

Keitarou’s right, damn him. We have to try and stop this, Sekizanha. Somehow, we have to do something. Killing people in the Real World is not on our agenda. Even if you can’t talk to the mountain — I want you to use whatever strength you have and prevent things from getting worse. Block it as much as you can — absorb as much of the seismic energy as you can take. If it kills us, so be it. If Yunosuke can get Kamitani back safely, it won’t have been in vain. So long as there’s someone to report on Keitarou being here... that’s enough. Right now... that’s enough.

Sekizanha's spirit rippled sadly, but then Nagesu heard the sword speak, his response a single word, laced with resignation.

Understood.

"Yunosuke!" Nagesu exclaimed. "Listen and do as I tell you! I'm going to try and stop the earth exploding... but I don't know if I can. If it goes wrong, I want you to open the gate. I want you to take Kamitani back with you and see to him getting proper treatment. I want you to go to Third, report in full to my son everything that happened here — and, most of all, that Keitarou is here. He's here in the Real World — understand?"

"Taichou?" Yunosuke's expression became one of alarm, but he was already drawing his own sword, and, reassured, Nagesu turned his attention back to the task at hand, plunging the weapon deep into the earth at his feet. Closing his eyes, he drew on his strength, tightening his hold on Sekizanha's hilt as he pumped more and more of his own reiryoku deep within the core of the unhappy mountain.

Forgive me, Shiketsu. You said you didn't want this fight, but it might well end up being yours to take on.

The volcano rumbled ominously once more, the drifting smoke above its crater intensifying into heavy black clouds, and as the entire world seemed to shake and rattle around him, Nagesu was aware of the thickening ash dust filling his lungs, the falling fragments of pumice coming down more and more quickly around him.

"Yunosuke!" he managed, coughing and choking to make himself heard. "Go! Go now! Go before the gate is buried — go on!"

An explosion of red and black from the top of the volcano drowned out any hope of a response, but as the slick lava flow began to bubble and ooze forth, Nagesu felt the reassuring shift in spirit power that marked the opening and closing of the spirit gate. They had left safely, then. They would report to Shiketsu, and all would be well.

The lava was melting the snow that dusted the peak now, snaking its way slowly but ominously downwards. Another burst of ash and pumice, till Nagesu could barely drag any air into his lungs, but still he held on to the hilt of his sword.

Composing himself, he unleashed the final restraint on his spirit power, forcing himself to stay focused on the task at hand.
I'm sorry, Sekizanha. If I had been more decisive sooner...

Right now, all that's to be done is to do what we both swore to do, the moment you became Head of the Urahara.

Sekihanza's voice was quiet, yet in Nagesu's soul the roar of the volcano was suddenly drowned out by his sword's resolute, calming voice.

We're here to protect people. We're here to protect lives. You told me that, when we began to fight together, and so we will. Unleash the floodgates, let me do what I can.

Very well.

Nagesu said an inward prayer for help, his body tightening as its demands for air grew ever greater in the ash-thick atmosphere.

"Bankai," he murmured, through dry, grey-coated lips. "Kazan-ha."

Author's Note:

So this chapter introduced Aki. Friendly kid, isn't she? o.O. The other two from Keitarou's cave find will show up next chapter... but in Aki's memories are clues to some of the things going on in this story that, till now, have stayed fairly deep beneath the surface...

40. The Masked Militia

Chapter Thirty Nine: The Masked Militia

“You took your time.”

Keitarou dropped out of his flash-step into the forest clearing, some miles upwind from the erupting volcano, finding a bulky, broad-built individual barring his path. Tree-branch-like arms were folded impatiently across his barrel chest and an accusing gleam glittered menacingly in his indignant dark eyes. “And what did you do to Aki? She’s not as strong as we are. You said you’d help us — you’ll get her killed.”

“You seem to have regained your recollections quite nicely,” Keitarou ignored the threatening stance of his companion, neatly sidestepping around the blockade and laying Aki down carefully on the grass, using his hand to brush the messy red hair out of her face. It was peppered with specks of chalk-dust, and at the sign of blood on her cheeks, he sighed, slowly shaking his head.

“I didn’t think she’d go wandering off on her own like that,” he admitted. “I went to retrieve her from the cave shelter where I left her, and found she was gone. We encountered a bit of trouble — but she’s all right. Fortunately for her she met someone whose will to kill is not particularly decisive — he broke her mask and I don’t think she’s done herself any major damage. She’s not going to die from this, Haruya, so stop glaring at me as though I attacked her myself. I told you to listen to my instructions and she didn’t... maybe when she wakes up, you can impress on her how important it is that she does from now on.”

“It’s hard not to be angry, when the whole earth starts shaking fit to burst and then you show up with my sister covered in blood and debris.”

“Not my doing, I promise you, but I imagine that there won’t be an eruption of any particular magnitude,” Keitarou dismissed this with a casual flick of his hand. “Even if there is, though, it won’t come this way. I think it unlikely, though — that same well-meaning soul who doesn’t have the killing edge is probably blowing himself up right now doing everything he can to stop it, so I left him to it and came back. If it kills him, it’s one less person to have seen Aki and I — though in truth it does no harm if they do see us. Let them know that this place is not undefended — and let them believe that this is where I am.”

“Are you really going to help us?” Haruya eyed his companion suspiciously, the tension not leaving his muscled body. “You’ve made all kinds of promises, and maybe Aki believes you on your word, but I’m not so easy to persuade. She’s just a kid — she’s innocent, and easy to take in... if you’re just going to get her hurt to meet your own goals, we might be better off on our own.”

“Where is Moe?” Keitarou did not answer the question directly, turning to glance around for the missing member of the party, and Haruya grimaced, shrugging his shoulders.

“Up a tree,” he said disparagingly, jerking his head towards a nearby elm tree and Keitarou raised his gaze, seeing a huddled shape part-concealed by the thick foliage. He raised an eyebrow, and Haruya shrugged.

“He’s been up there since you left, pretty much,” he added. “Don’t ask me to tell you why. He was always a bit of a loose cannon. Kusakawa’s experiments broke what little sanity he ever had... you’re wasting your time if you expect him to give you a straight explanation for anything he does. Just be glad he’s sticking around — he’s unpredictable, and I couldn’t promise what he might do, if left unsupervised.”

“He’s not unsupervised, though,” Keitarou offered Haruya a grin, getting to his feet and brushing the chalk-dust from his hands. “I left him in your care, and you’ve not let me down. I’m grateful to you, Haruya. Kusakawa’s notes said that you were their leader... clearly Moe will listen to you, even if he won’t listen to me.”

“You should bear that in mind,” Haruya muttered. “He could kill you, too, if I told him to — so stop changing the subject and tell me what I want to know. Are you really going to help us, or are we just tools in your plan to right old wrongs?”

“We have some shared wrongs,” Keitarou ambled over towards the dying embers of a camp fire, rubbing his rheumatic leg with an involuntary wince. “I’m really not getting any younger or more agile, either. My spirit power is just fine, but I’m not as nimble as I once was and I have to accept my weaknesses. You aren’t tools to me, Haruya, but allies. Powerful, potential allies whose abilities I need in order to achieve my goals. I won’t lie to you about that — I want your cooperation, but I don’t consider you pawns in my master plan.”

“Then what?” Haruya lowered his substantial frame down beside Aki’s still form, stroking her hair absently as he fixed Keitarou with a

quizzical look. “What exactly do you want from us, then? You set us free from that cave, you know all about Kusakawa and what he did to us — but how do we know that you can really do all the things you say you can? More, how do we know you’re not an ally of Kusakawa and his son? I came with you, because Aki was missing and you were the only one who knew where she might be — but now she’s here, what’s to stop me from taking her and fleeing into the wilderness?”

“Nothing, if you want to see your sister die,” Keitarou said matter-of-factly, and Haruya’s eyes widened, dismay glittering in his dark gaze. Keitarou laughed, holding up his hands in mock-surrender.

“Oh, no, Haruya-kun, I’m hurt. I already told you, I don’t mean you any harm. And right now, your sister’s life is not in danger. But Kusakawa’s experiments did permanent damage to her cell structure — hers, yours and Moe-kun’s up there, too. I’ve read the files, and I understand the processes used to mutate you into the creatures you’ve become — but I also know that there are serious drawbacks to the system that he used. I am a scientist, but I am no ally of Kusakawa. In fact, the man who first took you for his test subjects died at my hand, some several decades ago. His son is also dead — and I came by the secret of your existence through an unexpected source. I’ve studied spirit power and reiryoku enhancement myself for many years, and I’ve observed at least one other example of what you are. Kusakawa called you Kamen no Gunzei, and that name intrigues me. It sounds as though there were once more than three of you — but I could find no records of survivors other than you.”

“I don’t know. We were never let out of the cave, because we were special,” Haruya said bleakly. “Kusakawa the father, then Kusakawa the son, treating us as objects and nothing more. Our lives were forfeit to his cause, he’d tell us, because the Urahara had deemed it so. We were his property, and he would use us as he saw fit. It hurt Aki, it broke Moe, and it made me determined to get my revenge. But I don’t know about any army. There may have been more, but there may not. I only ever knew of Aki and Moe. I don’t know what Kusakawa wanted us for, but he kept us separate and that’s all I know.”

“That’s what I suspected,” Keitarou pursed his lips. ‘You were the elite, and any others would have been the fodder. You all three have Clan genetics, don’t you? Ah, yes,’ as Haruya flinched, “that’s what I thought. You and Aki, both illegitimate children of the same philandering Lord. And Moe..?”

“Mm,” Haruya raised his gaze upwards, then, “Locked in a cell in the basement of one of the Southern Clan manors. The idiot son of a Third Degree Lord. He's not illegitimate, not like Aki and I. He's a pureblooded son, but his mother died birthing him and he was born too soon. His brain was damaged, and his father rejected him. He had spirit power, but they couldn't tame him... so they caged him like an animal and pretended he was dead. But this isn't answering my main question — so don't think I've forgotten that I asked."

"You're intelligent," Keitarou observed wryly, "I like that. You should ask questions. It's a good sign, especially given your genetic heritage. But fine. Why should you ally with me? Aside from the fact I released you?"

"We didn't ask you to, therefore we owe you no debt," Haruya said gruffly, and Keitarou nodded.

"I can fix Aki's cell structure," he said softly, sliding his hand into his obi and pulling out a rolled up scroll, laying it down on the floor and unrolling it carefully, making sure it did not go anywhere near the fire which Haruya had half-heartedly begun stoking since the beginning of their conversation. "Hers, and yours, and Moe-kun's too. I found Kusakawa's notes, and I can see where he went wrong. He was a good scientist, but not a great one, and his son took shortcuts which made your weaknesses even worse. As it stands, now the seal over you three has been broken, you are probably running on borrowed time. Like this, in rest, the damage isn't so obvious, but releasing your power causes a tremendous strain on cells that just can't cope. Your body can't produce new cells quickly enough to replace the old ones, and as a result, your bodies are breaking down. I can't really detect it from you now, but I suspect that the moment I broke your seal, that process began again. Slowly, its true, but enough to cause tangible long-term damage. In a fight, unleashing the mask could cost you dear — as Aki-chan proved earlier on."

He patted her lightly on the shoulder.

"But I can fix it," he said at length. "I've looked it over, and I'm sure that I can. I can certainly stabilise your current forms... and I very much hope that I can do the same for you when your power is released. This is power you didn't ask to have, power Kusakawa mutated and damaged so that instead of developing into shinigami and entering legitimate training, you became monsters whose souls are stuck between shinigami and Hollow. Well, I don't very much like shinigami, and I believe there's purpose for a Hollow that can retain conscious control over their actions."

"You say you've seen people like us before?" Slowly Haruya picked up the scroll, glancing at it and eying Keitarou doubtfully.

“Not as developed as you, admittedly,” Keitarou responded. “The one example who came the closest was created from a natural birth deformity — his spirit power, like yours, was twisted away from the so-called natural line — the one the shinigami believe in — and over towards that of a Hollow. Knowing that such a thing could happen naturally sparked my interest, and in the years since I’ve done a lot of theorising. Unfortunately I have not met any more examples, but I have investigated the potential of Hollows a lot more since I came to live in Rukongai. My knowledge, therefore, is wider than either Kusakawa or his son could possibly have imagined.”

He sat back, shrugging his shoulders.

“I will leave it up to you,” he concluded. “I can’t force you, nor will I lie to you. Fighting shinigami is dangerous. Aki met a powerful opponent tonight, and it was fortunate for her that he so dislikes shedding blood. There will be risk involved. However, without my help, you three are walking dead. Walking time bombs, simply waiting for nature to take its course and consume you completely. You have some conscious control in Hollow form now, but that control will doubtless waver as you become weaker. I can change all that — if you’re willing to take risks for me, too.”

Haruya glanced at the sheet of paper once more, then he sighed, holding out his hand reluctantly to his companion.

“I don’t think we really have much choice,” he admitted. “At least you negotiate your terms, you don’t force them down our throats like that cursed Urahara demon did. I’d like a chance to settle some scores with that Clan, even if I care nothing for the other shinigami. I suppose if shinigami are their allies, that makes them enemies. And if you can help us — and prove it, by making us stronger... then I guess we’ll fight for you in return.”

“Thank you, Haruya-kun,” Keitarou took the proffered fist, shaking it firmly. “That is precisely what I hoped you’d say. It won’t be long, I’m sure, before bigger parties come to the Real World in search of me. I’ll be counting on you three to hold the line here, and I’ll do whatever is in my capacity to increase your advantage in battle. You can kill any shinigami you like, and treat them as you see fit. All I ask is that you keep them occupied, and distracted from Rukongai whilst I finalise my plans. I have one more errand in Seireitei which it now becomes pressing for me to complete, and then I’ll begin work on helping you three, providing you do what you can to help me. Is it understood?”

“I guess it’s a deal,” a grim smile touched Haruya’s lips, and he nodded. “Make us the kind of warriors you need, and we’ll kill for you. Just tell us when and we’ll be there.”

The mood around the Second Division had changed.

Masaya set aside his book, leaning up against the cool stone wall of his cell as he contemplated the activity that had gone on around him in the last couple of days. Kai had not been to see him since the time he had brought the Kotetsu boy, and no matter how he considered it, Masaya knew that this was not because the Onmitsukidou leader had lost interest in his case. Rather, he suspected Kai had found another line of enquiry — but try as he might, Masaya had not managed to overhear anything specific about his opponent’s intentions.

His gaze flitted to the cell bars, sizing them up pensively. He could escape from here whenever he felt like it, using his special skills to morph his body through the gap between the wood and then disappearing into the shadows. He could have left the first night he had been brought here, but he had chosen to remain, hoping that he might pick up something of use to take back with him to Keitarou. Tenichi’s appearance had amused him, for the shinigami was clearly too intimidated by Masaya’s threats and Keitarou’s influence to betray anyone, and even when they had been face to face, Tenichi had claimed they were strangers.

He’s an idiot, but I don’t need to trouble myself with him. He won’t talk. He’s not strong enough inside to put his life on the line to betray Keitarou-sama, and so I can probably let him alone now. Keitarou-sama said that he was an ally, and perhaps cowardice is a way of forming an alliance — anyway, I won’t waste time and energy worrying about him. He’s not a threat, and that’s more important.

His gaze flitted to the book which had been provided for him as standard along with food and bedding of a basic nature since he had been taken captive.

Funny how the Onmitsukidou have become so courteous. Kai-dono clearly feels he can coax something out of me if he treats me gently.

His gold eyes flickered slightly as he remembered their previous conversation.

He asked about Kohaku. Interesting that he should. They’re dabbling in things they don’t understand... but it doesn’t trouble me if they encounter Kohaku or are killed by him. Very few have seen Kohaku face to face and known the monster for what it is... but I’m one of those few. Knowledge is power... in a case like this, perhaps ignorance is death. Oh well. Onmitsukidou deal in death — a few losses of their own won’t be too grievous.

“As far as I know, they’re still there,”

The voice of one of his current guards drifted through his thoughts and he turned towards the sound, moving nimbly across the cage as far as his chains would allow him to listen more closely to the conversation. “Kai-dono said that there was enough evidence in the Rukon to indicate the mark travelled to the Real World — Saku-dono said we should be prepared in case the follow-up arrest team comes from us.”

“Nagesu-sama went on his own?” The second man seemed doubtful. “That doesn’t seem sensible. If they really think the Aizen guy is there, wouldn’t you expect them to at least take some of us, if not an army of your own?”

“Beats me, I’m just telling you what I’ve heard,” the first man let out a sigh, and, pressing his face against the bars, Masaya could just make out the tall, slender form of the speaker around the corner of the narrow corridor that led down to his cell. “We need to be ready if we’re called out. Nagesu-sama’s pretty tough, anyhow. They say he has bankai — he can probably look after himself.”

Nagesu-sama. Urahara Nagesu? Interesting information... Keitarou-sama will want to know about that.

Masaya’s eyes became contemplative slits.

Kai-dono, the quality of your men has fallen. In my time, nobody would ever talk so freely within earshot of prisoners. Unless it’s a trap...?

He considered this, eying the body language of the two men for a moment, then discarded it.

No. I sense no tension, no unnecessary excitement in their words. They are careless, not conniving... perhaps they’ve forgotten who Kai-dono believes I am... or maybe they don’t know. Either one is fine. I can take advantage... so let them talk.

He frowned, a sudden image of Minami’s face flitting across his thoughts, and he shook his head, trying to dislodge it from his focus.

Remembering things about the past is a bad thing. Keitarou-sama told me that — confusing thoughts and conflicting ideas can compete for my attention and distract me from what’s really important. The girl is no longer relevant and I shouldn’t think about her now. I’m here to gather data for Keitarou-sama — nothing could be greater than that.

“I don’t understand why we’ve been so sidelined this far, anyway,” one of the men was grumbling now, bending to pick lint from his white tabias he spoke. “I know Kai-dono went to Rukongai, but he wasn’t in command of his party, and the Third are taking over in all kinds of ways now. So what if the exile is an Urahara? There are certain jobs we ought to be fielded for from the start and that’s all. Why else are we here like this, if not to take on the bulk of this kind of work?”

“Nagesu-sama has pull,” the other man responded dryly. “He’s head of the Council this year — you must know that. Means he and Third can do pretty much as they please, and are. I guess he has personal grievances to settle in all of this too. All we can do is sit back and wait to be dispatched.”

“You don’t think it’s because of that heathen locked up down here?” Masaya’s lips twitched into a smirk of amusement as he realised that he was now the subject of their conversation. “There are rumours he was once part of this operation... I’ve only been here five years, so I wouldn’t know anything about it, but, well, there are rumours. Rumours about him and that guy... the one kept in Deep Cell Nine... Kounou?”

Masaya’s eyes widened as the familiar name jerked roughly across his unprepared senses.

Kounou still lives? He’s here in captivity, but he’s alive?

A flash of uncharacteristic rage flushed through his body, Keitarou’s interests momentarily forgotten as years of old grievances and old bitterness overwhelmed him. Kounou, the man who had shamed his name, parted him from his family, slaughtered his allies and his mother... and then, when he had appealed to the main house for help, had hunted him down over the hills of District Two, shooting him full of venom designed to rot his body from the insides out. Kounou who had chosen him as a scapegoat, and who still lived, somewhere in the Onmitsukidou’s complex.

Masaya’s hands clenched tightly into balled fists, his ragged nails digging deep into the flesh of his palms without him registering even a flicker of pain. He darted towards the bars of the cage, half-inclined to smash them open in his fury, but then a familiar voice penetrated his memories, the words calm and reasoned as they acted like a balm to his distress.

If you are going to be of use to me, you need to swallow that hatred and put your focus into the bigger picture. You still have life... and destroying one man is less than destroying the whole society who supported that man and allowed him to wound you so deeply. Let me help you... let me take it all away.

Masaya closed his eyes, forcing his breathing to return to a more regulated rate. It was not like him, he berated himself, to become so easily distracted. Perhaps it was being here, in the heart of the realm he had once helped to police... or maybe it was the sleeping recollections of his hatred for Kounou and the grief the man had caused him ten years before. Still, that was then, this was now. Keitarou had helped him... had refocused him... even Masaya didn't know quite how, but he had relished the ability to shut out the pain and bitterness and focus simply on the task ahead. He did not need or want emotional ties and Keitarou had helped him suppress them. Now it was his duty to put Keitarou's needs first, and that meant paying attention to the shinigami's conversation, not worrying over ancient betrayal.

"...something to do with the whelp who brought back Souja-dono," one of them was saying now. "I don't know what his deal is, or why the Thirteenth are being so protective over him, but according to Saku-dono, they've forbidden anyone entry to see him without formal clearance."

"Probably that Ukitake-taichou has decided to adopt him into his family of strays," the second man snorted in amusement. "You know what folk say about Thirteenth's recruitment policy — the more pitiful and desperate the more likely they are to get in. True, there are some good fighters in the Thirteenth's ranks, but some of their recruits... seriously. And the scrawny guy who brought the prisoner here...? Looked like you could knock him down with a feather. That is, if he didn't get spooked and flee by one jumping up behind him."

"Well, Thirteenth is District. Ukitake-taichou kinda has to take in anyone and everyone, whereas other divisions can choose," the first man said dismissively. "In any case, Saku-dono said they've not managed to establish much detail on this Koku kid and what his involvement is in this business. He came through some kind of Senkaimon with Souja-dono and that's all that's official."

"A District kid isn't much of a challenge after they've hit the Academy, so one from the wilds of Seireitei probably isn't much to worry about from our perspective," the second man ruminated. "Still, he should be here, so Kai-dono can quiz him, rather than being mollycoddled by the Thirteenth and their strange philosophies to life." Did he just say Koku?

Masaya's golden eyes hardened, his lids twitching closer together as he digested this information.

A boy called Koku came through a Senkaimon with Souja-dono? Soujadono, the murdered Vice Captain from the Endou Division? The young lad that Sakaki-sama apparently killed in one of her fits of pique? Well. That does make things interesting. No... it makes everything different. Staying here is no longer an option. Tenichi might not be a problem, but clearly there's another potential leak I should've seen coming from the start. How far does that wretch think Keitarou-sama's protection will cover him? A traitor is a traitor, and that changes the rules completely. I'm not obliged to pander to traitors.

He flexed his hands, watching the fingers elongate and stretch out of their normal shape, his wrists narrowing like stretched elastic as the cuffs fell with a clatter onto the floor of his cell. There was a yell from one of the guards at the unexpected sound, followed by the appearance of one stocky man and another taller and leaner figure, looks of suspicion and annoyance on their faces as they converged on the small holding pen.

"What are you playing at? You're meant to keep quiet in there, else we've orders to hurt you!" One of them exclaimed, brandishing what looked like a short dagger in his direction, but Masaya merely returned his limbs to their normal formation, rubbing his wrists absently and fixing the duo with a benign smile.

"I'm sure Kai-dono hasn't ordered me to be killed just yet," he said lightly, getting properly to his feet and moving towards the bars, resting his pale fingers against the thin strips of reinforced wood. "I'm certain that's something he'd like to do himself... given that he's convinced himself the two of us have a history."

"Get away from the bars!" The nearest guard struck the wood of the cage, clearly trying to intimidate Masaya back into the corner where he had sat reading so quietly and unobtrusively for the majority of his captivity so far, and Masaya took a step back, holding up his hands in a mocking gesture of surrender.

"I'm sorry. It's just your conversation was so interesting," he purred, a sinister glitter in his golden eyes. "I wanted to hear every single syllable for myself."

"You were eavesdropping on us?" The second guard was furious, and Masaya let out an amused chuckle.

"In my day, Onmitsukidou didn't speak to each other much when on duty, and certainly not at all in front of prisoners," he said quietly. "I suppose standards have dropped since my time... either that or, with everything else going on, sentry duty has been entrusted to the dregs of the force. Sadly I won't be able to thank Kai-dono for his charmingly nostalgic hospitality... but I'm most grateful to both of you for telling me everything I needed to know.”

He lowered his hands, turning his palms to face his companions as an ominous purplish light beginning to ooze out from the tips of his fingers, spreading and drawing together into spectral petals that drifted spookily down like cascading flakes of tainted snow.

“Now, however, I’m going to take my leave,” he murmured, as the eerie aura began to spread out across the whole of the cell complex, taking the two men completely off guard. “Hakufuku.”

Kamitani’s wound had begun to bleed again.

As he bundled his subordinate officer into the gaping hole of the Senkaimon, Yunosuke sent an apprehensive glance down at the makeshift tourniquet, taking in the spreading stain with genuine consternation. True, the blood was not flowing like it had done before, but it was seeping through the fabric nonetheless, and it was all he could do to bear his comrade’s weight as he navigated the uneven trackways through the Dangai back to Soul Society. His Captain’s orders still echoed in his mind, those desperate commands unlike any Nagesu had ever given before. Yunosuke had not liked it, but he had known better than to disobey his leader when the man sounded like that. He did know whether Nagesu’s powerful earth sword could make any difference to the juddering mountain terrain nor the slick sweep of angry lava that was winding its way slowly down from the peak, nor did he know whether Keitarou would be waiting and watching for an opportunity to strike his cousin at a moment of weakness. Nagesu had ordered him back to Third, and Yunosuke had accepted the command.

Jun’s life rests with me, and, more importantly, so does our proof. Our witness testimony that Keitarou was in the Rukon — only Taichou and I can confirm that, and one of us has to get back safely. Taichou’s sword is the only one that might be able to make a difference to the mountain, so Jun and the report rest with me. Fukutaichou will be angry that I left Taichou without complaint — but this is a military decision and I can’t look back. Much as it would be an honour to die at my Clan leader’s side, defending innocent life... this is more important.

He glanced down at his limp burden once more, relieved at least that his companion’s complexion was not greying out. Despite the bleeding, Kamitani seemed more or less stable and, though he had not regained consciousness, Yunosuke was fairly certain his younger kinsman would survive to fight another day.

Providing I get him to a healer quickly, he should be fine.

Shifting the heavy form of the injured man in his grip once more so that he could raise his zanpakutō to a more horizontal angle, he swept the sharp blade through the blackness, watching with a measure of relief and regret as the air parted, revealing colour and light on the other side. A few more paces and he would be back in the Third Division's barracks, surrounded by his subordinate officers and able to seek proper help to patch up his friend. As he stepped out onto the cobbles of the Third Division's courtyard, he was aware of footsteps hurrying to greet him, and as the black hole closed up behind him, he rested his body against the side pillar of the Gate's metal frame, reassured by its firm stability. Carefully he lowered Kamitani's body to the ground, being careful not to jar the injury any more than was necessary, and as he did so, he realised that his own body was still trembling from the intensity of what had happened in the Real World.

"Yunosuke-san!" That was the Third's fourth seat, horror in his pale eyes as he surveyed the blooded form on the ground, then, "What happened? Where's the Captain? What's wrong with Kamitani?"

"He took an injury but he'll be all right. Go send for help from Fourth — they'll patch him up good enough," Yunosuke knew that he had to take control, no matter how unsteady he was feeling now he was back on safe soil. 'Gai,' he rose his voice to address the Fifth seat who, two junior officers in tow had just stepped out into the courtyard, "come bring those men and take Jun inside so he can rest more comfortably. It's a nasty gash and it'll bleed less if he's somewhere secure — it's not life threatening, so don't stare at him like that. Do it quickly — I need to go speak to Fukutaichou."

"He's in his office," The fourth seated officer cast Yunosuke a troubled look, as Gai and his companions hastened across to obey the order. "Shouldn't we seal the gate first? Is Taichou coming after you?"

"Right now, leave it be," Yunosuke ignored the question, getting to his feet and wiping the blood from his hands on his dirty hakama. "There isn't time — first things first. Do as I've instructed, and do it quickly — I'll see to the gate myself when I've spoken to Shiketsu-sama."

"Yes, sir," The officer saluted, hurrying off to obey, and as Gai and the other officers gathered around Kamitani's unconscious body, Yunosuke gathered his wits, glancing at his hands as he tried consciously to stop them from shaking. The blood still flecking against his fingernails would alarm the Vice Captain enough, he knew, without him seeing how much what had happened had shaken his normally unflappable Third Seat, and so though his mind was racing, Yunosuke drew on all his reserves of self-control, taking one deep breath into anxious lungs before marching purposefully towards the central hall of the barracks and the passageway that led to Shiketsu's office.

He rapped on the door smartly, waiting for his superior officer to call him in, and after what seemed like an aeon of a pause, Shiketsu did so, allowing the Third Seat into the spacious, well-appointed chamber that was the domain of the Third Division's second officer. Shiketsu was younger than Yunosuke, and had served with the Third Division for less time, but Yunosuke understood the hierarchy of Clan better than any other Urahara and had accepted his position with equanimity. Though Shiketsu was his cousin, there was a gulf of birthright that lay between them, and Yunosuke had always been content with this way of things, choosing not to consider the potential of higher rank in the subsidiary Twelfth to stay close to his Clan' Leader's side. Of all people in Third Division, therefore, he knew best the strong familial bond shared by Nagesu and his eldest son, and his heart quailed slightly at the thought of the report he needed to give.

But this was his job, this was his duty, and he would do it to the best of his ability, just as Nagesu would have wanted.

"Yunosuke?" As the Third Seat stepped over the threshold, Shiketsu was on his feet, surprise turning to consternation as he registered the state of his subordinate. "Yunosuke, what's happened? Why are you messed up like that — why did nobody tell me the Gate was being reopened for your return? What's happened in the Real World — what have you come to report to me?"

"We saw Aizen Keitarou, Fukutaichou," Yunosuke's words shook slightly, but somehow he managed to keep his composure, meeting his anxious Vice Captain's gaze with a sombre one of his own. "There was also a girl who fought for him — so we think. She had Hollow powers of some nature, but it was imperfect and she was no match for the Captain's ability. She hurt Jun, however, and that's why you see me in the state I am. I've given orders for Fourth to be sent for — but the injury isn't life-threatening, so far as my limited knowledge of such things goes. I believe he will make a full recovery."

"I see," Shiketsu bit his lip, mulling this over in his mind, then, "A girl with Hollow powers? What kind of Hollow powers? Elaborate more clearly, because I'm not sure I understand. This was a Plus Soul turning to Hollow, or something else?"

"Undoubtedly something else, sir," Yunosuke said grimly. "She was able to use Cero and she manifested a mask, but her body didn't undergo a full scale transformation. She had reiatsu, and she did not show any sign of a soul chain at her chest. I don't think she was native to the place we found her... rather, I think she was some kind of barrier guard sent to keep us away."

"In case we breached Keitarou's kidou-barred Gate and penetrated the Real World near his hideout?" Shiketsu asked, and Yunosuke nodded.

"Yes, sir. That's what I believe... what the Taichou also likely believes."

"Likely believes?" Shiketsu's eyes widened, as he latched on to his companion's turn of phrase. "What do you mean, likely believes? Have you not discussed it?"

"I haven't had an opportunity to do so, sir, not yet," Yunosuke hesitated for a moment, then sighed, closing his eyes briefly as he prepared himself for what he was about to divulge. "The truth is that the Captain didn't come back with me from the Real World. I came back with Jun, but only the two of us have returned."

"Father... didn't come back?" Shiketsu's expression became one of genuine alarm. "Why would he not do that? You said Keitarou was there... do you mean to say he went after that man... alone?"

"No, sir. Not exactly." Briefly Yunosuke outlined what had occurred, trying to ignore the growing sense of panic rising in Shiketsu's aura. "It was a direct order, and I couldn't disobey it. We were the only ones who saw Keitarou — I would rather have stayed and fought to help him, but I would've failed in my duty to report to you, and therefore betrayed his faith in me."

"You just left him there?"

Shiketsu grabbed Yunosuke by the shoulders, giving him a shake as fear and panic flooded through his system. "Why did you leave him there? Even if it was an order... why..? Why didn't he come back with you? If Keitarou had fled, and the scene was no longer viable, why not just come through the Gate with you and with Kamitani?"

"Taichou didn't believe in letting innocent people die," Yunosuke said grimly, "even if those people were Real World people. I didn't like it either, but he wanted me to save Jun and to come back and report to you about Keitarou. He didn't know whether he could push back the mountain's explosions, and he wanted to make sure someone knew what we'd seen in Seireitei. With things like that, I couldn't not go. I'm sorry, Shiketsu-sama. An order is an order, and one given like that has to be obeyed.”

“But to just abandon your Captain like that?”

“I was coming back to get help,” Yunosuke admitted. “I couldn’t do anything with Jun unconscious, and I understood his instructions, but he didn’t say anything about not reopening the gate nor going back to get him. The gate’s still active, I haven’t disconnected it yet. I’m not powerful enough to fight against Keitarou, nor against a volcanic eruption, but I’m willing to try, if it’s to help the Captain. I thought, once I’d discharged my duty, then maybe...”

“We’re going,” Shiketsu broke across his words, grabbing his sword from the shelf of the Vice Captain’s office and ramming it through his obias he half ran for the door. “You come with me. Jun will be fine, now, but I need to know where Father was and what happened. Did Jun see Keitarou, by the way?”

“No. He was knocked out,” Yunosuke shook his head, hastening to follow his superior officer out of the doorway and back along the hall towards the courtyard. “I stabilised him, but that’s about as much as I could manage. The girl-hollow’s reiatsu was strange and it shook me up pretty badly. I guess it affected him, too, though I think he hit his head when he fell. Taichou held his own against her, and she seemed overwhelmed, but then Keitarou appeared, and the volcano was about to erupt...”

He shrugged.

“I don’t know exactly what happened, just that Taichou’s still there, and we don’t know whether Keitarou is with him.”

“We don’t have time to waste on more detailed reports right now,” Shiketsu admitted. “We can do that when Father’s back and safe. It’s a risk, if only you and I know the things you saw there — but it’s a risk I’ll take if Father’s life is on the line. I’m not willing to sacrifice him in the name of hunting Keitarou — so you can follow my orders now, Yunosuke. We’re going to get Father back — understand?”

“With pleasure,” Yunosuke saluted grimly. “If not for Jun, I might have disobeyed him and risked trying to drag him back through the gate with us, even if it meant facing a disciplinary later. I’m with you all the way, Fukutaichou. Lead the way.”

“Then we’re going into the Gate,” Shiketsu said purposefully. “Father is strong, we both know that. I believe he can fight against almost anything, but even so, he might need help. If Keitarou is there... he could do anything, and I don’t like that thought. I don’t want to fight Keitarou either, but I also don't want to inherit the Urahara Clan just yet."

"Fukutaichou! Yunosuke-dono!" before Yunosuke could respond, the Fourth seated officer hurried to greet them with a breathless exclamation, saluting hastily before glancing up at the Vice Captain that stood a half head above him in height. "Fukutaichou, the Senkaimon is still unsealed! We picked up a signal — there's something activating it on the other side!"

"Something? Do you have a reading on who or what?" Shiketsu sounded harried, and the officer shook his head apologetically.

"There's no reading we can detect, sir," he said regretfully. "We're trying again now, but it's not clear. Whoever's activating the gate, we can't detect their reiatsu at all."

"Keitarou?" Yunosuke's eyes widened. "Taichou's said he can open the gate without anyone detecting him — and he was right there, watching us. What if he didn't flee? What... what if this..."

"Stop it," Shiketsu snapped, his usual cool lost in the heat of the moment. "It's not like you to panic and dwell on probabilities. I need your head clear, and I need you focused. You can draw your sword, can't you?"

"Yes, sir, but..."

"Then draw it and keep your thoughts in your head, where they belong." Shiketsu said grimly, his hand moving towards the sheathed weapon that hung at his side. "Whatever comes through that gate, we're going to be ready for it, and we'll take it off guard. If it's Keitarou, all the more so. We'll have his head rolling around the floor before he's managed to set two feet inside the compound."

Yunosuke's gaze flitted to his companion, but he made no comment, obediently grasping the curved hilt of his sword and drawing it forth from its scabbard. There was a moment's pause, then the Fourth seat reluctantly followed suit, clearly on edge as he hopped from foot to foot to try and dispel nervous energy. There was a moment of absolute stillness, then the air between the pillars of the gate began to seam and split, parting into an ebony gape, the edges of which clung lovingly to the metal frame. From within the depths of the tunnel beyond something moved, then, as Shiketsu moved purposefully forward to sweep in a decisive attack, a dusty, ash-coated figure stumbled forth onto the cobbles, coughing and hacking as he fell to his knees among them.

“Taichou!” It was Yunosuke who found his voice first, dropping his sword with a clatter and ignoring the zanpakutou’s indignant protests against his senses as he hurried forward to help the older man. Shiketsu let out an exclamation, managing somehow to sheath his sword before following Yunosuke’s example, bellowing to the Fourth Seat to go prepare the Captain’s quarters and to send further word to the Fourth Division as he did so. Nagesu did not speak for a moment, hunched onto all fours and hanging his head. To begin with he could only rasp gulps of clean air into volcano-ravaged lungs, but little by little he seemed to realise that he had company, and with as much strength as he could muster he raised his gaze, meeting first his son’s, then Yunosuke’s. He was no longer wearing his glasses, Yunosuke realised, his usually pale complexion white as chalk thanks to the pumice and ash thrown out by the angry mountain, yet there was a tiny gleam of relief in his unfocused eyes that gave the Third Seated officer reassurance.

“Otousama,” As another bout of coughing wracked through Nagesu’s lean frame, Shiketsu moved to support him, coaxing him into a more upright sitting position. “Yunosuke reported to me everything that happened. I’ve sent for medics to see to Kamitani, and for you too, now you’re back here. Please don’t worry — everything will be fine.”

“I’m... all right. No need... for fuss,” with a Herculean effort, Nagesu pulled himself to his feet, using his son and the metal frame of the gate to get upright and reaching up dusty hands to wipe an equally dusty face. “Just... tired. Used... a lot of power... stopping... volcano. Just... need to wash... and rest. Will be... fine.”

“We were coming to get you,” Yunosuke admitted, and Nagesu shot his companion a startled look.

“But I said...”

“You told me to come back here and bring Jun. I did, and I reported everything to Shiketsu-sama,” Yunosuke told him sheepishly. “Only we didn’t like the idea of abandoning our Captain, so...”

“Foolish... sentiment,” Nagesu’s words were reproachful, but Yunosuke could hear the warmth in the hoarse tones, and he grinned, the tension of the situation suddenly lifted.

“Yunosuke, seal the gate,” Shiketsu cast the Third Seat a glance. “We don’t want anyone else coming through. This time it was Father, so leaving the Gate unfastened was a good decision, but we’re a whole division again now. There’s no use tempting fate.”

“Yes, sir,” Yunosuke saluted, reaching to grab his discarded zanpakutou from the cobbles. “Then, if you don’t mind, I’d like leave to go change and then check on Jun’s condition.”

“Granted,” Shiketsu nodded. “Father, let me help you to your quarters at least. You look all in, and if healers are coming to see Kamitani, it wouldn’t hurt for them to see you too, surely?”

“Just... need to rest,” Nagesu shook his head. “Too many... things... to bother... Fourth about. I’ll be... fine, Shiketsu. Don’t... fuss. A Captain... doesn’t fuss... over duties like... this.”

“I’m not a Captain, not yet,” Shiketsu said quietly. “I don’t want to be one, nor do I feel ready for that responsibility. Please don’t push me away, Father. It might be unprofessional, even un-military, but I want to do my bit as a good son, so please don’t stop me. Yunosuke can take care of the Gate and things here... you haven’t slept since Rukongai and I know Mother would want you to humour me.”

“You... won’t say a word... of this... to your mother.” Yunosuke saw genuine consternation in Nagesu’s bleary gaze, and he chuckled despite himself.

“It’s all right, Taichou. Shiketsu-sama is right. I can manage here,” was all he said, however. “I’ll seal the Gate, and then...”

“Fukutaichou! Fukutai...”

One of the Third Division recruits skidded into the courtyard, stopping dead at the sight of the ash-dust monster that was his Captain. His jaw dropped open into an O of surprise, his eyes bugging out of their sockets as he tried to work out exactly what could have occurred to make the usually neat and tidy Nagesu look such a state, but as he caught Shiketsu’s eye he seemed to realise that staring was not polite, for he blushed, lowering his gaze and bowing hurriedly towards his senior officers.

“Taichou, Fukutaichou, I’m sorry to interrupt,” he began nervously, “but there are people here from the Second Division. They’re saying that a prisoner’s escaped their cells and they want authority to search. Gai-san is trying to hold them back, but their orders come from Kai-dono and Midori-sama, and so... he sent me to speak to you.”

“An escapee? From Second Division?” The momentary levity dispersed in an instant as Shiketsu’s fine brows drew together into an expression of concern. “They want to search the Third Division? Do they have evidence to suggest this individual came here, or is this just another whim from the Onmitsukidou to take over as much of Seireitei and invade private space where and how they see fit?”

“Let... them search,” Nagesu held up a hand, shaking his head slightly as his son gazed at him in dismay.

“But Father, you know what they’ll...”

“The prisoner is the man Ukitake arrested, correct?” Nagesu turned his gaze on the apprehensive recruit. “The one that’s been interrogated in their cells lately — the man they call ‘Suzuki?’”

“I don’t know, sir,” the recruit admitted. “They won’t tell us anything, just that he’s escaped. Also that he might be armed. They told Gai-san that he’d knocked out his guards with Kidou and killed a prisoner in one of their secure cells before disappearing... and they want to search the surrounding area for any sign of where he’s gone.”

Nagesu’s expression became grim, and he nodded.

“In a war, there are no such things as... personal sensibilities,” he said softly. “This man is... dangerous, and may prove... a threat to all of us. He may be... allied with the demon we... seek to snare, and we have... nothing to hide. Tell Gai to... let them in. They may search our... Division if it will... put their minds at rest.”

Author’s Note: Kanji and Kamen

I’m sure you can’t help but notice how epically dense the Third Division were in this chapter, not realising that the most likely candidate to open the gate was Nagesu himself. But this wasn’t an error on my part, it was deliberate (before I get reviews asking just how dumb the Third are?) Shiketsu panicked. The point was to show that Third are far from ready to lose Nagesu and hand over the baton yet. Shiketsu is about the same rough age as Juu and Shun, perhaps a little older, but he lacks leadership experience and has always counted on Nagesu being there. In the heat of the moment, knowing that his father was missing and that Keitarou — with his track record of moving through gates undetected — had been witnessed, he and the other Third members jumped to conclusions, forgetting their own Captain is a Bankai level shinigami and therefore capable of doing the same now too.

This is... if you like... an indication of the importance of Captains in this story... and the huge gaping hole the loss of one of them might cause...

Also, Kamen no Gunzei. I’ve used this term a couple of times already, but I should explain it for anyone who doesn’t know. A lot of the terms in Japanese Bleach are written in Japanese characters, even if they are given foreign pronunciations. Vaizard

(ヴァイザード) is one of these — the term is written in Kanji as 仮面の軍勢 (Kamen no Gunzei). This literally means “masked armed forces”, or, in my nice alliterative translation, “masked militia”.

There are also many ways of writing Vaizard in English — Visored, Vizard, they're all the same thing and all of them are correct. I just use Vaizard because the Japanese katakana pronunciation is written Vaizaado and so IMO it's the closest to the original of the Anglicised versions. I strongly believe that Aizen and Urahara both working on the Hollow-ka process independantly of one another is indication that this wasn't an idea that began randomly around the time of the Pendulum but really had much deeper, older roots. If you've read Meifu 4, you'll remember I brought in a naturally occuring vaizard-type mutation. This is a more scientifically mutated project... what you can call the groundwork and origins that inspired the later studies of Aizen Sousuke and of Urahara Kisuke.

The characters' names in Japanese script, for those who are interested, are Aki秋 (autumn), Haruya春 夜 (Spring night) and Moeモエ. Whilst Moe's name COULD have kanji, somehow it seems right that it doesn't have a tangible meaning attached. It's actually written “Mowe”, with the archaic character 𪛗 (we) that is no longer regularly used in modern Japanese. Why? Aside from the vintage setting of this story in regards to Canon Bleach, I actually got the idea to write it this way from seeing As Nodt's speech style in the recent manga. As Nodt uses a lot of katakana in dialogue, which is unusual, and even more unusual, uses one archaic katakana character which is not in common usage in modern Japanese, 𪛗 (wi) instead of イ (i). As Nodt is a little unusual, and so is Moe, so I figured, why not? However it is usual to romanise these letters in the modern style, hence MoE and not MoWe.

The kanji behind some commonly used Bleach terms is also somewhat a theme of this story. I'm not going to explain that any further at this point, though...

41. Killer Instinct

Chapter Forty: Killer Instinct

The spy had escaped.

Tenichi stood in the courtyard of the Seventh Division barracks as he watched the sun slowly beginning to set over Seireitei. He had been in the middle of an intensive sword training session with two of the Seventh's newest recruits when the message had come, and as a result Hirata had ordered all individuals under the rank of Tenth to take positions within the squad headquarters, sending his higher seated officers out to man posts around the Division's frontier. Though Hirata had said that he did not believe an attack here was likely, Tenichi knew otherwise. Unlike his comrades, who had greeted the news with annoyance, frustration and mocking remarks about the Second's security system, Tenichi's heart had leapt in his throat, anticipation and adrenaline flooding his whole body. When Hirata had asked for volunteers to man the outer perimeter, Tenichi had spoken up immediately, and as a result, here he was, the first line of defence for his division against a maurading escapee.

Though to Tenichi it didn't feel that way. He had never had such a rush of emotions cascade through his body before, and he hopped from foot to foot, trying to dispel some of the nervous energy. Unlike the day he had slipped into the Thirteenth Division's barracks with the intention of stifling Koku, he felt no sense of guilt or desperation. On the contrary, he was eager to hunt Masaya down and put an end to him once and for all. It was only natural to feel that way, he told himself darkly, since it had been Masaya who had taken him to Rukongai, Masaya who had threatened him over Souja's disappearance and Masaya who, from behind the bars of that Onmitsukidou cage had made it clear he knew far too much to be allowed to safely roam Seireitei. He had not divulged Tenichi's secrets yet — perhaps that was true — but unlike Koku, Tenichi had no confidence in Masaya's general secrecy. He did not understand why the spy had revealed so much about Aizen Kohaku, except to intimidate Tenichi into keeping his mouth shut and the more time that had passed, the more resolved the Eighth Seated officer had become.

He had learned from Kitabata during one of their morning inspections the full details of the Spiritless Zone, and the murders that had taken place there. Expecting to be shocked by this confirmation of Sakaki's involvement, and therefore the likelihood of Keitarou's guiding hand, the news had instead given him even greater determination to keep his trip to the Rukon a secret for as long as he possibly could. Though he knew infiltration of Onmitsukidou land was both unwise and unlikely to be successful, he had spent most of his free moments — not that there had been many — since his conversation with Koku trying to work out a possible line of attack to get in and silence Masaya before any more could be said. The people from the Fourth, their deaths were sad, but there was nothing Tenichi could do to bring them back. Souja, too, for though the thought of his Vice Captain's corpse still haunted most of his nightmares, he could only do what Koku had told him and try to rise above the speculation by being strong. He had to protect what was important to him, and when he had considered this point most seriously of all, he knew what this was.

Ketsui has father's blood as sure as I do. Kirio too knows Keitarou-san came to our home and spoke to us before Mother died. If those things were to be known, my complicity with Keitarou-san's schemes will be assumed, even if there's no truth in it whatsoever. Even if all I wanted was to help get food to starving people, nobody will believe that. Keitarou-san laid a path, spun a web that I couldn't escape from even if I tried. I saw him all those years ago and none of us raised the alarm. We pretended we had not, and hoped it would go away. Keitarou-san didn't, though, did he? He came to see us in order to find out where we were and what we were doing. From the start he intended to involve me to a point where I could not speak... because of Father, I got snared in, and because of Father, I can't get out.

He tightened his grip on his sword, reflecting on this fact bitterly.

I don't remember the things Father did as a scientist or as a rebel. I remember him as the man who played with us, who told Ketsui stories, who joked with mother about my growth spurts. When he died, I don't know what I felt. Was I angry? I don't even know. Even though I know Hirata-sama's grandfather murdered him, and I know how and why, I don't... hate the Taichou. I didn't hate Fukutaichou, either. Mother raised us away from Father's values, so we wouldn't become tainted. What would she say now, if she knew how much danger I'd brought us both into because of my own foolish naivety? I spoke to nobody about that meeting all those years ago. I allowed myself to be abducted. I was in the Rukon when the massacre in the Spiritless Zone happened. I met the girl who probably did it — nobody would believe that she was trying to kill me too, since I escaped there unscathed. I was found at Father's grave, by those silver haired people I'm not allowed to talk about. Kurotsuchi threatened me and threatened Ketsui, and because I was abducted and found there, Fukutaichou died and Koku came here.

His brows knitted together in consternation.

I suppose that's someone else I need to protect. He said himself that Kurotsuchi might come after him, if he had the chance. If that's where he's heading, he'll have to pass through Seventh's patrol space to get there. Koku can't fight and defend himself, but I can and I called us allies. Whatever that really means, Koku hasn't betrayed me, and I'm running out of options to choose. I have to trust in him — I already know I can't trust Kurotsuchi, so the simple answer is to kill him. Do that, and a danger disappears. My past isn't important — Mother broke the link when she moved us to Eighth District, and that's what I have to cling to. Any hint of a more recent connection between Keitarou-san and I must be buried again... and we can go back to normal. Whatever that is.

His mind flitted to Kikyue who, pale faced and shadow-eyed, had given him and his fellow patrol members their specific orders before they had dispersed.

For her sake too, it would be better if things were at an end. This would be one step towards that. Acting this way isn't wrong. Killing is, but this is different. This is to protect people. Didn't Ukitake-taichou teach us that we hold our sword to protect? Surely, then, killing someone who's a threat to so many people and a nuisance for the Second Division is justified, even merited?

"You look thoughtful tonight, Kotetsu Tenichi."

The words echoed out of the shadows that were lengthening into full scale blackness along the wall of the division barracks, and Tenichi started, swinging around in the direction of the sound. He could make out nothing in the gloom, but a disembodied chuckle told him that he had not imagined it, and the subject of his thoughts was mocking him from somewhere nearby.

"I imagine that face is for my benefit?" the voice asked smoothly, and Tenichi's eyes narrowed into slits as he raised his sword, brandishing it in the direction he hoped the speaker stood.

"Show yourself, Kurotsuchi," he demanded angrily. "I'm not going to be baited by you this time."

"I think you are," A figure oozed out of the shadow, little more than a silhouette himself to begin with, but as he gained more and more definition, Tenichi could make out the cold gold eyes glittering with derision and he thrust his weapon forward once more, using it to keep space between them.

"If you think I'm going to let you lay a hand on me this time, you've another idea coming," he spat out. "You don't have the Second Division to protect you in a little cell now, and I have my spirit power uncapped and ready to go."

"You're going to fight me?" Masaya stepped into the dim light of the brazier lamps, the odd flicker of brightness glittering off damp patches of the man's clothing, and as all of his body came into clear view, Tenichi was aware of the bloodsoaked knife that he clutched in his left hand. It was a Shihouin dagger, not a regulation Clan affair but one carried by most members of the lower ranking Onmitsukidou, and at the sight of it, Tenichi's brows knitted together.

"Who did you hurt?" he murmured, his mind flitting to Koku.

"Nobody you know," Masaya glanced at the knife before giving it a casual flick, sending a spray of blood cascading onto the cobbles. "An old acquaintance."

He smiled, an unpleasant twist of lips stretched against a row of gleaming white teeth, and despite himself, Tenichi suppressed a shudder.

"You're wrong, by the way," he added casually. "The Second Division weren't protecting me — from you or from anyone else. You were protected from me by them. That and the fact I decided to sit put to see what I could find out. I've learned all I need to know, now. So I left. I hadn't planned on making a personal call, but considering the last time we met, I thought I should re-establish some ground rules. Starting with what might happen to you were you persuaded to talk to anyone about what happened in Rukongai."

"Like I plan on doing that," Tenichi retorted coldly. "I know who you are — who you really are — and you don't scare me. Some former Onmitsukidou with the power to twist his body — that's all. I graduated first in my class, and I was given Eighth Seat in this division over members of the Endou Clan because of my ability. I was head-hunted to come here. I'm not a weak fighter. You had me in your power before because you took me by surprise, and I cooperated because, like you, I wanted information. Now the situation is different. You can't kill someone like me. All I need to do is release my sword,"

He made a cutting motion across his throat with his free left hand.

"You don't even have a zanpakutou. That's a common sword, not even a proper asauchi. It's nothing in comparison to a released shikai. And I'm already angry. You talk to me about betrayal, but what about you? Leaking secrets about things you shouldn't be talking about to people who you consider enemies!”

“Oh,” Masaya pressed his lips together pensively. “You mean, about Kohaku?”

“You know I do.”

“Like a child playing with toys he doesn’t understand,” Masaya mocked. “You don’t know what Kohaku is, where he is, or anything about him. I ascertained that much when I spoke his name to Kaidono. As for my betraying that secret... things run deeper and darker than you understand in Keitarou-sama’s world. That creature is not what he thinks it is. Nor what you do. Besides, you believing yourself a match for me is already entertaining enough. Imagining you — or anyone else in this place — is a match for that monster’s power is pure idiocy. It doesn’t matter if they know or they don’t know Kohaku exists. Unless they can see it for what it is and destroy it when its weak, they will never defeat it. And the poison spreads deeply and quickly. Deeper than even I imagined it did.”

“You’re talking in riddles,” Tenichi protested, and Masaya grinned once again.

“Intelligent people understand when they’re being given a warning to back down,” he said softly. “I’m a trained assassin. If you know who I am, you know I don’t shy from death. I didn’t come here to kill you, just to make sure you kept your mouth shut. But if you want to fight, I can do that too. I can kill you and leave you bloody on the cobbles here. Keitarou-sama hasn’t ordered it, but if you are hostile towards me, you are hostile to Keitarou-sama’s cause and therefore worthy of elimination. First you and then that turncoat hiding in the Thirteenth.”

“You know about Koku?” Tenichi’s eyes widened in dismay, despite himself, and Masaya let out a chuckle.

“And so do you, apparently,” he murmured. “Interesting. I wondered how you came to know details about my former identity. Now I suppose I’ve discovered the answer. You’ve formed an alliance, haven’t you? How cute. But I’ve heard he’s injured. Weak and unable to even stand, let alone muster the will to fight. And one other thing you don’t know about your new friend...”

He pressed his head close, and Tenichi slashed his blade up, aiming for Masaya’s jugular, but the spy was gone into shadow almost at once, re-emerging on the Eighth seat’s other side.

“That’s rude, when I’m telling you secrets,” he admonished, his demeanour suggesting he was more amused than put out by the swing. “You have gained some conviction, though, which is good. Keitarou-sama likes conviction. He likes resolve. As I said, killing you isn’t my brief. I don’t have any interest in you except to ensure your silence. My business is with your new friend — who I should not trust, not if I were you.”

He gazed at his blade, then shrugged.

“Of course, that won’t matter, if I kill him,” he added. “Now might be the time.”

“I won’t let you kill him! Him or anyone else!” Tenichi’s blade glowed with energy as he prepared to summon its shikai release, but Masaya’s next words made him falter.

“Koku betrayed Keitarou-sama by bringing the boy back here,” he said quietly. “He acts for his own interests — unknown interests. He is not your ally, and he is not mine. Your only protection is in keeping silent and away from people as dangerous as that. Whatever face he shows you, you know nothing about him. You know all about me, by your own testimony, and I haven’t lied about it either. I was an assassin. An Onmitsukidou. A squad leader within the Second until ten years ago. These things are true. I kill, and I maim and I do it in Keitarou-sama’s name and no other. But Koku... what do you think his motives are?”

He shook his head.

“He will turn on you too,” he murmured. “To protect himself, to protect his agenda... who knows?”

Tenichi bit his lip, and Masaya chuckled.

“Ah, so your conviction only runs so deep,” he mocked. “Pity. I had hope for a moment that there was more to you than the fool I snared unawares.”

“Koku said there’s another spy somewhere in Seireitei,” Tenichi spoke in low tones. “Was that true, or was it a lie?”

“A spy?” Masaya’s brow twitched in momentary annoyance, then he shrugged his shoulders.

“I don’t know who they are,” he said reluctantly. “Koku probably does, though doubtless he told you he doesn’t. Keitarou-sama hasn’t trusted me with that information. He believes that, if he did, I would go and kill them, and probably, I would. I am the only eyes and ears he needs in Seireitei — and trusting a member of the Gotei is unwise.”

His eyes became slits.

“Ah, but you’re a member of the Gotei, aren’t you?” he mocked. “A child of Daisuke-sama, in a place like this, wearing the uniform of the people who took him, killed him, and who treated him like no more than rubbish. Are you sure you’re on the right side, Tenichi-dono? Or is it the ghost of your Vice Captain that frightens you? Because you can’t change what you are. You are a Kotetsu, child of the Urahara. You belong on the right side, not on the shinigami side. Forget Koku. Lower your blade. Honour your father, whilst you still can.”

“You leave Father out of it!” The rage which had abated into uncertainty at the mention of Koku now flared up once more in Tenichi’s heart

“I’m only telling you the truth,” Masaya was unmoved. “You are his son, you belong to Keitarou-sama. You and your brother, too... the one who even lookslike an Urahara.”

“What do you know about Ketsui?” Tenichi demanded, and Masaya chuckled.

“I’m Keitarou-sama’s agent, and I know everything,” he said smoothly. “Apparently your brother is the likeness of Daisuke-sama. You might think Keitarou-sama has no interest in Ketsui-dono, but I’m sure you’ll find his intentions will go beyond you if you prove to be useless. Or if I have to kill you. You are the eldest, but if you were to be inadequate...”

He shrugged.

“That’s how it is. You can’t escape, no matter how hard you try. Your job is to protect Keitarou-sama, and by doing so, you can protect Ketsui-dono, too. That seems a fair deal, really, given that you get to keep your current lifestyle.”

“If I kill you, then there’s nothing to escape. The link is broken, and you won’t be there to haunt me any more,” Tenichi snapped back. His blade glimmered once more with a sinister reddish glow, casting blood-edged shadows against the grey cobbles. “You think I won’t, but I will. You think I can’t, but I can. I’m under orders to attack with no hesitation if anyone meeting your description trespasses into my Division’s preserve. Since I know you on sight, I won’t be fooled by your games or your body’s deformations. You can hide, but I will find you. My sword and I — we will both find you.”

His eyes narrowed.

“I usually keep this for shattering Hollow masks,” he added darkly,

“but in your case, an exception can be made. You’re more than half dead already, from everything Koku has said. Killing you will just be finishing the job, and sending you to the place you really belong. Kiba o muke, Reihahen!”

As the words left his lips, the reddish energy that coated the surface of the weapon glimmered eerily, swallowing up the sword’s guard and digging deep into the hard metal of the blade, melting and reforging it in a haze of dull crimson energy. The hilt lengthened and hardened into a gleaming ebony staff, carved deep with criss-cross slashes which appeared dyed red by the reiatsu cloud that surrounded it. At its base, the molten mass of silver curved and sharpened, forming a razor blade edge which hardened and tapered to a needle-sharp point. A length of leather wrapped itself firmly around Tenichi’s right wrist, looping itself to the weapon at midpoint to strengthen his hold, and Tenichi clasped the end in his left, swinging the weapon around in an arc to dispel the last lingering fragments of spirit energy before thrusting the silver tip in Masaya’s direction.

“You better raise that dagger thing of yours,” he said softly. “Though it won’t be much use to you against Reihahen.”

“So your zanpakutouis a naginata.” Masaya arched an eyebrow. “Escaping a bladed weapon is much the same regardless of where the edge comes. Your reiatsu is impressive, but not enough to swallow me up. Your sword is pretty, but you won’t use something that flashy to catch an assassin. Haven’t you realised yet that we live in the...”

“Kobahashi!” Tenichi cut across Masaya’s words with a command that echoed through the night air, swinging his naginata down and thrusting the blade in the direction of the wooden boundary fence that crossed the divide between Masaya and the main shinigami thoroughfare that ran alongside the division. He wheeled the weapon back towards his own body, and there was an answering creak and groan, then the sound of something splintering and the fence exploded into a cloud of wooden shrapnel. Long thin shards of broken bamboo sped through the air like miniature javelins, sharp as arrow shafts despite the fact they lacked the metal tip. Despite himself, Masaya jerked back away from the blast, slipping into shunpo and re-materialising out of the line of fire before he could be impaled by a particularly large wedge of wood. Although he had avoided the worst of the attack, Tenichi noticed with some satisfaction that he had not evaded it completely, for the blood that now covered his dagger arm was now as much his own as his earlier victim’s, and a slick streak of red ran across beneath his eye, oozing slowly down his cheek like crimson tears.

He swung the naginata around again in satisfaction, pointing the weapon at Masaya once more.

“Still so sure you can escape?” he challenged. “I don’t need to see you to impale you. You can’t remove the physical presence of your body, even if you can stop me from seeing it. Blooding my blade would be a shame, but I don’t need to be able to touch you to kill you, not now I’ve released.”

His lips twitched into a grim smile.

“A naginata is a physical, contact weapon,” he added, “designed to cut, hook or slash an opponent within the range of its swing. It has more reach than a katana might, but mine has the added advantage of ranged attacks beyond the length of its swing. My reiryokuis in tune with the wood in the surrounding area, and Reihahen acts like a snake-charmer, luring it into the field of attack. You can see that here there’s plenty of ammunition for me to draw on — that’s why I volunteered for this location when we were dispatched to stand guard. I can use the whole barrier if I need to, if it’s to protect Seventh and my position here. I am not afraid of you, nor your history as an assassin. Coming to bait me was a mistake, since the tables are turning.”

He thrust his naginata blade at the fence on the other side of the compound, feeling the angry energy welling up within his sword once more in anticipation of a second attack.

“Kobahashi!”

“Hadou no Gojuu-hachi: Tenran!” As a second section of fence imploded in on itself, blasting debris once more in the spy’s direction, Masaya released his grip on the dagger in his hand, spinning it around before thrusting his palm up against its guard. A whirlwind of kidou energy poured out across the Division barracks, meeting the splinter-arrows head on and driving them back, scattering them across the cobbles as though dropped there by a sudden summer tornado. Tenichi’s expression twisted into a grimace of determination, his grip on the naginata staff tightening until his knuckles became white.

“Kidou isn’t going to stop me,” he said darkly. “If you hadn’t come here, I was going to come to find you. I was looking for you. Listening for you. Waiting for you. I was going to kill you, and that’s what I intend to do. You can run, you can hide, but you won’t escape me. I have too much to protect, and no reason to call you my ally. Koku might or might not be as you say. I don’t know, and I don’t care. Right now my issue is with you — the one who’s been a thorn in my side since that night you took me from outside Twelfth. I've trained hard with this weapon since before I was a recruit, and I came here because my skills were valued and above the mainstream. My Kidou isn't bad either, however — and I can match you fire for fire if you want to play it that way.”

“And vandalise your whole division? I don't think so.” Masaya snorted. “Your Captain would have something to say, wouldn't he, if you brought down his barracks in pursuit of a fugitive? I'm sure your orders don't include killing me, since Kai-dono seemed quite keen to keep plying me with questions. It might be hard to explain if you succeeded, Kotetsu Tenichi... why you went to so much trouble to kill someone you had only been instructed to detain. Mind you, it would be even harder to explain, if you failed...”

His eyes narrowed, and he disappeared into shunpo, reappearing within the range of Tenichi's weapon and reaching out to grasp the other man by the throat of his hakamashita, forcing him physically up against the remaining post of the perimeter gate. Tenichi tried to bring his zanpakutou down against Masaya's back, but the angle of the assassin's hold was just enough to prevent it, and Masaya's lips twisted into another ugly smile.

“See, the Onmitsukidou train their people to exploit the weaknesses of all kinds of offensive weaponry,” he hissed. “At this range, you can't swing at me and you can't impale me without risking your own life. The only reason I won't kill you now is because I haven't been given the order. If you were to talk... if you were to open your mouth and say one word about things you should keep to yourself, I will know. I will hear of it, and I will make sure they're the last words you speak. You can shatter fences and walls as much as you like with that glittering toy of yours, but you can't kill me as easily as that. I'm blessed with life beyond life. You can't kill one who's already seen death and walked away.”

“Kotetsu-hasseki! Kotetsu-hasseki!”

The voice of a recruit, followed by the sound of footsteps hurrying across the courtyard towards them made the spy hesitate for a moment, then raise his hand in preparation to blast the youngster out of existence but, as his fingers glittered with the unmistakeable glow of Oukasen, Tenichi wrenched himself free, flinging the naginata out between himself and the recruit and spinning it around to deflect the golden flare up into the air. The recruit let out a shriek of dismay as the bolt made contact with the Endou logo that hung above the gate of the division, searing the corner off and melting the edge of the chain so that it creaked and then hung at a precarious angle. It did not fall, but Masaya hopped back, clear amusement on his face.

“Stop picking on children when I’ve already said I’m your match!” Tenichi’s features were black as thunder as he wheeled round to face the spy once more. “Stop playing coward’s games and fight me fair with that dagger of yours.”

“I’ve no interest in fighting you at all, not now the cavalry are coming,” Masaya said with a dismissive shrug of his shoulders. Casting the recruit a look of disdain, he melted back into the shadows, and try as he might, the Eighth seat could no longer detect the man’s presence around the division grounds. He took a heavy breath of air into his lungs, knowing it was his duty to turn and make sure the recruit was not hurt, but it was with any amount of reluctance that he turned away from the devastated barrier fence, his eyes widening with dismay as he saw that someone else had reached the boy first.

“Hajime-dono?” he whispered, and Hajime raised his gaze, meeting Tenichi’s expression with a grim one of his own.

“We felt your sword release,” he said briskly. “Kikyue-hime already sent someone to Second, since the Taichou’s gone to Eighth to speak to Kyouraku-taichou about something, but it looks like the man escaped. Did he hurt you? I saw you deflect the flare of magic away from the kid here — he’s not hurt, but... that fence...”

“I did some damage,” Tenichi’s pulse was still racing, and it was all he could do not to snap at his superior officer, the urge to hunt Masaya down coupled with the fear of the man’s escape still uppermost in his mind. “I’m sorry, Hajime-dono. He was threatening me and threatening Seventh. I had to release.”

“Well, we’ll deal with that matter inside,” Hajime got to his feet, yanking the nervous youngster to his with a rough tug of his arm. “You too. Go inside, and don’t be so foolish as to disobey a command again. You were meant to stay within the barracks, and even if a senior officer releases his sword, you are not required to run out and gawp at it. Understand?”

The recruit gaped, then hung his head, trudging back inside with a desolate look on his young face, and Hajime sighed, turning back to Tenichi.

“Put your sword away,” he said gruffly. “We’ll talk inside. It’s better that way. Second will be here soon, and it’ll be enough to explain to Kai-dono why their prisoner escaped. Or why he was here in the first place.”

“Mm,” Tenichi swallowed hard, not trusting himself to speak, though he reluctantly returned his sword to its sealed katana state, sliding it slowly into its scabbard. Hajime cast him a keen glance.

“You wanted to nail him,” he observed. “That’s good spirit to have. You’re not an Endou, but perhaps you’re learning from being around us. I was impressed with the resolve I felt in your aura, and so would Fukutaichou have been. He thought you were a good acquisition for this Division, and I’m seeing now what he meant. You’ve worked hard and been a solid member of Seventh in a period of crisis — that won’t be forgotten, when things calm down and everything is regarded clearly.”

“...Sir?” Tenichi sent his companion a horrified glance, but Hajime laughed.

“You didn’t reel this one in. That’s experience, but it’ll come,” he said wisely, clapping his hand companionably across the other’s shoulders. “In the meantime...”

“I’m sorry to interrupt, Hajime-dono, but I’d like to speak to Kotetsu myself, if I may, before the Division debrief him.”

As they reached the door of the barracks, Kai himself stepped out onto the cobbles, meeting Tenichi’s gaze briefly, then offering Hajime a fleeting smile. “I realise it’s unorthodox, but the escaped prisoner has already killed once tonight, and I need to know as soon as possible what happened here.”

His eyes flickered back towards Tenichi, and he frowned.

“Particularly why it seems to be you who encountered him,” he said softly. “It is a very unfortunate coincidence, don’t you think?”

“Kai-dono, Kotetsu just protected one of our more stupid juniors from getting incinerated alive,” Hajime said frankly. “In the circumstances...”

“In these circumstances, witnesses are the first line of enquiry, and my rank supersedes yours,” Kai’s smile remained, but now it was flinty, his gold eyes every bit as predatorial as Hajime’s own. “I have the consent of Kikyue-dono to act as I please in this regard. I have important questions to ask your Eighth Seated Officer in relation to tonight’s events, and I mean to get to the bottom of it whether you cooperate or not. Your Captain is currently next door with the Eighth, comparing information and in his absence, I will have my way. Kotetsu?”

Tenichi stared at Kai, a mixture of anger and indignation flaring up inside him once more at the brisk, matter-of-fact the other division's adjutant had asserted his rights.

"I didn't do anything," he muttered. "I was defending myself. And the recruit. Like Hajime-dono says."

"Yet there must be a reason why he came here, of all places," Kai's gaze bored into Tenichi's, and despite himself, the Eighth seat dropped his gaze, knowing that if he continued to glare at the Second's Vice Captain, he would be accused of insubordination.

If Souja-dono had been here, he thought bitterly to himself, clenching his fists.

"Then I'll proceed with my questions indoors, if I may," Kai cast Hajime a glance, and the older man's brows drew together in consternation.

"Kikyue-dono gave her authority?"

"She did, but I act in the authority of the Onmitsukidou, and as such, I have the right to overrule the views of a Third Seat or, indeed, a Fourth Seated officer if I feel they are obstructing my duty. I am invoking that right now." Kai spoke calmly, his words grating against Tenichi's last nerve. "I want to know everything I can about Suzuki Naoto, and his escape this evening. Particularly why, of all people, it should be Kotetsu Tenichi he apparently singled out. We believe Suzuki to be involved somehow in the events that led to your Vice Captain's death — in those circumstances, I advise cooperation. From all parties."

This last was directed particularly at Tenichi, who flinched in annoyance, but Hajime sighed, shrugging his shoulders.

"If that's the order, so be it," he said, though it was clear that he was not happy about it either. "I'll come with you, Kotetsu. We'll humour Kai-dono's request and then get back to some proper duties. This missing spy is Second's mistake and Second's problem — but he has the pull of rank and we can't argue with that. We'll just have to help them mop it up however best we can."

"You know, you could try and look a little bit more welcoming, when someone's taken the time and effort to come pay you a visit,"

Kirio unlaced the shutter ties on the window of the sickroom, pulling the slatted divides across to block out the sunset before turning to cast the drowsy Koku a teasing smile. "From what Tsunemori-san said outside the door, you barely spoke a single word to him today — and Edogawa-san said you were in dead silence when she was changing your bandages and trying to persuade you to eat her soup. This is not the way a guest usually behaves towards his hosts, you know — you could make more effort to be sociable, when we're giving up so much of our time to see to your needs."

"I don't remember asking for anyone to do anything, and I don't think it's really a 'guest' situation when I don't have a choice about being here," Koku grunted, opening his eyes fully and swivelling his gaze across the chamber towards where the young woman was tightly re-knotting the lace cords over the hooks so that they would not bang in the evening breeze. "On the contrary, I was trying to sleep — now you're here, though, I don't suppose I'm going to get a chance. You don't need anyone to hold a conversation with you — you'll talk whether I ask you to or not."

"Well, if you don't respond, there's not much else for me to do, is there?" Kirio said matter-of-factly, coming to sit down beside the bed on the small wooden stool. "Tsunemori-san's quite retiring and quiet and not the kind of person to push his nose in where he's not invited, but I'm afraid that's not my way. Besides, it doesn't look very pretty if all you do is frown, pout and sulk. We already established that you're hard done by — so let go of the attitude for a bit and humour us, all right? Sooner you heal, sooner you can leave — and if you're miserable and glum all the time, nobody's going to want to cut you loose."

"I'm not a sociable person as a rule," Koku said mildly, nonetheless dragging his bandaged body into a more upright position with a sigh of resignation. Kirio grabbed a spare pillow from the pile by the door, handing it to him and the young man took it, glancing at it thoughtfully for a moment before slipping it behind his spine to support him more securely. "I told you, I spend time by myself. I'm not used to someone always being in my face... and here, it seems that no matter when I sleep or wake, someone's hovering around me waiting to do something."

"Feed you, change your bandages, check your wounds, take your temperature, ensure you're doing all right," Kirio counted off the tasks on her fingers. "You might think you're the victim in all this, but we're taking care of you on top of our other duties. Spare a thought for me coming in here after a long day's work and at least attempt a smile from time to time, all right? That's not too much to ask, is it?"

Koku eyed her for a moment, but made no response, and Kirio grinned.

“All right, you’re antisocial. I get it,” she said lightly, “but you could at least be a little grateful to me today. I’ve done you a favour, and it’s poor form not to thank someone properly. District people learn manners just as sure as Clan ones, so there’s no excuses.”

“The things you seem to classify as ‘favours’ are things I tend to read as ‘annoyances’,” Koku muttered acerbically, and Kirio laughed, amusement glittering in her gaze.

“See, Tsunemori-san never gets to see this side of you,” she said playfully. “Even though you say I get on your nerves and you want me to go away, you talk to me much more than you do anyone else. I guess you’re more lonely than you think you are.”

“Chance would be a fine thing,” Koku said bluntly. “You don’t take a hint, that’s all. You’re here more than anyone, smiling and cheery and acting like we’re life-long friends and it bothers me. We don’t know each other. You want information from me and I don’t know the things you want me to say, so it doesn’t matter how sugar sweet you are to me, it’s not going to change anything. You might as well be like your quiet friend and just let me to myself.”

“No, because I don’t like that way of seeing things,” Kirio shook her head. “We have something in common. You’re on your own, and I’ve been like that, too. You’re stuck in a strange place surrounded by people you don’t know and I know how scary that can be. I’m not going to leave you to stew, even if you want me to. It’s not good for you, not with all you’ve been through. Maybe you don’t know about Souja-dono’s killer, but that’s not really my business or my investigation. Taichou is the one who’s pursuing that and he’s made it clear to me that I’m just to do what I can to help keep you comfortable, not try and prise information from you. So it doesn’t matter whether you know things or not — I’m still going to be here, regardless.”

“I see,” Koku pressed his lips together, then a faint, droll smile touched the edges of his lips. “Well, and I heard that shinigami could be brutal, judgemental and violent. I didn’t realise they also excelled in irritation techniques.”

“It’s one of my specialties,” Kirio dimpled. “I don’t like seeing people unhappy, so if they are, I want to help. Even if that means they get annoyed at me, well, being annoyed at me often takes their mind off what’s actually bothering them. Tenichi and I used to have fights over stupid things all the time, but we’d always end up laughing about it at the end. He’d say it was a talent I had — to butt in and somehow make it better. I don’t know if it works on strangers, but since you’re determined to be sorry for yourself, I figured I'd try."

"Ten... ichi?" Koku's expression flickered slightly with consternation, and Kirio nodded.

"He's a member of another division — he used to be here in Thirteenth, but not any more," she agreed, folding her hands pensively in her lap. "You probably don't remember, but he was here, briefly, the day you first roused up. We were students together, and I knew his family very well. He's one of my closest friends — more like a brother in some ways. He's never been good at admitting when things are on his mind, so I used to drag them out of him by getting him angry, and it always worked."

"So you think you can do the same to me?" Koku arched an eyebrow, and Kirio shrugged.

"You're a pretty challenging grump," she admitted, "and I guess you really aren't used to talking about things that bother you, or scare you, and so you're determined to play it tough with us here. It's fine, though. You don't need to. You're not that old, really, not yet — you don't have to take everything on your shoulders."

"I'm twenty one," Koku's response came stiffly, and Kirio knew she'd offended the youngster by her suggestion. Her grin widened.

"I wondered how old you were," she admitted. "All right, so you are an adult — but even twenty one is still pretty young. Some people are still at the Academy at twenty one — not out in the world fighting and killing Hollows."

"I don't kill Hollows, so I guess that doesn't matter," Koku shifted his position slightly against the pillows. "I'm not a child, Kirio-san. You wouldn't like it if I called you 'obasan', so don't make assumptions on my account."

"Oba... san?" Kirio's eyes widened, then she burst into a peal of laughter. "Oh, you are horrible. You're right, I would object if you called me that — I'm nowhere near old enough for that kind of a label, thank you very much! All right, I take your point — no more comments about your age."

"Then maybe you'll shut up and let me sleep?" Koku asked hopefully, and Kirio shook her head.

"Not quite," she replied. "It's early yet, and you slept a lot this morning, according to Tsunemori-san. You need sleep to heal, but it's not good for you to do it all of the time."

"There's not exactly much else for me to do," Koku pointed out acidly, and Kirio nodded.

"I know," she admitted, "so that's why I did you a favour. I told you that I had, didn't I?"

"Ye-es," Koku responded cautiously, a wary expression entering his brown eyes, and Kirio's smile widened.

"Don't look like that," she scolded. "It's not as though I'm about to drag you out of bed, dress you in kimono and parade you through the centre of the division. I just thought you might like something else to focus on."

She ferretted around in her obi, pulling a soft-cover book from beneath the folds and setting it down on the bedcovers. "I'm not meant to take books from the library, but Taichou said it would be all right to take something small if it was to keep you occupied."

"A book?" Despite himself Koku's eyes glittered slightly with excitement, and his fingers stretched out to brush against the soft vellum cover. Then he faltered, frowning and casting Kirio a quizzical look.

"You're assuming I can read?"

"Well, a lot of District kids can," Kirio admitted, "but I chose this book on the off-chance you couldn't. It's a book of Seireitei legends, and it's one of my favourites because it has several really pretty illustrations. I thought that if you could read the text it might amuse you for a bit, but even if not, the pictures might appeal to you."

"I see." Koku hesitated a moment longer, then curled his fingers around the spine of the book, pulling it slowly towards him and turning it so that he could see the cover. The characters across the front were old and a little faded, but a tiny smile touched his lips as he traced his index finger across them.

"Thank you," he said at length. "As it happens, I can read. And... I like reading. I like it very much."

"Really?" Kirio's expression became one of relief, then, "I sort of hoped you might. I mean, if you were able to read... because reading is something you can do on your own, and, well, you seem to like... those kinds of things."

"I suppose so," Koku glanced up in surprise at her perception, then another faint smile touched his wan features. "I suppose you win again."

“Well, regardless of whether we catch Souja-dono’s killer or we don’t, and whether or not you can help us with doing that, you matter to us too,” Kirio said honestly. “Taichou’s said it, and Fukutaichou too — that when things die down and you’re all healed up, it’s our duty to make sure you have a say in your future beyond here. If you need to get far from Inner Seireitei, then the Thirteenth will make sure you do — we won’t follow you, or even ask where you want to go, if you’re determined not to tell us, but we will make sure you have everything you need to survive on your own when we let you go. You might feel like a virtual prisoner at the moment, but we don’t see you like that. At least, I don’t. Actually, I’m grateful for having you here, believe it or not.”

“I can’t imagine why you would be,” Koku blinked, bewildered, and Kirio laughed.

“When Taichou first sent me to help you in the forest, I didn’t know anything about assisting wounded people,” she admitted, “and I didn’t know what to do to help you. It bothered me, but Taichou had made you my responsibility, so I had to act on it and do the best I could. Then I decided I wanted to help you and get you to trust me, because I was worried about Tenichi — Souja-dono was his Vice Captain, so I thought if I knew what happened to him, I could make Tenichi feel better. But Tenichi... the last time I saw him, he seemed all right, and you know, busy, but coping. And Taichou has been taking care of the investigation, so I guess I decided... that the most important thing I could do in all of this was help Edogawa-san in treating you. Annoying you is all my own talent, but I’ve learned a lot about first aid and basic medical treatment I would never have come to know without your being here. I know it’s been horrible for you, getting slashed up and dragged out here like this — but because you were, I hope that I might be able to be of use with injured officers in the future. And that might help save their lives. You might not have saved Souja-dono’s life, and I know that upset you — but you might have helped save other lives just by being caught up in things the way you were. Little things often lead to bigger ones — so in return for being able to learn so many new useful things, I want to try and make your time here less difficult.”

Koku stared at her, digesting this, then he sighed, scooping up the book and flicking open the first page.

“You’re really very annoying,” he murmured, more than half to himself. “I really didn’t want to start liking shinigami, but you make it very difficult.”

“Did you just admit you liked my company?” Kirio teased, reaching out a balled fist to bop him lightly on the arm, and he scowled, casting her a glower.

“I said nothing of the sort,” he retorted firmly. “You must be hearing things... maybe your Taichou is making you take on too much.”

“Perhaps he is,” Kirio grinned. “But I’m glad that you’ll at least talk like this with me. You don’t have to trust me or anyone else here if you don’t want to, or tell us anything about yourself or your life — but it makes me feel happier about you if you’re lively and answering back like this. Sometimes you seem so withdrawn and miserable, and then... I worry about what you’ll do when all of this is over.”

“That makes two of us,” Koku admitted, propping the book up against his knees, “but the future is as it is, and nothing can change it, so I guess I’ll face it — whatever it happens to be — when that time comes.”

“I suppose that’s true for all of us,” Kirio agreed, “though you sound like an old man when you talk like that.”

“Well, at least you’re not calling me a kid, now,” Koku said pointedly. “Are you going to let me read this book, then, or are you just going to keep talking regardless?”

“Seriously, who taught you your manners?” Kirio scolded, and Koku shrugged.

“I guess I didn’t have a traditional upbringing,” he said ironically, smoothing out the first page of the book and tracing his finger along the columns of kanji as he scanned through the contents page. The weave of a green stem adorned with blooming red and white roses trailed across the paper, and he paused, touching his nail gingerly against the first illustration.

“They are pretty. You’re right.”

“I love roses,” Kirio agreed. “They’re such a bold flower. Of course, officially I have to be loyal to the snowdrop, since it’s our divisional emblem, but secretly...”

“I don’t know what a snowdrop is,” Koku admitted, pursing his lips. “I don’t know the names of any flowers, or much about them at all, really.”

“Well, you’re a boy, so I guess it can’t be helped,” Kirio rolled her eyes. “Probably you spent your youth rolling in mud-puddles and climbing trees — although you don't look like you'd be very good at either, to be perfectly honest."

"I never did either one," Koku shook his head. "I did spend a lot of time by the river bank, and I liked sitting beneath the branches of a tree to read — but that was about all."

"Can you fish?" Kirio eyed him doubtfully, and Koku snorted, shaking his head.

"I don't kill things," he reminded her, "and there were no fish in that river, anyway. Besides, I can't swim... so I would've drowned trying."

"Killing things for food is different from just going on a bloody rampage," Kirio objected, and Koku shrugged.

"I don't care. I can't do it," he admitted. "It makes me feel funny. I see it in their eyes, before they die... people, animals, birds... fish. It doesn't matter... I can see that last flicker of fear before all the light goes out and then..."

He faltered, clamping his mouth shut as though he had said more than he had intended, and Kirio sighed.

"You really don't like death at all, do you?" she murmured, and Koku shook his head.

"It's a fact of life," he responded gravely, "but it doesn't mean you have to like it. I don't like it. That's all."

Before Kirio could muster up a response or a change of subject, there was a sharp rap against the wooden door, and it slid back, revealing an anxious looking Makoto.

"Hikifune, we've had an alert from the Second," he said, casting Koku a doubtful glance then turning his gaze to his immediate subordinate. "Taichou wants everyone to report to the main mess hall immediately. It seems something's going down. He said not to worry about sentry duty, because Edogawa-san is here and will come and take over for you."

"Something at Second?" Kirio got to her feet, a look of confusion on her features. "Taichou wants all of us? Are you sure?"

"That's what he said. Everyone who's on site and not on patrol is to report to the mess hall at once," Makoto nodded impatiently. "Stop fussing and come on — your waif will be fine, I told you, and this is your real job, not babysitting a witness."

“I suppose if it’s an order.” Kirio grimaced, casting Koku a glance.

“I guess you got your wish,” she added ironically. “At least till Edogawa-san gets here, you have some peace and quiet to read your book.”

“I’ve no objections,” Koku returned the glance with a wry smile. “I’m not planning on running away anywhere in the ten seconds or so I’m alone, Kirio-san. It hurts far too much to go sightseeing, and I have something to keep me busy, so I’m sure I’ll hardly notice your absence.”

Kirio pulled a graphic face at the young man, but made no retort, instead following Makoto into the corridor and shutting the door behind her with a soft click.

“I guess the kid does speak,” Makoto remarked. “I’d understood he was pretty much mute with people flitting around him, but he seems to be fine with you.”

“I irritate him, and it gets him to respond,” Kirio dimpled. “I can’t help but fuss over him, Atsudane-san. It makes me think of my little brother... I think Koku’s about the age my brother would’ve been now, or no, he’d even be some years younger. It makes me want to protect him, even though he clearly wants nothing at all from us.”

“Well, right now you need to be a shinigami, instead of big sister,” Makoto said frankly. “I didn’t want to say anything in there, in case it put the spooks into the lad, bearing in mind he’s not used to all this crap we deal with, but I think something pretty major’s going down. It’s to do with the prisoner you guys took to Second — there was a message from Kai-dono and though Taichou hasn’t said in explicit detail, I think he’s got loose.”

“And he’s coming this way?” Kirio looked alarmed, and Makoto shrugged.

“Can’t see why he would. Taichou bested him once, and he’d be a fool if he did,” he reflected. “No, I think it’s a general alert, and I guess it’s not impossible that the Onmitsukidou might want to do a full sweep of our grounds. It’s not like them to let someone loose, but there’s something funny about this guy. I dunno what it is, but even though we’re pretty much as far as you can get from Second, Division wise, Taichou took the message seriously.”

He pushed open the door of the mess hall, ushering his companion inside, and Kirio could see that the rest of the Thirteenth were already present, Juushirou in his white haori at the front of the gathering. His expression was grave, and at their entrance he gestured for them to join the rest.

“Makoto’s told you?” he asked, and Kirio nodded.

“Yes, sir. There’s been a message from Second about the prisoner we took in Outer Seireitei,” she agreed, and Juushirou nodded.

“I’m sorry to tear you from your other duty, but since you and Tsunemori were both there that morning, I wanted you present here now,” he said quietly. “Sadly it seems Second have failed to hold him. Mitsuki, I’ll entrust Koku’s well-being to you — though I trust he was in no distress when you left him, Kirio?”

“He’s quite sparky this evening, sir,” Kirio said dryly. “I think he’s feeling better than he was.”

“Good,” Juushirou offered a harried smile. “Then Mitsuki, with any luck your job will be fairly painless.”

“I’ll go gather together supplies to change his dressings, since I have to do that before he settles down to sleep,” Mitsuki said. “You can leave him to me.”

“I’ll come with you,” Naoko said firmly, and Juushirou cast her a surprised look.

“Naoko?”

“I don’t want Mitsuki wandering around the division alone if there’s an escaped felon on the loose,” Naoko said grimly. “You don’t need me here, Taichou, so I’d like permission to stick with her instead, please. I won’t intrude on her sickroom manner, but I’d be happier if someone was with her, in case Mitsuki’s still on a target list somewhere.”

“Naoko, I don’t need...” Mitsuki began, but Juushirou held up his hand.

“Naoko has a point,” he said evenly. “There’s no reason to suppose the felon will come here, but since Mitsuki is in our company and her life has been threatened, it makes good sense to ensure her security. Very well, permission is granted. Though Naoko, we’re under orders to catch the man, not kill him. Remember that, please.”

“I’ll do my best,” Naoko said crisply, meeting her friend’s gaze, and Mitsuki sighed, but nodded, leading the way out of the mess hall. Once the two women were gone, Juushirou took his own seat.

“Since you all know bits and pieces, let me give you the full outline of the situation as it stands,” he said quietly. “Second sent a message earlier this evening to say that the man Tsunemori, Kirio and I captured in the forests around the District Two/Three border had broken loose from his holding cell. He’d used Kidou to knock out two guards, but had not harmed them, and to begin with they thought he might be close by, but then it was discovered that another prisoner held in more closed security had had his throat slit at some point, probably by the same individual.”

“He killed someone, then ran?” Ketsui’s eyes widened. “He escaped from the Onmitsukidou but stopped back to commit a murder before trying to get away?”

“This individual is good at concealing himself, and he has some unusual abilities,” Juushirou said grimly. “We saw his ability to extend his arms beyond their normal length, and I imagine he can probably do far more in this regard to slip through bars and escape. To begin with, Second were very cagey about revealing this but I’ve had leave to do so now and so I will. The escaped man is a former member of the Onmitsukidou division, by the name of Suzuki Naoto. Ten years ago he performed a similar escape from Second custody whilst awaiting judgement for an alleged crime. The main accuser in that case is the man who has now been murdered in the high security cell, so it seems probable that we are indeed dealing with Suzuki. He was believed to have died following his escape, but that now seems unlikely. Suzuki Naoto was a squad captain in the regiment and well trained in discretionary arts, as well as those of a shinigami. He is potentially dangerous. We do not know what weapon he might carry, or if he’s discarded the blade that he used to cut the other prisoner’s throat somewhere on his travels, but as I mentioned before, he has Kidou skills.”

He paused, his eyes flitting to Kirio then to Ketsui, pausing for a moment on the silver head of the new recruit Izumi, and Kirio saw the tension flicker in her Captain’s eyes.

“I don’t believe Thirteenth is his target, and it is possible he will simply flee Seireitei, but we don’t want him to repeat his antics of ten years ago and disappear into the unknown a second time,” he continued wearily. “That being the case, I want you all to be on your guard. When you head out on your patrols, and your duties here within the division, be prepared. Do not get taken off guard. It is highly likely this man was at the very least involved in abducting members of the Gotei for unknown purposes, including a former member of our own, and so we have to be on our guard at all times.”

Another pause, then, at length,

“Kirio, Tsunemori, since you’ve knowledge of this felon’s appearance, I’ve been asked to spare you to help Eighth and Twelfth to know what they’re looking for. Sekime-taichou is concerned that recent work she’s been doing on the investigation into Souja-dono’s death might be a target for the escapee, whilst as I think you are all aware, Eighth Division have been doing investigations of their own into the business and would like a more accurate heads up on the person they’re seeking. That being so, Tsunemori, I want you to go next door to Twelfth, and Kirio, I’m sending you to Eighth.”

“At once, sir?” Kirio looked startled, and Juushirou nodded, but before anyone could make a move, a small, slightly bedraggled black butterfly flitted in through the window of the chamber, dancing dizzily around in a circle as though unsure where it should land. Enishi let out an exclamation of surprise, reaching out a thick finger to provide the insect with a perch, and as it settled itself against the Vice Captain’s calloused digit, it fluttered its wings slightly before dissipating in a cloud of blue-black dust.

“Enishi?” Juushirou cast his adjutant a quizzical look, and Enishi’s brows drew together.

“Message from Kitabata of the Seventh,” he said grimly. “Sounds like the felon made an appearance there. There was a tussle between him and some of Seventh’s people, but he got away. He’s still in Inner Seireitei, though, by the looks — maybe it’s not a good idea, sending Hikifune alone in that direction.”

“At Seventh?” Ketsui looked anxious. “Is Ten-nii...”

“No details in the report, kid, just the basics,” Enishi replied briskly. “Kitabata didn’t mention any casualties, just that there’d been a skirmish, so take that look off your face. You too, Hikifune. Tenichi’s a strong lad and Seventh isn’t the kind of division you want to mess with in their current mindset. It’s more likely the felon’s the one who took some bruises, and that’s why he made a run for it.”

“But he is still here and he must have been around the Seventh for a reason,” Juushirou reflected. “You’re right, Enishi. Kirio, I’m keeping you here. Shu... Kyouraku-taichou will just have to do without you. If the land around Seventh has been compromised, well, Suzuki knows your face and might try to hurt you.”

“What about me, sir? Should I still go to Twelfth?” Tsunemori asked apprehensively, and Juushirou nodded.

“Yes, but I won’t have you go alone. Kira, go with him,” he said decidedly. “Makoto, I want you to gather your usual patrol group and do a sweep of the perimeter — everyone is to carry zanpakutou.”

His gaze fell on Izumi again, and he frowned.

“There will be no recruits stepping outside of the main barrack building until further notice,” he decided firmly. “All ranked officers who are usually numbered in Naoko’s patrol, I want you to take the area around the koi pond at the rear of the Division grounds. Enishi, I want you to send a message to Eighth to let them know not to expect any of our members, then take charge of that group please. Kirio, I’m going to put you in charge of the recruits instead — your duty will be to ensure all the usual routine duties are carried out and to provide back-up and support if Makoto needs it. Ketsui, I want you with Kirio, please. There’ll be no mad dashes into the night to see if your brother is all right, not when your own division members need you, and I’m sure there will be plenty for the two of you to oversee. While it seems unlikely that Thirteenth will be a target, it’s better to be safe than sorry, so I want you both to have your swords with you just in case. You all have permission to utilise Kidou within the barracks complex and Division grounds if you feel it absolutely necessary, but try not to set fire to any buildings if you can help it, please.”

He raised his hand, acknowledging Enishi’s rueful grimace with a wry smile, then,

“Division dismissed.”

“Was it really all right, do you think, letting them go without telling them the other report we had this evening?”

As Enishi made his way towards the door, he paused, turning back to face his Captain across the now empty mess hall. “With that Ichimaru kid here, and this shadow on the loose, do you think we should’ve given them more idea of what’s at stake?”

“That Suzuki’s escape and the secure message I received from Third Division may be connected?” Juushirou rubbed his temples, letting out a heavy sigh. “What should I have said, Enishi? Keitarou’s been sighted in the Real World. That’s as much as we know. Maybe Suzuki was waiting for some sign, maybe he wasn’t. Perhaps this is part of the plan, perhaps it isn’t. Maybe Izumi is in danger... but I’ve taken what precautions I can, and I don’t know how giving Ketsui, Kirio or anyone else information would be of benefit. Knowledge isn’t necessarily a weapon against someone like Keitarou.”

“True enough, on past evidence,” Enishi agreed grimly. “Just, that silver haired kid might be as smart as her brother told us, but she doesn’t give me a lot of confidence in being able to defend herself. Girl can’t hold a sword properly, let alone swing it, though Ketsui, give him his due, spent a good three hours this morning trying to teach her. If we’re attacked, it seems pretty sure to me that it’d be her, not Edogawa who’d be targeted. I don’t want to lose either Ketsui or Hikifune in a scramble to protect that fox cub.”

“Me either,” Juushirou admitted. “I’ve encountered Suzuki, though, and I believe Kirio would be a match for him, providing she was aware of his presence — which would leave Ketsui to, hopefully, protect the recruits, Izumi included.”

“And if Keitarou follows up his attack on Nagesu-sama with one on Seireitei?” Enishi asked quizzically. Juushirou frowned, eying his adjutant pensively.

“You’ve been giving this an undue amount of thought, haven’t you?” he asked softly, and Enishi hesitated, then lowered his head in a nod.

“I don’t like thinking in terms of intrigue,” he admitted with a grimace. “It knots up my brain, and makes my head spin. But I do understand that the Ichimaru girl being here is important, and us protecting her is, too. And I know that it’s not good to have a former Onmitsukidou roaming loose after already killing a guy when it was my Captain who first brought him into custody. Nagesu-sama’s report was just the icing on the cake. What I do understand is hostile intent. The report from Third makes concrete everyone’s suspicions about Keitarou, so that makes it real. And the last time he showed his face, he had it in mind to kill you. Add to that the Ichimaru girl, and it makes Thirteenth a pretty attractive target, don’t you think? Especially if you consider Shikibu and Edogawa are also here.”

“We don’t know, yet, that Mitsuki was attacked by Keitarou’s forces in the Spiritless Zone,” Juushirou objected, but Enishi shook his head.

“Even I see that she was, so I’m sure you do too,” he said gruffly. “I mean no disrespect if I’m speaking out of turn, Ukitake, but it doesn’t take a genius to know that if the girl who killed Souja killed the healers in the Spiritless Zone, well, then it’s unlikely what happened to Aomori and Edogawa was coincidence. Shikibu thinks that way too, because we’ve talked about it. Shikibu’s none too sane on the Keitarou subject, and I dunno what might happen if he turned up here. I don’t know, sir. It makes me uneasy.”

Juushirou was silent for a long time, then he let out another sigh.

“If it’s even getting to you, then I suppose I’m not imagining how oppressive the air suddenly seems this evening,” he murmured. “I know, and I understand your fears. This is my choice as Captain, though, Enishi. I don’t want to bring Keitarou’s name up here until it’s absolutely necessary. I have faith in Kirio and Ketsui to protect Izumi and the other recruits, and in Naoko to protect Mitsuki should it be needed. With any luck Suzuki will have been given a fright at Seventh and will try to skirt away from division land... or Kai’s men will track him down sooner rather than later. Right now that’s the threat we know about, and it’s the one we need to face. Keitarou... all of that, for now, will have to wait till tomorrow.”

Enishi gazed at his companion for a moment, then he nodded his head.

“Being a Captain ain’t always easy, is it?” he observed, scratching his brow absently, and Juushirou smiled faintly, shaking his head.

“Having other people’s lives in your hands is never easy,” he agreed. “I’m glad I have you backing me up, even if you have doubts behind closed doors. With any luck, this threat will be handled this evening, and then... as a Gotei... we can look to dealing with the other problem that’s now loomed up large as life on our horizon.”

Left alone in the small bed chamber, Koku turned his attention fully to the bound volume Kirio had given him, gazing pensively at the rose pattern once more. Briefly, flickers of memory from his first foray outside of the barracks returned to him, the vivid colours, scents and glow of life that had engulfed him for the briefest of instants before fear and panic had returned to rule his wits. Kirio had called them ‘roses’, he remembered pensively, touching his finger to the image again. In Rukongai, there were no living flowers, nor really many signs of dead ones, for such things could not grow. Yet the ones on the paper, inked in by a careful hand seemed more real somehow than the ones he had seen by way of Katsura’s Seireitei memories, and for a moment he thought he could smell that sweet, intangible perfume that had assailed him in the fresh Seireitei air.

Maybe I’ll like flowers too, if I learn more about them.

Koku’s eyes narrowed thoughtfully, as carefully and gingerly he turned the page of the book, running his gaze down the neat columns of text that a scribe had taken great pains to turn into an elegant, calligraphic masterpiece. Unlike the grimy, tattered volumes he had thumbed to death in the Rukon, this book was clean and crisp, having been well looked after and carefully stored, and both the text and the illustrations were still in vivid, bold strokes. He was able to read the passages without having to squint to make out a faded or smudged kanji, and, as he absorbed himself in the first of the book's tales, images came unbidden into his mind, characters and scenes coming to life before his gaze as though conjured there by the author's words.

So this was what reading was in Seireitei?

He turned the page, smoothing it down as he devoured the next page of words, eager to see and experience more of the tale contained within the thin pages.

For as long as he could remember, reading had provided a soothing remedy to his headaches and the swirling images that made him dizzy and filled him with panic and fear. It had become a calming technique, and through its practice, he had learned things, but somehow, reading this book was different from those thick, heavy volumes he knew the text of almost by heart. Those he had read more to bring solace and rhythm into a place of confusion, relying on the certainty and reassurance of the same words appearing in the right order, just as he anticipated them to be. This, by contrast, was an entirely different experience. An unknown text, weaving in directions he could not predict or expect, that little by little dug its way into his sleeping imagination, pulling forth the colours and sounds into a sense of reality. Yet there was no fear in this illusion, rather an appreciation of a world created entirely by another's imagination. Koku had never read like this before, yet as he turned over yet another page to begin the next short story, he knew that of all the things that Kirio could have brought him, she truly had chosen the best.

Did she understand when she gave it to me what power this had? She said it was a favourite of hers, but could she have known... did she realise more quickly than I did that I would latch onto it in such a way? Or is it just a case that here, in Seireitei, there is life, and colour, and things beyond my imagining... things my mind now wants to understand?

There was a different kind of flower bordering this page, not a rose, yet despite Koku's careful examination, he could not make out what it was. Tiny, delicate pink blossoms adorned the branches of a tree like jewellery on the arm of a fine lady, small and insignificant on their own yet in such numbers they appeared like a cloud, almost cloaking the tree itself from view. Beneath the tree sat a man, grey eyed and dark haired, robed in greens and creams, his hair tied back in a style Koku did not recognise. Beside the picture were four characters which were clearly his name, but, unlike the neat graphs that told the story, this was written in a cursive script he found much more difficult to make out.

His gaze flitted back towards the text, looking for clues to the identity of this individual and what kind of tree it was he was seated beneath. Forgetting for a moment that he cared nothing for Seireitei or its society, or that, until moments earlier, the existence of either person or plant had been unknown to him, he searched the text hungrily, determined to know who this figure painted so plaintively beneath the cloud of pink petals could be. At length he found his answer, his heart lurching slightly in his throat as he made out the words.

Kuchi... ki... Shirosuke. Kuchiki?

A brief image of Mitsuki's face flickered before his thoughts, and he bit his lip.

Edogawa-san's kin? This is a legend... about them?

He turned back to the text.

Long ago, there was a young man, [he read]

Being the son of a noble house and having completed the coming of age rites, he began to travel between the provinces of the old country in search of a consort of exceptional beauty, but, although he had travelled through many places, and met many beautiful women, his heart had been captured by none of them.

Knowing he would soon be called back to his family, he stopped for a night in a small village below which a river ran, and as he walked along the river's edge, he began to play a sad song on his flute, believing he must have come as far from the world he knew and understood as he possibly could. The people in these parts spoke with rustic tongue and he could barely understand them, and so he felt lonely and began to dream of home.

On the banks of the river, there were many trees, but, as the man walked beneath their bent branches, he was suddenly taken aback by the glow of pink that seemed to shimmer out from the midst of the willow green. Fleeting and intransient as the snow resting on the branches in winter, these first messengers of spring spread their delicate petals boldly beneath the sun, and the young man, drawn to their warmth and courage, hastened to catch them as they drifted towards the ground, cupping his hand to gaze at the perfect form of the flower that nestled in his palm.

If only a woman so beautiful as this flower could appear to him, he thought, he would be the most blessed man in all of Seireitei.

A local man was fishing by the river, and the young lord asked this rustic what the name of the tree might be. The man spoke in thick tones, his dialect so heavy it was hard to make out, but eventually the lord understood that the flower was a cherry blossom, and the tree that flowered with such forceful beauty was a blessed tree, known as the Great Sakura. Within the Sakura lived a spirit of nature so beautiful that by her presence alone, the village and its surrounds thrived and shone brighter than any other, and when the young lord learned this, he determined that he must meet the deity of the Great Sakura for himself.

For days he camped by the river, drawing fish from the crystal waters to feed his appetite, and spending his days sitting beneath the branches, writing poetry and gazing up at the gradually fading petals of the Great Sakura, but still he could not hear the voice of the kami within the tree.

Heart broken, he decided to return to his family, but, as he gathered up his belongings to leave, the last of the delicate petals fell from the tree, dropping onto the hilt of his sword. The petal glimmered in the bright sunlight, then, from somewhere, the young man heard a voice.

The flowers are here for a brief time, but the true beauty lurks far within. The flowers leave to bring forth fruit, and the the rotting leaves nourish life for the next generation. If you seek beauty, you must also seek decay. This is the reality of our world. If you wish to truly see me, you must look into the ugly weave of my bark, not the pink of my petals, for they are just an illusion.

Startled, the young man turned, facing the tree and, for the briefest of moments, he thought he saw a woman's face shadowed against the gnarled trunk of the tree. Reaching out to touch the wood, he felt the prickle of energy beneath the tree's surface, and realised with a jolt that what he felt was the life of the tree, burning and beating as strongly as his own heart.

Touched and moved by the experience, the young lord decided to make this place his home, and to live always within view of the Great Sakura and its true, inner beauty. In honour of her words, he took the name, "Kuchiki", and for generations since, in this place where the Kuchiki Clan's greatness was founded, the descendents of Shirosuke have worshipped the beauty of the Sakura as a symbol of their continued growth.

Koku gazed at the image again, chewing pensively on his lip as he took in the image with new understanding.

I've only heard of the Kuchiki Clan in terms of the man who hurt Keitarou-san, and the boy who Eiraki-san killed. I've only encountered them through meeting Edogawa Mitsuki... to think a family I associated with such ugly sentiments has such a beautiful story at their heart. I thought I understood the Clans of Seireitei, but maybe I don't understand them at all. Maybe I don't know...

He faltered, tensing as there was a sudden shift in the air in the chamber. A prickle ran up his spine as he realised he was no longer alone. He glanced around him, seeing nothing, but although his eyes were fooled, his spiritual senses were not and his gaze darkened, lips thinning into a hard line as he identified his companion's reiatsu.

"I should've known," he murmured. "Something is creating a ruckus in Seireitei — and now you're here to see me. That's not a coincidence, is it? You've been biding your time, that's all."

"I'm impressed." The voice seemed to echo out of nowhere, "Even though your eyes could surely not see me, and my reiatsu is suppressed far, far below the levels most shinigami can detect at, still you know I'm here."

Very gradually the colour of the wall shifted and changed, taking on shades and density until the golden eyed assassin's skinny form became visible against the bamboo panels. He was robed in the same dark fabrics that he had been wearing the last time Koku had seen him, but even though the cloth was almost black in colour, there were patches that seemed darker, giving away stains of what was clearly drying blood. The scent of death lingered around the assassin's cadaverous form, and Koku was unable to suppress a shiver of revulsion as the fragments of dissipating spiritual energy tugged against his senses.

"You've been killing people," he observed softly, and Masaya shrugged.

"Settling an old score," he said dismissively. "It's nothing to do with you. You needn't worry — I didn't blood any of your new friends."

"New friends?" Koku arched an eyebrow, and Masaya's lips twisted into an unpleasant smile.

"Since you expected my coming, I imagine you know what I'm alluding to."

"I think I told you once. I know everything about you," Koku spoke evenly, setting aside the precious book and fixing his visitor with an impassive stare. "Good things, bad things... everything. But what I don't know is why you're here right now. I would've thought this would be the last place you'd choose to come — if you've escaped the shinigami's prison, I'm amazed you haven't run back to tell Keitarou-san all about it."

"Keitarou-san," Masaya mimicked, derision glittering in his feline gaze. He snorted, tossing his head disdainfully. "I'm not fooled by anything you do or say, not now. Things have changed since the last time we spoke. They've changed quite considerably, one might say."

"Oh?" Koku arched an eyebrow, and Masaya stepped neatly across the floor, pausing at the end of the bed.

"Katsura-sama made it safely back to the Rukon," he said quietly. "No harm came to him. I kept my end of the deal you imposed on me. I was taken prisoner but I knew I could escape at any time I needed to. I was hoping to learn something important to take back with me before I did. What I learned, however..."

His eyes became slits, and before Koku knew what was happening the other man was almost on top of him, the skinny fingers of his left hand grasping the collar of Koku's nightrobe so tightly the injured boy felt the edges of the fabric pressing ominously against his adam's apple. Masaya's grip was cold and determined, and he wrapped his free hand around the weakened Koku's shoulder, digging his nails deep into the joint until the younger man gasped in pain. Without missing a beat, Masaya thrust Koku up against the wall, the patient's spine thudding sickeningly against the bamboo panels. Gold eyes gleaming with triumph, Masaya pushed his own head closer to his victim's, boring that amber gaze deep into the startled brown eyes of his prey..

"You betrayed Keitarou-sama," he hissed, and for the first time Koku felt the killer instinct that flared at the edges of the spy's aura. "You came here without permission, you brought a shinigami back here... because of you, they know about Keitarou-sama and all kinds of other things. You lectured me and threatened me, but I see through you. I see what you really are. Keitarou-sama put false trust in you... but I won't be so easily blinded."

"I haven't betrayed anyone," Koku struggled to free himself from his companion's grip, all too aware of how physically frail his body still was as it recovered from Kikyue's strike. The collar of the robe tore slightly, allowing him to draw breath into his lungs unhindered, but Masaya was not to be discouraged so easily. Deftly he switched his hold from Koku's shoulder to his chest to pinion the other in place, adjusting the long, bony fingers of his left hand so that they pressed directly against the exposed skin of the young man's throat. The digits twitched and extended slightly, breaking out of their normal sockets to twist unnaturally around Koku's throat like a rope, and despite himself, fear flickered deep within the Rukon stray's heart. He tried to raise his own hands to push the former Onmitsukidou away, but Masaya had judged his moves carefully, and a simple shift of his body was enough to block the attempts, leaving Koku's fingers flailing helplessly some inches from their target. He had been out-thought and outmanoeuvred in every way, and he swallowed hard, wondering whether he had underestimated the ability of Keitarou's hand-picked fanatic.

"I told you. I'm not fooled," Masaya could clearly see the distress in the dark brown eyes, for a sinister smile of satisfaction began to twist across his sallow face. "You say you know all about me, but you've forgotten that I know all about you, too. I've told Keitarou-sama that he doesn't need you. Any of you. Now you've betrayed him, you can't expect his protection any more. Your threats, your words... all lies. You're working for the shinigami and you know Keitarou-sama would never forgive that."

"I... am... not!" Koku managed to gasp out the words, but Masaya let out a contemptuous chuckle.

"What would the shinigami say if they knew where you really came from?" he asked, the gleam of the predator in his amber eyes. "What would they say if they knew what I know about you?"

"You don't... know anything... about me!"

"You're wrong," Masaya shook his head. "I know everything I need to know about you... enough to destroy you just by opening my mouth. However, I prefer a more permanent solution — shinigami are unpredictable and I like to know that I've cleaned up all the loose ends. That's what makes a secret agent... and I was very good at that job, once upon a time."

He grinned coldly, slowly tightening his grasp around the other's throat. It was not enough to cut off the airway, nor make Koku lose consciousness, but he had applied enough force to prove he had control of the situation, and Koku's heart began to pound unevenly in his chest. Masaya was not strangling him — not yet — but only because he had chosen not to apply the deadly pressure needed to choke his airway or, even worse, snap his neck like a twig. Koku's mind raced as incomplete images of similar death delusions flickered fragmented across his thoughts. Assassins were capable of such things, he realised dully. Assassins were taught to kill in a plethora of different ways — and in his current state, there was no way he could physically fight back. There was no mercy in Masaya's eyes, no sense of hesitation or regret, just zealous pleasure at the thought of removing one of his rivals for Keitarou's attention, and Koku struggled to keep his composure, fighting to get free but unable to improve his position under the firm hold of his opponent.

“You’re here, within the depths of their heartland, covered in their reiatsu and their bandages, and you say you’re not a traitor?” Masaya was mocking him now, tightening his hold around Koku’s throat momentarily to make the young man cough before loosening it just enough to allow him to gulp air desperately into panicked lungs. “You know, I was thoroughly trained in all the skills of the assassin, and I was once ranked quite highly within the Second’s covert organisation. You might have had pull in the Rukon, and you might have persuaded me to do your bidding — then. But as I said, things have changed. Keitarou-sama doesn’t protect traitors, and nor do I. And, in this physical condition,”

He paused, slapping his right hand cruelly against Koku’s bandaged torso, before pulling his fingernails across it with enough force to loosen the binding and make the young man flinch involuntarily. The hint of a yelp began in the depths of Koku’s vocal chords, but Masaya had no idea of letting him alert anyone to his current position, for he tightened his grip immediately, choking off the cry before it could break forth from Koku’s lips.

“They can’t sense me,” he said softly. “You might be able to, but they can’t. My reiatsu was always hard to find... now it’s even harder, thanks to Keitarou-sama’s help. They won’t come here... they’re looking for me everywhere but there. By the time they find you, you’ll be another broken corpse in the paper trail of their mystery. They won’t get a chance to prise out of you things that might hurt Keitarou-sama’s cause further.”

“He won’t... forgive you... if you... kill me,” Koku managed to gasp out, as the fingers loosened briefly at his throat, and Masaya smirked.

“The shinigami killed you, thanks to that war wound across your gut,” he said lightly. “That’s what happened, and that’s all he’ll know. He trusts me, and I won’t betray that trust.”

He pressed his face yet closer, till Koku could almost feel the man’s hot breath against his face.

“The best thing you can do is lie back and die,” Masaya whispered. “You won’t escape me. It’s bad to leave an Onmitsukidou with wounded pride... we don’t take that well. Finish us off when you have the chance, or prepare to be hunted down and killed in your turn. That’s how I was trained, and no amount of poison or exile can break those habits. You forget that here, the tables are turned. I’m used to Seireitei — you’re not. I knew the people who held me, but you don’t know the first thing about the people who have you in their clutches. I could escape from that cage at any time, while you’re helpless and injured into the bargain. You made a fatal mistake... and it will be your last."

Does that worm really think that he can kill you that easily?

The words ricocheted across Koku's senses like a splash of cold water, and the entirety of the young man's vision exploded into a flare of reds and yellows, vibrating with an indignant anger that suddenly seemed more real and more terrifying than anything the spy's dislocated fingers could inflict. Koku felt his control slipping away from him, for, half-starved of air and boxed into the corner by Masaya's grapple-hold, he was helpless to the other man's sadistic whims. His lungs spasmed, desperately trying to drag in oxygen to steady himself, but already he could feel the prickle of dark energy rippling through his body, and he knew that it was too late to force it back.

Stop it. Stop it! Nobody called you here... go away!

I've told you before, and I'll tell you again.

The voice was cold and full of disdain.

You are weak, but I am strong. I own you, and I will conquer every inch of you and take you for my own. You're useful to me, and so long as I consider that the case, I'm going to keep you alive. I don't care if you'd rather die here... death isn't an option, as I've told you before.

I can fight him on my own.

Can you? Can you really?

There was a snort of derision, then,

It doesn't seem that way to me.

The pressure of Masaya's hands against his throat again sent Koku's lungs once more into spasm, and he battled desperately against his assailant's hold, face red and body gasping as he tried in vain to free himself. Masaya's grip was firm, and he was still weak from his wounds. Already the world was becoming hazy, the explosions of colour and light becoming more real and vivid than the gold eyes of the assassin and the plainly furnished Gotei room which had been his shelter for the past several days. Already he was losing touch with what was there and what was not... sinking deep, deeper down into the eternal darkness of death which he had seen claim so many other souls. He closed his eyes, forcing himself to grasp hold of the fragmented pieces of his sanity, but they were cracking and shattering beneath his touch, drifting into ever smaller shards that disappeared before him into the abyss. Overhead, he could sense the deprecating gaze of another's piercing eyes, judging him, hating him, but ultimately standing back and letting him struggle. As soon as he gave up the fight, Koku knew, the demon would be in and it would be all over — for him and for Masaya — but he had no energy left to fight. He was going to die, but more terrifying than that, he was going to live... stifled and suppressed inside his own body as the dark, ruthlessness of the demon took control.

And then, just as he thought his entire body would explode from lack of oxygen, a fresh image flickered across his senses. At first it was hazy, no more than a blur of indistinct colours swirling together yet as it gained in definition, Koku realised with a jolt what it was he was seeing.

No, this was no errant vision or delusion. He was not seeing it... he was remembering it.

A young man was huddled on the ground before him, caked in blood. A wounded soldier reached out a hand, begging him for help to travel through the black hole to return home. A man barely older than Katsura, injured beyond saving, yet thinking only of his duty, not of his own life. A man who was a stranger promising him sanctuary and reaching out in trust.

Souja-dono.

Tears glittered against Koku's lashes at the memory, bitterness welling up in his heart as he remembered Souja's expression and heard his voice, speaking so calmly and rationally despite how close to death he had been.

You did everything to stay alive just those few moments more. You did it for what you believed in. You did everything for that cause, and that's why I brought you home. If you'd lived, things would've been different. I knew that before, and I know it now. But you dying doesn't mean I can stop fighting. And right now I need to fight — not just against Kurotsuchi, but for what I believe in.

He clenched his fists, new determination to live flooding through him as he punched his knuckles against the wall with as much force as he could muster, drawing on the sudden shock of pain to break the illusion of darkness and return him to awareness. Masaya was still speaking to him, he realised, loosing and tightening his hold at Koku's throat. He was apparently unaware of the ominously dark swell that had almost swallowed his victim whole, and Koku registered that only the briefest of split-seconds had passed, despite it feeling as though he had been under for an eternity. With every twitch of Masaya's deformed fingers, the amount of time he had to draw in air grew less and less, and it was clear that the assassin had no intention of a quick kill, intending to savour his victory in revenge for the encounter in the Rukon that seemed like so long ago now. As his rationality began to return, Koku knew he had no choice but to take advantage of his opponent's desire to milk the moment.

He hasn't snapped my neck, so he thinks he can watch me suffocate, little by little, and I have to use that to my advantage. I have to live through this. Souja-dono died, but I can't. Not yet. It's not over yet.

Aware that the dark, angry swirls of colour were still circling at the peripheries of his vision, readying for a second assault, he focused instead on his hands, forcing each finger to stretch as far as it would go until it brushed against the other man's lean torso. He could not do anything about Masaya's stranglehold, but, as he felt the rough fabric of Masaya's clothing beneath his touch, he said an inward prayer of thanks. Releasing the floodgates that held back his spirit power, he allowed what little reserves he had left to pour forth through his body, pooling against his skin and out into the surrounding environment.

"What are you doing?" Masaya was taken off guard, loosening the hold at Koku's throat as for the first time he sensed the prickle of energy now glittering around the young man's hands, and Koku forced his trembling fingers to extend their reach across his enemy's clothing, pushing to make closer contact with Masaya's skin. It was all he could manage, for his spiritual energy was still shattered into disjointed pieces from his injury. Nausea flooded through him, as his abused body protested at the effort whilst he was still convalescent, but he ignored the twinges of pain that rippled through his injured gut, knowing that to pull back now would cost him his life. If Masaya perceived the threat too soon, he could counter, and Koku knew that he could not let that happen. Unlike Tenichi's half-hearted, panicked attempt, Masaya meant business.

I couldn't save Souja-dono. At the very least, I need to save myself.

"I can't die here," Somehow words formed on his lips, little more than a hoarse whisper as he redoubled his efforts to steady the buzz of reiryoku which was now pulsing through his body. It was uneven, flaring one minute and feeble the next, but the assassin let out an exclamation of dismay, trying to pull back as he sensed the danger he was in. It was too late, however, for Koku's blooded fingers gripped hard against Masaya's clothing, digging in to maintain contact as he pumped his spiritual energy across the gap between them. In his weakened state, body battered and bruised, it was all he could do to summon this amount of power, but the assassin fell back, eyes widening in fear and alarm as though something terrible had just flashed before his eyes.

It was the same look the assassin had given him in Rukongai, and as Koku met his assailant's gaze, sadness glittered deep within his own brown eyes.

"I don't kill," he said softly. "I told you in the Rukon that if you let Katsura get hurt, I would kill you, but I believe you when you say he returned safe. You kept your side of the deal, just as you said. I don't care that you attacked me... I understand why you did. I'm not a traitor — not how you think I am. But I can't die... not yet."

He let out a shaky breath of air, tightening his hold once last time as a final pulse of spiritual energy rippled across the divide between the two men, and as it washed over them, Koku was suddenly aware of a flickering in Masaya's aura. To Koku's dismay, something dark and cloying broke free from the assassin's body, filtering like black smoke from the man's ears and mouth into an ominous cloud of choking energy that fragmented and disappeared into the ether around them. The assassin let out a gasp, his eyes darting all over the place in confusion and disorientation, and he thudded back against the wall as though thrown with force, suddenly unable to hold himself upright as the malevolent energy poured forth like a damned soul leaving the body. The golden eyes rolled back into his head, devoid of all signs of life, and, like a puppet whose strings had been cut, Masaya slid down the wall, falling onto the blankets in a crumpled heap.

Koku stared in disbelief, pulling his hands back hurriedly as though they had been scalded. Had he done too much? Killed the man? He knew that Masaya's life had been saved by science once, but had he been closer to death than the young man had thought? His whole body began to shake in fear and alarm at what he might have achieved, nausea flooding through him as he stared at the still form.
But I can't have killed him... can I?

You should have. If you weren't such a wimp, it would've been quicker. I wouldn't have hesitated... you should've let me do it instead.

I don't intend on ever letting you do anything. Not ever

Koku's thoughts flared up in defiance, but still the assassin did not move, and he bit his lip, mind racing as he struggled to work out what to do. If the shinigami returned, if they saw this scene... what would happen? What would they say, what would they do?

Seconds passed that felt like hours, minutes that felt like days, and he was just summoning his courage to extend a tentative finger to poke Masaya's arm when there was a faint murmur from the fallen assassin, and, to Koku's relief, the man began to stir.

You didn't even get that right. Pathetic. You'd think I'd shown you enough death for you to kill with a hint of penache. No, just managing to kill him at all would've been progress. Instead you're gasping like a little girl because he's alive. You disgust me. You really do.

Good. Then go away.

Koku forced up his mental barriers, blocking out the voice with more force and determination than he had managed before, and instead turning his attention to the dazed assassin who was slowly but surely dragging himself into a sitting position. For a moment they met gazes, and Koku was struck by the blank expression in his companion's amber eyes. Masaya's lips pressed together in clear bewilderment, but there was no sign of recognition anywhere in his gaze or his demeanour. On the contrary, the clear killing instinct that had radiated from the man's lean body moment's earlier had completely dissipated, and Koku realised with growing disbelief that he could now sense the man's reiatsu on a more normal level. A level the shinigami too might pick up on, he realised in consternation. They would come here, and find them, and...

"Who... where... what?"

At length the assassin's words broke the silence, three disjointed questions which fell from his lips one by one. He raised a hand to his head, closing his eyes as a look of pain crossed his features, then opening them again, and this time Koku saw a flicker of animation deep in the golden gaze. It was the first time in the whole of their acquaintance that Masaya's expression had appeared alive, and Koku's heart clenched in his throat as he understood the significance of what had occurred.

So that was it. I should have realised sooner. Keitarou-san took everything from you when he saved your life... more than I ever realised he had. I was wrong, Kurotsuchi. I didn't know everything there was to know about you. I didn't... but now I do. Now I understand. I just have to work out... what to do with that information.

He inched his aching body forward, using his right hand to stabilise his shaking form against the wall and reaching to cup the other under his companion's chin, raising the man's head so that their gazes were on a level. This time, it was Koku's dark brown eyes which locked deep into the depths of Masaya's bewildered golden ones, and as Koku dragged himself closer, he took a deep, ragged breath into battered lungs, focusing all of his composure on summoning one last pulse of spiritual energy.

Leave.

As he felt the impulse pool out around his body, raw and far weaker than what he had used to dispel Sakaki, he saw the fear and alarm that glittered in Masaya's gaze, and the assassin pulled back, slapping Koku's arm away in terror and drawing hurriedly back away from his companion. Koku forced himself to keep eye contact, watching the plethora of different emotions that rippled through the golden eyes as tears formed on the man's lashes.

"A monster," Masaya murmured, then, "Some kind... of monster?"

With this incoherent observation, he was gone, dropping into a desperate flashstep which came more from instinct than from genuine technical skill, and Koku sighed, burying his head in his hands as the tension of the encounter rippled over his battered body.

A monster? No. The monster was within you all the time. And I...

He raised his head, turning his hands over and gazing at the blooded, raw skin of his battered knuckles.

I should've seen that one coming. I thought I knew all the pieces of this puzzle... but I guess I was wrong.

You didn't kill him, and then you let him go?

As his concentration began to lapse, the words battered against his thoughts, fainter now, but determined to make their opinion known, and Koku could just about make out the contempt in the muffled syllables.

If you think I'll sit back and let that go, you're mistaken.

The next moment Koku felt his mental barriers crack and shatter as an overwhelming surge of spiritual energy poured across his senses, colours and lights blurring into blood and chaos as he saw person after person ripped down and torn apart. He tossed back his blanket, stumbling off the bed towards the door of the chamber in an attempt to escape the oppressive waves of terror and despair now flooding his senses, but there was no way to flee from what was in his head, and tears began to trickle down his cheeks as he grabbed the doorframe, inwardly begging the dark waves of delusion to pull back.

Stop it. Please, stop it! I can't... I don't want to...

This is the future you're walking towards, my friend. You can't stop it, and I won't let you try. You waste time immersing yourself in the self-appreciating tales of Seireitei's Clansfolk, but this is the reality, and the only image you should pay attention to. One saved assassin won't change the inevitable. Of all people, you dare to doubt Kohaku's word, and fight against it most of all? You who, of everyone, sees its truth and knows its full meaning?

There was a mocking chuckle, then,

Well, no matter. A fool you might be, and a coward, but you're a useful vessel and I won't let you die. It changes nothing, whatever you do. The world is going to sink into war... and unless you sacrifice life, you can't stop it. But there's a dichotomy, isn't it? You, who refuses to kill, standing back and letting others die. This one is a minnow, but there will be others. Just remember...

The image of a corpse flitted across Koku's senses, vivid and bloody and Koku swallowed the bile in his throat as he recognised the face of the fallen figure. It was a face he had seen before, from a scene that had played out a multitude of times in his nightmares, but somehow following the encounter with Masaya it seemed more vivid and real, and he knew that time was running out.

The Endou shinigami is dead, and there's nothing you can do about it. Whatever you choose, my friend... in the end you'll lose. The war is coming, so take my advice. Let go of these stupid ideas of yours and accept the reality of the situation. Join it. Embrace it. Kill for it. You can't prevent it from happening... so be a part of it. Do as Keitarou-dono told you — accept your destiny, and accept me.

"I won't," Koku gasped out the words, flinging back the door of the chamber and staggering into the hallway, his fingers groping desperately against the wood for support yet trembling too much to manage a stable grip and after just a few steps he pitched forward, falling against the wall as the tears streamed down his face.

"Stop it," he murmured, unaware that he was speaking out loud now, for his pleas were falling on deaf ears. "Please, make it stop."

"Koku?"

The sound of Mitsuki's voice did nothing to soothe his traumatised wits, for the sense of her reiatsu nearby was enough to trigger the memories of the Spiritless Zone and the battle with the Hollow that he had inadvertently picked up from Katsura's memories. As she hurried down beside him, putting an arm around his shoulders to prevent him from falling headlong, he twitched back as though burned by the contact, for a moment drowning in a sea of mingled spiritual energy from which he struggled to pull out and redefine his own. The nausea rocked over him, churning through his stomach, yet he only knew from Mitsuki's exclamation and the instructions she shouted to someone else to fetch help that he had actually been sick, dropping back against her body as he was unable to hold his own body up any longer.

“Help me get him back in his room,” he heard the healer say, though the words sounded very far away. “His bandages are coming loose, and he’s clearly agitated by something.”

“He’s all red around the throat,” another woman, this time one Koku did not know, cut into the conversation. “Was he bruised there before? I thought Taichou said he took a strike to the gut.”

“He did,” Koku was aware of being hoisted clumsily up between the two women as they hauled his limp, dangling body back into the small chamber and forced him to lie down on the bed that a moment before had seemed like a prison full of ill omens. “But no, he wasn’t bruised there before.”

A finger touched Koku’s neck, and he pulled back again. A whimper escaped his lips, and there was a sigh.

“Well, either he hurt himself really badly escaping his sickroom, or someone thought it would be nice to give him a necklace of bruises,” the second woman observed bluntly.

“Mm,” Mitsuki’s voice was troubled. “He’s very upset — I haven’t seen him this bad before, not even when Ryu and I found him in the garden, so something must’ve scared him. I’m going to sedate him, Naoko — hold him still for me while I make him drink it. It will calm him down, and then one of us can tell Juushirou. It looks like the Second Division’s escapee did make a pit stop in Thirteenth Division... but his target wasn’t me.”

Author’s Note:

Yeeps. Everyone is trying to kill Koku, lately o.O. If I were him, I’d start getting a complex about it...

Also! The legend. Well, I’ve said lots of times that for me the Kuchiki are the most classically Japanese of the Noble families as far as I’m concerned. I’m always using historic references for things relating to them. I’ve been influenced a lot this year by classical Japanese texts, and there are a few elements of Ise Monogatari (written in 9th/10th century Japan) that inspired the writing of this, especially in the beginning part. Almost all the passages in Ise begin with “long ago, there was a man,” so. In terms of the text, that’s just a random imagining of a Kuchiki origins legend.

I’ve always tied the Kuchiki to the sakura because of Senbonzakura, and therefore made the Kuchiki celebrate the sakura each spring with festivals. With that in mind, I thought that would be a nice story for Koku to be reading in the book. The name Kuchiki means “decayed wood”, and that’s always struck me as interesting. There are any number of reasons why Kubo might have chosen it, but I thought I'd give one potential reason, since traditionally surnames in Japan were awarded or taken from places where people lived, and only people of status had them.

Kuchiki Shirotsugu is, therefore, the "founder" of the "modern Kuchiki" and the Great Sakura (or more likely one of its descendants) is in the grounds of Guren's manor, built in the location Shirotsugu made his home. The prosperity of the Kuchiki is therefore thanks to the blessing of the Great Sakura that made the village prosper. This is... so much like a Japanese kami legend that it just... had to happen. It also provided a nice innocent contrast for Kurotsuchi's entrance... so I hope you guys enjoyed it ;)

The characters used to write Shirotsugu are 白哉. Now where might we have seen those before, I wonder...? ;)

Reihahen

霊破片. This is Tenichi's zanpakutou. It's name means "Spirit shard" or 'Broken Piece of Soul/Spirit' if you prefer to be poetic. It's release is Kiba o Muke 牙をムケ "Bare your fangs". The inspiration for this came from a conversation with a friend in which I realised how Tenichi bore a striking resemblance to a canon character in his frustrating behaviour. For that reason, his sword's name and release come mostly from song lyrics belonging to this character from the Bleach Musical. I'm not going to say who or where, so I don't get hate mail, though cookies for anyone who knows ;)

The attack, Kobanashi 木端破矢 means "Wooden splinter, broken arrow". Actually, koba, pronounced koppa, has another meaning, but that's beside the point..innocent. Naginata was suggested to me by a friend for the form of Tenichi's weapon, and this appealed to me because of Musashibou Benkei, a key figure in the legends of the Genpei War (around which I have been lately writing my academic masters dissertation xD). Benkei was a monk who is remembered in Japanese war folklore as fighting to the death to protect the hopeless cause of the war hero Yoshitsune (around whose literary legend Kubo has based a lot of Byakuya's imagery). He fought with a naginata and was such a ferocious figure that he died standing up, weapon in hand and the enemy were too scared to approach him in case he came back to life and attacked once again. Not that I think Tenichi is really comparable to the figure of Benkei, but you know, I like things like that :).

Additional note: The Manga!

As some of you know, I'd more or less intended not to read the manga for a bit, since it was getting to a point where I was just ranting about it. But then one of my friends decided to tell me the whole story of this week's chapter, and so I ended up reading it anyway. Sigh. It features more messed up continuity, but anyhow.

Kubo's SS doesn't parallel Meifu's in the distant past, but I don't really care about that, I never expected it to. But someone did point out to me that in the picture of Yama and the Captains, there are eight figures. Eight, huh...;)

Also, anyone who is a Shunsui fan and who isn't currently reading the manga, at least stop in and check the first page. You might not want to read the rest of the chapter, but the first page is really cute. ;)

42. Fox Hunt

Chapter Forty One: Fox Hunt

The mood was sombre as Tenichi was led into the small back office of the Seventh Division, a grim expression on his features as he followed his Fourth Seated officer between the desk to the furthest end of the room. Kai raised his hand, indicating for the Eighth Seated officer to be seated, and reluctantly Tenichi did so, adrenaline driven anger and indignation at Kai's attitude still pulsing through his veins. Only the impassive presence of Hajime had prevented him from answering back when the instruction had first been given, and now he sat and simmered, resentful and sullen about the sudden invasion.

"Kai-dono?" Once sure his companion was settled, Hajime cast Kai a quizzical glance, and Kai nodded his head, folding his arms across his chest and pacing across the room to stand just a metre or two away from where Tenichi sat.

"Kotetsu, the other day you came to identify a prisoner of mine," he said quietly, and Tenichi raised his gaze, meeting the Shihouin's golden eyes with his own. "During that meeting, you told us that you knew nothing of the man in our custody. Is that not correct?"

"Yes, sir," It was impossible for Tenichi to keep the edge out of his voice, and Kai's eyes narrowed thoughtfully.

"Tonight, however, that prisoner escaped," he continued evenly.

"I didn't have anything to do with that!" Now indignation flooded the young officer's senses, and he stared at Kai in dismay. "Do you think I'd break into the Second Division to rescue some creepy guy I know nothing about? Don't be ridiculous! I was at Seventh — I've been at Seventh the whole time and you can ask Hajime-dono or Nakata-san or even Kikyue-dono if you don't believe me!"

"Kotetsu, mind your lip," Hajime's gruff reproach prevented Kai from immediately responding, and Tenichi's lips thinned as he faced his superior officer. "Nobody has accused you of anything, and you're shaming yourself and your division speaking back to a superior officer in that tone of voice."

"It's all right, Hajime-dono. I'd like to hear Kotetsu's thoughts and feelings uncensored, even if they happen to be rough-edged," Kai held up his hand to indicate that he was not offended. "Nobody is suggesting you let the man free, Kotetsu. We know you didn't. He was a trained agent of the Onmitsukidou, and it's likely he used knowledge of his prior involvement with us to effect his own escape."

"Oh." Tenichi bit his lip, looking chastened. "I'm sorry. I... it was just..."

"My interest in you is simply why your name came up so quickly in our attempts to trace our missing felon," Kai continued evenly, ignoring Tenichi's flustered attempts at an apology. "I call you to see this prisoner, and you say you don't know him — yet the prisoner seeks you out and attacks you? Instead of fleeing the premises completely, and getting far, far from the Gotei's auspices, he stops to launch an attack on you, Kotetsu Tenichi, Eighth Seated officer of the Seventh Division. Now why would he do that?"

"Maybe because he saw Kotetsu the other day," Hajime looked troubled. "I've heard this man is unbalanced — maybe he thought Kotetsu would recognise him and so tried to rid himself of the threat."

"By going out specifically to attack a man who almost certainly didn't know he'd escaped?" Kai was sceptical. "I know you want to help your officer, Hajime-dono, but that won't do. This man may be... a little odd, but he is not stupid. More, he was once a ranking officer under my command, and I know his abilities and his discretion as well or better than anybody else. He's not an individual who chooses to show himself unless there's a good reason for it. No, he attacked Kotetsu for a reason."

"If he did, sir, I don't know what it was," Tenichi's palms were sweating and he pressed his hands together absently, meeting Kai's gaze with as level expression as he could muster. "He just came at me out of the darkness. I thought he was going to hurt me so I fought back. A junior ran out, and so I acted on reflex to deflect his blast. Perhaps I acted rashly, releasing Reihahen, but when someone launches themselves at you like that..."

"Nothing else you could do," Hajime agreed.

"And if this man was the one who abducted you?" Kai pressed. "The one who pulled you into the Senkaimon?"

"I... I don't know about..."

"I thought Kotetsu had no memory of that event," Hajime objected. "Kai-dono, I know you want to track this person down, but there's no evidence that Kotetsu's done anything wrong. On the contrary, by fighting this evening he was defending his division and doing his duty — can I ask why you insisted on dragging him in here and talking to him like he's a suspect in some greater conspiracy? This is Second's prisoner, and he broke Second's custody. Shouldn't you be interrogating your men, if you suspect something odd about the escape? Clearly Kotetsu had nothing to do with it, and your reasons for pulling him in here like this are oblique and insulting to Seventh's honour."

"I don't suspect him of plotting to release Suzuki," Kai said gravely, "but I do believe Kotetsu knows exactly who kidnapped him. More, I'm sure it was my prisoner, and that the risk of identification is what drove Suzuki to attack Kotetsu this evening. It wasn't a random attack, it was designed and specific."

"But Kotetsu already failed to identify your man when you called on him," Hajime pointed out, and Kai nodded, turning to the uneasy Tenichi.

"That's true," he agreed softly. "But I didn't entirely believe him. Rather, I felt Kotetsu was frightened by seeing my prisoner. You don't become frightened by someone you know nothing about, Hajime-dono, not when they're locked behind bars and doing nothing to excite anyone's reactions. Suzuki is a nondescript man with a nondescript demeanour, and he was in no way a violent or troublesome prisoner. On the contrary, he was reading a book quietly in the corner of his cell when Kotetsu came to see him. Yet Kotetsu seemed scared by him. So although he didn't identify the man... it was fairly certain to me that they had met before."

Tenichi tensed, staring up at Kai in horror, and Kai offered him a grim smile.

"I've been involved in the Onmitsukidou since before it formally began, and I know a lot of tricks of deception and misdirection," he explained. "You were frightened, and you lied to me. You knew the man in my cell, and he knew you. He came after you tonight because of that reason — either that or you went after him. I'm not quite sure yet which one is the true one — but I don't believe this encounter was at all coincidental."

Tenichi swallowed hard, and Hajime frowned, glancing at his officer and then back at Kai.

"You have evidence for this?" he asked quietly. "Kotetsu is a good officer and he's in our trust. He's done nothing in his time with us to suggest he'd be involved in anything untoward, and I won't believe it unless you can pull out something that ties him into this whole conspiracy you're building up here. With all respect, Kai-dono, it sounds like you've jumped to conclusions based on your interpretation of Kotetsu's behaviour. The man has probably never been to the heart of Second before, certainly not near the dungeon you like to call a holding bay. No wonder he was intimidated. It takes a strong hearted man not to be scared when in the clutches of the Onmitsukidou."

Kai allowed a rueful smile to touch his lips, nodding in acknowledgement of Hajime's point.

"Perhaps," he agreed, "and I'm not accusing Kotetsu of anything untoward. My belief is simply that he knew our prisoner was the one who abducted him, and something about the man frightened him enough that he couldn't say so, not when that prisoner was present. The prisoner escaped, and there was a scuffle between them tonight... one trying to prevent the other from talking about something that happened. In light of the evidence we have, the obvious conclusion would be that Kotetsu could identify my prisoner as his abductor and that prisoner wanted to eliminate a witness."

"I see," Hajime rubbed his chin pensively. "Well, Kotetsu?"

"I don't remember anything about being abducted," Tenichi's mouth felt dry and full of cotton wool as he forced the lie over his lips once more, and tears of frustration glittered in his eyes. "I don't know what you want me to tell you."

"The truth, as you see it, please," Kai was unmoved by the other man's unsettled emotions, leaning back against the wall and eying the Eighth Seat thoughtfully. 'We have good evidence to indicate that you were taken and held in a remote part of Rukongai. We also have evidence of things occurring in that part of Rukongai which are undoubtedly in breach of Seireitei law. I'm not questioning your integrity,' as Tenichi flinched, dismay flooding his features, "and if you say you don't remember where you were held, until I have evidence to the contrary, all I can do is believe you. But when it comes to your kidnapper, things are different. You are right when you say you were with the Seventh tonight, and some of them saw your fight with the escaped man. One of them — the youngster you protected — also overheard snippets of the dialogue between you."

"Dialogue?" Hajime looked startled, and Kai nodded.

"When I arrived, one of your young officers told me he'd heard my prisoner threaten Kotetsu," he said blackly. "He was full of how Kotetsu saved him, and how the other guy had been making threats. When I heard it, the faint suspicions I'd had about Kotetsu's memory became far more firm in my mind. Apparently my prisoner told Kotetsu that if he didn't keep his mouth shut, he'd come kill him. That isn't the kind of thing you say to someone you've never met... nor someone you believe doesn't remember you, even if you have encountered each other before."

Tenichi's features drained of all colour, and he drew a shaky breath into his lungs, wetting his lips as he reeled from the Onmitsukidou officer's revelation. At the clear look of dismay on his subordinate's features, Hajime bit his lip.

"Kai-dono, Seventh is a battered place at the moment," he said softly. "It's a shameful thing to ask from an Endou to a Shihouin, but I'll ask anyway. Please don't break one of the few remaining sane members I have left."

"I have an investigation to complete, and I need to complete it," Kai said frankly. "I don't mean any disrespect to the Endou or to Seventh, but a man is dead and I want to know why. More, I want to find the people responsible, and prevent any further calamities from befalling the Gotei or Seireitei as a whole."

"We all want to do that," Hajime responded, "but Kotetsu's been under enough strain. His abduction was bad enough, but it was that the Fukutaichou was investigating when he was struck down. Nakata reported to me that Kotetsu blamed himself — and he's not an Endou, he doesn't have the resilience we have to death nor the same quick ability to recover from it that we do. If Kotetsu did lie to you... and I don't know that he did, but if he did... I feel sure it's for that reason. It's because of Souja-dono."

"I didn't kill anyone," Tenichi whispered, and Kai sighed, softening his expression as he took in the other man's pallor.

"Nobody suspects you of being responsible for Souja-dono's death. We know our killer, we even know her name, and we know roughly what must've occurred," he said quietly. "All we need to know from you is the missing pieces of the puzzle that might stop your Vice Captain from finding justice. You were abducted into a disused Senkaimon outside the Twelfth Division, and you were taken to Rukongai. These things we can prove, whether you can tell us about them or not. What I need to know from you is about that abduction. The man who attacked you tonight... he threatened you, and you knew who he was. Didn't you?"

"Kotetsu, tell him," Hajime said brusquely. "Whatever it is you do remember, if Kai-dono is right or not... tell him."

Tenichi swallowed hard, unable to speak, and Kai reworded his question yet again.

“Was the man you fought tonight the man who abducted you from Seireitei?” he asked, and slowly, reluctantly, Tenichi lowered his head, all defiance and fight knocked out of him by the direct persistence of the Shihouin’s approach.

“And he threatened to hurt you if you told us?”

“Yes,” Tenichi barely managed to form the word, swallowing the panic that threatened to well up inside of him. He desperately tried to pull his composure back together, raising sorrowful eyes to his interrogator. “And Ketsui. He threatened... Ketsui.”

“I see.” Kai’s lips set into a grim line at this, and Hajime muttered a curse.

“A low blow,” he said, clearly displeased by this revelation. “I’m sorry, Kotetsu. We should’ve seen that possibility. Maybe Souja-dono did see it — but I had no idea you were wrestling with so much.”

Tenichi merely hung his head, the tears trickling silently down his cheeks, and Kai let out another sigh.

“The oldest trick in the book, and you fell for it,” he said disparagingly, causing Hajime to send him a startled glance. “Threaten a kinsman and use that to buy your silence. Your brother would probably be devastated if he knew you were concealing evidence on his behalf — not to mention insulted that you doubt his ability to protect himself — but at the very least, I suppose, your intentions were honourable and I can lay to rest any deeper suspicions on your part. To protect a kinsman is at least noble, if sometimes foolishly done... but it would’ve helped to know this much sooner. If you couldn’t tell me in front of Suzuki’s face, Kotetsu, you should’ve told one of your own officers.”

“Did you tell one of the Seventh?” Hajime asked sharply, as though something had just occurred to him. “Did you speak to Souja-dono, when he brought you back to barracks that night?”

Tenichi shook his head.

“I didn’t... my memories were... blurry,” he said uneasily. “Until I saw... in Kai-dono’s cells... I didn’t know what to say about anything.”

“Well, so now we’ve established that Suzuki was the man who kidnapped you, maybe we can tease some more truth from those reluctant memories of yours,” Kai said frankly. “Maybe there’s something else you can tell us — perhaps Suzuki said something to you when he was taking you over the divide, or maybe you recall something from your time in captivity.”

“In fairness, Kai-dono, none of the abducted officers remember anything from being taken,” Hajime pointed out, and Kai nodded.

“True, but we’ve already discovered that Kotetsu’s memory is deeper than we thought it was,” he said unsympathetically. “I thought perhaps we could push it a little further, and see whether anything else comes to light.”

He cast Tenichi a benign smile, which the officer met with a wary look.

“Aizen Kohaku,” Kai’s words were brisk and to the point, and Tenichi flinched at the sound of them, alarm growing in his gaze once more as he realised the conversation was headed in another dangerous direction. “What about him? Did you see him as well, during those days you were held far from Seireitei?”

Tenichi shook his head wordlessly, and Kai frowned.

“But you don’t remember where you were held, so how can you be so sure?” he countered. Tenichi bit his lip, but did not speak, and Kai sighed.

“When I said his name in the Second’s dungeon, you acted as though it meant something to you,” he said quietly. “You overreacted to it, in fact... and just then, when I said it, something in your eyes changed. I’m not an idiot and you gain nothing by lying to me, Kotetsu. Right now you’re not under suspicion of anything, but if you continue to withhold what might be valuable evidence, that might change.”

“What is going on in here?” Before Tenichi could muster any kind of response, the door of the small chamber was flung back to reveal the Captain of the Seventh Division, white haori flapping around his shoulders and the glitter of indignation in the man’s pale eyes. “I’ve just been told that all hell has let loose on my doorstep once again — now I find that one of my officers has been pulled back by the Onmitsukidou and is being interrogated on my premises. Kai, explain to me — what in hell are you doing here?”

“Trying to discover what Kotetsu knows,” Kai turned to his friend with a grimace, bowing his head slightly in a gesture that acknowledged Hirata’s higher rank in the most casual of manners possible. “He’s already helped quite considerably with my enquiries —

tonight he fought the former Onmitsukidou that was in our cells, and it turns out he does remember that man abducting him. I wanted to know what else he remembered... since justice for your son might well rely on it.”

“For Souja?” Hirata looked momentarily stricken, then his eyes became grave. “I see. But Tenichi has already told me that he knows nothing of my son’s death. What you’re suggesting is that he lied before his Captain and concealed information about the death of his Vice Captain — both of which are considerable crimes indeed.”

“I’m not accusing him of doing either, exactly,” Kai shook his head. “We know Kotetsu was traumatised by the abduction, and his memories were unsettled as a result. But there has been discussion among senior officers that time and other events are, bit by bit, bringing them back. I’m not accusing your officer of treason, Hir... Endou-taichou, at least, not yet. I’m just trying to piece together any fragments of memory that might have returned to him in the time since he was returned here. It’s my belief he has some latent knowledge about Aizen Kohaku — a figure who your son claimed knowledge of also, before he died.”

“Tenichi?” Hirata turned his hawkish gaze on his subordinate officer, and Tenichi groaned, burying his head in his hands.

“I never saw him,” he murmured, his words muffled and laced with desperation. “I don’t know anything about him, I swear I don’t! I didn’t know anything before and I don’t now! When the man... when the person you had as a prisoner said the name Aizen Kohaku I was shocked. I hadn’t heard... I didn’t know anything about it, I promise. I never saw anyone by that name, and I don’t know who or what he or..or even she is. That’s the honest truth.”

“To be so sure implies you do remember something from your time in Rukongai,” Kai observed evenly, and Tenichi swallowed hard.

“Shadowy, fragmented images that don’t fit together,” he said at length, unable to meet either the Onmitsukidou’s gaze nor his Captain’s as he struggled to get himself out of his predicament. “They still don’t make sense — how could I know if they meant something or if they didn’t? They meant nothing to me.”

“Memories such as?”

“A hut... broken bird skulls... a water source... a grey flash of sky,” Tenichi took a shuddery breath into his lungs, knowing he was outright lying now but not sure how else to pull himself back from the sharp edge of Kai’s interrogation. Lying to the Onmitsukidou was one thing, but in front of his Captain, he knew he was treading on much more dangerous ground — yet however he looked at it, he could not see a way to bring up his encounter with Keitarou without seeming complicit in the whole scheme. Again he remembered the massacre in the Spiritless Zone and that it had not been, as Keitarou had implied, the result of Hollow activity, and he knew that however innocent his intentions had been, he could not extract the good from the bad without putting himself, and possibly his brother too in serious trouble.

“I don’t know how to connect those things together,” he said finally, “And I don’t know how to link them to the man who took me hostage. That’s all I know, Kai-dono. Taichou.”

“And your reaction to the name Aizen Kohaku?”

“I know the name Aizen.” Tenichi paused for a long time, but the emotion was just beneath the surface and try as he might he could not hold back all of his fears. “That name frightened me more than anything else. Well, why wouldn’t it? My father was Aizen Keitarou’s cousin. They worked together... Father died for his cause. I didn’t want... people to think I was complicit because of the things Father did. When I heard the name Aizen, and Fukutaichou had died because he was investigating my abduction, I was afraid. For Ketsui and for myself... that people would think... but it’s not true! It’s not true and I didn’t want Fukutaichou to die! The place I was dumped after the abduction was right by Father’s grave, and when I realised that... I was scared of what it meant, that people would think I’d done it on purpose, that somehow it was what I wanted but it wasn’t! Fukutaichou came to get me, and he told me never to go there again, and not to talk about that, nor the people who had found me, because the Taichou would be cross and it would cause problems for everyone, even Ketsui if I did! I kept it a secret because he told me to, not because I wanted to lie to my Captain or anyone else about anything! I’m not working with any enemy, I’m not! I just didn’t want my brother to be hurt, so I didn’t tell you about the man who abducted me, but he came and threatened me, and then...”

“He threatened you before you saw him in my prison cells?” Kai demanded sharply. “You saw him after you were abducted, but before he was our captive?”

Tenichi nodded miserably.

“He came and threatened me the morning after Souja-dono disappeared,” he admitted bitterly. “He can appear and disappear, camouflage himself into the walls so you never know when he’s there, watching or listening. He told me that if I told anyone... if anyone found out that I'd been abducted by him... and then Fukutaichou was dead, and I... but I... I didn't want that to happen! I didn't know where Souja-dono had gone and I didn't want Fukutaichou to die! I wasn't a part of that, I just... I..."

At this point words failed him, and he buried his head in his hands once more, his entire body shaking with the force of his sobs.

Hirata cast him a glance, mixed emotions in his pale eyes at Tenichi's admissions, then he sighed, turning to face Kai.

"You've reduced one of my officers to a gibbering wreck," he observed bluntly. "Is this your normal interrogation procedure? If it is, I'd prefer you take it away from my division... we've dealt with enough stress without you sending any of my other subordinates into mental collapse."

Kai frowned, then moved forward, resting a gentle hand on Tenichi's shoulders.

"Clearly there are more complicated reasons you felt the need to protect your brother," he said quietly. "I hadn't perceived them, and I'm sorry. However, I need to know one more thing from you. The hut you think you remember seeing — was there anyone inside it? Do you remember seeing anyone within that hut?"

"I never saw inside the hut." Tenichi's breath was coming in heavy, heaving gulps, but somehow he managed to raise his gaze, dashing away his tears as he answered the question. "I just saw the outside... I didn't go in. It's just an image of... of this hut... shrouded in... darkness. That's all. That's all I can tell you."

"Tenichi, you know nothing about my son's death, correct?" Hirata's question was direct, and Tenichi stared at him, before slowly shaking his head.

"I didn't want anything to happen to Fukutaichou," he said emphatically, his voice shaking slightly as his emotions threatened again. "I respected him. Admired him. He was good to me. I would never..."

"Then I think you're done here," Hirata turned a meaningful gaze on Kai, who sighed, but nodded his head in defeat.

"You outrank me, especially here, so I'm done," he agreed reluctantly. "Kotetsu, if you remember any more about what happened when you were abducted, we need to know. People's lives have been lost, and no matter how afraid you are, we need the truth."

Your life, your brother's life — none of the things you want to protect will be safe if you don't trust in the folk around you. We need everybody on board to solve this case and, at the very least, bring justice for that Vice Captain you say you respected."

With that he bowed his head towards Hajime, then towards Hirata, and left the chamber. There was a moment of silence, then Hirata let out a heavy sigh of his own.

"Hajime, take Kotetsu and give him to Nakata to shake sense into. Find them something to do that doesn't involve hysterical outpourings," he said wearily. "There's been enough instability here for ten divisions, lately. Make sure everyone's on guard in case this escaped felon returns — but otherwise, this business is closed. Tenichi?"

This last to the still shaking Eighth seat,

"Go clean up and pull yourself together. A grown man doesn't break down like that before superior officers, not if he wants to survive longterm in a division like the Seventh. I took you on here knowing your family's past, and the relationship between it and my ancestors' own, and it means nothing to me. It should mean nothing to you, either — you have a duty to do and I will be cross if you fail to complete it."

"Y... Yes, sir," Tenichi stammered out, before Hajime grabbed him by the arm, hauling him bodily from the room and out into the courtyard beyond. Once there, however, the Fourth Seat rounded on his companion, clapping his hands down on the other man's shoulders.

"If you remember anything more, you come to me and tell me before you tell that Onmitsukidou," he said grimly. "This is Seventh, and we'll handle Fukutaichou's vengeance our own way. I know how you feel and I realise it's been hard on you, but I don't like officers from other divisions coming and trampling over us when they think we're down. Taichou pulled us out of it today, but without a Vice Captain, there's only him who can really stand up to Kai-dono and I don't want to bother the Captain more than we have to about petty things like this. You have something you need to talk about, you come to me. Understand?"

"Yes, sir," Tenichi swallowed hard, then nodded his head. "I'm sorry, sir. I'll be more careful, and I'll remember what you said."

"Good," Hajime released his hold, nodding curtly. "Then let's get you cleaned up and back on duty. No blood was spilled, so there's nothing to get worked up over — lets go find you something more productive to do.”

Well, that had been informative.

Kai stepped over the threshold of the Second Division, his fingers groping at his belt for the key that would let him into the most secure parts of the Maggots’ Nest complex. Down, down, down he went, deep in thought as he passed through checkpoint after checkpoint, making half-hearted acknowledgements of the salutes each of his guards gave on his way down. At length he reached his destination, resting his hand against the door frame of the cell and gazing through the bars to the bloody mess that lay beyond. The body had been removed, already carted off for further examination and eventual autopsy, but to Kai’s expert eye there was little sign of a struggle. Kounou’s wound had bled profusely, but he had not been aware of his attacker’s approach until it had been too late — no, it was quite possible the man had been killed in his sleep.

This section of the Maggots’ Nest had the highest level of security, and the most guards on duty, yet not a single one of his trained agents had seen or heard anything until the alarm had been raised as to Suzuki’s escape. There was no reiatsu at this scene, but Kai had been certain that this had been Suzuki’s handiwork all the same. It had been an Onmitsukidou kill, done deliberately to send a message, yet the cut had been an angry one, sunk deep enough through the vessels and muscles of Kounou’s throat to penetrate the gristle of his oesophagus and trachea. Kai’s fingers tightened around the metal frame as he tried to suppress his anger. Kounou had been an uncooperative prisoner, but Kai had kept him alive for a reason. In one sweeping coup d’etat, Suzuki had made a mockery of the entire secret ops organisation and gained his vengeance for a crime ten years old.

If I had been in any doubt as to whether it was Suzuki Naoto we had in our custody, this would’ve settled the matter unequivocally.

Kai sank back against the wall with a sigh, clenching and unclenching his fists. Onmitsukidou trained to overcome many trials and hardships, to rise to challenges and complete duties in the most efficient manner possible. Yet death was and always had been a barrier. Kai had always disliked killing as a solution to a problem, and even after twenty five years as head of the organisation, that disgust for bloodshed had not changed.

Kounou was a worm, but he was our worm and we had ownership of his life. Suzuki may have been aggrieved that we didn’t give him the justice he felt he deserved — but now we will never prove it either way. Suzuki is still on the loose, and we might never find him. If what I suspect about his abilities is true — if Kotetsu's evidence is at all reliable, he's become a true chameleon, capable of blending in in plain sight. More, he's able to twist his body through bars and use his knowledge of us and of Seireitei to his advantage. He's probably well away by now.

“Kai-dono?”

Saku's voice echoed from the gloom, and Kai turned, casting his adjutant a harried, weary smile.

“Saku? What do you have for me? I presume you bring a report — please tell me it's a good one.”

“I don't know if it is or it isn't,” Saku admitted, tucking a wisp of dark hair behind her ear. “There's been a report that Suzuki's emerged at the Thirteenth Division. It's unsubstantiated, but I sent Karaki's patrol to find out.”

“At the Thirteenth?” Kai's brow furrowed. “Do we know why? Do we have a witness?”

“Hard to say, sir,” Saku chewed on her lip. “Thirteenth didn't make a report to us exactly, just that one of the night patrols picked up unusual energy and flurry in that area.”

“So Suzuki might still be on the premises?” Kai was already moving towards the door, and Saku shrugged her shoulders.

“I think it's unlikely,” she admitted. “Like I said, it's all unsubstantiated, but...”

“But?” Kai paused, fixing his companion with a quizzical gaze. “Spit it out, Saku. One of our prisoners is on the loose, another lies dead, and we're in very grave danger of being a laughing stock if we can't pull the threads together into a perfect puzzle before the dawn. I want Suzuki and I don't intend on going easy on him this time around, not now he's breached our security and slit Kounou's throat. What do you know about what happened at Thirteenth? What did the patrols tell you — was someone attacked there?”

“I think so, but I think the attack was unsuccessful,” Saku paused, then slid her hand into the sleeve of her hakamashita, pulling out a cloth wrapped object which she held out gingerly towards her companion. Kai glanced at it for a moment, then took it, unwrapping it carefully and letting out an exclamation as he recognised the short bladed dagger with the curved hilt, its blade crusted with drying blood.

“This weapon is...”

“As far as I can ascertain, it was stolen from one of the guards on duty at Suzuki’s cell,” Saku said quietly. “It was not used against either of them — both are dazed and dizzy but unharmed. The weapon was located somewhere in the vicinity of the Senkaimon where Kotetsu Tenichi was said to have been abducted. It was abandoned. I believe it was left as a message — either before or after the attack at Thirteenth.”

“To tell us he was the one who took Kotetsu or to lead us on a wild goose chase?” Kai wrapped the weapon once more, resisting the urge to toss it into Kounou’s bloodstained cell in his frustration. “I don’t like this, Saku. Everything is moving in undertones and it’s moving faster than I’d like.”

Saku’s keen eyes flitted from her commander to the blood-spattered cell floor, then she pressed her lips together.

“I heard you’d interrogated Kotetsu at last. Properly,” she murmured. Kai snorted, shaking his head.

“I was beginning to get there, but I had interference from the Seventh,” he said with a grimace. “Kitabata is one thing, but I can’t pull rank on Hirata and he knows it. Kotetsu broke down and told us some things he knew about Suzuki. He also told us some things I wasn’t so aware of — about his family and that family’s connection to Aizen.”

Saku’s eyes became contemplative slits.

“Do you suspect Kotetsu Tenichi of treason, sir?” she asked softly, and Kai shrugged.

“I suspect him of being an idiot, at present,” he said tiredly. “An idiot who lied for reasons best known to himself. He unburdened himself of a lot of information this evening, but I still felt it was piecemeal. His memory-loss becomes more and more convenient as time passes — he recalls now that Suzuki abducted him and claims Suzuki threatened him again, in Seireitei, before Souja was killed — but he claims not to recall more than brief flashes of his abduction. He says he never saw Aizen Kohaku, yet if his memory is so patchy, how would he know that? I think he’s still lying... and I don’t know, yet, if it’s because he’s a fool or because he’s a traitor. For Hirata’s sake, I’m hoping it’s just a case of complete idiocy, which can be dealt with through normal disciplinary procedures. But this blood connection to Keitarou interests me.”

“You want him watched, then?”

“We can’t do anything about him when he’s within Seventh’s grounds. Hirata’s made it very clear that he doesn’t want me pestering the lad, nor does he believe Kotetsu is guilty of anything sinister and, honestly, probably needs to believe that in order to pull the whole squad together,” Kai said with a sigh. “Outside the division, though... yes. I think it’s time we kept a closer eye on him. If he’s making contact with Keitarou — or, heaven forbid, a spy within the Gotei — we need to know about it and flush it out before little things become bigger.”

“You’re thinking of the report from the Third, aren’t you, sir?” Saku asked astutely, and Kai nodded.

“Although it was brief and not detailed, Nagesu-sama’s testimony is quite compelling evidence,” he agreed. “Keitarou is alive, is able to move and act on his own impulses, has others fighting for him and has been seen by a Captain and a Third Seat of good, sound mind in the Real World. We know where he was before, and we have a good idea of the region he’s operating in now, but it’s all too nice and neat for my liking. There’s got to be more strands to this thread and I want to find them. Kotetsu Tenichi might be a dead end, but he might not. I think, with Suzuki loose, it’s worth spending some manpower on finding out.”

“And the Thirteenth?”

“Let’s see what Karaki brings back,” Kai stretched his hands over his head, stifling a yawn. “If Ukitake has any sense, he’ll let my men take a look around and answer all the questions so we have a full picture. Hopefully he’ll be more rational to deal with than Hirata — whose Wind Hawk I don’t feel much like exciting at the moment.”

“Then I suppose we need to wait for Karaki,” Saku mused. “Sir, what of Kounou’s remains? What do you intend to happen to them after the official examination?”

“He’s a felon, whose stay of execution may well have been longer than was sensible,” Kai admitted. “Neesama took me to task about it, too — perhaps she was right. At least if we had dealt with it, there wouldn’t be the shame of having an escaped prisoner responsible. But a felon is a felon, and this is no different from any other criminal who dies in our custody. Make sure all useful evidence is gathered from his body and recorded meticulously... then burn it and dispose of the ashes in the usual way.”

“We won’t be returning them to his family, then?” Saku questioned, and Kai shook his head.

“A man who dies with honour fighting for something worthwhile is a family member worth having returned,” he said briskly, though there was a troubled expression in his golden eyes. “The Shihouin pride themselves on honour and worth, and disdain disloyalty and shame. Kounou shamed his badge by acting in the way he did — whatever his involvement with Suzuki, he was a guilty man and he betrayed my trust. His family should have washed their hands of him a long time ago — and even if they haven’t, this is what justice means. He is a felon. See to it that he is disposed of as is fit.”

Saku was silent for a moment, her clever gaze absorbing every flicker of expression that reflected across her commander’s face in the dim light of the underground cell. Then she nodded her head, raising her hand in salute.

“Yes sir,” she acquiesced. “I’ll make arrangements at once.”

Darkness.

Keitarou watched the black rip in the atmosphere slowly shrink and disappear, he was aware of the heavy scent of dew-drenched grass all around him. The night was peaceful except for the hoot of an owl on the wing overhead, searching for a mate above the tall tops of the densely packed trees. Tiny scuffles of claws against soil told of small rodents taking cover from the killers on land and in the air, and in the shadows, a fox hunted, its russet paws greyed out by the dim glow of the moon. The creature almost appeared silver in the haze, and, for a moment, it turned to stare at Keitarou, eyes gleaming before disappearing with a twitch of its tail into the undergrowth.

A dark smile touched Keitarou’s lips. Well, he had come to hunt foxes, but not the four legged kind.

Moving carefully through the grass, ignoring the rheumatic twinge in his leg as it protested against the uneven ground, Keitarou made his way to Daisuke’s final resting place, pausing before awkwardly lowering himself down onto his knees before it. Brushing back the thick foliage to gaze down at the stone he had carved the word ‘tomo’ onto so many years before, he closed his eyes, saying a brief prayer for his cousin’s respite in the world beyond. He was not a spiritual man, nor had he ever believed in the folk deities and superstitions that he knew were still rife across rural Seireitei, but somehow, when it came to Daisuke, the rules were different. Even now he could draw to mind recollections of that day, and most of all, the innocent, tearful face of Shikiki as she had spoken of a world beyond this one. Keitarou had not believed then, and did not now, but his fondness for Daisuke had made him hope that, in this instance, his science was wrong.

But it's been too many years since I even saw Shikiki. I shouldn't place my convictions in the hands of children who choose to grow up under enemy auspices. Not even if her words remain my only comfort for losing you, Dai-kun. Well, that and having seen your sons, grown and alive in this world.

Using a nearby stick to pull himself to his feet, Keitarou brushed the knees of his hakama free of leaf litter, aware of the chill in the night air now that the damp had touched his clothing. He would ache for his efforts later, he realised ruefully, but coming without paying respects to Daisuke he could not do.

Even dressed in death robes, your eldest son shows great promise. I can't speak for the other... well, I suppose wherever you are, you no longer care about any of those things. It's for me to take care of everything. I won't disturb your sleep with prattling about children you haven't seen in years. Just, you're the only one who ever fully understood, and maybe, now, I realise that all the more. You sent the children away, your wife too, so you could commit to our cause without hesitations, and die a martyr to it. You were faithful and decisive to the end — yet I've let cracks and chinks appear in my armour. I've made mistakes — mistakes you'd never be foolish enough to make, Dai-kun. I let my affection for Eiraki hamper me twenty five years ago and was almost killed by a Kuchiki for it. And now... now, my daughter has done something which... has had consequences. Yet... I can't take action against her as I should. Stupid as she's been, she fought out of loyalty and I... I have become weak at heart.

He raised his gaze to the sky.

Instead, I draw on monsters created by a man I killed, a man whose work I considered beneath me, and that of his greedy son. I use them as a shield and a distraction whilst I come here to lay to rest another ghost. What would you say to me, Daisuke, if you knew how much I put my family above my common sense? Should I have followed your example and sent Eiraki far away after Katsura was born? But...

He sighed, rubbing his temples.

Enough. It's only in the dark of the night like this, here in the depths of Seireitei, at your grave that I let these doubts spill out. You're the only one I can ever tell about them. Everyone else relies on me to be strong and to do what's right. They don't see how flawed my judgement has become... and if they did, it would be the end of me.

He rested a palm against the trunk of a nearby elm tree, gazing across the grass in the direction from which he had seen the silver-haired, cloaked figures emerge the night he had left Tenichi in their care.

Once, I would have done this far sooner. I would've acted against the threat immediately and thought nothing about doing so. Why am I so uneasy? What is it about this night, Dai, that makes me feel that I'm about to cross lines that can't be crossed back?

A cloud passed across the moon, creating a glittering stream of light that flickered over the surface of Daisuke's makeshift grave, and, for a brief moment, Keitarou almost thought he could see the outline of his friend's fair-haired form, those pale Urahara eyes gazing at him impassively through the bleakness of the night. The illusion was gone as soon as it had come, but Keitarou chewed his lip, only half convinced that it had been his imagination that had summoned the spectre before him.

I really have become foolish, haven't I? But I have the strangest feeling that... I really will see you again soon.

He closed his eyes briefly, drawing on the broken fragments of images that lurked deep in his memories. Recollections that were not his, put there by a screaming child, kicking and clawing the air in their desperation to escape. A child with no words, yet whose thoughts and delusions had penetrated Keitarou's own consciousness and implanted ideas and pictures there.

I never saw the whole picture of anything, and it's frustrating. But from the bits I know... time is running out.

He opened his eyes, resolve glittering in their depths.

I have to take action here, and eradicate this threat, whatever the cost happens to be. I have to rescue Koku, and bring him back to Rukongai. I have to do those things, and then...

His eyes narrowed, as something inside of his body flickered then disappeared, like the snuffing out of a candle flame.

Kurotsuchi?

His brow furrowed.

Well, so the Shinigami finally got to you? My informant was right, you were in their custody. Well, so much to the good. A dead man can't talk, and a twice dead man even less. You were useful, but I can do without you. This is probably better... I can focus my attention fully on what's important, instead of worrying about where you are or who you might have stumbled across.

Pressing his body against the tree, he crept in the direction he had seen the Kitsune go, feeling his way with his feet as he went. The maps indicate old Sekkiseki mines in this part of Seireitei. Coincidentally, they've not been disturbed for years. What better place to hide your foxes, Hirata-dono? There's nowhere else in this vicinity they could be so well hidden, nor disappear and appear so easily at will. Though it seems quiet this evening. Either they've not detected me, or...

His eyes became slits. They're waiting for me. Well, that suits me too. I can play the stealth game as well as any silver-haired traitor.

He closed his fingers around Chudokuga's hilt, stepping carefully between the twisted roots of two trees and using his sharp gaze to scan the surrounding landscape. Despite his physical stiffness, there was nothing wrong with his vision and, even in the dim light, he soon made out a slight imperfection in the rock, shadowed in the overhang of a clump of bushes and ferns.

Well, a veritable fox earth. How appropriate.

Keitarou drew Chudokuga from his obi. Well, Chudokuga. This is a bit more old-school for us, isn't it? I wondered whether you might turn back. You seemed in two minds when we arrived.

I know.

Keitarou sighed, shaking his head. I have no feeling for these people, Chudokuga. Don't accuse me of going soft on their account. It's not that. It's... The threat they pose to your visionary, and your family. I know. I know, and I sanction their elimination. I just prefer it when you act and don't dither. We're here to do a job, and we should do it. You don't need to ascertain information. They are all fair game. Simply kill anything that moves. That way there are no foxes to threaten your boy, are there? You make it sound so simple.

Keitarou's grip tightened, and he reached his free hand for the edge of the overhang, using it to swing his body down into the narrow hole that lay beneath. The tunnel twisted and turned, with barely enough room for Keitarou to move, and every few metres a new tunnel branched off from the main one, making it hard to discern which route was the one that truly led to the core of the Kitsune lair. Paranoid souls protecting themselves with diversion tactics. How Urahara of them.

Keitarou gritted his teeth, dragging his body through the widest part of the tunnel until he reached a fork. Pausing, he spread out his senses, trying to pick up the flicker of life and energy from below. It was hard, the Sekkiseki foxing and confusing his attempts, but he had not spent time working in a Sekkiseki coated prison beneath the Endou manor for nothing, and after the first few wrong turns, he found he was able to pick out which passages had been most recently used. At this depth, the Sekkiseki was no more than the discarded scraps from the mine, rather than the core of the seam itself, and so, despite the faint buzzing at his senses, he was able to persevere, dropping into a round, smooth chamber with the minimum of noise and glancing around him as he got his bearings.

The room was empty, devoid of anything that could possibly identify it as part of an inhabited dwelling, and from it led off six separate tunnels. Quick assessment told Keitarou that it was likely only two of them really led anywhere important, but which two was harder to make out.

They really don't make people welcome, do they?

Well, you're not the kind of guest they'd want to invite.

Chudokuga's response was droll, but his voice was fainter than it had been at the surface, and Keitarou squinted in the blackness at his fingers, aware that they were coated in Sekkiseki dust.

A little Sekkiseki won't slow us down, but it's worth remembering that this was a mine. Further below the surface, we might have more trouble. I don't know whether this mine still has Sekkiseki or whether it was exhausted then abandoned. We'll have to play it by ear.

The faint sound of what seemed to be voices drifted from one of the tunnel openings at that point, and Keitarou turned in its direction, certain he had not imagined the presence of life at the end of the winding passageway. Reminding himself that all within this place were fair game, he ducked into the dark hole, almost misjudging his footing against the rock as it stepped and swung harshly down before straightening out and curving to the left.

Seriously, only an animal could find this kind of network convenient. How accurate the term Kitsune seems to have become... beasts in behaviour as well as in name.

“Who are you?”

At that moment he reached the end of the tunnel, stepping into a chamber lit with lights of a type Keitarou had not seen before, though he knew that they were not Kidou lamps. An elderly woman had spoken, sitting on what looked like an uncomfortable bed carved into the rock and dressed with moth-eaten blankets. Another man slept in a bed beside hers, and Keitarou's quick eyes saw that there were more beyond, sunk into the darkness. The woman who had spoken reached unsteadily for a club stick that was propped against the wall, and Keitarou could see the deformity in her lower limbs that made it difficult for her to get to her feet. At second glance, he realised that she was not really so old, her face lined and her hair streaked with grey but her eyes still bright enough to suggest she was no more than middle age.

“Sekkiseki ages people prematurely, does it?” Keitarou remarked aloud, and the woman froze, staring at him in alarm.

“I said, who are you? Who are you, or I’ll raise the alarm!” she threatened, and Keitarou let out a chuckle, a sudden sense of calm settling over him as he realised what he had to do.

“Raise it,” he said softly. “It’s not you I want. It’s those who lead you — but you’ll do for a start. Ore, Chudokuga.”

This last to his sword, and barbs of metal shot out from the sword’s blade, thudding into the woman’s chest and throat and ripping through them. She gasped, stumbling back as blood bubbled at her lips, but Keitarou was already pulling the weapon back, firing it into the sleeping bodies of the two men alongside her. The woman’s body slid to the floor, her eyes still rolling and rasping sounds from her lips indicating that she still lived, and as Keitarou made his way forward into the room further, he bent at her side, drawing Chudokuga’s already blood-flecked blade across her throat to silence her permanently.

I’m afraid I don’t know which one of you it is that poses my son a threat, and so I have to kill all of you.

He shook the blood from the weapon, getting to his feet and stepping over the woman’s bowed legs as he gauged how many more patients there were in this room. Aside from the men he had already killed, there appeared to be three, with a fourth bed which lay empty, and Keitarou wasted no time in finishing these souls off in the same way he had tackled the others, reforming his blade and wiping it against his sleeve with an absent click of his tongue against his teeth.

Messy, and I don’t even know how many Kitsune live here.

“It will be a long night, Chudokuga,” he said aloud, tilting the weapon to examine it for residual stains in the light of the odd manual lamps that flickered and burned in the alcoves.

“I wouldn’t count on that.”

A voice from behind him made him turn, his eyes meeting the ice cold blue ones of a young man no older than his own oldest son. The newcomer was pale as the moon. Silver hair straggled over his shoulders, glinting eerily in the lamplight, and making the stranger's eyes seem equally argent in hue. In his slipstream was another, older and taller but clearly subordinate, rusty red hair in a tail behind his head. Horror and dismay reflected in this man's gaze, but the silver apparition's eyes held only anger, and, from the young man's bearing, Keitarou understood that he had found what he was looking for.

"Well," he murmured. "And I suppose you must be the one who has authority over this miserable clutch of corpses."

"You had no cause to kill them. They could not have hurt you... killing the old and the sick is a coward's game!" the redhead exclaimed, but the other man held up his hand.

"This is Aizen Keitarou," he said quietly. "We should be surprised by nothing he does, Hiko."

"Ah. So you do know who I am. I'm honoured," Keitarou's eyes became slits. "In which case, you know why I've come."

"Yes. We've been waiting... I expected you far sooner," the silver-haired individual agreed coolly. "Your business is with me. And mine is with you. Business relating to a friend whose death is on your conscience."

"A friend?" Keitarou arched an eyebrow, then, "Endou Souja-dono? I see. Then you're here to avenge him? Well, that suits me. I've come to kill all of you — regardless of whether you run or you fight. If you fight, it will surely speed things up considerably."

He flicked out Chudokuga's blade in the silver-haired man's direction, the barbs shooting out once more with the intention of piercing vital structures, but the other man merely snorted, holding up his hand. There was a glitter of silverish light, and the barbs deflected against an invisible barrier. They fell back, the long threads of metal wire clattering uselessly against the floor of the chamber, and Keitarou cursed, taking a step back.

"Fight? You?" The Kitsune's eyes became glittering slits of malice. "You think your spider-web barbs can work on me? You're a fool, if you do. I'm not like them. I'm not weak and I'm not sickly."

His fingers brushed the ends of his silver hair.

"You're an Urahara. You understand that this signifies my blood descent from the Northern Clansfolk, and the reiatsu those people possess," he added softly. "If you think you can kill me, Keitarou, you're going to have to use your intelligence and your wits. And you're going to have to assume you can escape from our lair alive, too. I am Ichimaru Joumei of the Kitsune, and I will avenge the lives you stole!"

"I don't need to know your name. I'm only interested in your corpse. Yours, and his," Keitarou's eyes glittered angrily. "Your people are steeped in blood and guilt, and even the Urahara want you dead. There's nobody to protect you — if the Urahara discovered the Endou were sheltering you, it could cause a war, so don't think your Hirata-sama will come to your aid. Your existence is unnecessary, and in this the justice of Seireitei is on my side."

He clasped his other hand over the right that held Chudokuga's hilt.

"If you won't die easily, then I'll have you die the hard way," he added coldly. "Bankai. Chudokuga Konshi."

43. Joumei

Chapter Forty Two: Joumei

“...and I think that’s everything for the time being. I’ll deal with the fall out from last night myself, if the need arises, Enishi, so if anyone comes to speak to you regarding it, refer it directly to me, all right?”

Juushirou set aside his empty mug of green tea, rearranging the pile of messy documents on his desk and casting his adjutant a tired smile. “I have a feeling I might not have made myself too popular, so just in case...”

“You mean Shihouin, I suppose,” Enishi pressed his lips together, then nodded, hauling his substantial frame into an upright position. “Right. Well, orders are orders and if he asks me anything on or off the record, it’s not like I really know what the hell happened anyway. Shikibu and Edogawa started screeching about the assassin being here but nobody died and though that kid of yours was roughed up a bit, he seems more or less in one piece. This morning’s much the same as yesterday, and that rum lass Ketsui’s in charge of didn’t come in for any attention whatsoever. I’d call it a good night’s work, by all accounts.”

He grinned, looking rueful.

“If you want my honest opinion, Taichou, I’m glad you didn’t let the Onmitsukidou run riot around our barracks,” he admitted. “Don’t tell Shihouin, since he’ll be none too pleased and I have to sit through Vice Captain meetings with the guy — but it’s not the business of another division to mop up their mess in foreign turf. If the assassin was here — and I have no idea how Shikibu came to that conclusion, but I’m not going to argue with her, because I don’t want to start the day with earache — and he’d threatened us good and proper, we’d have dealt with it. We’re not lacking in the combat department, and I think a prison escapee would be a fool to come near here. Especially since he already got taken in by Thirteenth people — if he had brains, and from how Shihouin described him, he does, he’d go as far from here as possible and make his escape into the vast blue yonder.”

“That might well be what he’s done,” Juushirou admitted. “He’s not here, though, of that we can be fairly sure, I think. Just because none of us saw him, though, Enishi, I’m not refuting the possibility. Given the characteristics of the enemy, he might well have attacked Koku and I mean to find out what I can from the boy today — if possible. It depends what kind of state he's in."

"Mm. He's having a rough time of it," Enishi's features softened. "All right. I'll go attend to normal morning duties and kick the backsides of the lazy so and sos who think that because there was an alert last night they can dither over breakfast. If you need me, Taichou, I'll most likely be in the drill yard whacking a few good hard bruises into dozy recruits."

He saluted, then left the office, his heavy, striding steps audible as he crossed the walkway towards the barracks proper, and Juushirou sighed, resting his chin in his hands. Though Enishi's matter-of-fact nature was always reassuring, somehow he could not subscribe to his adjutant's confident belief that if you could not see an enemy, it had probably never been there.

In this case, Enishi, I think Naoko is right. I think Kai knows it too. I hope it won't become an issue, though. Last night was hectic enough and I could do without another raid from the Onmitsukidou this evening.

"You look like the weight of the world is on your shoulders."

A voice from the rear window of the small cabin-like chamber made him look up, surprise turning to disbelief as he registered his pink haoriclad friend lounging over the sill.

"Shunsui?"

"Who else?" Shunsui acknowledged blithely. "I know, I know, it's early and you don't expect to see me before midday, but spare me the shocked and stunned routine. Do you think you can let me in? I heard Enishi-kun as I came up the back path, and I didn't like to interrupt, but the ground's damp and muddy round this way and I'm getting wet feet."

"Oh. Yes. Hang on," Juushirou got to his feet, hurrying to release the catch on the small side door which was really barely big enough for a whole person to get through. Shunsui, however, in spite of his height and the extra folds of the fancy patterned haori he always wore atop his uniform slid through it with surprising agility, pulling it shut behind him with a shiver.

"Brr. It's a bit too chilly this morning for wading through swamp."

"That's why there's a plank bridge."

"And only a tightrope walker could negotiate that."

"Most of my Division manage it," Juushirou observed offhandedly. "You probably can too, depending on how hungover you are."

“Cheek!” Shunsui pretended to look hurt. “Do you think I’d be up this early if I’d have been drinking last night? Not a chance. And you overestimate my skills. The plank bridge, as you call it, is little more than a piece of wood sunk deep in greenish blackish goop. And that greenish blackish goop is now setting up home between my toes. If you don’t believe me...”

He lifted his left leg, and Juushirou grimaced, giving his friend a little push away.

“It’s fine, I don’t need to see your feet,” he said firmly, and Shunsui yelped, almost overbalancing. He grabbed hold of the window ledge to steady himself, and Juushirou sighed, tut-tutting under his breath.

“You should wear tabi like everyone else, then you wouldn’t have such a problem,” he said unsympathetically. “Besides, enough insulting my division’s access routes. You chose to use them, so the problem’s on you. Why are you here, anyway? I assume there’s a reason.”

Shunsui grinned, regaining his normal nonchalant demeanour and shrugging his shoulders.

“I was hurt by your rebuttal of my request last night,” he said casually. “I couldn’t think why Kirio-chan would be grounded at such short notice, and thought I ought to make sure the special relationship Eighth and Thirteenth share hasn’t been somehow damaged without my knowing about it. If I did anything to offend you, Ukitake-taichou, you have my sincerest apologies — I’m sure it was probably my fault, but as our long acquaintance should bear witness, I really can’t help annoying folk.”

“Idiot,” Juushirou snorted, reaching across to swipe his friend playfully across the back of the head, and Shunsui ducked neatly out of his way, letting out a low chuckle. “You know and I know that I didn’t send Kirio to you because there’d been a skirmish around Seventh and since Suzuki knew Kirio by appearance, I didn’t want to put her in any danger. It was nothing to do with you and you know it.”

“Mm,” Shunsui’s expression became more serious and he nodded his head. “I do, and I know a little about what transpired with our neighbours, too. I trust Kai hasn’t been to see you at all?”

“Why would he have?” Juushirou asked, feigning ignorance, and Shunsui arched an eyebrow.

“I’m wrong, then, when I say that the escapee came here last night after he left Seventh's perimeter?"

"You know about that too?" Juushirou looked taken aback, and Shunsui nodded.

"Began the morning with Kai," he said laconically. "I knew stuff had gone down at Seventh, because Hirata was with me last night and an emergency message came for him that something was in the offing — he refused my help, though, so I couldn't do anything but sit put and wait for news. I sent someone to see what was going on, from a safe distance, you understand — but by that time it had fizzled out. What my agent did see, though, was Kai marching Tenichi-kun inside as though he'd somehow done something he shouldn't — and he looked quite cross about it, too. Kai was the usual po-faced agent he is when on duty, so I thought I'd go and catch him off guard today, try and see what I can find out. I don't much like Second, as you know, but Saku-chan turned a blind eye to me calling without an appointment, so..."

"Using old friendships to discover information is a sneaky tactic," Juushirou said reproachfully.

"True, but sometimes it's the best way," Shunsui agreed blithely. "I'm still very fond of Saku-chan, even though our paths are in such different directions. It's reassuring that she seems to see things the same way, and besides, Seireitei are supposed to be working as a collective. Therefore any method is as good as any other, right?"

"Mm. Maybe," Juushirou leaned up against the door-frame of his office. "Well? You found something out and came here to tell me about it? Or you found something out and came to see what I knew?"

"Both," Shunsui responded simply. "I'll trade you what I learned from Kai — he's cross with you, by the way, since apparently you refused his people entry to investigate Thirteenth's grounds last night — and you tell me what happened with your stray."

"Ah. Kai's angry," Juushirou looked rueful, but he nodded, gesturing for his friend to step inside Ugendou. Shunsui did as he was bidden, pulling the door shut behind him and leaning up against it in his usual lounging fashion, whilst Juushirou settled himself on one of the wide cushions that the room sported. "How angry? Angry enough to launch a secret raid the next time I'm away from barracks?"

"Mm, well, you should count your lucky stars that he considers you a friend, lets put it that way," Shunsui ruminated pensively. "He's frustrated more than really cross. He knows you don't like the Onmitsukidou crawling all over your operation, scaring your recruits, but this Suzuki person is his prisoner, and he wants to track him down. He feels that by preventing his people from infiltrating Thirteenth last night, you might've facilitated the guy's escape."

"We did our own sweep, and there was no sign he was anywhere on the premises," Juushirou said frankly. "My message to Kai said the same. By the time everything here had calmed down, it was well into the night. It just wasn't practical, and besides, I know where it would've led. They'd have wanted to interrogate Koku, and I didn't want that to happen. He's not physically up to that kind of an encounter."

"The escapee hurt him, then?" Shunsui asked curiously, and Juushirou shrugged.

"We'll come to that in a minute," he said cautiously. "First, about Tenichi? What happened at Seventh? Why was Kai involved in that?"

"Well, Tenichi crossed blades with Suzuki, and it seemed like a heated encounter. Tenichi was pretty much all out to kill the guy, and I guess Suzuki wasn't holding back any hatred either," Shunsui responded. "Apparently in the midst of this Suzuki said something that indicated he knew Tenichi, and Tenichi's response corroborated it. Someone from Seventh overheard, it got reported to Kai when he arrived at the scene. In any case, it transpires that Tenichi's been telling us a few fibs about his abduction."

"Fibs?" Juushirou's brows knitted together in consternation. "That's not like him."

"I knew you'd say that," Shunsui reflected. "Kai did too, which is why he wanted me to pass the information to you, rather than him coming and doing it officially. Kitabata defended Tenichi, and Hirata eventually sent Kai and his men away from Seventh, but I haven't tackled either of them, so don't know Seventh's official opinion on this at the moment. From what Kai told me, Tenichi recognised Suzuki when he was taken to Second to identify the man, but was too afraid to admit to it. Suzuki was his abductor, and he remembers fleeting bits from Rukongai, including a hut, but nothing tangible. At least, not at present — if we believe his testimony. Kai wasn't sure if he did or he didn't, but he did think the man was frightened. Very frightened. He broke down in tears, and even Kai was surprised by it."

"Frightened? Of what?" Juushirou looked nonplussed.

"It seems that it ties up with the boy's past — the origins of his father, and the fact that, with Keitarou's name so tied up in all of this, Tenichi and Ketsui's bloodline might also come to the fore," Shunsui explained. “You probably know more of the details of that than I do, but Kai said that Tenichi seemed especially afraid when the name Aizen Kohaku was mentioned. Kai thinks this might mean he met Kohaku and knew things about him he was too afraid to reveal, but he’s willing to concede that maybe it’s the Aizen element that had him so terrified. What do you think?”

“Tenichi’s father Daisuke was an ally of Keitarou’s, it’s true,” Juushirou’s eyes became grave. “Keitarou told me himself they were like brothers, and Shikiki mentioned that Daisuke was killed by the Endou when she was in his custody. Keitarou reacted to that loss very badly... so I guess Daisuke was someone he trusted in a good deal. I never met him, of course, but I think you met his wife — Irie — when she was a refugee in District Eight. Tenichi told me the whole story when he recruited in Thirteenth, because he knew that you’d been kind to his mother and he felt that it was better he was honest with me from the start about his origins, in case it came out later.”

“Irie-san,” Shunsui’s eyes became near slits. ‘You now, now you mention it, I do recall... there were two scraps of boys playing in the dust when I went to the refugee camp — and I remember a woman telling me about her husband who had likely died and his close ties to Keitarou. You mean Tenichi and Ketsui are those brats? Yeesh, I am getting old,’ as Juushirou nodded. “I hadn’t made the connection at all — Ketsui was such a tiny, scrawny little thing, and Tenichi was the kind of whelp who balled his fists and fought all comers if they dared make fun of his little brother. But I do remember, now you mention it, how much like an Urahara the young’un looked... and Ketsui is very Urahara in his appearance, even now.”

“He looks a lot like his father. Both he and Tenichi have said so,” Juushirou sighed. “To me, this is all irrelevant, of course. They were refugees, they lost their father and they rebuilt their lives in your District without causing any civil unrest. Your forgetting about them is proof of that. But I suppose we never completely move away from our pasts. Tenichi and Ketsui are not allies of Keitarou, but I can see how... if that name came up again... Tenichi would feel under threat. More, that it was him who was abducted...”

“For that reason?” Shunsui asked. Juushirou spread his hands.

“Who knows?” he asked helplessly. “I like Tenichi, and I believe in his integrity. I didn’t see him the night Souja died, but Enishi and Kirio both told me how wrecked he was. It’s no part his fault, but he took it on as though it was, because he’d been kidnapped and it had set in motion other events. With that depth of emotion...”

He bit his lip, then,

“Don’t say this to Kai,” he added uneasily. “But it wouldn’t surprise me if Keitarou himself put that to Tenichi. If he abducted him, and made him feel as though if he said anything, he and his brother... would both suffer in the worst way. I believe Keitarou took Tenichi so that he could find out where the Kitsune were, and who knows if he succeeded, but it would be hard to completely suppress the memories of a competent agent like Tenichi through Kidou. All the things you’ve just told me... and his attitude towards Suzuki especially... lead me to wonder if Suzuki took him to Rukongai, where he encountered Keitarou, and once that happened... he was trapped. The moment Keitarou’s name comes from his lips, the past comes rolling out, and he must remember how horribly Ketsui was bullied as a young boy for his Urahara connections. It sounds from what you said that Kai wants to press into that connection now, so that fear would be justified. They’ve worked hard to break away from that... and I wouldn’t put it past Keitarou to try and reel them back in again by drawing on Daisuke’s memory and the ties of blood. If Kai goes down that path, he might be playing into Keitarou’s hands.”

Shunsui was silent for a few moments. Then he nodded.

“It makes sense,” he agreed pensively. “Tenichi isn’t someone I’ve had a lot to do with, but I trust your judgement of him, and I know his brother well. He’s a good kid, and he and Shizu-chan are close friends. Sometimes, though, if someone has a particularly strong sense of duty, they throw themselves open to weakness in a lot of other ways. Especially psychological manipulation of the kind Keitarou excels in. You’re sure that, if you’re right, Tenichi wouldn’t ally with Keitarou?”

“I’m sure. He’s a shinigami, and this is his world,” Juushirou said firmly. “He was distraught at losing Souja-dono, and Hirata’s said how good an officer he’s proven. I know it myself, too — how much it meant to him to establish his name and position here without worrying about his roots.”

“Then I shall say nothing to Kai,” Shunsui promised. “Possibly you should, though, as circumspcctly as you can, regarding his past, now that Tenichi himself has brought it up. It might put you back in Kai’s good books, and help to put his mind at rest over the boy’s guilt. Hopefully Tenichi will pull himself together, after ritually humiliating himself in front of his Captain and the head of the Onmitsukidou, and that will be that. Maybe he’ll find an opening to speak to you or Ketsui and all will resolve itself, but in the meantime, lets return to the subject of your stray.”

“I had a feeling that was coming,” Juushirou sighed. “All right. I suppose that’s fair. Koku was attacked last night, it’s true.”

“By Suzuki?”

“We believe so,” Juushirou nodded. “At least, he’s acquired a ring of bruises at his throat which we can’t explain through any other means. It makes me cross, because he was only unattended for a short while and I was the one who summoned Kirio away from his side. I feel I put him at risk by not seeing he was in danger, but honestly, it took us completely by surprise. We’d factored in the possibility of Mitsuki being attacked, so Naoko was going to help her with Koku’s dressings, but they got caught up collecting the supplies and in that brief interlude... bam.”

He shrugged his shoulders.

“Nobody saw anyone enter or leave,” he added. “I know that Suzuki has high skills of concealment, because we encountered them once before, but even so... this was quite an exceptional feat. Thirteenth were on alert, and yet he managed to get in and out without us knowing. More, he managed to choose a moment nobody was guarding Koku, and that bothers me.”

“You think it pre-planned that way?”

“How could he know I would call Kirio away?” Juushirou shook his head. “He had no way to judge my thoughts, because I didn’t know myself till I received Kai’s Hell Butterfly. Plans not yet made can’t be leaked.”

“They can, if Keitarou can see the future,” Shunsui pointed out.

“Maybe,” Juushirou conceded, “but you haven’t totally proven that theory yet, and besides, Suzuki was in the Onmitsukidou cells. I doubt, given his history, Kai would’ve let anyone who might have been sympathetic to his cause guard him, and besides, the Onmitsukidou as a whole aren’t particularly sympathetic people.”

“You’d break Kai’s heart, speaking like that,” Shunsui observed drolly, and Juushirou snorted impatiently.

“Kai is different,” he acknowledged, “and maybe Saku-dono, too — but I also think both of them are beyond suspicion as leaks. Don’t you?”

“I do,” Shunsui agreed. “So it would’ve been hard to get a message to Suzuki, I grant you. Perhaps that is my grasping at straws to prove my theory. What do you think the answer is?”

“Suzuki’s ability to take us off guard?” Juushirou pursed his lips, then, “I think it’s to do with his skills of concealment and camouflage. He can twist and distort his body, and I think he can do more than that. I think he was probably within Thirteenth’s barracks before I called Kirio away — and he saw her leave the room. I think he took his chance then. Nobody would have detected him. He’s very hard to detect. I think he waited for his opportunity, and then he struck. It chills me to consider it, but I think that’s how it was done. He waited till Koku was alone, which means...”

“Koku was his target, and nobody else,” Shunsui rubbed his chin pensively. “Now you mention it, Kai said that Tenichi’d mentioned something about this Onmitsukidou being able to conceal himself, like a... how did he put it? A chameleon. Probably you’re right on the mark. Koku survived this attack, though?”

“He did.” Juushirou agreed. “I think Suzuki must have sensed Mitsuki and Naoko approaching and taken off before he was caught. There was a flurry of reiatsu from Koku’s room, and Mitsuki reported him stumbling around the corridors in a hysterical daze. She sedated him, hence why there’s been no witness statement so far... and that’s all we know. He’s not been left alone for a moment since. Mitsuki’s still with him now, and I was going to go speak to him myself when you arrived.”

“I timed it well, then,” Shunsui observed comfortably. “If you don’t mind, I’ll come with you.”

“Shunsui...”

“Being an overprotective parent-type isn’t cute,” Shunsui scolded. “Besides, we’ve moved beyond the point where simply molly-coddling him as a Rukon stray in a strange world will suffice. He was attacked by a man who kidnapped Tenichi and who is probably working for Keitarou in some regard. Koku’s told you he didn’t see the attack on Souja, but I think this proves he did. He saw something he hasn’t told us, and the assassin came specifically to make sure he never did tell us. The fact he failed means we need to know what Koku knows, because it’s undoubtedly important.”

“You’re still of the opinion he was a prisoner of Keitarou’s, maybe a test subject in waiting?” Juushirou asked, and Shunsui shrugged.

“Maybe. Maybe not. It’s hard to theorise about a kid I haven’t met,” he said honestly. “That’s another reason I want to come. And besides, it helps to have a neutral present during interrogations. Even if you are more gentle in your approach than most, I think it best I come with you and act as your second.”

“You’re not going to change your mind, are you?” Juushirou eyed his friend doubtfully, and Shunsui shook his head.

“I’m not,” he agreed blandly. “So you should save time by not fighting me and instead taking me to see your enigmatic young houseguest.”

Juushirou pressed his lips together, a look of reluctance entering his hazel eyes, but at length he sighed, holding up his hands.

“Fine,” he conceded, “but it won’t be a long conversation. He might not even be awake — I don’t know how deeply Mitsuki sedated him or if he’s stirred yet. If I take you with me, you’re not to harass him or scare him or make any of your usual silly remarks.”

“You really do sound like an overprotective mother hen,” Shunsui reflected lazily. ‘It’s all right,’ as Juushirou sent him a glare, “I won’t ruffle the down on your newly hatched chick — though I’m sure I warned you already about becoming too attached to a kid we know nothing about. Things are still too tenuous to make decisions about trusting strangers.”

“If Keitarou’s ally wanted him dead, then that’s a pretty good indication he’s not on their side.” Juushirou retorted, and Shunsui shrugged.

“Perhaps,” he agreed cautiously, “but he’s not entirely the innocent bystander and I think he needs persuading that it’s time to drop that pretence. We need to know what’s what — so you need to make sure you get him to tell you everything he hasn’t said already. Including his relationship with the disappearing dead man.”

As they reached the chamber, the door slid back to reveal Mitsuki, a tired expression marring her pretty features. She cast Juushirou a faint smile, glancing at Shunsui for a moment then standing back to allow them past her.

“He’s awake,” she said, in low tones so that the patient himself would not hear her. “Juushirou, be gentle with him. Both of you. I don’t know what happened to him yesterday — he won’t talk about it to me. I hope he will to you — but I wouldn’t hold out any hope.”

“His injuries?” Juushirou paused, looking concerned, and Mitsuki shook her head.

“They’ve done no real damage. Bruises — nasty ones, but that’s all. In places they’re almost finger-shaped, in others more like rope — but given the suspect involved and what you said about his unusual abilities...”

“Mm,” Juushirou nodded grimly. “So long as Koku is not badly hurt, that is the important thing. As far as I know the suspect is still on the loose — so for the time being, we need to be aware of everything. I won’t have him left alone again under any circumstances — please tell Kirio to be ready to come back on duty at a moment’s notice. This is now a protected witness, rather than just an injured boy.”

“I will,” Mitsuki promised. She rested a hand on the sleeve of his haori, meeting his gaze gravely.

“I don’t think he’s very well,” she admitted. ‘It’s not relating to yesterday — I don’t think,’ as Juushirou’s eyes widened in consternation. “It’s also not his injury — that’s healing fairly nicely, as far as I can see. It’s something else, something unsettled in his aura. His vital signs were all quite stable after the attack, even despite the trauma involved, but since he’s been here...”

She shook her head.

“I don’t know how to account for it,” she admitted, frustration in her grey eyes, “but he’s not recovering in the way I expected him to. There’s nothing wrong that I can see, exactly, but his spirit is more uneven, and it’s like something is sapping the strength out of him. He is very thin and it might simply be a case of anaemia or a side effect of so much healing when he’s clearly underweight, but he has been at least picking at food, up until today. Last night he was unwell following the incident, and this morning he’s refused all food completely. I’m worried about him, Juushirou. He seems so sad and frail — please, if you can, convince him to eat something. He doesn’t listen when it’s me — for some reason he’s wary of me and doesn’t want me anywhere near him.”

Juushirou and Shunsui exchanged glances, and Shunsui tut-tutted under his breath.

“So rude to a pretty girl,” he observed. “It’s all right, Mitsuki. I think Juu’s already got it into his head to fly to the rescue — I’m sure the waif will be just fine. Leave him to us and go take a break. You’ve not slept yet, have you?”

Mitsuki shook her head.

“I stayed with him overnight, and Naoko did too, till she went to run drill first thing,” she said with a sigh, running her fingers through her dark hair and pulling it absently back into a loose tail before letting the waves fall once more over her shoulders. “I am tired, and I know, I’m meant to be resting too — but I really think Koku is a bigger concern than I am at the moment. I’ll go take a break, though, don’t worry. Eat my own breakfast and hope that you have luck talking to him where I’ve failed.”

With that she was gone, and Shunsui gazed after her thoughtfully, then clapped his hand down on his friend’s shoulder.

“Torn between your love and your rescue case. It’s a hard life,” he reflected, and Juushirou snorted.

“Don’t,” he warned. “It’s not the time or place. This is a serious business — and I’m concerned if what Mitsuki says is true.”

“Does Mitsuki-chan know where this boy came from, originally?” Shunsui asked, and Juushirou shook his head.

“No, and you mustn’t reveal you know, either. It’s a matter of trust between the boy and I, and that’s fragile enough.” he replied. “He’ll think I told you, when you worked it out for yourself.”

“Maybe the atmosphere here is what’s upsetting him, then,” Shunsui suggested. “I was going to voice it, but I’m glad I didn’t, if Mitsuki’s in the dark. Though it’s not a good idea to keep secrets in a relationship, Juu — that’s where communication breaks down.”

“It’s not a relationship. I don’t know what it is, after so many years apart,” Juushirou admitted. “Sometimes there are flickers and sometimes I’m not sure. There are things... sometimes I think she hasn’t told me about the Rukon, and I don’t know if it’s just too big to talk about, or whether it matters. And this... is part of my job as a Captain. Some secrets are professional ones — and we’re wasting time here. Come on — if you’re coming — and close the door behind you.”

Shunsui looked rueful, but he did not argue, and Juushirou led the way into the chamber proper, leaving his friend to bring up the rear as he approached the bed. Koku was hunched against his pillows, a book on the covers beside him, and with a jolt Juushirou realised that it was the volume from the library that Kirio had convinced him to allow out. The book was open, but only on the contents page, and as Juushirou watched Koku’s finger trace over the rose stems for a second and then a third time, he wondered whether the young man in their custody was capable of making sense of the calligraphy at all.

“Koku?” he spoke softly, not wanting to alarm the boy, but Koku raised his head immediately, weariness rather than surprise in his expression. He opened his lips as if to speak, then his gaze rested on Shunsui, and he froze, consternation and dismay glittering in the dark brown depths.

“It’s all right, this is a friend of mine. He’s not here to do anything but listen,” Juushirou hastened to reassure him, but Koku acted as though he had not even heard, his eyes watching Shunsui warily as the other man crossed the chamber, lounging up against the window frame and folding his arms loosely across his chest.

“Pleased to meet you, Koku,” he said lightly. “My name’s Kyouraku Shunsui. It’s as J... Ukitake says, I’m here simply out of formality. We have questions to ask you, and it’s quite important this time that someone else is present to witness the answers.”

Koku swallowed hard, then lowered his gaze, and Juushirou frowned, coming to sit on the stool beside the bed. Koku’s body was rigid with tension that had not been there a moment before, his eyes fixed once more on the patterns in the book. He made no attempt to speak, and at this distance the Captain could see clearly the angry ring of reddening bruises about his charge’s pale throat, proof positive that something untoward had occurred in his chamber the night before. Guilt twitched at his heart.

“I’m sorry,” he said at length. “I promised you safety here, and last night, that promise got broken, didn’t it?”

Koku did not answer, and Juushirou reached out to rest a hand on the edge of the book.

“Kirio gave you that, didn’t she?” he asked softly. Koku bit his lip, but did not protest as the Captain took the volume carefully from the young man’s grip, turning it over to read the title properly for himself.

“Legends of Seireitei, huh,” he murmured. “It certainly doesn’t seem particularly legendary at the moment, with all the things going on.”

“Will you take the book away?” Now Koku spoke, raising apprehensive eyes to his white haired companion, and Juushirou eyed him keenly.

“No, not if you want me to leave it,” he said frankly, setting it down on the unit beside the bed. “Kirio borrowed it so that you weren’t so bored, and if you’re interested by it, then it can stay here. Just, we need to talk to you and it can’t wait. Even if you’re feeling unwell, I’m afraid this is one of those times I have to ride roughshod over your feelings and press ahead. We need to know what happened last night — in your words, what you remember.”

Koku wet his lips, his gaze darting towards Shunsui doubtfully for a moment, then back to Juushirou.

“Why is he really here?” he asked softly. “You talked to me before on your own. You’re a... a Captain, aren’t you? Kirio-san talks about you like you are. Why is someone else here now, if you’re really a Captain? What’s happening — what’s going to happen to me if I answer you?”

“I’ve not come to do anything to you,” Shunsui was startled by the sudden turn of the conversation. “I’m a visitor to Thirteenth, but Ukitake and I are old friends, and we’re both involved in this investigation. I’m a Captain too — though in this haori, I’m sure you can’t believe it — and sharing information often makes the solving of crimes quicker. That’s the reason I’ve come today.”

Koku’s brows creased in consternation.

“You don’t... like to kill people, do you?” he asked softly, and Shunsui’s eyes opened wide with dismay.

“Do I look like I came here to kill you?” he demanded, his usual casual demeanour shaken aside by this unexpected remark. “I didn’t even bring my swords with me — of course not!”

“Shunsui, maybe it’s not a good idea, you being here,” Juushirou suggested, a troubled look on his face. “Koku doesn’t know you — and this isn’t the best time for a first meeting. He was attacked last night and he’s probably scared... now you’ve appeared, and there’s only so much one person can take.”

“It’s all right,” Koku sighed, shaking his head. “I... said something bad. I’m sorry. I didn’t mean to.”

“Well, not everyone who comes here wanting to talk to you is meaning you harm,” Shunsui cast the young man a wry grin. “I’m also a bit too conspicuous to make much of a shadow-assassin — so you can rest assured. Besides, with Juu... I mean, with Ukitake here, I wouldn’t be able to do anything to you even if I wanted to. He’s dead keen on looking out for your interests, and well, I’m not good at arguing with him when he gives me a certain look.”

Koku looked momentarily bewildered, and Juushirou sighed, rubbing his brow pensively.

“Shunsui, shut up. Don’t confuse the boy — he’s been through enough,” he said flatly. “Koku-kun, if you can talk to us, we want to listen. That’s all. We’re looking for the person who hurt you — the more we know about him, the easier we can put him back behind bars. We know he's dangerous, and we know quite a bit about him — but we don't know why he would come here and why he would attack you."

"Really we want confirmation that he did," Shunsui reflected. "Someone put that ugly red necklace around your throat, so somebody attacked you — but we need to put the pieces together. One person has already died, and..."

"In a dark place, covered in blood," Koku agreed absently, and Juushirou cast him a quizzical look.

"Koku?"

"Nothing," Koku shook his head as if trying to clear it of an unpleasant image, shooting Juushirou a troubled gaze. "I don't know what to tell you. He came at me. He put his hand around here..." He lifted his hand to his throat, touching the abused skin tentatively, then lowering the pale, delicate fingers back to the covers. "He said he would kill me, and he had blood all over his clothing. He was dressed in black, and it was dark, so I didn't... see very much. Only he was there... and then he was gone."

"Do you remember being in the hallway?" Juushirou asked, and a stricken look crossed Koku's face.

"I was trying to get away," he murmured, genuine fear flickering in the depths of his clouded brown eyes. "I didn't know where to go, but I had to... to leave. And then... Edogawa-san..."

"Yes, Mitsuki found you," Juushirou agreed. "You were in no danger after that, but she said you were very upset, so she gave you some herbs to make you sleep. I know it's not pleasant to remember, but we need to know what we can about the attacker. If you saw how he came into your room, and how he got out again. We searched the entire grounds, but had no luck."

Koku shook his head.

"He came out of the wall," he said seriously. 'One minute I was alone, reading the book Kirio-san gave me,' he indicated, "and then..."

He touched his throat, shivering, and Shunsui sighed.

"I think, then, we can say for sure that we're dealing with Kai's pet," he said heavily. "That kind of modus operandi fits with only one suspect, and confirms what we were talking about before. If you can camouflage yourself, plain sight is actually one big hidey-hole. He could be anywhere."

“True enough,” Juushirou agreed. “Koku, had you met this person before? Perhaps...”

He faltered, glancing at Shunsui a moment, then,

“Maybe before you found Souja-dono, perhaps you saw this person somewhere around there?”

“With Souja-dono?” Koku looked stunned, then shook his head. “He wasn’t there, Ukitake-dono. I would have seen him. He wasn’t there.”

“Not necessarily, judging by how he acts, but I guess you can’t be expected to bear witness to the invisible man,” Shunsui groaned. Juushirou nodded.

“But he did choose to come here,” he pointed out. “And we still don’t know why.”

“To hurt Koku,” Shunsui said categorically, and Koku flinched back from the older man’s glance. “Oh, please, kid, I’m not going to do anything to you. I’m not as nice or cuddly and sympathetic as Juu is, maybe, but I’m not here to cause you harm. I want to keep you alive as much as he does, believe me. There have been enough corpses, and there don’t need to be any more. Killing you or anyone else is not on my agenda for the day — besides, my sister would have my hide if I got blood on this haori, so you can take it as read. She’s far more scary than either of us are when she’s angry, believe me — I’m not going to risk it.”

Koku looked startled, then, to Juushirou’s surprise, a sad look entered the young man’s eyes.

“I’m sorry,” he murmured, and for a moment Juushirou had the impression that the apology was not for doubting Shunsui’s motives.

“Well, we’ll forget it and we’ll move on,” Shunsui shifted his position slightly, reaching for one of the cushions and tossing it onto the floor before dropping down onto it. “There, that’s a more casual demeanour, isn’t it? I’m not standing over you glaring at you any more — so perhaps you’ll stop staring at me as though I’m a cat about to eat the mouse.”

“We need to know why someone would target you,” Juushirou explained to Koku gently. “It’s not a nice thing to think of, but we need you to think it all the same. You’re still a stranger here, and there might be things — dangers — that we don’t know about, things that we can’t protect you from if we don’t have the full picture.”

Koku pursed his lips, then he sighed.

"I helped Souja-dono," he murmured. "To some people, that would be... betrayal. To help a shinigami... to some people... that's not a good thing to do."

"To what kind of people?" Shunsui's eyes narrowed, and Koku shook his head.

"People," he said vaguely, "there are some who don't like shinigami. I don't trust shinigami either, but I didn't want to see one die. I helped Souja-dono because I couldn't just leave him — that would've been as good as helping to kill him and I... I don't like death either. So I helped him, but... there are people who would think that... was a bad thing to do. And so they'd want to come here... and hurt me."

"Do these people have names?" Shunsui asked softly, and Koku's lips thinned slightly. He shook his head.

"I can't answer that."

"Can't, or won't?"

"Can't," Koku's expression became defiant. "If there are people like that in Seireitei, I don't know their names. You know Seireitei, I don't. You know what kind of people there are here who might come and attack me, whereas I don't know anything about them. You should be able to tell me who attacked me — rather than asking me to tell you."

"I see. So you're not from Seireitei," Shunsui observed neatly. "Well, if not from there, where else could you be from? I wonder... maybe... Rukongai?"

Koku's eyes widened in alarm.

"I..."

"Shunsui, shut up," Juushirou took a hand. "Where Koku came from isn't important. Discussing this incident is."

"Unless they're connected," Shunsui pointed out, then he relented, reaching out to tap Koku on the arm. Koku flinched back, gazing at him fearfully, and Shunsui grinned.

"Look, kid, believe it or not, I don't care two hoots about it, if that's where you really came from," he said matter-of-factly. "I happen to believe that the border between that place and this is far too rigid, and the rules far too harsh. I also think, having been to the Rukon recently, that there are a lot of people there that we just don't know about — and that's our bad, not yours. You're not the first person from the Rukon I've ever met in Seireitei. Unlike some Clan Gotei, I have no problem with pretending I never met them, and forgetting, conveniently, where they might be. In fact, if it puts Clan Seireitei's noses out of joint, so much to the good. If you came here to help Souja, then you came to help the son of my friend, and I've no reason to get you into trouble. If that's what you're afraid of, you should stop. This isn't good-cop bad-cop, and I'm really not that bad a cop. Honestly, you can come from the Real World, if you like. It doesn't bother me. What does, however, is that there are assassins on the loose. I don't think you're one of them — but last night, you were almost the victim of one, and that's a problem. So you help us with what you know, and we'll do our best to prevent a repeat. Sound fair enough to you?"

Koku's expression had become more and more troubled with every passing moment, and as Shunsui finished speaking, he let out a heavy sigh, reaching up to massage his temples.

"Don't," he begged. "Don't say things like that."

"Like what?" Shunsui was foxed, and Koku raised his gaze.

"Kind... things," he said haltingly. "I don't like it. Please... stop."

"You don't want people to be nice to you?" Juushirou was equally thrown by this, and Koku shook his head.

"It makes everything so much harder to bear," he whispered. "I don't want to think about it, so please... don't speak like that any more. You don't have to care about Rukongai people — you're a shinigami, you shouldn't. Either of you. I'm not important enough to bother about, and yet you do, and it's a problem for me. I don't know what to do about it... when important people are saying such things, and then..."

"Nonsense," Shunsui cut across him with a derisive snort. "That kind of attitude might suit some of the more traditional Clan shinigami, but it won't wash with me. You and your life are as important as me and mine and Ukitake and his. That being settled, we want to catch the person who attacked you. There's also Souja's life in this too, and I value that as well. If you start adding weight to one life over another, your judgement becomes skewed. I won't have it, so you might as well forget that line of thought right now."

Koku gaped, rendered speechless, and Juushirou reached out a warning hand to brush his friend's arm.

"Let's not," he begged. "Koku's unfamiliar with us and how we work. There are enough negative rumours, enough reasons that people in different places feel inferior or superior. He can't be blamed if he doesn't know that's not how the majority of us think or act. Besides, we're moving away from the point. We came here to find out about Suzuki, and... Koku?"

For the young boy had suddenly gone very pale, his hands trembling and his eyes widening so that Juushirou could almost see the whites.

"Stop it," he whispered, but he didn't seem to be talking to either of the two shinigami, and the next moment he let out a yell, pushing the blankets away as though they were somehow trying to smother him. He scrambled towards the edge of the bed, clearly trying to get away, and Juushirou darted forward, grabbing the young man by the shoulders and giving him a gentle shake.

"Koku, what is it? Why are you upset, what's happened?" he asked softly.

"Is Suzuki here?" Shunsui was on his feet, eyes scanning the scenery as if expecting a shadow-stalker to emerge from the wall or window at any given moment. Koku struggled to free himself from Juushirou's grasp, his lips moving but nothing coherent coming out. Juushirou tightened his grasp, really afraid the boy had once more gone hysterical and would hurt himself if he was allowed to flail around as he had done the night before, but as he did so, Koku raised his gaze to the Captain's and Juushirou gasped, almost letting go completely as he read the blank, glazed look in the young stray's eyes. Tears glittered on Koku's lashes, but they seemed somehow disconnected, as though Koku's soul had disappeared behind pupils that, despite the bright daylight streaming into the room, had suddenly dilated into miniature black holes. Koku's skin was a greyish colour in hue, and Juushirou could feel the fingers clawing against his arm, frantic and feverish yet disjointed in their actions, as though Koku could not coordinate his body enough to manage to free himself.

"Shunsui, something's wrong with him," At length, Juushirou found his voice. "Mitsuki said he wasn't well, and I think she's right. If I stay with him, maybe you could get her. I don't think that Suzuki's here — I think it's just that..."

"Stop it. Stop it, please," Koku's vocal chords finally managed to make the sounds in the right order, and Juushirou was struck by the plaintive, childlike note in the young man's voice. The tears began to roll silently down ashen cheeks, falling unchecked onto Juushirou's haori, and Shunsui halted his search of the room, casting them a glance.

“Stop what?” he asked, and Juushirou shrugged.

“I don’t know, but I can’t let him go, not like this. He’ll hurt himself, and I don’t think he’s in his wits. I don’t know if we drove him over — and if we did, Mitsuki is going to have us both for it — but in the circumstances I don’t like leaving him this way.”

“I don’t like leaving you with him this way,” Shunsui admitted. “You might need help, and besides, there’s something unnatural about his eyes. You see it too, right? Its not like he’s just gone hysterical. There’s something else wrong with him, and without knowing what that is, I’m not going to trot off and disappear.”

“You think he’s going to hurt me?” Juushirou was indignant, and Shunsui shrugged.

“Maybe not on purpose,” he said, and Juushirou was struck by the grim look that had entered his friend’s eye. “I just don’t like it. So I’m staying. And when he’s calmed down, we’ll get help.”

“If he does,” Juushirou glanced at the young boy once more. As his gaze met that blank brown one, he felt suddenly disorientated, as though something was trying to pull him deep into the dark abyss of the boy’s pupils and beyond to a troubled mind beneath. Broken fragments of what might have been pictures flashed through his mind, but they were there and gone so quickly that all he could make out was the briefest of impressions — fear, darkness, and then, Koku’s voice broke the quiet once more.

“It’s so dark,” he murmured. “Tunnels... so deep. Hiding in tunnels... but now... so much blood. Running... hiding... can’t get away. Hunting them... spider’s web... can’t escape. Dark... dark... down... down... poison in the earth that might save them. Pieces of souls broken and scattered... blood on his sword... in the spider’s eyes.”

“What the...” Shunsui stared at Koku, aghast, and Juushirou forcibly shook himself from his reverie, blinking and regaining his composure as for a moment he had thought he too was sinking deep into tunnels, far, far beneath the earth. He raised his gaze to his friend, and Shunsui’s lips thinned.

“Stop it,” Koku’s words were no more than a feeble whisper, like a breath on the wind by this point, and as the tension flooded out of his young, undernourished body, he sank against Juushirou’s shoulder, burying his head in the fabric folds of the haorias bitter, heavy sobs engulfed him. Like a terrified child rising from a nightmare, the clawing hands now clung to Juushirou’s sleeves looking for reassurance and, despite how unnerved the white haired Captain still felt, he hugged the young boy tightly, stroking his hair as though it was one of his young siblings who he was comforting during a storm.

“Shunsui, get Mitsuki,” he said softly. “We’re not going to interrogate him any further today.”

“But...”

“It’s quite all right,” Juushirou shook his head. “I’m not in danger. Just go. Please.”

Shunsui looked reluctant, but he did not argue, disappearing into the hall to do his friend’s bidding, and Juushirou glanced down at the pathetic figure still huddled up against him as though looking for someone to protect him.

But from what? What... was that? All of a sudden, out of the blue, to say such things.

His eyes narrowed.

Spiders. Tunnels. Blood. A nightmare? But when he was quite awake? And what was that I felt, when I met his gaze? It seemed as though I was about to be swallowed up by... something. Is this that assassin’s doing, or something else?

At length Koku’s sobs abated, and he raised his tearstained, grey cheeks, gazing at Juushirou first in confusion then alarm. He pulled back, almost tumbling off the bed completely in his haste to put space between himself and the Thirteenth Division Captain, and Juushirou let out an exclamation, grabbing the fragile body and steadying it against the pillows.

“Are you all right now?” he asked gently, and Koku shook his head, his eyes still distressed.

“You can’t be here. You need to go... there,” he whispered, and Juushirou was not certain whether his companion was fully returned to his senses or not.

“There?” he echoed, and Koku nodded.

“There,” he repeated, “where the foxes are. In the dark place. You saw it too, didn’t you? Where they are. Though it’s probably... probably already...”

He gulped, his breath catching after the violence of his sobs, and a cold chill touched Juushirou’s soul at his words.

“The foxes?” he murmured, and Koku nodded again.

“...Silverfoxes?”

Koku's head jerked forward again, and Juushirou drew breath sharply, as, briefly, the blurred images that had flashed before him before came into sharp focus.

It was only a split-second, but...

"Joumei," he was on his feet, only just remembering that he was waiting for Shunsui to return with Mitsuki and help for the frightened young boy. "Something's happened to Joumei. Joumei and the Kitsune."

Koku stared, frightened by the sudden movement, and Juushirou forced himself to calm down, resting his hands on the young boy's shoulders.

"I don't understand," he admitted, "and right now I don't think you can tell me, even if I knew how to ask. But yes, I saw it too. Whatever it was, I... felt it. I saw the Kitsune. And I don't know why, but I believe you. I believe they're in trouble."

"Please, don't let anyone else be killed," Koku begged, grasping for the sleeve of the white haori once more, and Juushirou had the impression the youngster had no idea who he was talking to, his reservations and defences struck down by whatever had assailed him. The eyes were no longer blank and glazed, but pools of emotion, and Juushirou suddenly remembered Shunsui's words about the note Souja had brought back from the Rukon.

It means that someone knew what was going to happen to Souja before it happened, and Souja found and pocketed a description of his own death — probably without even realising what he'd found.

His eyes widened, and he stared at Koku as if seeing him for the first time.

It's insane. It's completely crazy, but Shunsui's hunches often pay off. And if that's the case, then...

He swallowed hard.

Did the assassin come here to silence the prophet who foretold Souja's death, because he tried to prevent it from happening? In which case... Joumei and the Kitsune are really in trouble. And I have nobody I can tell about it, and no idea where to go except to Hirata. What I'll even tell him I don't know, but even if it sounds crazy, I know what I saw. In that moment, I saw Joumei in the darkness, and if the Kitsune are in danger...

"Juushirou?" Mitsuki's voice at the door startled him from his reverie, and he turned, almost stumbling over his own feet in his relief to see her.

“Mitsuki! Oh good. You’ve come. Did Shunsui tell you?”

“That he got upset again? Yes,” Mitsuki looked concerned. “Are you all right? You look as though you saw a ghost.”

“I hope not,” Juushirou’s expression became grim. “I have to go somewhere — can I leave him to you?”

“Juu, hold it,” He made to leave, but Shunsui grabbed him by the arm. “Go? Right now? What of your stray?”

“I can’t ignore it, even if it’s crazy,” Juushirou shook himself free. “I have to go see Hirata — and I have to do it now.”

“Hirata?” Shunsui’s eyes became thoughtful, and Juushirou nodded.

“Come with me,” he suggested. “I’ll explain what I can on the way, and you can see what you think — but we can’t stand around here. I think it’s important... and I don’t know how much time we have.”

They were getting deeper beneath the surface of the earth.

Joumei paused for a split second to glance behind him, focusing not only his eyes but his ears on the tunnels beyond as he tried to make out the sound of pursuit. In the darkness, the heavy sound of his companion’s breathing was a distraction rather than a comfort, but the next moment he felt a push against his arm, and heard Hiko’s voice, breathless but firm in his ear.

“We can’t stop here, Joumei-dono. He’s still here. We can’t take the risk he isn’t, and there’s nowhere else to go but down.”

“Then we’ll take him down as deep as we can manage,” Joumei said grimly, grabbing out for Hiko’s wrist so that they did not lose one another in the blackness. “You listen, too. He’s a spider, scuttling in shadows. We don’t know where we might encounter him, so be on your guard.”

“Mm.” Joumei grunted his acquiescence, and Joumei set off once again at speed, gritting his teeth as the effort of using shunpo in such a spiritually polluted area began to take its toll on his thin frame. Though he had spent the entirety of his life surrounded by the deceptively pretty sheen of the Sekkiseki stone, and had learned to acclimatise to it, using bursts of spirit power in such close proximity to the unmined seams was still a painful and difficult feat, and, despite the cold stone that surrounded them, sweat beaded across his brow from the effort.

Yet it was all they could do. All they could do was run.

As they dropped out of the flashstep near to the chamber where Tenichi had been held, Joumei put a hand out against the wall, taking a deep breath into his lungs.

“Any further will have to be on foot,” he said wearily. “I can’t push my reiryoku any further — it’s too intense down here to focus after having used so much.”

“Do you think he can come this far down?” Hiko dropped back against the wall beside him, taking his own deep gulp of the cool, slightly musty air. The faint scent of funerary herbs penetrated the darkness, a pungent reminder of the chamber’s other use, and Joumei’s mind flitted back to the desecrated invalids whose corpses lay several levels up. Instinctively he put his hands together, murmuring an apology. They had known the risks, and had accepted that, by staying, an attack was likely — but his own reaction had come too late. As the Kitsune’s leader, he had no time to dwell or mourn such losses, but as a man, he knew that he would regret them for as long as he lived.

Which might not be so very long, considering.

He sighed, putting his hand to his chest. It burned, but not just with the exertion of shunpoing so deep inside the seams of rock. He remembered clearly Keitarou’s sword shooting out its silvery, barbed threads, and his own shield which had caused them to deflect harmlessly away from his body. Keitarou had become angry, he remembered, perhaps unsettled by the proximity of the Sekkiseki, but after that...

He shook his head, trying to clear the fog.

Keitarou had definitely uttered the words Bankai, and for a full minute following, there was nothing but a sea of white noise impeding his recollections. Then everything had shattered, and he had no longer been able to tell which senses were transmitting what. As though his tantou had carved up time into bitesize pieces and scattered it as confetti over the heads of the two Kitsune, Keitarou had taken control of their entire worlds and then, the next, had seemed to pull back, leaving them reeling but still on their feet.

Before he had been able to strike again, Joumei had reacted. Survival instinct had pumped adrenaline through unwilling limbs and he had grabbed Hiko roughly by the flaps of his shirt, dropping into a desperate and clumsy flashstep which had taken them some hundred metres deeper into the Sekkiseki mine. Where Keitarou now was or what he was thinking, neither of them knew. All either of them were focused on was survival... and somehow, escape.

“I don’t know,” at length he answered Hiko’s question, hating how ineffectual his answer was in light of such danger. “In the stone, there’s no way to properly sense his reiatsu. We only have our other senses... but then, with luck, so does he. We’re more used to the atmosphere and we know these tunnels blindfolded. It’s the only advantage we have.”

Hiko shivered involuntarily.

“What did he do with his sword?” he wondered. “One minute you were deflecting... the next... I don’t remember.”

“He said Bankai,” Joumei said grimly, rubbing his chest again. “Just because we’re both walking and in one piece, given such close confines, I don’t think we can assume that he missed. I’ve heard from Misashi-sama, and from Hirata-sama about the nature of Keitarou’s zanpakutou. It has the power of possessive manipulation... in one individual, over whom he can take complete control.”

“Over... one individual?” Hiko repeated apprehensively, and Joumei nodded.

“Irrespective, it seems of their spiritual ability,” he agreed. “I don’t know which of us he bewitched with it, Hiko, but it seems for sure one of us is touched. I hoped that coming this deep might break its effects, though — with the Sekkiseki all around us, damping our spirit power and his, he won’t find it so easy to locate us, let alone try and exploit his sword’s abilities.”

“I see,” Hiko glanced at his hands pensively for a moment, then, in the gloom, Joumei saw him reach for the dagger that hung at his waist, pulling it free and tossing it to the ground. He kicked at it, pushing it into a crevasse between split rock seams, and Joumei cast him a quizzical glance.

“If it’s me, I won’t attack you,” Hiko said simply. “Your father took care of me and I promised when he died that I’d always be there to help you in whatever way I could. Even if an enemy’s lurking inside me, I won’t hurt you. If I’m unarmed, you can defeat me. If I should turn on you, please don’t hesitate to kill me.”

“Hiko...” Joumei started for a moment, then he grimaced, resting his hands on his companion’s shoulders.

“You’ve borne this family’s curse for long enough,” he observed

sadly. “Now you want to die for it, too? You who of everyone in this place could’ve escaped without sanctions, standing here unarmed waiting for someone to kill you?”

“I may not be a Kitsune by blood, Joumei-dono, but I am a Kitsune by spirit,” Hiko replied matter-of-factly. “Without the Kitsune, I’d have died a long time ago. If I die now, so be it. In the meantime, how long can we lurk here? If he’s going to put us under siege, or try to starve us out, can we resist him?”

“Mm. We can,” Joumei nodded his head. “There’s enough food down here for two or three days at least, maybe more if we’re careful. I’ve never spent such a long time together at such depth in the mine before, but I can’t imagine Keitarou will be able to stand Sekkiseki exposure for as long as we should be able to manage it. We must, though. I want to report to Hirata-sama. I’ve already delayed for far too long, and now, when I have firm evidence of Keitarou’s activity within his land... it’s my duty to go.”

“Probably that’s what he wants to prevent,” Hiko observed blackly. “That and to eradicate the Kitsune once and for all. He lives on old grievances... this is just another one for his list.”

“Then it’s a relief to know that he’ll never succeed in that aim,” Joumei shifted his body against the uneven surface of the stone wall. “Most of our people are far from here and safe. Some are even trying to integrate into normal communities, and having some success.”

“And Izumi-himeis in the protection of the Gotei,” Hiko agreed, though Joumei could hear the doubt in his friend’s voice, and he sighed.

“I trust them, Hiko. You shouldn’t fear them so much as you do. They aren’t always enemies... and not enemies of ours, not in this case.”

“I know,” Hiko pursed his lips. “I have no reason to hate them, not really. Just... the things Neechan used to say about them, I guess...”

He shook his head.

“It doesn’t matter. It was a long time ago, and Junko-nee isn’t here any more,” he said pragmatically. “I’m a Kitsune, now, and have been since I was six. That’s what matters most — I’m sorry, Joumei-dono. I think perhaps I’ve become afraid... and it’s shaking my usual concentration.”

“If so, you’re not the only one,” Joumei admitted darkly. “This enemy we’ve known about for so long is now so real and more, within our heartland. Death is such a reality for our people that I've barely given it any thought, but seeing Souja-dono killed made me look at it all anew. I don't want to leave this life without having seen justice for him, first. His family may have orphaned you and your sister, but they've protected me and mine."

"Souja-dono didn't kill anyone, nor did Hirata-sama," Hiko shrugged. "Really, I didn't mean to dwell on the past. Shunmei-sama used to tell me off for it. Stop wondering, he'd say. Stop thinking of things you can't change. Life is here and now and as you make it from this point on. It doesn't matter any more. What's more important is finding a way to get you out of here, so you can go report to Hirata-sama and bring this to an end."

"If you think I'm sacrificing you to that end, it's not going to happen," Joumei said pragmatically, then he stiffened, ears pricking as he heard a shuffling, scuttling sound from the tunnel beyond.

"Did you hear that?" he murmured, and Hiko gritted his teeth.

"Something's... here," he whispered. "Something..."

He faltered, grabbing hold of Joumei's sleeve, and pointing towards the yawning gape of the tunnel opening ahead. Joumei turned, his own eyes widening with dismay as he made out the glittering, ghostly red eyes glowing out of the darkness, the faintest impression of a spectral spider hazing around it just enough to give itself form against the black.

You think you've escaped from me. How sweet.

The words ricocheted around the walls of the tunnel, resounding off the Sekkiseki as though mocking its sealing properties, and the eyes seemed to glow brighter for a moment before fading to a dull, blood red colour.

How utterly naive.

"Where are you?" Hiko exclaimed, glancing around him in fear. "Stop hiding behind your spider, Keitarou! Come out and show yourself! Show yourself!"

I really don't think that's either wise or necessary.

The voice echoed again, and Joumei clapped his hands over his ears.

"Don't listen to him!" he exclaimed. "Don't let him bait you — he's just trying to spook us, so we let our guards down and move to higher ground!"

Do you think that covering your ears will save you? You are ignorant. I'm not that easy to ignore.

Joumei's eyes widened, for the voice had not been dampened at all by his hasty action. Horror gripped hold of his heart as he understood that, far from being projected from the spectral spider before them, the voice was, in fact, nowhere but the inside of his own skull, and, from the identical look in Hiko's eyes, he knew that his companion had realised the same. He tried to take a step back, but the tunnel wall dug into his spine, and his lips mouthed a curse, his vocal chords suddenly unable to remember how to transmit sound.

The voice, the spider... it was all an illusion. It was all in their heads, put there by the man who...

Joumei's gaze flitted to Hiko, taking in his companion's ashen features, and the dread began to grow inside his own chest.

The man who released his Bankai... not on one of us, but on both of us. And who, despite the power of the Sekkiseki... has now found us. Both of us. Trapped.

Well, so now you understand that I don't need to be near you to kill you.

Keitarou sounded amused, the predatorial note in his tones laced with derisive humour.

The Sekkiseki makes it hard for me to physically touch you, but spiritually, that's another matter. I'm already inside you. Inside both of you. And since your spirit power acts as a cushion between me and the rocks around you... I can still reach you, just like this. I simply wanted you to get to a place where escape would be highly unlikely and interference almost impossible. I want to kill the both of you, and thanks to your escape reflexes, I don't have to do it manually. I can have the two of you kill each other, instead.

Almost before Keitarou's words had finished, Joumei felt something lurch inside of his body, and he gasped, putting his hands to his chest as the burning sensation suddenly began to stifle his entire respiratory system. Alongside him, Hiko had crumpled to the floor, his knees giving out as he lost all individual control over his limbs. Despite his spiritual strength, Joumei felt the world around him drawing further and further away, his vision becoming telescopic as something dark and cloying began to sweep through his body and up over his heart, pumping itself into his bloodstream with every beat of his pulse. Valiantly he fought against it, but the lure was too much for him, and in dismay he watched his own fingers begin to move to his waist in search of his dagger, his head swivelling to bring the still collapsed Hiko into his sights.

Kill him.

The words were soft, soothing and hypnotic, entirely different from the mocking tones he had heard just a moment before, and though Joumei's consciousness screamed for help, he felt his arm turn and lift, fingers curling around his own dagger whilst his left hand grasped for Hiko's reddish crop of hair. Before he could grasp it, though, Hiko sprang up from the crouched position, launching himself at his leader with so much force that it threw Joumei back against the wall, knife clattering from his own hands as Hiko's broad fist came down across his upper left cheek. Pain resonated through him, but though he felt it, Joumei was unable to react to it, his hands going up for Hiko's throat despite all his attempts to pull them down. Hiko's teeth came down against his arm, the terror in the other man's eyes a stark contrast to the savagery with which he had begun his attack, and Joumei tried desperately to regather the scattered threads of his composure.

Stop it!

He begged his fingers, and they twitched briefly in hesitation, before lunging once more for Hiko's throat. The redhead rolled over, away from Joumei's reach, and for a while the two grappled on the ground, Hiko's physical strength giving him the advantage, yet Joumei fighting tooth and nail against the control over his nervous system.

Well, this is entertaining.

Keitarou's mocking tones acted like salt against the bloody scrapes and scratches the struggle had left against Joumei's body, jagged stone tearing through the sleeves and legs of his clothing, and as Hiko shoved him down against the ground, his head hit the rock, causing stars to dance before his eyes. Momentarily stunned, his focus on fighting Keitarou's control waned for a moment, and in that instant Chudokuga's power took full advantage. Before Joumei knew what had happened, his left hand had thrust up against Hiko's chest, a glow of repellant silver magic sending the heavier man flying back against the wall of the tunnel with a heavy thud.

You see how futile it is to battle against me?

Keitarou scolded.

You used too much power escaping to your current location. Using Shunpo against Sekkiseki was a poor decision from a scientist. Perhaps you're the weak link in your family's chain — not really an Urahara so much as vermin scuttling around in channels beneath the earth. Your presence taints this land. It will be a loss to noone if you die.

Let Hiko go.

Joumei focused every last nerve on transmitting this thought back in the direction from where the message had come.

Let him go. He's not a Kitsune. He's not one of us. He's not an Urahara, even. He's not even Clan. He's just someone who happened to be here. Let him go.

How touching. But this isn't a negotiation. He's here, therefore that's culpability enough. He can die alongside you. He can kill you, then himself. I can't be appealed to. I have no mercy for foxes.

Something tight and dark wrapped itself like a wraith of energy around Joumei's neck and, even though he knew it was all in his imagination, he coughed, desperately trying to bring air into his lungs. As he did so, however, he caught sight of something, indistinct but glittering in the recesses of his mind.

A sword? What sword? I never saw that before. I don't have a sword like that, so why...

Stop it! Know your place!

The image was gone in a moment, as though something had roughly slammed the door on it, but there had been a note of alarm in the formerly serene tones, and for a moment, Keitarou's hold over Joumei's limbs waned. Pushing Hiko back with as much force as he could muster in his deadened arms, he struggled to pull himself away from his companion, who, eyes still gleaming with fear, seemed to be readying a new attack.

You said your power was inside of me, cushioned by mine. You said that the Sekkiseki outside me couldn't do anything, but if that's the case...

Without stopping to think about what he was doing, Joumei's fingers scrabbled desperately at the ground, pulling together fragments and splinters of Sekkiseki rock.

This might kill me, but even if it does, better that than dying at your hand.

He pushed the fragments into his mouth, ignoring the burning sensation as they made contact with his tongue. Resolutely he swallowed them, coughing and spluttering as they seared their way down his gullet and into his stomach, causing him to double up in pain and nausea. Hiko's shadow loomed over him, but he somehow managed to jerk his body to the side, dropping down against the cold stone floor and taking laboured breaths into his lungs. Close as he had been to Sekkiseki his whole life, ingesting it was still a highly dangerous venture, yet as the cloaking darkness of Keitarou's power began to fragment and push back to the edge of his senses, he closed his eyes, relief filling his body as little by little it returned to his control.

When he opened them, he realised that the glowing red eyes no longer stared at him from down the dark twist of the tunnel ahead, and he could no longer hear Keitarou's mocking voice echoing against his senses.

He dragged himself around to glance at Hiko, who was poised to attack once more, yet clearly fighting tooth and nail against the scientist's control. Dragging himself up, Joumei tried to reach out a hand to his friend, but at his gesture Hiko pulled back, clumsy fingers faltering for the knife that lay tucked away in the crevasse of the wall.

"Hiko, no!" Joumei's vocal chords suddenly erupted back into life, his words hoarse and raw, but his words fell on deaf ears, and the red haired man drew himself up to his full height, weapon clutched in his right hand.

For a moment, nothing moved between them. Then, very deliberately and as though he were fighting the weight of the world's forces to do it, Hiko reversed the sword, plunging the blade deep into his own gut. Joumei's eyes widened with dismay as his closest ally staggered back, falling into the funeral chamber proper with a sickening thud. Joumei forced strength into his limbs, crawling towards the opening to reach his friend, but before he could manage it, Hiko had thrust his hand up towards the ceiling, determination in his green eyes.

"Hadou no Sanjuu San. Shakkahou!" He gasped out, pain clear in every syllable, and with a rumble and a clatter, the ceiling of the chamber split apart. Huge chunks of rubble broke loose, falling with a cloud of dust and debris to the ground below, and Joumei, rocked back by the force of the explosion could only stare, the tears running down his cheeks as much from genuine emotion as the fallout from the blast. The door had been entirely blocked in, making any kind of rescue attempt impossible, but despite this he clawed at the rubble anyway, trying desperately to shift the boulders that now formed a barrier between him and his companion.

The chances of surviving an explosion like that without an injury was slim, but with a blade wound to his gut as well...

"Hiko!" Joumei yelled out his friend's name, but there was no response, the only movement in the hall around him the clouds of settling dust that coated both him and the tunnels, making the air thick and difficult to breathe.

“Hiko...”

At length he realised his attempts were futile, and he fell back on his haunches, feeling sick and not just from the Sekkiseki he had put into his system.

Hiko saw me use the Sekkiseki to break Keitarou's hold. He saw, and he took the weapon and did the same. That sword was covered in Sekkiseki dust. Getting it into his bloodstream allowed him to regain control. He said he wasn't going to kill me, so instead...

He closed his eyes, anger replacing grief in his heart.

All the sacrifices you made for me and for my people, and I never did get a chance to repay them. All those sacrifices... but now isn't the time. I have to focus. I have to breathe. I have to find a way to get out of here whilst Keitarou's hold over me is broken. I have a duty to do and I must do it. For Hiko as well as for Souja-dono, now... I have to go.

“Well, so here we are,” Shunsui gazed up at the Endou Clan logo, still hanging at a slightly precarious angle, letting out a low whistle as he registered the damage to the barrier fence. “And from what Kai said, your former recruit that did that — I hope Hirata had him sweeping up the mess.”

“Tenichi's sword,” Juushirou's eyes clouded and he nodded his head, but he did not slow down, grabbing his friend by the sleeve of the pink haori and giving him an impatient tug. “Come on. I said we don't have time to hang around. I need to see Hirata as soon as possible... it might already be too late, but it's the only option I can think of.”

“And you promised me an explanation, of which I've had none, yet,” Shunsui objected, nonetheless speeding up his naturally lounging pace as they crossed the courtyard towards the Seventh Division's main barracks. “I realise shunpo isn't the best time to talk about anything — and you could've warned me you were going to flash step, by the way, since I almost tripped over my feet trying to catch up with you outside Thirteenth — but I want to know what it is that has you on edge. That boy said something that bothered you, didn't he?”

“It doesn't take a genius to work that out,” Juushirou said wearily, as a group of Seventh Division officers, led by the austere Ohara hurried across the courtyard to greet their arrival. “Look, trust me. I'm trusting your hunch here, and acting on it, so trust me that I've made the right call. It's hard to explain and I'm not sure how to... or if it's wise to do it in front of anyone but Hirata.”

"I see. Brought here under false pretences," Shunsui pouted, but his expression was grave. "You've piqued my curiosity, though, so I'll humour you for now."

"Kyouraku-taichou! Ukitake-taichou!" Ohara reached them at that point, bowing respectfully towards Shunsui, and then, after a moment of hesitation, repeating the gesture towards Juushirou, and despite himself faint amusement glittered in Shunsui's eyes at the reluctant deference this proud Clan peacock was forced to pay to an officer he knew had grown up in the Districts.

"We've come to see your Captain," Juushirou took charge. "It's a matter of urgency, so I trust he's here."

"Indeed he is, sir," Ohara bristled slightly at the brisk nature of Juushirou's words, but nodded his head nonetheless, "but he's in his office dealing with paperwork. Can I ask what it's about?"

"Apparently not even I have full clearance to know that right at the moment," Shunsui interjected lazily, before Juushirou could respond. "Apparently it's important, though, so if you don't mind..."

"I see," Ohara's brows knitted slightly, but he nodded. 'In that case, I shall alert him of your presence. You,' he turned to a recruit, "run to the Captain and report that Kyouraku-taichou and Ukitake-taichou are here and want to see him at once. Tell him it's apparently urgent, and that I shall bring them forthwith."

"Yes sir!" The recruit saluted sharply, before scuttling off to carry out the order, and Ohara cast the Captains a lukewarm, patently false smile.

"If you'd like to come with me, I'll take you to his office," he said politely, his words directed more towards Shunsui than Juushirou, but the white-haired Captain did not notice. He nodded, and Shunsui sighed, tucking a stray wisp of wild brown hair behind his ear in resignation.

"Lead the way, please, Ohara-kun," he said pleasantly. "I'm sorry we've interrupted your duties — I'm sure Seventh are pretty busy at the moment, and I heard you had a run-in with a dangerous felon last night."

"That idiot Kotetsu let him get away," now there was no hiding Ohara's disdain for District blood, and he wrinkled up his nose in derision. "Kikyue-dono and I have worked hard to improve his ruthless edge, but it seems he still has a long way to go before he can be truly effective against that kind of prisoner. However, we were fortunate not to take any major damage as a result.”

“The prisoner is still at large, I believe,” Shunsui commented, and Ohara shrugged.

“With all respect, sir, that is a matter for the Second to resolve,” he said matter-of-factly, and it was clear from his attitude that he considered it beneath his notice. “Kotetsu at least managed to keep the felon from progressing deeper into our barracks, and for that the ingrate should count himself fortunate. Had he come within range of a higher level of sword...”

He made a beheading moment, and Shunsui looked amused.

“Fortunate indeed,” he agreed benignly, as they stepped into the hallway that led to the Captain’s office. “In Souja-dono’s absence, it must be a great comfort to H... Endou-taichou and Kikyue-hime to have strong officers like yourself and Kitabata to help hold the fort.”

“Mm, well, Kitabata does the best he can,” there was a level of condescension in Ohara’s voice, “and of course, I am as ever at my Captain’s command. Seventh Division has taken a severe loss, but we are strong enough at our core to overcome it — I am quite sure that we will hunt down our Vice Captain’s murderer and lay his spirit to rest in the not too distant future.”

“I’m sure Hirata doesn’t want anyone else to die needlessly,” Juushirou, who had been lost in a troubled reverie spoke up at this point, and Shunsui saw Ohara visibly flinch at the white-haired man’s sudden intrusion into what he clearly considered a conversation between Clansfolk. He had no occasion to respond, however, for at their brisk pace they had quickly reached Hirata’s inner office, and the man himself pushed back the door, casting both his fellow Captains a quizzical glance.

“Well?” he demanded, his own tones harried, and Shunsui offered him a grin.

“It’s Juu’s idea,” he said off-handedly. “I’m as in the dark as you, but apparently it’s something important.”

“And confidential,” Juushirou added, and Hirata’s expression became thoughtful.

“All right. Come in,” he agreed, casting Ohara a glance. “Ohara, you’re dismissed. Return to your scheduled duties, please.”

“Yes, sir,” Ohara saluted, though clearly insulted by Juushirou’s snub, and as Hirata ushered his friends into the office, Shunsui let out a low chuckle of appreciation, shutting the door behind him.

“That one’s so full of his own opinion,” he reflected, “and he can’t stand being out of the loop. Especially since it was you who put him there, Juu. I guess it’s tough when you’re born with delusions of grandeur to accept that rank no longer depends on birth.”

“He can say what he likes. I don’t have time to fuss about Clan idiots,” Juushirou responded, and Hirata’s eyes widened behind his glasses at the uncharacteristic curtness in his friend’s tones.

“What’s going on, Juushirou?” he asked softly. “Why are you here — what’s happened?”

“I want to know where the Kitsune are.”

“I beg your pardon?” Hirata’s jaw dropped, and Shunsui cast Juushirou a startled glance.

“The Kitsune?”

“Yes. Joumei-kun and his associates. I want to know where they are, or at the very least, to know that there’s someone you can send there to check on them, because I’m pretty sure they’re in danger.”

Hirata’s gaze flitted to Shunsui, who shrugged helplessly.

“Don’t look at me, I’m missing the pages of this volume too,” he said, mystified. “The last update I had, we were in Thirteenth and talking to the young lad who brought back Souja. The next thing I knew, Juu was talking about coming here and acting, well, like this.”

He gestured, and Hirata’s brows drew together in consternation.

“Juushirou doesn’t generally get worked up over nothing,” he said pensively. “The only people living, though, who know where the Kitsune are are myself and my father. I haven’t spoken to Joumei face to face for some time, certainly not since Souja died. If even I haven’t had contact from his people, I can’t imagine why...”

“I have. I’ve spoken to him, recently,” Juushirou interrupted, grasping Hirata by the wrists, and Shunsui saw the urgency in his friend’s hazel eyes. “He came to see me, after Souja was cremated. He wanted to help find justice for your son, and he spoke as a friend.”

“Joumei... came to Thirteenth?” Hirata’s face drained of colour, and Juushirou nodded.

“And you didn’t tell me?”

“You were observing official mourning,” Juushirou responded. “I was going to, when you returned, but this is...”

He faltered, shaking his head, and Shunsui was startled by the depth of anxiety in his friend’s gaze.

“I don’t even understand what happened today, so it’s hard to put into words that will convince you I’m not crazy,” Juushirou said quietly. “Joumei, when he spoke to me, said that he felt certain Tenichi’s abduction was designed to locate their lair, and that Keitarou had succeeded in doing so by dropping Tenichi in a place that he would be found by the Kitsune.”

“Souja did collect Tenichi from them,” Hirata agreed gravely, his pale eyes sad. “Tenichi’s been sworn to secret on the subject, though, and I’m fairly sure he doesn’t know much about where they held him. Izumi-hime has quite a powerful hypnotic ability which they used to sedate him before taking him below ground, so if you think that...”

“Izumi can do what?” Juushirou’s eyes almost fell out of his head, and Shunsui glanced from one friend to the other, holding up his hands in defeat.

“I am completely lost,” he said frankly. “Who is Izumi, why does that matter, and what did we come to bother Hirata about, anyway?”

“Right,” Juushirou got a grip on himself, shooting Shunsui a sheepish look. “You’re right, that can wait. It’s the boy that came back with Souja. Koku. You know he’s been in my custody since that incident.”

“Yes, and apparently you’re guarding him obsessively,” Hirata said astutely. Juushirou looked rueful.

“Kai’s been complaining to you too, clearly,” he observed. “Oh well. I’ll deal with that later. There isn’t time now. Hirata, you were the one who gave Shunsui that weird note, too, weren’t you? The one that was in Souja’s clothing?”

“Kikyue found it,” Hirata nodded, looking bewildered. “Did you want to see it? Is that why...”

“Later, maybe, but right now, no,” Juushirou shook his head, tightening his grasp on the younger man’s wrists. “Hirata, Shunsui believes that’s a prophesy. It was written by someone who knew your son would die, and how, before it happened. It sounds insane, and it’s hard to rationalise, but I believe him. And most of all I believe him because of what Koku said. I think he’s the one who made the prophesy and that’s why he came to help Souja when nobody else did or could. I think he saw it and tried to prevent it, but wasn’t able to do so.”

“That’s a huge leap, even considering it’s based around my own,” Shunsui objected.

“I know, but listen,” Juushirou spoke in low, excited tones, releasing his hold on Hirata as he turned to his older friend instead. “Earlier, when he lost his wits, he was trying to tell us something. All those words he said, they didn’t make sense at the time, but when he was grabbing hold of me, I... I felt it. Something. I can’t even explain what, just that it was as though I was plunging down tunnels, too. It was the briefest fragments of something that didn’t make sense, but when you went to get Mitsuki, he spoke to me about foxes. Silver foxes. He asked me to go to them, and begged me not to let anyone else be killed. He didn’t know what he was saying, or, I think, who he was talking to — but he was insistent and I believed him. Whatever he saw, I saw a flash of it too. And in the midst of it, I saw Joumei.”

“You’re serious,” Shunsui’s expression became grave, and Juushirou nodded.

“If there’s a prophet, Koku is it,” he said softly. “That’s why Keitarou’s assassin came to attack him, out of everyone else. That’s why he knew where to find Souja, and why he tried to help him. And now I believe he’s seen something else, and I don’t think we can risk not acting on it.”

“Or it’s a trap,” Shunsui pointed out, and Juushirou flinched, staring at his friend in dismay.

“Shunsui?”

“Well, I know you want to believe in this kid,” Shunsui said with a sigh, “and I admit, he doesn’t seem like a calculating killer. But this could just as easily be intended to lure Hirata, or you, or anyone to a place of exposed danger. Hirata’s a Clan leader. Mounting an assault on him within a short time of his son’s death is not unheard of. Not considering the enemy — we can’t overlook the possibility that this is a planned ambush.”

“You didn’t see Koku’s eyes,” Juushirou shook his head. “You didn’t feel how it felt when whatever it was flashed through me. I believed him, because I saw Joumei too.”

“I saw them, but you can’t base...”

“Shunsui,” Juushirou cut across his friend, a frustrated look in his eyes. “Look, you asked me to back you up on your hunch at the Captain’s meeting, and I did. You had no evidence for it, but I did.

Now I've added to your evidence, you're acting like it's not even possible."

"I know you when there's a vulnerable stray about, and more, so does Keitarou," Shunsui said darkly. "Remember Shikiki? Keitarou's not a fool, that's all I'm saying. We don't know enough about Koku, but we do know that his answers are evasive and his behaviour highly defensive. There are secrets in that boy's head, and we don't know what they are. There's more to this, and more to him. The way he looked at me, it was as though he'd seen a potential problem or obstacle in his path. What if he's been sent to dupe you, and win your trust? We both know that you have a soft heart when it comes to people in trouble. What if this is Keitarou's master plan?"

"Will you stop acting like I need protecting all the while?" Juushirou exploded, the sudden raising of his voice making both Shunsui and Hirata jump. "I'm a Captain of the Gotei, just as you are, and more, Koku is in my custody. I have my subordinates with him twenty-four-seven and they report to me, too, about his behaviour and his actions, things he says, things he does."

He jabbed a bony finger accusingly against Shunsui's chest, making the stunned Eighth Captain take a step back.

"You, on the other hand, live several divisions away and, until today, hadn't even met the lad face to face. Moreover, I would've thought that you'd be pleased that there's some evidence to support your theory. Instead, though, you've turned it into an issue of my safety — which, incidentally, in a Gotei where people have already been killed, is a pretty stupid concern."

"Woah there," Shunsui raised his hands in mock surrender. "Someone didn't get enough sleep last night, clearly. I'm just asking you to look at all the options, that's all."

"And I'm asking you to trust my judgement," Juushirou snapped back. "In the meantime, while we're arguing here, the Kitsune might be in danger. They might be hurt, or worse. We have no guarantees they're under threat, but no indication that they're not. And I didn't come here to ask you or Hirata to go investigate. I came to ask where they were, so that I could go. I am perfectly capable of taking care of myself, and handling Keitarou if that need should arise."

"And if you can't?" Shunsui asked softly, and Juushirou's eyes clouded.

"People have already been killed," he said sadly. "Too many people. Koku begged me not to let anyone else die. You don't have to believe me, or him, if you don't want to, but I know that plea came from the heart. His eyes were desperate, and frightened, and he really meant it. He believed they were going to be killed and it was hurting him. If I go, and it's dangerous, well, that's why I trained to hold a sword. If I don't go, and people die because of it, then how can I hold up my head as a Captain who protects the people in the Districts? If I was killed, Enishi would take hold and Thirteenth would be fine — but I've no intention of letting that happen. I'll go and I'll do what I can. That's all."

"The Kitsune are mine to protect, not yours," Hirata interjected quietly, and Juushirou shook his head.

"I promised Joumei something too," he said simply, "and it was me Koku asked to go. It's my obligation. I'll go. Just tell me where, and I'll go."

"But it's my duty to. If you go, I'll have to go too, because you won't be able to find it without my help," Hirata reached for his haori, slipping it over his shoulders and taking a step towards the door.

"You... believe me?" Juushirou looked startled, and Hirata sighed.

"I don't know what I think about the whole idea. Like you said, it's insane, and it also suggests someone knew my son would die — that's hard to stomach," he said quietly. "I'd also rather you two didn't have a domestic in my office — you sound like an old married couple and my head is already aching enough from dealing with Souja's paperwork and upstart subordinates who don't know their place. But..."

"But?" Shunsui asked.

"I believe in both of you and the crazy ideas you have," Hirata said simply. "Besides, Juushirou is right. Too many people have died, as I know to my personal cost. We can't risk not believing it. It doesn't matter if it's a trap, since a summons to the Kitsune lair would mean they were in danger in some way regardless of the real reason for that summons. I know Joumei was evacuating most of his people, but he's still there, with a couple of his associates and his sister. Their family have led the Kitsune since they came to District Seven, and..."

"His sister isn't there," Juushirou shook his head. "That was Joumei's reason for coming to me. He wanted to make a deal — his sister's safety for her scientific help in our investigation. Izumi is currently at Thirteenth."

"What?" Hirata's eyes almost fell out of his head, and Juushirou looked apologetic.

“You weren’t in a position to discuss it with,” he explained, and Shunsui’s eyes widened in wonder.

“Your new recruit,” he murmured, and Juushirou nodded.

“I had her particularly protected last night, but since the assassin came after Koku and paid her not the slightest bit of attention, I think she’s still beyond Keitarou’s radar,” he said wearily. “I had no idea she had any... whatever it was you called them, Hirata — hypnotic abilities? Joumei failed to mention that to me when he offered me her services.”

“The Kitsune have a lot of secrets,” Hirata admitted.

“They don’t seem to be the only ones,” Shunsui grimaced at Juushirou. “Fine. If I’m outnumbered, then I guess you can count me in on this jaunt as well. Better three Captains than two.”

“Then we should go, at once, to the Kitsune lair.” Hirata suggested.

“There’s no need for that, Hirata-sama.”

A voice from the window made the three Captains turn, Hirata letting out an exclamation of disbelief as a ragged figure pulled his body awkwardly over the sill, dropping down onto the tatami mat floor with a painful thud. He winced, closing his eyes briefly as if steadying himself, and at the sight of him, Shunsui’s heart skipped a beat. Though he had never met the newcomer before, somehow he knew exactly who this stranger was.

“Kitsune,” he murmured, and Juushirou bit his lip, clearly as shaken as his companion by this obvious confirmation of Koku’s claim. Joumei’s clothing was torn and stained with blood, deep scratches running down his arms beneath shredded sleeves, and dark bruising beginning to shadow the pale skin around his left eye. He was breathing heavily, his palms pressed against the floor as he struggled to stabilise his body. At length he managed it, shuffling himself around so that he faced Hirata and lowering his head in a bow of deference.

“For infiltrating your premises uninvited, and with so little regard for your status, Hirata-sama, I apologise profusely,” he murmured.

“Joumei,” Hirata’s expression became troubled, and he moved to help the young man to his feet. As he stood, Shunsui saw that the man’s legs too were similarly savaged, as though he had been involved in a hard, physical fight, yet despite the damage, he managed to pull himself into an upright position, allowing the Endou Captain to guide him to a seat and usher him down into it. There was a moment of silence, then Hirata turned to Juushirou.

“Apparently your theory was correct,” he said, though there was no sense of congratulation in his tones, and Shunsui saw Juushirou slowly shake his head.

“We were too late,” he murmured. “We procrastinated too much, I wasted too much time. Joumei-kun, I’m sorry. We should have acted quicker to come help you.”

“Help us?” Joumei stared at the District Captain as if he had lost his mind, and Hirata nodded.

“It seems that Juushirou received some warning of an attack on you, not so long ago,” he said gently, though Shunsui was aware of the tension rippling through his friend’s slender body. “We were heading out to investigate — but your presence here tells me that there’s nothing more we can do. You wouldn’t have left your home if there was something still there to protect, would you? You’ve come to pass on a warning, and to tell us that Keitarou has struck again.”

Joumei drew a heavy, shaking breath into tired lungs, lowering his head in a reluctant nod.

“He came to attack us,” he said softly. “I had tried to prepare for the worst, and most of my people have long since left our home for pastures new, but the sick and the frail remained behind. We had not managed to put in process a plan to move them, and with only Hiko and I to protect them, there was little we could do. Keitarou killed all of them without hesitation, and then tried to corner the two of us. Since his barbed attack didn’t work... he resorted to other methods.”

He took another shaking breath, burying his head in his hands.

“I don’t know how long I can function here without putting anyone in danger,” he admitted. “I came because I felt I should report, but Hirata-sama, I want you to discard me. Me and all connection to my people. It may have cost you your son’s life, and now, perhaps, it might cause even greater wounds to your Clan and your name. I do not want any more deaths on our account. We have sinned enough in past generations — I would rather prevent those sins from spreading to this.”

“What are you talking about?” Hirata demanded sharply, and Juushirou’s countenance paled.

“Keitarou’s Bankai,” he whispered. “That’s what you mean, isn’t it, Joumei-kun? Keitarou used his Bankai on you, and because of that...”

“I don’t know what might happen next,” Joumei nodded confirmation of the other man’s words. “He unleashed it on Hiko and I, and made us fight against one another. It was a fight to the death, against ourselves and against his power. We were deep inside the mine, and I used the Sekkiseki to break his immediate control of me. Hiko... Hiko tried to do the same, but then exploded the ceiling of a chamber on top of himself so that he couldn’t attack me any more. I tried but I couldn’t rescue him, and so I came here.”

“Used the Sekkiseki?” Shunsui looked blank, and Hirata turned grave features on his friend.

“The Kitsune’s home is a former Sekkiseki mine. They live among it and it protects them, or so it should,” he said quietly.

“Poison in the earth that might save them.”

Koku’s words, shaking and disjointed suddenly echoed through Shunsui’s thoughts, and his brows knitted together in consternation. He glanced at Juushirou, meeting an identical expression of concern in the other man’s hazel eyes, and knew the white haired Captain was thinking along similar lines.

“Keitarou’s attack was anticipated,” Joumei said grimly, bringing both Captains’ attentions back to the matter at hand. “We knew it was coming, just not when. We could have taken greater losses, and those he killed were not likely to live much longer anyway. All but Hiko — whose loss I find harder to put behind me.”

“That’s a clinical way of looking at people who you consider family,” Shunsui objected, and Joumei raised his gaze to the Kyouraku Captain, taking in his appearance for the first time.

“We haven’t met, I don’t believe.”

“Kyouraku Shunsui. Hirata and I are old friends,” Shunsui said frankly. “And you’re one of the mysterious fox people I keep hearing about.”

“It’s all right, Joumei. You haven’t met him, but I trust Shunsui as I trust Juushirou, and both are people you can put faith in too,” Hirata assured the young man, looking troubled. “That is, if you can put faith in me after today’s events. It seems that my promises of protection run very hollow these days. Since Souja died, I haven’t been as alert as I ought to have been. I knew you were in danger, but I did nothing to protect your people, and now...”

“We took what precautions we could, but we just ran out of time,” Joumei shook his head. “It’s not your duty to shield us, Hirata-sama, not when I might have brought Souja-dono into the danger that cost him his life. I didn’t come here to question your motives or ask for reparation. I came to inform you of what I knew — while I could.”

“You’re so much like your father when you speak like that,” Hirata rubbed his temples, and Joumei managed a wan smile.

“You give me too much credit,” he said matter-of-factly. “Father would doubtless have done better.”

He glanced at Shunsui.

“You said I was clinical, but the reality is that we all live on borrowed time,” he added. “Living alongside Sekkiseki, life is brief and death is common. We learn to appreciate the time we have, but accept it when that time ends. Those Keitarou killed were all in the final stages of the malady that claims most all of us eventually. It is lingering, debilitating and, ultimately, a sentence of death while still alive. At most, they would have lived a few months, and moving them might have killed them outright. Perhaps it is callous, to consider such people expendable, but so they also viewed themselves. They too agreed that the young and strong should be evacuated first — they were prepared for death before today. It is the way we will all go, sooner or later.”

His eyes narrowed, faint flickers of anger in the argent depths.

“Hiko was different,” he added. “He wasn’t born to be subjected to the curse that hangs over the Kitsune, and you will not find me so calm over his loss.”

“But you have been treating with Juushirou during my absence in office?” Hirata cast Joumei a questioning look, and Joumei nodded, once more apologetic.

“I have overreached myself, and I’m sorry,” he admitted, “but I wanted to help avenge Souja-dono’s death. He was my friend first and foremost and I felt Izumi and I could be of some material use. I trust this has been the case?” this last to Juushirou, who nodded.

“We found Keitarou’s original hideout,” he agreed, “or Shunsui and some others did, based on Izumi’s coordinates. He’d left the scene, though — and now we’re working on narrowing down his current choice of home.”

“Almost certainly in the last place you would consider viable,” Joumei muttered, and Shunsui nodded.

“He’s been sighted in the Real World,” he said frankly. “The witnesses are reliable, placing him there.”

“Then that is probably where he is not,” Joumei said frankly. He winced, closing his eyes briefly, and Shunsui frowned, noting the sudden pallor that crossed the young man’s features.

“Joumei-kun?” Hirata asked softly, and Joumei shook his head vigorously, opening his eyes and meeting the Endou Lord’s gaze with a frustrated one of his own.

“He is still inside of me,” he murmured. “I felt it then, just fleetingly. Clearly even swallowing Sekkiseki isn’t enough to break it permanently, not now I’m out of the tunnels. My being here could be his will or it could be my own — I truly don’t know for sure whether he let me come to you or whether I escaped on my own. I thought it suspicious he was nowhere around when I hit the surface — but perhaps that was just another part of his plan.”

“In that case, it’s a good idea we don’t talk about anything else relating to the Kitsune or the Gotei’s progress for the time being,” Juushirou looked troubled, but he nodded his head. “I’ve experienced Keitarou’s Bankai — Shunsui and I both have knowledge of it, and that it can’t be broken so easily. It’s not impossible that Keitarou let you escape so he can try and learn something from us. That being the case, I think we’d do better discussing only Keitarou himself, rather than anything else.”

“Juushirou-dono is right,” Joumei acknowledged. “I came to report on the things I can — please, let me do that while I’m in sound mind enough to do it.”

“Keitarou’s method of control seems to have changed since that day in District Seven,” Hirata reflected. “Although, Juushirou, when you were possessed by his blade, to begin with there was no way to tell. You didn’t act against Shunsui until after I had gone to pursue Seimaru... so perhaps it isn’t so very different.”

“No. No, you’re right,” Juushirou pulled a face. “It has changed. In the past, he was only able to use this power on one individual at a time, and told me so — if you remember, the last time he and I met face to face, it was because he wanted to reclaim the shreds of spirit power left inside of me because without them he couldn’t activate his Bankai on anyone else.”

“But he did succeed in doing that,” Shunsui said grimly. “That means he has a fully functional sword this time around.”

“Ah, but I see what Juushirou means. By Joumei’s testimony, it was used against both him and Hiko simultaneously.” Hirata pointed out. “Hiko couldn’t overcome it, so wound up killing himself. Joumei is still under the influence, but rational and clear headed. That suggests Keitarou’s refined his skill to the point where he can control another individual without being easily detected. More, he can control more than one person at once. Who knows what the limit is on that?”

“The Kitsune in the lair were all killed by his Shikai, save for Hiko and I, on whom he turned his Bankai.” Joumei agreed grimly. “The information I had was that he could do it on one, but he clearly had control of us both, and maintained it even when we were deep within the mine. I don’t know whether he is capable of doing more than turning two individuals on each other, but it’s a terrifying power to have. Hiko was my most loyal associate, and yet we were induced to attack one another. The strength of the persuasion is overwhelming. Though we know that our bodies are acting amiss, there’s no way to stop it. And... no way to know how to break the control, either.”

“In my case, Shunsui put a sword through my heart,” Juushirou put a hand absently to his chest. “I don’t remember, but I’ve been told. I was healed at once by a girl with exceptional reconstructive talent, so I am alive to tell the tale. Keitarou told me himself I was the first to ever survive his Bankai. But... with this new development...”

“Keitarou’s power was rejected by Juushirou’s body, and it began to break down in attacking it,” Hirata remembered.

“I don’t feel any ill effects from it at all, however,” Joumei sighed. “At least, having consumed Sekkiseki, I can explain my physical weakness through other means. But there is a sense of something cold inside of me which threatens to overflow my senses if I let my guard down. Well. I don’t know what damage it might do, or might induce me to do later, so I won’t outstay my welcome. There is one more important thing I want to tell you. While I think it possible Chudokuga has evolved, I don’t know whether that evolution is perfect.”

“Meaning?”

“In controlling us, he opened himself up to us,” Joumei explained. “Bits and pieces. Fragments. Nothing particularly substantial. But every time he compels me to act, it gets a little more vivid, and when he realised I had access to these images, he pulled back his control of me. I’m willing to sacrifice myself to try and use this to Seireitei’s better advantage — for the sake of my family, and for Souja-dono, I’m not looking for a cure if it can lead me to Keitarou’s base. Just, I don’t know if anything I tell you can be trusted, or if these are even my thoughts or actions right now. That being the case... I intend to act alone. I want to find out what I can — but I won't risk other lives in case this is a trap."

"I'm sure you can't be spared, you know," Juushirou began, but Joumei offered him a faint smile.

"My people are gone," he said matter-of-factly. "I have nothing left to protect, except my honour and my obligation to the Endou. Please don't try and change my mind. This is all I can do, so I will try. I have no idea whether Keitarou is capable of reading pieces of my thoughts in the way I was picking up bits of his — so I don't want to dwell on that any more than I have to."

"Then what can we do to help?"

"Research all you can relating to Keitarou, all the evidence, everything," Joumei got to his feet. "It's all I can say. Whatever the solution, it's much more complicated than it seems to be. And... and one more thing."

He paused, casting Juushirou a glance.

"About your stray. Did he tell you anything about Souja-dono's death?"

"No," Juushirou shook his head. "He claims he didn't witness it. Last night he was attacked, though, by an agent believed to be in Keitarou's pay."

He faltered, then,

"Joumei, in all your research and reading, have you ever come across anyone with the power to predict the future?" he asked softly, and Joumei's eyes widened in surprise.

"To do what?"

"This morning, we had someone tell us, albeit in broken words, that someone had attacked and killed silver foxes," Juushirou explained. "We came here to get Hirata's advice and help, and then..."

"I turned up?" Joumei's eyes narrowed. "How interesting."

"I thought it a prediction, but now I think that he saw it happen at the same time it did," Juushirou said slowly. "I can't explain it any other way. I don't really understand, but... there's so much in this case that doesn't make sense. I feel important things are missing, and if we could only grasp hold of those, we'd have the full picture. But... they're still slipping away. How could someone predict something that hadn't happened, or see something that occurred miles away? It's beyond my understanding of spirit science. Admittedly, that's not very broad — which is why I thought I'd ask you."

Joumei pursed his lips for a moment, then,

"Is there a sword?" he asked at length, and Juushirou stared.

"A sword? Here? What do you mean?"

"In Rukongai. Did you find a sword?"

"No..." Juushirou shook his head. "But Souja did report there was one. One with Aizen Kohaku carved on the hilt. Why?"

"But you didn't bring that sword back here?"

"No."

"Then it's not the sword, but the soul." Joumei bit his lip, frustration glittering in his silvery eyes. "I'm sorry. I'm being incoherent. Just, when you asked me about that, for some reason, I saw an image of a sword. I saw it so very clearly... an odd, ugly sword with a hilt coated in Sekkiseki. A sword surrounded by a sinister aura... but if it's not here, then it's not what I thought it might be. Maybe it doesn't even exist. I don't know. I'm not being particularly useful."

"But you've heard of a sword that could tell the future before?" Hirata asked softly, and Joumei shook his head.

"No. I've never heard of any such thing," he admitted. "It was an image that first came to me during my fight with Keitarou, which may make it irrelevant, or important. I don't know."

"I am going to go with important," Shunsui's eyes glittered with alarm. "Souja spoke of a sword, before he died, and we found the place in Rukongai where it would've been, but it had gone. Now you mention it too, in conjunction to what Juu just said — I don't think we can claim all of that is a coincidence. If that wasn't your memory, Joumei-kun, it must've been one of the fragments you picked up from Keitarou when he invaded your senses. And if that's the case..."

"We should look into it," Juushirou said frankly. "We should look into everything, and try and make sense of whatever we can."

"And I should go," Joumei got stiffly to his feet. "Please don't send anyone after me, Hirata-sama. I mean what I say and I'll find out what I can. If it's safe for me to return here to report, I'll try to do so — but I'd rather not know how your investigation goes. It's possible Keitarou will learn things from me the way I seem to be learning them from him — and I don't want to make this a two-way process. Doubtless when I outlive my usefulness to him, he'll try to destroy me the way he did Hiko — and I'd rather not hurt anyone here in the process."

"But where will you go?" Juushirou was anxious, and Joumei offered him a faint smile.

"Foxes are good at finding places to hide," he said simply. "I'll leave the mine and roam further abroad. It doesn't trouble me... the Kitsune have lived for a long time knowing that things can change at a moment's notice, and we adapt. I will do whatever I can — but right now, the best thing I can do is leave."

He bowed his head to Hirata, who rested a hand briefly on his shoulder.

"We will do what we can too," he said gravely. "I lost Souja, but I don't blame you or your people for that loss. I took a vow to protect you, and so far I've failed, but I don't intend on failing again. Whether you wish to risk the safety of my men is irrelevant. We are a military operation and we can fight if we need to. If you have news you think needs sharing, or you have nowhere else to go, you can consider Seventh Division your home."

His eyes narrowed, and Shunsui saw a flicker of the hawk surface in his friend's eyes.

"And if Keitarou's listening, then he can know that I'd relish that fight most of all," he murmured. "So don't forget what I've said, all right?"

"Yes, sir," Joumei looked solemn, nodding his head. Then he was gone, in a swish of silverish shunpo, and Hirata sighed, sinking back down into his seat and burying his head in his hands. For a long moment there was silence, then he glanced up.

"Juushirou, the person who told you all of this was the young lad who brought back my son?"

"Yes," Juushirou nodded, and Shunsui inclined his head in confirmation.

"And you still insist on not letting me speak to him myself?"

"More than before, I think that would be a bad idea," Juushirou looked troubled. "Hirata, whatever happened earlier, I can't explain. But Mitsuki said that she thought Koku was unwell, and having seen his episode earlier, I'm tempted to agree with her. More, it's something I don't know how to handle. I don't know whether this morning was coincidence or triggered by the fear of seeing a stranger — Shunsui came with me, and Koku was clearly on edge about it from the start. Right now, I know you have lots of questions. So do we. But for now..."

"I had a feeling you would say that," Hirata grimaced. "Fine. Then, since I can't invade Thirteenth Division and forcibly overturn your decision, I suppose I should put my mind instead to what Joumei said. It's time that I came out of mourning and did my part in this investigation. You can expect me back at Council and Captains' Meetings from this point on — for Souja's sake, it's time I helped bring to justice this man who seems determined to demolish my family and all that it holds dear."

44. Ketsui and the Kitsune

Chapter Forty Three: Ketsui and the Kitsune

“I’m sorry I shouted at you earlier, Shunsui.”

It was evening and, following the hasty visit to the Seventh Division’s barracks, both Juushirou and Shunsui had withdrawn to their own quarters, Juushirou to check up on Koku’s progress and Shunsui to go over once again the notes and theories relating to the prophesy Souja had brought back from Rukongai. It had been sundown before Juushirou had emerged at Eighth, greeting Sora with a weary smile and a request to see her Captain, and a short time later, as the sun disappeared into darkness over Seireitei’s horizon, the two men had withdrawn to Shunsui’s private study. Shunsui had quickly produced sake, which he had insisted on pouring into smoky grey sakazuki, and Juushirou had not objected, sinking down into his seat with a heavy sigh. Shunsui had soon picked up on the tension in his friend’s frame, but had left it to Juushirou to break the silence, and, at length the apology had come, a look of genuine contrition in the hazel eyes.

At his words, Shunsui snorted, raising his sake dish in a mock toast.

“I’ll drink to that,” he said blithely. “I don’t know where it came from — it was out of the blue and not like you at all. Though... maybe I wastoo quick to jump to conclusions about the young’un’s words. Or more likely, didn’t want to come to that conclusion, if that makes sense. Still, though, I didn’t mean to make you snap.”

“Mm,” Juushirou rested his chin on his hands, his expression becoming pensive. “I can’t even explain it myself. It was like a charge of adrenaline, running through me. I knew I had to go to Hirata, I had to find the Kitsune. I had to act.”

“Have you spoken to the boy about it?” Shunsui asked, and Juushirou shook his head.

“I don’t even know what to ask,” he admitted. “Mitsuki said that he didn’t fight her, and he took whatever she gave him to drink as innocently as a small child. I don’t like that she’s sedated him twice in a short period, but I’m concerned about the implications of what happened earlier. I believe he saw the Kitsune and from Joumei’s testimony, he must have seen it when it happened, but he was with us and so that's logically impossible. If he did have some kind of a gift, though, whereby he could predict — or at the very least, witness events that aren't happening around him, that would make him a target for Keitarou. It would explain him being kept in the cage you found, and support your theory about him being one of Keitarou's experiments. I just don't want to ask him those questions. I don't really understand why I'm hesitating, but what happened earlier unnerved me. I can't stop seeing his eyes, so detached and empty and like... like pools you could fall into."

Shunsui was silent for a moment, considering this. Slowly he drained his sakazuki, setting it down on the unit between them.

"Do you think that whatever he saw affected you?" he asked quietly, and Juushirou cast him a startled glance.

"Affected?"

"You said it was like a rush of adrenaline, and you certainly weren't ready to brook any opposition," Shunsui explained. "Normally, if you're cross with me, you just give me that look and nag me a little. You've built up a high tolerance to my annoying character traits, so it's not common for you to full out yell at me. Today, though, you were all guns blazing. The way you left the sickroom, too, was abrupt and out of character, not to mention how you snubbed that Ohara bocchan when he was being full of himself. You're usually the one who's nice to idiots like that, even when they're being insufferable. Do you think that you picked something up from Koku's aura when he was hallucinating that made you act more impulsively than usual?"

"Something that affected my mood?" Juushirou's brows knitted in consternation. "I definitely felt strange. And I did see Joumei. The images were so fleeting and faint to begin with, but when Koku said foxes, they seemed to come together. Maybe you're right. Maybe something like that did happen — his urgency transferred itself somehow to me."

"Leaky reiryoku," Shunsui said matter-of-factly.

"Is seeing the future a normal product of reiryoku?" Juushirou looked doubtful. "I don't know what to do about it. I should ask him to write down something for me, so that we can compare whether he wrote the note you saw or not, but I don't even know whether he can write. Or read, for that matter, though he seemed attached to the book Kirio brought him. Do they have the facilities to learn in the Rukon? Surely not in the stretch we believe Koku came from. Do people remember their previous lives and skills when they cross over? I don't know and I don't remember us learning much about Plus Souls other than how to perform konsou when we were training."

"Koku isn't what Seireitei would call a Plus Soul, though," Shunsui pointed out, and Juushirou frowned.

"Meaning?"

"He has reiryoku. Keep up, Juu. If he didn't have that, it couldn't be leaking all over you and making you hyperactive," Shunsui pulled a graphic face. "The official definition of a Plus Soul is an entity lacking in spiritual presence or awareness — right?"

"Except that definition has to be challenged by the evidence of people like Koku who undoubtedly do come from the Rukon valley, and yet have reiryoku," Juushirou rubbed his temples. "I wish my head was clearer. Everything is buzzing and I can't focus as clearly as I usually do."

"Well, I don't really care for officialdom, especially when it comes to people segregation," Shunsui relented, tapping his fingers absently against the wood of the table. "I do think, however, that Koku's reiryoku is not like that of other people I've met who've slipped the divide and come illegally to Seireitei."

"You weren't making that up?" Juushirou eyed him sharply. "You have met people who've done that before?"

"A long time ago, in my misspent youth, I crossed paths with one or two young women looking for a way to survive after breaking the barrier, yes," Shunsui reflected ruefully, and Juushirou groaned, rolling his eyes.

"Shunsui, you're not serious? You mean to say that they... that you..."

"I had a very eclectic taste and an entirely open policy on people's origins," Shunsui said blithely. "I know, it's shameful, so save your lectures. I'm a much better behaved boy now than I was then, believe me. But yes, I met them. And they had reiryoku, but my memories are rather sake-soaked and not clear enough to be trusted. All I think is that I'm not totally convinced that Koku fits the profile of a Rukon escapee."

"And the sword?"

"I can't explain the sword, so I'm not going to try," Shunsui said calmly, "but Koku's reiryoku, when it fluctuated and flared, I felt it. It had an odd taint to it, but it wasn't that of a polluted or enhanced Plus Soul. It's unstable, untrained, raw and clumsy — but you can still tell, and I'm sure, if you focused for a moment, you'd pick it up too. It was like he'd been born here, like you or I. And more — or maybe because of that fact — I think he has quite a lot of it. So it wouldn't surprise me if he did disorientate you."

"Gah," Juushirou groaned, flopping his head down on his arms, and Shunsui eyed him keenly, amusement in his eyes.

"Going back to the earlier topic, too, the person who wrote the note was definitely educated," he added. "The writing wasn't neat, exactly, but it was properly formed and legible except for the blood. All the characters were correct, and it looked like whoever wrote it had learned them thoroughly. I haven't seen Keitarou's writing, so I can't compare, but it was within the kind of script I'd expect from a mad exiled genius like that. Or, if I'm right about Koku, he could've written it himself."

"What you're suggesting is that Koku came from Rukongai, but at some time before that he went from Seireitei to Rukongai," Juushirou raised his head reluctantly, running his palm along his brow as he tried to smooth out the crease lines that had formed there. "He said he'd never been to Seireitei, though, and I believe him. I don't think he has. If you're suggesting he was here, was educated here, ended up there somehow and then back here — it just doesn't tally with how little he knows about this world. That's not just my bias, but based on reports Kirio and Tsunemori have both made, not to mention Mitsuki and Ryuu's judgement on his behaviour when he tried to go walking around the barracks when he first woke up."

"Well, if you say so, but the more Keitarou's name comes into any equation, the twistier the logic becomes and the more complex the theories needed to crack it," Shunsui replied. "Someone wrote that note. Someone with calligraphic skill. And as you said, the Rukon doesn't seem the right place for someone to learn to do that."

"But today, what Koku saw, he told us," Juushirou pointed out. "He could've done the same to Keitarou, who might've written it down. We don't know Keitarou's hand writing. I may have seen it once, a long time ago, but I wouldn't recognise it if I saw it now, and I haven't seen this note of yours. Neither you nor Hirata would recognise it as Keitarou's, either... and it's still with Hirata at present. There's no reason to suppose it isn't his writing."

"You accept Koku's involvement with Keitarou as pretty likely, then?"

“I don’t know,” Juushirou admitted reluctantly. “I don’t want to believe that, but I can’t entirely rule it out. Just... I can’t see it as being in the way you think. He didn’t know who he was predicting to, earlier. He couldn’t see me, and the words just came. I’m sure about that. I don’t think he can control when it happens, or to whom. Keitarou could easily have taken advantage of him when he was in that vulnerable state. If he predicted Souja’s death, and doing so put Keitarou’s cause in jeopardy, why would he have worked to get Souja back here if he was Keitarou’s man? It doesn’t make sense.”

“True,” Shunsui conceded. “So you’re saying this proves that Souja’s death was premeditated?”

“No, because it doesn’t make sense,” Juushirou groaned, clutching at his lank white hair in his frustration. “If you’re planning to kill someone, then you don’t wait for someone else to forecast it happening before you take action. Either Keitarou ordered Souja’s death and Koku predicted it, so tried to prevent it — but then Keitarou didn’t write that note, or Koku predicted it and Keitarou wrote it down, but it wasn’t premeditated. Yet Keitarou didn’t stop it, either, and Koku tried to, which means...”

“It means you need to drink your sake,” Shunsui nudged the untouched sakazuki in his friend’s direction. “I concede you’re right that Koku genuinely saw the attack on the Kitsune and it probably wasn’t a trap. But I still think there are things that are not right about that boy, and more, I don’t like how he looked at me... or spoke to me. He might well be one of Keitarou’s victims, but... he might not.”

“Mmm,” Juushirou obediently lifted the sakazuki, downing the contents in one gulp before setting it aside with a sigh. “All the sake in the world couldn’t clear my head at present. It’s whirling up a dervish with all we’ve learned today. Maybe you’re right about Koku’s aura somehow conflicting with my own. I feel as though all the energy rushed out of me somewhere and now nothing will properly add up. Probably I need to go sleep on it, and hope for better in the morning — but it concerns me that Suzuki is still on the loose and, now Keitarou’s attacked the Kitsune directly, he might make Izumi a target too.”

He closed his eyes briefly, then opened them, casting Shunsui a helpless look.

“I don’t know what to do,” he confessed. “If I report to the Council about Koku, he’ll be taken into proper custody and interrogated and I don’t think he’s mentally or physically up to the kind of rigorous investigation techniques the Onmitsukidou prefer. If I keep it a secret, can I protect him? And who or what am I protecting, anyway? My gut still tells me that he's not an enemy, but..."

He faltered, and Shunsui patted him reassuringly on the shoulder.

"For now, do nothing," he advised wisely. "Joumei-kun seems like he intends to take responsibility for his own battle, and there's nothing you can do there. The girl — Izumi? — she's here and safe, and if the assassin ignored her then probably that won't change — but you've taken all the precautions you can without arousing suspicions, so there's no more you can do there, either. Koku is under twenty-four hour surveillance and Kirio and Tsunemori are both capable of handling an assassin who seems to have run from Tenichi-kun's splinter sword. Mitsuki's come under no more threat and despite what Naoko-chan detected, there's been no repeat here, so probably she's no longer a person of interest. You, on the other hand, look more tired than I've seen you in a while. Whether it's the stress of all of this or Koku's reiryokuleak, I don't know — but you need to get some rest. And, if I have to, I'll get you drunk and drag you off to Ugendou myself to make sure you get it. I advise you go on your own steam, though — since your head will probably be less clear in the morning if you follow my method."

Juushirou eyed his friend for a moment, then he laughed despite himself.

"Sometimes your annoying characteristics are reassuring ones," he observed. "Thank you, Shunsui. I appreciate the pep-talk, even if it is as unique as ever coming from you. You're right — there's nothing more I can do tonight but sleep. Tomorrow, I'll consider things again. Our priority is still finding Keitarou, and that hasn't changed — worrying about Koku can come second to that for the time being, while I figure out the best course of action to take."

"There, you see? Already better," Shunsui grinned widely, reaching across to refill his friend's sakazuki, then his own. "One more for the road?"

"I guess so," Juushirou nodded agreement. "Then I'll head back to base. Before I go to bed, I'll dig out the notes Sekime-taichou gave me about the Gate in the Rukon that leads to the Real World."

"That sounds like pretty heavy bedtime reading to me," Shunsui looked doubtful, and Juushirou grinned ruefully, shaking his head.

"No," he responded, "I didn't mean like that. Tomorrow, I'm going to give it to Izumi to look at. I should've done it already, but I got bogged down in other things. Now her people have been put in danger, I need her skills all the more. Keitarou is supposed to be in the Real World, Shunsui, but he appeared in Seireitei and killed Kitsune there. That means he's not static in the Real World, and Joumei might be right when he says the man might well not be there at all. It's possible he appeared there for the sake of making us think he was — and we know how he likes to distract."

"And you say sake doesn't aid the thinking process?" Shunsui looked amused, and Juushirou snorted, nonetheless picking up his sakazuki and taking a sip.

"No, but talking to you does," he admitted. "Maybe Keitarou's base is in the Real World now, but it doesn't hurt to have Izumi take an independent look at all the data and see what she thinks. Her coordinates led us to his base in the Rukon, so even without taking her out of the safety of Thirteenth, I'm interested to see what she comes up with."

"Me too," Shunsui admitted. "Now I'm properly in on this whole Kitsune secret, you will tell me what you find out, won't you?"

"Promise," Juushirou nodded, draining his cup and setting it down. "Thank you for the sake, and the advice. I'll go retire now — from tomorrow, operation Find Keitarou re-begins."

Her brother's reiatsu was in the air.

Izumi stepped neatly over the cracks between the bamboo slats of the walkway, fingers looping absently around the white fabric of her obi as she made her way towards Ugendou. It was still early, and most of the division were in the Mess Hall but, as she had left her dormitory, Naoko had grasped her by the arm, pulling her to one side.

"The Captain wants you," she had said. "Go now. I'll make sure you don't starve. Hurry! Whatever it is, I think it's important, as he sent me here to find you myself."

Izumi's silverish eyes clouded as she remembered. Was it to do with Joumei? Though her head told her that her brother would not risk her safety by showing himself so near to her hiding place, her heart and her senses told a different story. For a moment she paused, raising her hand so that the breeze could blow against the delicate pale skin, and her frown deepened. Yes, Joumei had been here. What his errand had been, she did not know, but now it was her turn, and she straightened her back, marching with renewed determination towards the little cabin that was Juushirou's personal dwelling. The pride of the Kitsune was on her shoulders — whatever had happened, she would deal with it as a himeshould.

“Izumi,” Juushirou was waiting for her as she reached the entrance, a smile on his face, but Izumi’s sharp gaze quickly picked up on the preoccupation in the other’s eyes and her lips thinned. She bowed her head properly before him, her Kitsune pride hating the gesture but knowing that her life depended upon it. Unlike Joumei, whose pragmatic attitude towards their status allowed him to adopt humility and authority according to the situation, Izumi had always found it difficult to shed her pride in her roots and, though she knew the man before her was a trusted friend of her family’s benefactor, the Endou Lord, to her he was still just a shinigami dressed up in haori and shihakushou.

But, she admitted to herself as slowly she raised her gaze to meet his, he had been kind to her and accommodating of Joumei’s whim. For this reason and this alone she had quelled her feelings and accepted the indignity of being yelled at by his well-meaning but — in her eyes — poorly trained inferiors.

At the sight of her, Juushirou sighed, shaking his head slightly.

“This must seem peremptory,” he reflected. ‘I know you came here because Joumei asked you to, and we’ve done our best to keep you safe. But I can see it in your eyes. You resent being called so familiarly, and ordered about so easily, don’t you? Yes,’ as Izumi’s eyes widened in surprise and dismay, “I thought so. Your family might have been exiles for a long time, but you are a hime and I’m sorry that our simple arrangement here is as it is. We are a District division, and we have no provision for those of noble birth, not even temporary guests. Still, it is for the best that you’re here, rather than somewhere like Seventh with Hirata. You understand that, don’t you?”

Izumi pursed her lips, then she sighed, lowering her head briefly in acquiescence.

“And you do realise that we are your allies? Yours, and Joumei’s, too?”

Another nod, but now Izumi’s eyes were narrowing once more, picking up on the evasive notes in her companion’s tones. Juushirou tilted his head, eying her for a moment, then he shrugged his shoulders, stepping back to allow her to pass him into Ugendou proper. Once inside, he shut the door, bidding her to take a seat.

“You probably know why I’ve sent for you — at least in part,” he began, and Izumi settled herself on the least worn of the several cushions that decorated the tatami mat floor, smoothing her hakama and adopting what she hoped was a look of attentive subservience. Juushirou gazed at her, then a rueful smile spread across his features.

“You know, when you look at me that way, I’m put on my guard,” he admitted. “Maybe that’s because I learned yesterday that those eyes of yours have a particular potency. Is it true that you are capable of hypnotism?”

Izumi’s expression became one of consternation, and Juushirou held up his hands.

“I don’t want a demonstration,” he assured her quickly. “Hirata was the one who told me, and I wanted to ascertain its truth. If so, it makes a difference, you see... in how capable you are of defending yourself in the face of danger.”

Izumi looked reluctant, but she sighed again, nodding her head. Juushirou’s lips pressed together pensively.

“Then perhaps I should be relieved,” he said softly. “Izumi, Joumei was here yesterday. I’m sure you’d already realised that, but I’ll confirm it for you. He came to report to Hirata, and I was present when he did. He had encountered Keitarou, and thought we should know of it.”

Izumi started, genuine alarm replacing the facade of innocence in her eyes, and Juushirou grimaced.

“I won’t keep secrets from you,” he assured her. “You’re not here to be protected by us, so much as to help us in tracking that man down, and in order to do so, I think you should be made aware of everything we know. Including what your brother told us yesterday... perhaps that most of all.”

He paused, then, slowly, outlined the events of the previous day, and at the mention of Hiko’s fate, Izumi flinched again, distress then rage flaring through her young body. She clenched her fists, silverish sparks darting from the knuckles as she fought to suppress the urge to lash out, and Juushirou reached out a reassuring hand to pat her on the shoulder.

“He wanted to protect your brother,” he said sympathetically, “but I realise that it’s a great loss to both of you. Hiko was the young man who brought you to us, wasn’t he? Joumei said he was different from the rest of you, and that he shouldn’t have had to bear your family’s curse. I got the impression when I met him that he didn’t look like you — perhaps he wasn’t a Kitsune by birth?”

Izumi's head jerked mutely in a nod.

"But you were still close," Juushirou observed. "Joumei has left you in my care and I will do my best to make sure his faith is justified. More, though, we need your help. Not just for Souja-dono, but for Hiko and even for Joumei himself. I don't know how to break Keitarou's spell over him, and nor does he. Not even swallowing the Sekkiseki seemed to work. We need to find Keitarou, and to that end, I want your expertise, please."

He dug his fingers into his obi, pulling out a tattered wad of notes, which he pushed across towards her.

"These were given to me by the Captain of the Twelfth Division. The Urahara have been working on them," he explained, as Izumi took the tattered paper gingerly in her elegant fingers. 'The data you calculated proved accurate in finding Keitarou's Rukon hideout, but he's moved on. Don't worry, the Urahara don't know about you,' as Izumi tensed. "Sekime-taichou just asked me to consult the source that provided that information, to see whether you could add anything to the investigation. I don't understand a lot of the stuff written in here, but I'm pretty certain you will, and more, that with your knowledge of Keitarou, you'll be able to draw some conclusions from it. I know you sensed him in Seventh District the day Tenichi was dumped outside your home."

Izumi's fingers tightened around the paper, and she turned her gaze to the uppermost sheet of notes, scanning her gaze down the columns of complex characters that had been scribbled alongside intricate scientific diagrams.

Kotetsu Tenichi...

Her lips thinned further, and she raised her silver eyes back to the Captain's hazel ones. Slowly and carefully she slid the wad into the folds of her shihakushou. Though using the quick sign language she had always relied on to communicate with her brother was pointless here, she knew that Juushirou would understand her gesture as one of acceptance and, as she had expected, a glitter of relief surfaced in his tired eyes.

"Thank you," he said quietly. "Whatever you find, come and report to me directly, all right? I'll try and understand, even though science isn't my area of ability. If it's to find Keitarou, I'll do whatever I can — and I hope you will too."

Anger flashed in Izumi's eyes at the sound of Keitarou's name, and she nodded her head resolutely, wrapping her arms protectively around the shihakushou as though shielding the documents from outside gazes. Juushirou grinned.

“Yes. On this we agree, clearly,” he reflected. “Sometimes people from different worlds can work together, if the enemy is a common one. I want to get justice for Souja, and prevent other people being hurt. I want to help your brother, too... and I know that you do as well. Keitarou has evaded justice too many times. This time we have to stop him.”

Izumi’s eyes darkened, and she got to her feet, turning to bow solemnly in the direction of the Thirteenth Division Captain. He gestured towards the door, indicating that she was dismissed, and she pushed back the sliding divide, stepping out onto the walkway. Though the air was fresh and clear that day, and there was a certain pleasure in walking in the open air, far from the taint of the Sekkiseki mine, Izumi did not even notice the colour of the sky nor the rippling water beneath the slatted planks over which she walked. Her thoughts were fixed on one thing and one alone — the man who had hurt her brother, and how to make him pay.

So deep in thought was she that she did not hear the footsteps of another heading in her direction, and as she rounded the corner, she collided headfirst with someone, causing them to let out an exclamation of dismay as she tumbled to the floor. The precious documents slipped out from beneath the folds of her uniform, the top pages scattering in the wind, and she opened her eyes wide in alarm, reaching to grab them back up before whoever it was could see them and realise her errand. Inwardly she berated her carelessness — she was not at home now, with Joumei and Hiko watching out for her, but an exiled stray in a land of potential enemies, and the slightest mistake could cost her — and now, she knew, her entire dynasty — existence.

“I’m sorry, Ichimaru-san,” The voice was contrite, and, as she turned to make sure she had recovered all of Juushirou’s tell tale data, she was aware of a hand held out to her, an apologetic look on Ketsui’s features. “I wasn’t looking... are you all right?”

Izumi blinked, momentarily taken off guard by this gesture, then she recovered herself, holding the documents protectively to her chest and accepting his hand primly, allowing him to pull her to her feet. He did so, eying her keenly as though looking for any sign of blood or scrapes, and despite herself she pinkened as his gaze ran casually across the back of her hand, his hold slightly longer than necessary as he ensured she had suffered no damage.

"I'm sorry," he repeated again. "Shikibu-san sent me to bring you breakfast rations, since you're due to be training with me again this morning. She said you were with the Captain, but I thought you'd still be in Ugendou. I didn't expect..." he trailed off, scratching his head awkwardly, and an uncomfortable silence stretched out between them. Izumi gazed at him for a moment, taking in the troubled pale eyes and the wisps of fair hair that framed the young man's face, and she frowned, her own silver eyes narrowing.

Kotetsu Ketsui, brother of Kotetsu Tenichi. Yet they couldn't be more different. Tenichi doesn't even look like an Urahara... but this one...

"Ichimaru-san?" Ketsui's confused voice brought her from her reverie, and she bit her lip, realising that this time it had been she who had been staring. Inwardly she berated herself. What was wrong with her? She was not normally so open or so discomposd... had Juushirou's news about Hiko and Joumei upset her so greatly? But as much as she tried to pretend otherwise, she knew that it had. Since her father's death, Joumei had been both father and brother, protector and guide in all things, and it was only now, having heard of Keitarou's direct attack that she had understood exactly how much danger they were all in. For the Kitsune, life itself was danger, but in that moment, the reality of death had hit Izumi like a ton of bricks.

To her dismay, a tear began to trickle unbidden down her cheek, and she dashed it away, but more fell in its place. The whole of the Kitsune might rest on her shoulders, she told herself furiously, and yet the idea of going forward without Joumei or Hiko around her was terrifying for her young mind to contemplate. They had nurtured her talents but shielded her from the worst of the Kitsune's doomed fate, and now she was miles from a home that had been desecrated, with no idea when — or if — she might ever see her family again.

"Ichimaru... san?" Ketsui looked stricken at the sight of her tears, but Izumi pushed past him, unwilling to let him see her humiliation. She had a job to do, and much as she knew Ketsui meant well, those Urahara eyes had suddenly begun to haunt her, reminding her that Keitarou was only one of many enemies looking to take Kitsune heads.

"Ichimaru-san, please, wait!" Ketsui had acted impulsively, reaching out to grab her by the arm, and as she tried to yank herself free, the top sheet of the data she had received from Juushirou worked itself loose from its fellows once more. It caught the breeze, wafting dangerously towards the edge of the walkway and the koi pond that flowed underneath, and Izumi lunged forward to grab it, but her tiny reach was not enough and it drifted agonisingly past her fingers, descending in almost unbearably slow motion towards the water's surface.

"Gotit!" Even as Izumi had missed, however, another hand had extended above hers, long and capable fingers closing around the edge of the sheet and pulling it back in.

"Whoops. I creased it. Sorry... let me..." Ketsui trailed off, attempting to smooth out the crumples his hasty grab had left in the sheet of paper, and panicked, Izumi reached to snatch it from his grasp. Before she could, however, Ketsui's brows knitted together, and he raised the sheet, casting Izumi a quizzical look.

"Does Taichou know you have data like this?" he asked softly, holding it just out of her reach, and Izumi, tears forgotten in her sudden burst of indignation, glared at him defiantly.

"Does he?" Ketsui repeated the question. His tones were calm, but something in his eyes told her that he expected an answer and, annoyed by her own reaction, Izumi found herself nodding her head. Ketsui's gaze became thoughtful, and he glanced at the paper once more, before holding it out to her to take. Surprised at his sudden change in demeanour, Izumi accepted the paper warily, putting it back with the others, not taking her eyes off her companion for a moment.

"Did he ask you to look at those?" Ketsui spoke again, and Izumi's lips pressed together, uncertain of how she should respond. At her hesitation, Ketsui sighed, running his fingers through the messy blond hair that reminded the girl so much of her family's Urahara enemies. With that gesture, the aura of calm authority was gone, but Izumi had seen it once, and now understood the a reason why Juushirou had trusted this man with her safety. Her impression of Tenichi had been of an impulsive hothead, guided by his emotions and quick with his sword, but she now saw his brother was another matter.

I thought him indecisive and disorganised, but fairly harmless. Maybe not. Maybe Ketsui is a better name for him than I thought... and I need to be more careful what I do around him.

"I guess you can't answer that," At length, Ketsui broke the silence, unaware that he was now the subject of her observations. "I guess it would be in breach of security if you did, and even if you could, I don't know how to understand your explanation. If Taichou knows about it, I guess that's good enough for me. It's not my business... I shouldn't pry into something that's not to do with me."

Izumi stared at him impassively, waiting for him to step aside and allow her to pass him, but instead he reached into his obi, pulling out a cloth-wrapped parcel and holding it out.

“Your breakfast. Shikibu-san’s orders,” he said matter-of-factly. “If you’re going over science data, your brain will probably need the fuel.”

Izumi took the burden carefully, glancing at him as she slid it into her own obi, and Ketsui let out his breath in a rush.

“It’s not my business,” he began slowly, “but in other ways, maybe it is. You came here and Taichou asked me to look after your needs. He didn’t tell me where you came from, or why, but now he’s giving you scientific material, so I guess he knows something that he hasn’t told me. It’s fine... I guess I don’t need to know that much. But what’s written on that paper, I sort of understand bits of what it’s about. I know it has to do with... with Aizen Keitarou, doesn’t it?”

He lowered his voice, speaking the syllables of the exile’s name with trepidation, and Izumi’s eyes darkened in consternation. At her expression, he nodded.

“I thought so,” he said, then, “I want to help you.”

Izumi’s head jerked up, shock and disbelief in her gaze, and Ketsui shot her a rueful glance.

“You probably think I’m just another useless shinigami, who pads around in black and white and who spends too much time playing with swords and not enough time on other things,” he said self-effacingly. “I don’t know what your particular talents are, but clearly Taichou thought having you here would be a good thing and I guess I know that isn’t because of your sword skills. He said you couldn’t go anywhere else, not home and not the Academy, so I suppose Keitarou is a threat to you as well as to everyone else. And, well, I’ve met Keitarou. I’ve met him a lot of times, in fact. He’s my father’s cousin... and because of that, I want to stop him before he causes harm to anyone else.”

Izumi’s head tilted on one side, gauging the young man’s demeanour carefully and analytically. She already knew his family background, but why had he told her? There had been no hesitation, no shame in his voice, just matter-of-fact acceptance, as if those events were as separate as they could be from his current life as a shinigami. They had found Tenichi at Daisuke’s grave, and he had stumbled over answering Joumei’s questions, leaving Izumi unsatisfied with his responses. Yet again, Ketsui was different. Those Urahara eyes, pale and flecked with the faintest shade of green gazed back at her, apparently sincere yet sparking every one of her self-protective instincts. Was he telling the truth, or was this a trap? Was Ketsui's Urahara blood only skin deep, or...

Oniisama wasn't sure that we could trust Tenichi-dono, and I think it probable that we can't. The likelihood is that Tenichi-dono is guilty of some kind of treachery, even if Seireitei doesn't want to acknowledge it. All the scientific evidence points to collusion between him and Keitarou, and just because it's an unpopular conclusion doesn't make it any less probable. But this one...

She frowned, her earlier grief and panic forgotten as she weighed up her companion.

This one really is different from Tenichi. He looks like an Urahara... but maybe... he's not. Not in all ways.

She glanced down at the bundle in her arms.

And he's seen these, now. I might get into trouble if anyone else knew how careless I was. It's better to keep people close, if you're wary of their motives. Besides, it will be more productive than wasting more time swinging a sword. He has Urahara blood, so who knows? Maybe he'll prove to be smart, and even if not, I'm sure he can lift and carry books from shelves I can't reach.

"Well?" Ketsui eyed her keenly. "Will you let me help you? I don't pretend I've had any kind of scientific training — Father died when I was just a kid and Mother never raised my brother and I with any of that background. I've had no special education, aside from the Academy. Still, they say things are genetic, and maybe I can help. If Taichou wants you to do this, and wants me to keep watch over you, then I'm sure he wouldn't mind if I helped you. In a way we're both in the same position."

He shrugged.

"I don't know why you're in danger from Keitarou, and I won't ask anyone, not even Taichou," he added. "It's your business and I don't need to know. But it seems to me that, if he's behind all these bad things — and people are saying that he is — then he might have had my brother kidnapped as well as having so many people killed. Maybe I'm wrong... maybe I'm overthinking it, but I don't want Ten-nii to get hurt again — he's the only blood kin I have, now."

He frowned, pursing his lips.

"I don't want Keitarou to decide to come after me, either," he admitted. "I've never wanted anything to do with him, or that, or anything subversive. Mother always taught us to think for ourselves and choose our own lives. Well, I chose to be a shinigami, and this is what I believe in. All the people I care about are here in Seireitei, and Keitarou is a traitor and a murderer. Even if he is my blood kin, that doesn't make what he's done forgivable."

His eyes clouded slightly, just for a brief moment but long enough for Izumi to see the shift in expression.

"Because of him, Father died," he said frankly. "I don't know exactly how, and I don't need to — I just know it was Keitarou's fault. Ten-nii and I had to grow up without him. I'm not angry at him exactly, but I think... I think that he's the kind of person who takes people from those they love. People like Father, and Souja-dono, and I'm sure there have been lots of others. He should be stopped before anyone else can be harmed... so if there's something I can do to help, I'd like to try."

He smiled, and this time Izumi knew that his words were sincere. A tiny smile touched her lips, and she slowly nodded her head. She beckoned with her free hand, raising it to gesture towards the main barracks building, where the small Thirteenth Division library was located, and Ketsui's eyes lit up.

"Thank you," he said sincerely. "I'll follow your lead, Ichimaru-san. Whoever you really are and wherever you're here, if Taichou trusts you, so do I."

Hajime's words were still weighing heavily on his mind.

Tenichi lounged against the outer fence of the Twelfth Division, shielding his eyes from the glare of the sun as he gazed up into the bright blue of the sky above. Though nobody had mentioned the matter to him again, he still cringed inwardly when he thought of how he had shamed himself and his Division in front of the piercing, unforgiving gaze of the Onmitsukidou's Captain, and more, though Hajime had shown him solidarity, the threat of a repeat performance was ever present on the horizon. In the absence of an adjutant, Tenichi knew that only his very busy Captain stood between him and a second interrogation. An interrogation he was quite sure he would not manage to survive intact.

He took a deep breath into his lungs, pulling his gourd from his belt and taking a swig of the cool spring water. That morning, Kikyue had taken the dawn drill and, though her blue eyes were still clouded and subdued, the sight of her on the training ground had boosted the morale of her patrol. Ohara's non-too-subtle attentions to his squad captain had provoked Nakata to make joking remarks about the courting male bird chasing the female, and, in the company of the other officers, Tenichi had felt his spirits lift. Yet now, after they had been dispersed to their own errands, he had felt the uncertainty inching in on his composure once more.

It was not nice, carrying a secret that could bring his whole world crashing down.

Stifled by the barracks, he had sought Kikyue's permission to leave the division ground and go see his brother and Kikyue had readily given him consent, offering him a weary, out-of-character smile as she had dismissed him.

"You've done enough, I know, to help recently," she had said. "Kitabata and Nakata have both said so, and you've taken on extra duties without being asked. It'll be a problem if you collapse from overwork, so I guess a short break won't hurt. Come back quickly, though. I'm going to send you with Ohara on the afternoon sweep of the rear perimeter, and I want to hear your report before I take mine to Father this evening."

"Yes, ma'am," Tenichi had saluted quickly, somehow discomfited by her praise, and so now, here he was, just across the cobbles from the entrance of his former division. Thirteenth was bathed in bright sunlight, and as he gazed at it, Tenichi wondered what his real reasons had been for coming. Since his encounter with Koku, he had stayed away from Thirteenth, and, though he had told himself that it was due to his heavy workload, he knew that he had avoided it. Absently he put a hand to his chest, pressing his lips together as he tried to understand why he was hesitating. He would be as welcome here as ever, he knew, yet still he faltered. Thirteenth hadn't changed, but, little by little, he knew he had.

Everything has, since Souja-dono died. Even if Kai-dono lets me alone now, I feel as though I've taken a wrong turning and I can't go back.

He sighed, moving towards the gateway over which hung the snowdrop emblem, resting his hand against the thick bamboo support and letting his gaze rove across the nostalgically familiar grounds. The edge of the chamber where he knew Koku was convalescing caught his eye and he frowned, remembering Masaya's comments about the young boy.

Who do I believe? The one I know I can't trust, or the one I thought I could? Kurotsuchi is someone I wanted to kill on sight, and if I saw him now, I'd try again. I know that without a shadow of a doubt. He threatened Ketsui, and threatened me, and I'm not willing to stand for that any more. But he is right about one thing. He hasn't lied about anything he's told me. Should I believe him about Koku, too?

His lips thinned as he remembered the young boy's discomfort at the mention of the word 'allies'.

"I wish you hadn't ever called us that, but since it's true, I have to honour it as well."

What did that mean? Why not?

Tenichi rubbed his brow pensively.

But Koku did tell me there was another spy, and Kurotsuchi confirmed it, so I suppose I have to believe that's true. And so far, he hasn't created any trouble for me. I don't want to kill him. It's not the same as Kurotsuchi — that was a fight, and I could've won it properly. But I don't want to... killing an injured boy who can't fight back, that's not honourable. And no matter how desperate I've become or how low I've sunk, I've not reached that level yet. So I guess for now... all I can do is trust him, at least as far as keeping his mouth shut about me.

"Tenichi?"

Kirio's voice made him physically jump, and he swung around, seeing his former classmate crossing the cobbles towards him from one of the far side buildings. Her arms were full with bokken, and at his surprise, she chuckled, swinging up the weapon she held in her right hand and bopping him playfully on the head.

"What are you doing, spacing out in our entranceway?" she asked playfully. "Did you come visit, and forget your way around?"

"I guess I did," Tenichi forced a smile, pushing the bokken away. "I was just thinking how nice the weather was today, that's all. Kikyue-dono gave me a break to come see you people, and since getting that kind of permission is almost once in a lifetime when she's on duty, I didn't wait to ask twice. I realise I have hardly been here at all lately — I thought you might've forgotten my face."

"Not a chance," Kirio snorted. "An ugly mug like that? Who could?"

"You're as warm and friendly as ever," Tenichi bantered back. "In case you care, I've been working to the bone with this duty or that, not to mention fighting invading convicts from the Second who thought they'd come make a mess of Seventh."

"I heard about that," Kirio admitted, shifting the bokken into a more manageable hold and nodding her head. "Apparently you destroyed a good six foot or so of Endou-taichou's barrier fence in the attempt — was he cross?"

“No...” Tenichi pursed his lips, “though I think he’d have been happier if the guy hadn’t got away. He’s slippery, though... hard to get a hold of.”

“I know. We dealt with him once,” Kirio sighed, and Tenichi was aware of the lines of weariness on his friend’s brow. “Anyhow, come on in. We’re quite busy here too, so you might get put to work — but it’ll be worth it, to see old friends, right?”

“Hey, I’m not your unpaid labour!” Tenichi protested good-naturedly, and Kirio laughed.

“I suppose not, but I can try,” she teased. “I do outrank you, Kotetsu-hasseki — in case you’d forgotten.”

“Considering how big your head seems to have got, I’m surprised you still fit through doorways,” Tenichi returned neatly. “But in seriousness, Kirio, you look tired. Taichou’s not working you too hard?”

“Mm, no,” Kirio shook her head. “Just I have to fit my normal duties and patrols around watching over Koku. You know, our waif and stray? His wounds are a lot better, but we’re not supposed to leave him alone.”

“Why not?” Tenichi was on his guard, and Kirio grimaced.

“Apparently Second’s escapee paid us a visit too, the other night — at least, that’s the rumour,” she said wearily. “I don’t know if it’s true, and Koku won’t speak to me about it — he’s too busy being rude to me at every opportunity, and honestly, I don’t know that I want to know. Just, he’s not been quite the same since then — more subdued, and pale.. Edogawa-san has had to treat him a lot more, and I think he’s pretty scared. The prisoner escaped, and nobody’s found any trace of him — but you’d know that, since it was a general report. We’re not to let Koku be unsupervised, in case he came back.”

So Kurotsuchi really did intend to kill Koku. Tenichi’s eyes narrowed for a moment, then he nodded.

“In that case, if I can help out, I will,” he decided. “I can’t stay too long, but I can talk and move stuff, if that’s what it takes to spend time with you. And watching over a sick kid isn’t really my forte.”

“Tsunemori-san’s with him now, and will be till mealtime,” Kirio assured him with a grin. “I’m only sorting weaponry for afternoon drill, but you can help if you like. Normally I’d get Ketsui to, but he’s training Ichimaru-san this morning, and so hared off after breakfast.”

“Ketsui’s busy?” Tenichi could not keep the disappointment from his voice, and Kirio nodded.

“Taichou gave him a special duty,” she agreed. “I think he’s decided it’s time Ketsui did some proper training — in any case, he’s been assigned mentorship of one of the recruits. She’s a rum little thing, but he’s persevering at it.”

“Well, he wasn’t called Ketsui for nothing,” Tenichi observed ruefully. “I guess I’ll have to make do with you, then, won’t I?”

“And you talk about my warmth and affection,” Kirio rolled her eyes, thrusting her burden of bokken at him. “Here. Take these then, and follow me. Since you’re a foreign visitor to our territory, I need to keep a close eye on your movements.”

“Being ranked up really has gone to your head, you know,” as Tenichi followed his old friend across the grounds towards the training arena, he cast her a grin, and Kirio glanced back, shrugging her shoulders.

“Duty is as duty does,” she said airily. “Besides, you look like you need a change of pace, too. Seventh must be pretty heavy right now, mood-wise. It doesn’t hurt to come here and be roundly abused by me once in a while. It’s what friends are for.”

“Yeah, I suppose I can’t argue with that,” Tenichi acknowledged. “Where are we putting these? In the rack, as always?”

“That’ll do,” Kirio watched him deposit his burden, then she frowned. “Tenichi-kun?”

“Yes?” Tenichi dusted his hands off, meeting her gaze quizzically.

“You called Ukitake-taichou ‘Taichou’ just now. You’re not regretting leaving Thirteenth, are you?”

Tenichi hesitated for a moment, then, slowly, he shook his head.

“No,” he said slowly. “Thirteenth is... my home-from-home. It’s probably... the place in Seireitei I love the most. But... I think... as I am now, it’s not the best place for me to be. For you, for Ketsui and for my own benefit, I needed to move. Seventh... seems like where I belong now. So long as I can come visit people here from time to time, I don’t regret transferring. Things have been heavy lately, true enough, but that’s all.”

He offered a faint smile.

“Ukitake-taichou was my first Captain, so in some ways he’s still just Taichou to me,” he added. “Don’t let Endou-taichou know I said that, though. He’s not the kind of person you want to get angry.”

“I guess not,” Kirio reflected. “All right. If that’s how you feel, I won’t ask again. You know you’re always welcome to come here, so that’s fine. Taichou wouldn’t mind at all, and Ketsui and I like to see you, as well as the others. So when Seventh is a bit calmer, come by more, all right?”

Tenichi opened his mouth to repond, but as he did so, he caught sight of a familiar figure crossing the opposite side of the Division barracks, making his way around the far side from Ugendou towards the main building. About to hail his brother with a greeting, the words froze in his throat as he recognised the young girl in Ketsui’s slipstream, her long silver hair glinting in the bright sunlight.

Izumi?

“Tenichi?” Concerned by his lack of response, Kirio gave him a nudge, and he turned, glancing at her blankly.

“Mm?”

“You suddenly spaced out on me,” Kirio frowned. “What’s up? What’s wrong?”

“Kirio, who’s that with Ketsui?” Somehow Tenichi managed to moderate his tones, suppressing the waves of panic and anger that competed for dominance in his mind.

“Ketsui?” Kirio was startled, then, as Tenichi pointed, she grinned.

“I told you, didn’t I? He’s mentoring our latest recruit. Ichimaru Izumi-san. She got dumped into all this chaos with very little warning, and so Taichou thought it best someone looked after her specifically.”

Tenichi frowned.

“She just transferred in? Even though it’s the wrong time of year for recruits?”

“Hey, I’m just Sixth Seat. I don’t sign the forms or make the decisions,” Kirio dimpled. “I think it’s good for Ketsui to have some responsibility. It means he worries less about you and your impulsive heroics against would be shadow-assassins, and besides, he can’t lurk back behind you forever. It’s about time he took on a recruit of his own, and well, he’s certainly giving it his full attention.”

“I see,” Tenichi returned his gaze to the pair, his eyes narrowing as he digested Kirio’s words.

A new recruit out of season, conveniently sent to Thirteenth Division at a time when so much is going on. Koku's here, Kurotsuchi's free, and now... this.

He clenched his fists, then,

Does Ukitake-taichou know, then? When I spoke to him the other night, he made it sound as though he'd seen them too — the silver people. He must know she's one of them... but if so... why is she here?

His eyes widened suddenly in alarm.

Is she spying on Ketsui to get to me? Is this Keitarou-san's doing, or is it someone else? Kurotsuchi said that if I wasn't useful, there was always my brother, and now... I don't trust those silver-haired folk, even if Fukutaichou did. The man said his people were cursed, and Souja-dono wound up dead, so maybe its the truth. Kurotsuchi said they had guilt in all of this, and he didn't lie about the other things he told me, so I believe him when he says they're not folk I should put faith in. I know they're part of this whole thing somehow, and not in a good way. Now one of them is here... it can't be a coincidence.

I will have to do something about this, and soon.

Keitarou pushed back the flap of his new makeshift laboratory, gazing out across the uneven terrain of the Spiritless Zone. Since their arrival, there had been a few scraps between the Plus souls already resident here and those he and his family had brought with them but, as it had become clear that the resources were plentiful enough for all of them, the discord had settled into an uneasy kind of harmony, and even those souls who had been spoiled by the shinigami had begun to look towards Keitarou for support and leadership. It was largely thanks to Eiraki, he reflected fondly, and her genuine affection and loyalty towards those who had shielded them during their initial flight, and though it was growing late, he knew she was still abroad in the nearby villages, tending to the scrapes and cuts sustained by two young children following their first foray climbing trees.

This is a nice place. A place we could live in peace for a long time.

Her words echoed across his thoughts, and he frowned, his eyes becoming narrow slits as he reflected on this thought.

Can't we stay here and live like other people, in this place? The water is good, the air is clean and the people have food. We have freedom here. Can't we just leave it be?

He sighed, sinking back against the outer wall of the laboratory. Here was one of the few places in the Rukon where he could actually see the sun set for, although the atmosphere made it appear a pale imitation of its Seireitei incarnation, the sky here was clear and mostly free of cloud. Eiraki was not wrong in her judgement, he knew. The shinigami had built this place, but now, in their absence, it was the perfect place for them to settle.

Only there would be no peaceful residency. Time was short, and growing shorter by the second.

He slid his fingers beneath the folds of his hakamashita, pulling Chudokuga free from his dust-stained obi and glancing at the blade, tilting it to reflect the blood red rays of the dying sun. The surface of the weapon was hazy, indicating that its principal power was still in the middle of being executed, and Keitarou pursed his lips, running his index finger across the surface of the weapon gently.

One fox still lives, and insists on trying to fight me. Well, I don't suppose I expected anything else, not from a people whose entire existence has been about survival and nothing else for years. It's inconvenient, though. I have other things I need to finish off. My research into Haruya and the others is going well, and I'm almost at a point where I can confidently stabilise their spiritual decay. Yet if there are still foxes roaming free, everything will be for nothing.

“An exiled fox, feral from its kind will cross the woodland path, leaving new scent and causing the river willow to turn towards a new sun. Once met, this bond cannot be broken, for the willow will protect the fox even with its life.”

The words of the prophesy lingered in his mind, as clear now as they had been the first time he had heard them, and he thrust Chudokuga back into his sash with a measure of frustration.

Kohaku is still in danger so long as that one fox survives. I can't be lax about his life, not when so much rests on it. If Kohaku is lost... everything is lost. Which means... I can't return to the Real World tonight like I hoped. Killing the straggler has to take priority. Only when the Kitsune are all dead can I really start to think about fighting the shinigami and bringing their world to ruin.

A faint, bitter smile touched his lips.

And then, Eiraki-chan, maybe we can think about settling down in peace.

I think I've mentioned this before, but although the word kohakuin Japanese means 'amber', the kanji that Keitarou's Kohaku is written with is 杞白. 杞 is a pretty obscure character that means "river willow", and the other, 白 means white. Keitarou's children, as I said earlier, are all trees. The homonym to amber was deliberate, though... within amber is often preserved fragments of life from the past. ;).

The prophesy in this chapter is the same as the one that appeared in a much earlier chapter. ;)

45. Katakai

Chapter Forty Four: Katakai

Joumei pulled his body carefully up over a deep rift in the path, manoeuvring around it with his usual deftness before slipping between two tall saplings and up onto the dirt track pathway once more. It was little more than a trail put in place by the wear and tear of feet trekking back and forth, yet it marked a dark line through the vivid green terrain. He did not know where it went, only that when the main road had petered off into a winding strip of mud, he had felt compelled to follow it, allowing himself to be guided simply by the earth path, following where it led.

He didn't know how long he had been walking, nor why he was. The sun had set, risen and begun to set again, yet he had not paid particular attention to the lengths of the shadows, nor whether he was making his journey by the light of the sun or moon. He had been in Inner Seireitei, with Hirata — but since he had left the shinigami's hallowed compound, his memories had become more blurry, and though he tried to figure out where his journey had begun, he came up blank. Nor did he really want to question it. Though there was something lurking at the back of his mind that he was sure he ought to remember, he could not dislodge it from its cosy resting place. And so he walked, one foot in front of the other, taking pleasure simply in the steady rhythm of his steps.

As he reached a stretch of flat land, the path came to an end, and Joumei put his hand up to shelter his gaze from the amber glare of the setting sun, surveying his destination with a detached kind of appreciation. It was peaceful here, he noted approvingly. He had not seen many houses on his walk up here, but from this vantage point he could tell that he was both high up and far from any settlement. There was nobody to disturb him, he reflected. How long had it been since he had felt this way? It seemed as though a heavy burden had been lifted from his shoulders as, at last, he was simply able to follow his own whims. It had been hard, catering to the needs of others. He could not draw their faces to mind, but he felt certain that there had been others, once. Where had they gone? He couldn't remember, but it probably didn't matter. He was here now, and that was all that was important.

He took a few steps across the grass, pausing as he registered how the land dropped away to reveal a sheer cliff face overhanging a ferocious pit of waves below. Joumei stared at this for a moment, fascinated by his first glimpse of such an expanse of water. So this was the sea. A pleasant salty breeze blew up from the water, teasing his senses and bringing a faint, slightly vacant smile to his face. Slowly and carefully he got down on all fours, moving closer to the edge and squatting down on the grass so that he could get a better view of what lay below.

The grey water swirled beneath, crashing and breaking against the rocks with a spray of whiteish foam. The more he stared at it, the more blurred together the impression became, until it was hard to separate one entity from another. The jagged edges of the rocks seemed smooth and welcoming, and he sank down onto the edge of the cliff, his fingers running absently through the blades of grass that surrounded him. It would be so easy, he thought pensively, just to let go. It would be like flying, with the open sea beneath him. He would be like a bird, in the fresh air — no longer cooped up among the dark stone that had sapped life and soul from those he had loved. He was fed up of being cooped up and caged. It was time to be free, to embrace the breeze and the elements and feel the splash of surf against his skin. He inched forward, his legs dangling off the edge of the bank of earth, and his sandal slipped loose, falling almost in slow motion to the waves beneath. He watched impassively as it was swallowed up by the grey swell of water, disappearing into the rapids. It did not resurface, yet Joumei was not concerned. With his bare toes he knocked free the sandal from his other foot, observing it intently as it too dropped like a stone into the sea below. It was a long way down, yet the smooth, swift descent was somehow intoxicating. I could do that too.

The thought crossed his mind as naturally as the sea breeze brushed against his skin, and the very air itself seemed to be luring him forward, enticing him into the freefall dive to the waters below. He had never learned to swim, yet he wasn't afraid. The water seemed to be calling to him, welcoming him to plunge into his depths. One quick movement and it would truly be at an end. He would find freedom like none of his kin ever had before... and see worlds they had never even dreamed of. He could... Stop it!

From the depths of his consciousness, a faint flicker of self-preservation reared its head, and panic flooded his senses as he realised how close to the brink he had really come. He scrambled backwards in alarm, his fingers gripping onto the fragile blades of grass as though trying to anchor himself to the safety of dry land, and as his heart began to pulse in his chest, he stared down at the sea, his throat closing and spasming in fright as he realised how treacherous a drop it would have been.

His eyes narrowed, as something dark and stifling shifted through his chest, wrapping itself more tightly around his heart.

Keitarou.

He put a hand to his chest, gripping the fabric of his hakamashita. Keitarou's lure tightened once again, tugging and teasing at him to trust the open waves. It was a gentle, enticing sensation, but now Joumei was alert to it, and he knew that there was nothing innocent in these thoughts. Keitarou had found him, and was trying to dispose of him. He had rid himself of Hiko, and now there was only Joumei left to eradicate. He had not been walking aimlessly, but instead into a carefully laid trap. The impulses had been his but not his, for someone else had tugged and pulled at his thoughts, reassembling them into a new and frightening set of commands. They had been intense enough to bring him this far, yet gentle enough to soothe him into disposing of himself without complaint, and he knew that in a few more moments, he might have become hopelessly entangled in the spider's ruthless web.

I won't let you kill me. I'm not as weak as you think.

There was no spoken reply, but something scuttled across the shadows of his thoughts, and Joumei knew his suspicions were right.

I don't care how much you try. I won't kill myself. The Kitsune have faced far greater trials and come through them. Didn't you know? Vermin can't be eradicated in one easy swoop.

Now he was aware of the glittering red eyes of the arachnoid invader, lurking oppressively in the recesses of his mind, and his eyes narrowed, his brow creasing in concentration as he fought against his body's urge to move closer to the edge of the cliff.

That's it. Show yourself, spider. If you want to kill me, you're going to have to exert more power than that.

He let out a gasp, as something tightened suddenly around his heart, sending a stifling pain ricocheting through his entire chest. His lungs seemed to be suddenly on fire, every breath as though inhaling ash, yet despite the searing sensation, he forced himself to sit tight, knowing that the fire was only in his imagination, and that the water below could not save him, only sever him from his life.

I promised Hirata-sama I'd utilise myself in a way that would somehow help. I guess this is where I find out how strong I really am.

You can't fight me forever, Kitsune.

Now Joumei could hear Keitarou's voice, faint but clearly discernable against the rhythm of his palpitating heart.

You can die of fear, or you can drown, or you can suffocate. There are a thousand deaths that Chudokuga's spirit threads can mete out, and most of them are less pleasant than a simple drop into a roaring sea. I suggest you follow my advice and let me choose the easier option. Otherwise I can't guarantee how much suffering you'll go through. I've no intention of giving up until you're dead, which means that this fight continues until you are. And here, your Hirata-sama can't do a thing to protect you from me.

You have that the wrong way around. My life is Hirata-sama's. My people serve him, we don't look to him for protection.

No? Then why run to him with your tail between your legs, whining and yipping like a tamed beast?

You can bait me all you like. It won't work. I know you're there, and so long as I do, you won't take over my thoughts again.

Really?

Really. You might die of old age before you manage to kill me this way.

I suppose we'll see, won't we. I have the time to experiment, and I enjoy it more that way. It gives me some idea of how my power can be used, so if you want to be my guinea pig, be my guest. Just don't think I'll spare you. The Kitsune have to die, so don't think you could beg for mercy.

I wouldn't beg you for anything, least of all my life. It isn't worth the loss of my honour or my pride.

Joumei closed his eyes, forcing his mind away from the despair that suddenly crashed over his every thought, severing himself from the images of his dead kin that Keitarou's web had spun before his gaze. Interspersed among them was the crumpled, bloody body of Souja, and although he knew it was a fabricated, faceless image, rather than a real rendition of the crime, rage flared up in Joumei's heart.

You think that will break me? You think trying to lure me with faked hallucinations of Souja-dono will induce me to give up? You really don't know much about my people, do you?

I know as much as I need to to kill you.

I wonder about that.

Despite his retort, Joumei felt the nerves and tendons in his right arm twitch, reaching out tentatively towards the edge of the cliff, and he grimaced, grabbing hold of his right wrist in his left hand and pulling it forcibly back against his chest.

You're my puppet, silly boy. Even if you stop the right hand with your left, who will stop your left?

Keitarou's voice was mocking now, but although the muscles in both arms had begun to react, his legs jerking into life as his body struggled to get to his feet, Joumei forced his mind to remain separate.

Before, he had seen the sword. Before, when Keitarou had pushed his power to extremes. Before...

He gritted his teeth, digging his heels into the ground, and as he did so, he felt Keitarou's threads of manipulation tighten yet again, the image of the spectral spider almost fully visible now at the back of his mind. Joumei's lips twitched into a faint, grim smile.

Got you.

Pushing all other thoughts aside, he plunged his consciousness back along the threads Keitarou had locked into his heart and mind, tracing them slowly and painstakingly back towards the spectral spider that signified the puppet-master's presence within his body. There was a sudden jerk of energy as Keitarou realised and tried to pull back, but Joumei was ruthless in his intent, and he threw all caution to the wind, grabbing hold of the spectral spider with his own spiritual energy, and, summoning the last of his strength, he enveloped it, watching as it fragmented and split into its component parts. Keitarou was withdrawing his energy, but he could not pull out every thread quick enough to avoid Joumei's assault, and the Kitsune looped his own ability through his enemy's last strands, picking up stray shards of energy from it as it disintegrated into nothing.

The next minute Keitarou's presence was gone from his mind, and, exhausted, Joumei crumpled to his knees, dropping back onto the ground and staring up at the hazy reds and golds of the twilight sky.

He had escaped, for now, but the battle was not over. He had won this fight, but not the war. The spell had not been broken, for Keitarou could return at any time, yet even so he felt triumphant.

I saw it.

He closed his eyes, revelling in the deep breaths he sucked into weary lungs, then,

If you use your power to the max, Keitarou, I can turn it back on you. To control me, you leave pieces of yourself behind. Puppet threads have to come from somewhere, and this time I was able to follow them to their source. It might've only been for a brief instant, but unlike last time, this time I knew where I was looking.

He opened his eyes, watching a pair of birds wheel around in a circle before heading out to sea. He no longer wanted to fly like them, nor dive deep into the greyish sea.

On the contrary, he had somewhere else he needed to go.

He dragged himself into a sitting position, dusting his body down and examining his arms and legs one by one to make sure they had suffered no permanent damage and would bear his weight. Finding nothing amiss except the absence of his sandals, however, he hauled himself to his feet, staggering a few steps towards a nearby tree trunk as he regained his bearings.

Last time, I saw the sword. It didn't mean much to me, but it seems it was relevant. So this time, I looked for something more. And this time I found something useful... something even I understand the meaning of.

A bitter smile touched his lips.

When you showed me your fake Souja-dono, I understood. From that point on, tracing the thought processes was easy. Your memories, your ideas all opened up to me like a book. Even in pieces, I know what they meant. And more, I know where you are. You and the wench that killed my friend... and that's all I need to know to avenge him.

He stretched his arms over his head.

You shouldn't have picked a fight with a fox, Keitarou. There's a reason we've lived till now, and a reason we'll exist long after you're dealt with. You tried to kill me, but instead you told me something you really should not have done. Now I know you're in the Spiritless Zone. And now I'm going there too.

The assembly hall was already bustling with life as Juushirou made his way along the walkway that led to the Captains' main meeting chamber. Although the sun was still rising in the sky, the dawn summons had been received promptly and with proper seriousness by all and sundry, and Juushirou knew that he was not the only one wanting clarification of the mixed reports from the previous few days. It had been a jumble of information and chaotic happenings, culminating with Joumei's dishevelled appearance within the Seventh Division barracks and his ominous warning about Keitarou's level of power. Things were gaining momentum, yet Juushirou was still at a complete loss as to how best to act. Joumei's testimony was in direct conflict with the Third Division's report of Keitarou's Real World location, yet Juushirou didn't know how to question Nagesu's claim without raising Joumei's name and risking the safety of the remaining Kitsune. Izumi in particular was his prime concern — the young girl had taken the news about her brother and old friend better than he had expected, but Juushirou was not naive enough to believe that beneath her composed, resolute exterior, her heart wasn't aching. Her home had been violated, her people killed, and whether she would see her brother again was still unknown.

On top of that there was the matter of Koku. Juushirou was certain that the escaped assassin had tried to take the young boy's life, and that the reason probably connected to his apparent ability to see things that nobody else could perceive. Shunsui was probably right, he mused darkly, that Koku had had some kind of interaction with Keitarou at some point — and yet, his instinct to protect the boy had prevented him from interrogating him again. He had clung so pitifully to Juushirou's uniform, sobbing copiously into the rough fabric, and Juushirou knew that he would not last five minutes under Onmitsukidou investigation.

Besides, I don't know what I have. That much hasn't changed. Giving Izumi the data helps in that respect, and Ketsui seems to be keeping a close eye on her, so I'm sure for now she's safe enough. But even though I feel confident I can help Sekime-taichou and Nagesu-sama in that regard, I don't know what to do about Koku. He might... be a quicker, clearer path to finding our target. If he really can see things in places far from here, maybe he could see where Keitarou was, and how he was planning to act. And yet... I remember his tears and his fright, and I can't even ask. I want to pretend what happened didn't. I've avoided speaking to him directly, and I've not said anything to Kirio or Tsunemori except that they should report to me or to Mitsuki if he has any bad dreams. And that's another thing. Mitsuki thinks he's unwell, and I can't refute her diagnosis. It's like this... whatever it is... is sapping away at him. By leaving it, I might be hurting him. But by dealing with it... it's like admitting that the future isn't something we individually decide. If he really did predict Souja's death, it means that everything is already written, and whatever we do, it's futile in the big scheme of things. That means Keitarou might win regardless of our efforts... and I'm not ready to face that possibility yet.

"You're early," A warm hand on his shoulder told him Shunsui had arrived, and he turned to acknowledge his friend. The other Captain was robed in his usual pink haori, the white of his Division rank poking out coyly from beneath the folds. His long dark hair was pulled back from his face in a haphazard tail tied with dusty ribbon, as though he had literally scrambled out of bed and wrapped the first thing he could find around his unruly locks. He looked tired, and at his expression, Juushirou arched an eyebrow.

"So are you, which is unusual," he observed. Shunsui nodded.

“Like you, I want to know all the pieces of the problem. Then I can sleep on it,” he said gravely. “Come on. Today isn’t a day to be standing out here gassing. You look tired, and I feel tired, and that’s not a good start to the day. I’m guessing you haven’t made any progress on things your end... and I’ve been working them over in my brain, but I still feel something important is missing. Maybe today will fill that gap.”

“Maybe. If it does, tell me?” Juushirou asked plaintively, as he fell into step with his friend, heading towards the meeting room, and Shunsui nodded.

“Promise,” he agreed. “I’m a bit unnerved that my hunch with the prophesy seems to have panned out, though. Hunches like that... I’d rather they didn’t prove right. And your kid — he still bothers me. I don’t even know why, but something about him does.”

“It’s the whole finality of it,” Juushirou reflected. “The idea that one boy could hold the threads of the universe together in that skinny, fragile body... beggars belief.”

“The threads, huh,” Shunsui’s eyes narrowed, and Juushirou cast him an apprehensive glance.

“Shunsui?”

“No. It’s not there yet,” Shunsui shook his head, frustrated. “Juu, whatever happens in this meeting, what Joumei told us is off limits, isn’t it?”

“Everything involving the Kitsune is,” Juushirou lowered his voice, nodding his head, and Shunsui pursed his lips.

“Then we’ll have to find another way to get across the worries we have,” he said simply. “All right. I know what the weight of the task is now. Let’s go in, and see what kind of state Keitarou left Nagesu-sama in, shall we?”

“Mm,” Juushirou nodded, allowing his friend to lead him inside the high-ceilinged chamber.

Several of the other Captains were already assembled, though not all thirteen had arrived yet, and as they took their places in respectful silence, Juushirou shot a sidelong glance towards the front of the room, taking in the figure of their current leader with a critical, objective eye. For someone who had just encountered a particularly sticky enemy at close quarters, he seemed remarkably composed and unruffled, but Juushirou had worked with the Gotei long enough now to know that Nagesu was not a man who displayed his inner feelings unnecessarily. Instead, he took in the other man's pallor, and the slight tremble of his hands as he adjusted his spectacles — a new pair — and he knew that the stories had been true. Nagesu had returned alive from the Real World, but had more or less collapsed on re-entry, and as a result this meeting had been delayed until he had recovered his strength enough to stand before them and speak. Juushirou didn't know how much power the Third Division Captain had had to expend to bring him to the edge, but from the fair man's flickering reiatsu, it was clear it had far from recovered from the experience.

I wonder if that was Keitarou's doing, or something else.

Juushirou's eyes narrowed pensively.

Keitarou was unharmed, since he attacked the Kitsune after Nagesu-sama returned from the Real World. Whatever power Nagesu-sama released, it didn't touch Keitarou. So either Keitarou can withstand the Bankai of a Clan Leader unscathed now, or... something else happened there. There has been talk of masked creatures — but I don't know if that's just confusing the story Sekime-taichou told me about her Captain with the present situation, or whether it was real.

"I'm glad so many people have assembled so quickly," Nagesu himself spoke now, meeting Juushirou's gaze and offering him a quick, tired smile. There was a resolve in the pale eyes Juushirou hadn't seen before, and somehow it put the Thirteenth Division Captain on edge.

Whatever it was, it was clearly significant.

"Before we begin the meeting properly, I've received a message from the Academy," Nagesu continued, oblivious of Juushirou's concerns as the dull hum of chatter in the room began to die away. "A messenger has come on behalf of Genryuusai-sama, and I promised we would hear his request and act accordingly. As we're mostly assembled, I think we won't keep him waiting any longer. There are no objections?"

"A messenger?" Yuuichi looked blank, then his eyes widened in apparent surprise, "Wait... I thought I saw Tadaoki as I came down from First, but... he's come all this way himself? If Genryuusai-sama's sent Tadaoki personally, it must be an important message."

"A very important one, I believe," Nagesu agreed soberly, "following the emergency message Third sent out a few days prior. Well? If there are no objections, I shall summon him within."

There was a general murmur of assent, and Nagesu turned towards the guardsman who stood to attention near the big heavy door, gesturing to him with a flick of his index finger to admit the visitor entrance.

The man scrambled to obey the command and, as the divide slid open, a slender figure stepped into the small chamber, bowing solemnly before the assembled Captains before standing erect and straight before them. He was tall, and built on the lean side, though his gently suppressed reiatsu suggested his narrow frame hid a deceptive amount of strength and purpose. A shock of ash fair hair just long enough to cover his brow in the slightest of waves crowned a thin, well-defined face, high cheekbones giving him an air of austerity and officiousness which was shattered the moment one saw the glitter of humour and life in the bright, honey-coloured eyes. He was robed smartly but simply in the clothing of an Academy instructor, a white manteau covering his shoulders the only deviation from the regulation black, and, as he drew close to Nagesu's position, he bowed again, raising his gaze to meet the head of the Urahara's solemn eyes. They were almost equal, Juushirou realised with a jolt, the newcomer matching Nagesu for leanness, height and dignity almost exactly.

Something in his bearing told the District Captain that he was neither phased nor inexperienced in such a hallowed setting, and Juushirou dug through his memories, recalling that this individual who Yuuichi had hailed so familiarly as 'Tadaoki' was Sasakibe Choujirou Tadaoki, Head of Sakusen at Genryuusai's Spirit Academy for the previous decade. Despite his modest clothing and polite demeanour, he was a figure of considerable influence in his own right, and a distant kinsman of the man who served as Shunsui's brother's right hand man, although Juushirou guessed that, unlike Yasuhiro, Tadaoki was from the main line of the family and thus wore the manteau signifying his higher born status. The Sasakibe were not one of the Eight Clans, yet they were highly respected as a warrior family across the Eight Districts, and though Juushirou had never met the man till now, he knew him by reputation. Tadaoki had been in Genryuusai's service longer than most in the Gotei either knew or remembered, and, ten years earlier, had been called from his position governing Genryuusai's private retinue to employ his skills teaching the expanding numbers of gifted young students flooding in the Academy doors. Far from the eighteen students who had made up Juushirou and Shunsui's own year group, in the previous quarter of a century intake had swollen to an average of a hundred new pupils each year, and, as a result Genryuusai had felt the need to draw on more trusted figures to help guide them. Tadaoki was not a person who liked the limelight, but the opportunity to play a part in Genryuusai's vision had been too tempting not to accept, and he had very quickly settled into his new role alongside his old mentor.

"I apologise for my intrusion, Nagesu-sama," he spoke properly now, his words clear, carrying and respectful. “Thank you for allowing me to speak here before you in this manner.”

“Genryuusai-sama sent the missive, and given the Gotei’s great indebtedness to his efforts, we are always willing to listen to his counsel or requests,” Nagesu said solemnly. “Well, Tadaoki-dono? Speak. What message do you bring before us today?”

“I speak on account of the Academy as a whole,” Tadaoki’s features became grave, and he turned to glance around at the Captains. “It is impertinent, but my words are Genryuusai-dono’s, and I would like to ask you to hear them as though he spoke them. On account of the recent events in Inner Seireitei, we have concerns about the safety of our students. Following the message kindly sent to us by Third Division, Genryuusai-dono understands the severity of what has occurred, and in particular, the identity of the enemy involved. He knows that the Academy has come under attack once before, yet he is loath to risk releasing his own zanpakutou in such close quarters to our young students. Whilst of course I will offer my services as best I can, I am unsure that my imperfect skills would be adequate against such an opponent, and my colleague, Kazoe Ginji, who is the only other member of current staff in possession of a zanpakutou is likewise concerned considering how many young lives we have in our care. I have therefore come to ask the Gotei’s help — in ensuring the Academy is protected during this latest crisis.”

“I am quite sure, Tadaoki-dono, that you are underestimating your skills,” Guren reflected pensively. “Nonetheless, Genryuusai-sama’s request should not be ignored. The Academy has been important for many of our ranked officers, and, indeed, educated three of our Captains. That fact alone proves that the talent it nurtures ought to be protected, and Genryuusai-sama’s zanpakutou is... not the kind of weapon to protect the young.”

“Ryuujinjakka,” Juushirou murmured apprehensively, shaking his head. “Guren-sama is right. Sensei taught us that his sword was capable of immolating everything in the surrounding area, and that included lives.”

“Sometimes great power brings with it great weakness,” Shunsui reflected, and Tadaoki nodded gravely.

“Indeed,” he said frankly, “which is why it is preferable not to have to use it. If possible, we would not seek to release our weapons to engage in battle, but the world is not always a convenient place for those who train with swords.”

He smiled, inclining his head in first Shunsui's, and then Juushirou's direction.

"I was not fortunate enough to meet either of you when you were students, as I have only begun to teach Sakusen this past ten years," he added, "but Genryuusai-dono has spoken well of your skills to me, and I trust his judgement. If the Academy can produce Captains and fighters capable of defending the weak, then I believe it is something worth protecting in itself."

"Then we will act to protect it, as Genryuusai-sama suggests," Yuuichi said gruffly. "It's First District's business, and the Yamamoto will take responsibility. You needn't worry, Tadaoki. First Division will dispatch in numbers to answer Genryuusai-sama's request. You will have Akira and I as your back up."

"Yuuichi-dono?" Midori cast her neighbour a look of surprise, and Yuuichi's expression darkened.

"Twenty five or six years ago, men under my command lost their lives or were hurt by the antics of that man," he said blackly. "I won't let him have a second chance, nor put Genryuusai-sama's students at risk. This is First Division's task — I will not accept the involvement of any other Division within my District so long as my men are able to match up to the task."

"Tadaoki-dono?" Nagesu's gaze flitted to the instructor, who turned to bow his head towards Yuuichi.

"Genryuusai-dono will be much relieved," he said honestly. "I shall return and tell him that First Division will bolster our ranks in the case of any danger."

"Has the Academy been threatened, Tadaoki-dono?" Kyouki asked curiously, and Tadaoki shook his head.

"No, but last time the attack came unannounced and, as Yuuichi-sama stated, people were harmed," he said sadly. "Genryuusai-dono does not want a repeat, not when the number of students now is higher than it was then."

"But is one Division adequate?" Juushirou murmured. "We are dealing with Aizen Keitarou, Yuuichi-dono."

"Are you questioning my people's ability, Ukitake?" Yuuichi bristled, and Juushirou sighed, shaking his head.

"No, of course not," he said wearily. "I just wonder whether, given past events..."

“So long as your Third Seated officer is nowhere near the premises, I’m sure we’ll be fine,” Yuuichi’s lips twisted into an unpleasant grimace.

“That’s unfair, Yuuichi-dono,” Shunsui protested. “Naoko-chan was under Keitarou’s possession, and what happened to your squad members was unfortunate but far from being her fault!”

“Carelessness costs lives,” Yuuichi returned, unmoved. “Shikibu’s sword killed my men, regardless of who was in charge of it at the time. Ukitake, I trust that she will not be deployed near the Academy, and as a result, my squad will be able to do their job correctly this time.”

Juushirou’s eyes glittered with anger, but he nodded his head.

“Naoko will be here, with me, doing her duty as she always does,” he said flatly. “Other insinuations are not necessary. The girl suffered more in that event than anyone else, your men included, and I would not put her through it again, under any circumstances.”

“Hrmph,” Yuuichi grunted, and Tadaoki shot Juushirou a pensive look, before turning his attention to Nagesu.

“With your permission, Nagesu-sama, I will withdraw and convey the message,” he said softly, and Nagesu nodded, looking troubled.

“Yes. Do,” he agreed. “Yuuichi-dono will take charge of the Academy, and so will First Division. The decision is made, and we can turn to other things.”

“Yes, sir,” Tadaoki bowed his head deeply, then disappeared into shunpo, and, as the Captains were left once more alone, Anabomi let out a sigh.

“Ukitake, Yuuichi-dono, squabbling among Captains is unseemly, especially when we have someone from outside visiting,” he said reproachfully. “Most significantly, a man known to have the ear of Genryuusai-sama. It was not well done.”

“We are in a pressure cooker situation, tempers fly,” Midori said categorically, before either Captain could respond. “More importantly, we need to discuss our action plan and hear Nagesu-dono’s report in full.”

“We are not all present, yet,” Retsu spoke up softly, though it was clear from the glint of disapproval in her blue eyes as she glanced at Yuuichi that she had not appreciated the remark about Naoko any more than Juushirou had. “Endou-taichou is not here — yet I understood he was to rejoin us from today?"

This last she directed at Shunsui, who inclined his head in a nod.

"He told J... Ukitake and I both that he would be," he agreed. "Minaichi isn't here, either, though, yet."

"Atsushi-dono isn't coming," Mareiko said softly, and Nagesu looked surprised.

"Not?"

Mareiko shook her head.

"He sent a terse message to Twelfth that I was to inform you of his absence," she said simply. "He said that he would accept whatever orders were handed down, but would not be in attendance himself."

"I see," Yuuichi's expression, which had become annoyed at Anabomi's words, now softened into one of comprehension. "I'd forgotten what day it was. I guess he has other things on his mind."

"Other... things?" Hakubei looked mystified, and Yuuichi nodded.

"Minaichi's a rum soul, and harsh on his men, sometimes," he ruminated, talking as though it were he and not the other Captain who were the senior in age and experience. "Father used to say it too, but in particular I've noticed it myself over the past twenty odd years. Today's the anniversary of his previous adjutant Sakanoue's death. He never attends meetings on those days. I think it makes him angry... either way, he always refuses to attend."

"Anniversary?" Juushirou's gaze flitted to Mareiko, whose own features had become pale and troubled.

"It's true," the fair haired woman nodded her head. "Atsushi-dono probably remembers a good deal more than I do, about that day — I imagine it haunts him more deeply than it could possibly haunt me."

"The loss of Sakanoue and Shougo-dono in service twenty five years ago was a heavy blow for all of us," Nagesu said soberly. "We all deal with losses in our own ways, and Yuuichi-dono is right. Minaichi does not attend meetings on the anniversary of his Vice Captain's death. Since he's made that known through Mareiko, we need not wait for him to appear."

"I had no idea Minaichi had sentiment for his officers, let alone enough to take a day off in memory," Hakubei remarked, and Yuuichi shrugged.

"I asked Father about it once. Apparently Sakanoue was as close to a son as Minaichi ever had,” he reflected.

“We shouldn’t talk about this any more, however. It’s not relevant to the matter at hand,” Juushirou cast Mareiko another glance, noting keenly how her hands were twisting together beneath the white sleeves of her haori, her demeanour apparently calm but her knuckles almost pale enough to match the heavy white cloth that half-concealed them from view. Watching her, he remembered their conversation in Ugendou about the fateful trip to Rukongai, and his heart went out to her. “I am sure Hirata will be here, but he has a lot of things to catch up on himself.”

“Seventh Division have not made application to the Council to appoint a new Vice Captain,” Nagesu reflected. ‘Unless, of course, such an application has come while I was recovering from my trip to the Real World.’ He looked rueful. “I believe I slept a good deal more than I intended, and Shiketsu handled much on his own, not wanting to disturb me more than he thought necessary. I have not yet had a chance to look at anything but the most pressing matters.”

“I don’t think Hirata has thought that far ahead, yet,” Shunsui said wisely.

“Running a division without a Vice Captain is hard work, though,” Hakubei reflected. “We all take advantage of our adjutants a lot more than we probably should — and with his being away at the main house, Hirata-dono’s probably got a bigger workload to catch up with than most.”

“He’ll pull it round,” Midori said with certainty. “Kai’s been to Seventh recently and, despite the loss of an important officer, he says they seem to be functioning at a very... attentive level.”

“And Hirata-dono has a daughter who can inherit the mantle,” Kyouki agreed. “I’ve heard a lot of impressive things about Kikyuehime and her talents. Even the Endou, with all their prejudices, can’t ignore ability when it’s right there staring them in the face.”

“Kikyue is still very young, though,” Juushirou shook his head, “and her brother’s death has upset her badly. I don’t know, Kyouki-sama. I’m not sure it’s so simple as that.”

“Kai believes it will be Kitabata,” Midori said succinctly. “On his recent visit, he had the impression that it was Kitabata keeping things together... but I’ll guess we’ll see.”

“Kitabata Hajime?” Yuuichi raised an eyebrow, and Midori nodded. “He’ll have a struggle, then. I’ve met Kitabata — not a bad officer, but not particularly high in the Endou. There are probably others of higher blood rank who'll be baying for promotion — it's one thing being subordinate to the Clan Leader's son, but another taking orders from a lower degree."

"I'm pretty sure that's the line of thought Hirata's keen on stamping out of the Endou," Midori reflected. "Otherwise why has he taken on the Kotetsu boy and ranked him over several of his own kin?"

"This is not the focus of our meeting, so we should perhaps move to other, more pressing things," Anabomi suggested, before the debate could become all encompassing, and Nagesu nodded.

"Agreed. We should begin, and Hirata-dono can join us when he is able," he decided with a sigh. "I know you've all had memos from Third via Hell Butterfly about the Real World trip, so there's no need to reiterate the fact my Third Seat and I saw Keitarou there with our own eyes. The question is what to do about it — when, and how."

"The biggest concern is that he was able to move freely," Guren said darkly. "My uncle smashed his body apart, yet he was apparently healed from the encounter."

"He seemed so," Nagesu agreed sadly.

"And he used Kidou?" Midori asked. Nagesu nodded.

"Byakurai," he confirmed. "He didn't make any other hostile move towards me or towards my men — but he wasn't alone, and he came to protect the young... whatever she was which attacked my officers and put Kamitani in need of treatment. He seems to have taken her and used the distraction of the volcano to flee — I used my sword to prevent the eruption, and he didn't take advantage of my concentration to attack me."

"So it was more important to him to get his ally somewhere safe than to take you down," Kyouki pursed her lips.

"I heard a rumour that the girl manifested a Hollow mask?" Guren murmured, and Nagesu lowered his head.

"A mask, but no more," he responded. "It put me in mind of your own account, Guren-sama, about your Lord brother and his affliction."

"There is no doubt Aizen was somehow involved in breaking the seal that led to Seiren's illness," Guren remembered. "It seems possible that he would apply that knowledge to his own experiments."

"If I may..." Anabomi hesitated, then, "I know that there was never any support for this, but Hyakken mentioned it to me following a Vice Captain's meeting, and I feel it ought to be brought up now. Following Seiren-dono's incapacitation, there were the incidents in Rukongai... the ones that led to the tragic deaths we were discussing earlier. At the time, the official view was that there was no connection between Keitarou and these individuals, and Hyakken said that this view was maintained at the Vice Captain's meeting too, principally by Shirogane-sama. However... can we call this a coincidence, given this new evidence? Should we not be reopening the investigation into the deaths there, in light of Nagesu-dono's testimony?"

"Taichou..." Mareiko's eyes glittered for a moment with unshed tears, and Juushirou saw her close them, struggling to bring her emotions back under control.

"Shougo-dono's death was a tragedy for all of us," Nagesu's gaze had also flitted towards his kinswoman. "I admit, I wondered the same myself, when faced with such an enemy. But... for Keitarou to initiate such an event when injured as he must have been after meeting Kinnya-sama's sword... both Kinnya-sama and Hirata-dono testified that Keitarou was in a severely broken state."

"But he did have my sister with him, Nagesu-sama, and I don't think she can be underestimated in any of this."

Hirata's own words prevented anyone else from answering, and the Captains turned to register their missing member, who bowed his head in apology for his lateness.

"I'm sorry. I had more documents to authorise than I expected, and came as soon as I could."

"We have really just begun discussing the matter of Keitarou's activities," Nagesu gestured for Hirata to take his usual place between Kyouki and Anabomi, offering him a sympathetic smile. "We are all glad to welcome you back among us, Hirata-dono. From your words, it sounds as though you heard some of what we were saying... and your timing is opportune. You can confirm for us the physical condition of my wretched cousin when last you saw him, twenty six years ago."

"Mm," Hirata's expression became shadowed, but he nodded. "He had many broken bones. I should have killed him, because he couldn't escape by himself — but Eiraki appeared, and they managed to disappear into a Senkaimon. I've relived that moment enough since my son's death, berating my weakness — it's as vivid in my mind now as it was back then."

"To dig up unpleasant memories is not our intention, Endou-taichou," Retsu said gently, and Hirata shook his head.

“This is all I can do,” he said simply. “Come here, work as a Captain should and help to bring the people to justice in the quickest possible way. Souja would want that, too. Enough mourning. Time for action. Please, don’t mind my feelings, Unohana-taichou. Believe me, I am quite all right.”

“Keitarou drank the reidoku when he fled, correct?” Nagesu asked.

“He did,” Hirata’s eyes became slits. “He had no real discernable trace of spirit power before that, but when he drank it, his power flared and he was able to use his sword to open a Gate.”

“Did he walk into the Gate?” Anabomi asked.

“He used some kind of shunpo,” Hirata responded, “but he couldn’t stand up. Even the reidoku couldn’t do anything about that.”

“We did see it provide regenerative properties when Seimaru ingested it,” Kyouki glanced at Midori, who nodded.

“He did seem to use it that way, and probably that was a less developed formula than the one Keitarou risked drinking himself,” she agreed. “We don’t know what it might have done. He might have healed quickly or he might not have. He’s apparently made a good recovery, but we don’t know how long that took. The incident in Rukongai might have been his science or it might not. Eiraki-hime might’ve been involved or she might not. Right now we have no proof of it — and I’m more concerned about trapping the current threat rather than digging up past we can’t change.”

“But there was no evidence Keitarou caused the incidents in Rukongai,” Mareiko murmured softly. “He didn’t kill my Captain. The events aren’t the same.”

“We can’t be absolutely certain,” Hakubei frowned, and Mareiko shook her head.

“I believe my Captain,” she said stolidly, “and in Nagesu-sama’s science. There were disparities. Differences. The evidence was wrong, everything was wrong. Taichou said that it looked like the work of an individual who had been planning these outbreaks and incidents for a long time. Maybe they acted just when Keitarou had disappeared, but he thought it would have been the work of several years. We looked at all the data and the timelines when we were preparing to go... to go purge the areas that were worst affected, and... and...”

She swallowed hard, reaching up to brush the tears from her lashes.

“I’m sorry. It was so long ago, I shouldn’t react like this,” she whispered, her voice trembling slightly. “Taichou plotted a timeline of all the occurrences and some of them clashed with times Keitarou was in other places. Some even occurred before Seiren-dono’s illness... but the witness testimony from Seiren-dono’s case suggested that Keitarou saw this phenomenon for the first time then.”

“Sekime-taichou is correct,” Guren pursed his lips unwillingly. “Keitarou might have been lying, but he did... give the impression that this was a new concept for him. Certainly he claimed not to have known what impact his actions would have on my brother. In fact, he seemed to think it had worked in his favour — far more than he had anticipated it would.”

“But do we really believe in spontaneously occurring Hollow mutations in Rukongai?” Midori said sceptically. “Sekime just said that Shougo-dono thought it was the work of an individual. We never brought anyone to justice for those incidents. If not Keitarou, then who?”

“Does it matter, since the incidents ceased?” Yuuichi demanded. “Eleventh and Twelfth took heavy losses, but their sacrifices took the bite out of the problem and the remainder were swept up and disposed of in the following years. There haven’t been any further eruptions like it, there. Maybe Shougo-dono was wrong... perhaps it was a spontaneous incident that spread like a plague among the souls there and we simply broke the back of the disease by reducing its ability to spread.”

“I am unaware of any disease that would present with such symptoms,” Retsu shook her head. “Seiren-dono was an exception. His was caused by latent spirit power sealed at birth. It was not the kind of condition I would anticipate being heritable or contagious — it was a flaw unique to Seiren-dono himself, and, as we have seen with his children and grandchildren, it has had no long term effects on the family’s line.”

“My investigation agreed with Mareiko’s account,” Nagesu sighed, offering Mareiko an apologetic look. “I had Shougo-dono’s data alongside my own when we reviewed the deaths in action, and I also examined the corpses of one or two damaged souls brought back by rescue squads. There was no evidence of reidoku — such as I understand that formula from the times Keitarou has used it — in any of the remains. I’m sorry, Mareiko, to drag up such a horrible recollection — but Shougo-dono’s testimony can only be conveyed here by you, and I’m grateful that you’re willing to do it.”

“That was why I became Captain,” Mareiko said softly. “For my Captain's sake. This is all I can do now... I couldn't help him in the Rukon, so this is all there is left."

She managed a weak smile.

"Besides, in this case I can help. We didn't decide this was disconnected from Keitarou because we hoped it would be the case, or because we wanted to distance the Urahara from the matter. The truth is, it didn't add up. Had I known, I'd have brought Taichou's notes here with me today, but I remember that the evidence made it unlikely. We considered it carefully, especially because of concerns from the Kuchiki. The evidence was not there."

"But now we have Keitarou using these mutated souls in some capacity?" Kyouki asked.

"It seems so. Maybe he took the inspiration from Seiren-dono, or maybe, if he's been in Rukongai, he learned something there that we didn't," Nagesu replied wearily. "He's a genius. Every clue would shine twice as bright for him as it would for us. Whatever the reasoning, he had a Hollow-masked girl fighting for him. She was definitely involved with him, and hostile to us as a result. And he protected her, preventing me from taking her prisoner, so there was something he didn't want us to discover from her. That or he has a use for her still. She didn't appear stable — a flawed experiment — but more than that it's hard to theorise on without proper lab tests."

"We need to stop him before he can perfect the science, in fact," Guren ruminated, and Nagesu nodded.

"Hence why I called this meeting as soon as I was able," he said grimly.

"I trust you are not in a hurry to return to face Keitarou yourself, Nagesu-sama?" Retsu looked concerned. "You have recovered quite well from your exertions, but your reiatsu is still fluctuating and you appear exhausted. It would be a dangerous undertaking."

"You're not fit?" Kyouki cast Nagesu a sharp glance, and Nagesu grimaced, running thin fingers through messy blond hair.

"I'm tired," he admitted. "I had to release Sekizanha's Bankai and use all my reiryoku to stop the volcano and reopen the gate to return to Seireitei. There's no time for proper recuperation, though. This is my cousin, and in part, my battle. We know where he is and we can't wait for him to move to a new location. We need to strike, and I do not wish to be left behind."

"We don't know that he's there for certain," Juushirou spoke up, aware that both Shunsui and Hirata had sent him surprised glances at his words. “We’ve seen in the past that he can travel between areas. He knows Senkaimon more than the rest of us.”

“Do you have evidence to suggest he’s somewhere other than the Real World at present?” Nagesu asked, and Juushirou hesitated, biting his lip as he debated out to answer.

“An unsubstantiated report came to our attention,” It was Shunsui’s smooth tones which broke the silence, and the Eighth Captain offered Nagesu a benign smile. “We don’t have any information as to his current whereabouts, I’m afraid. If we did, we’d report it here — but we already know he’s moved once. For him to move again would not be strange.”

“That’s true,” Hakubei rubbed his chin. “Thing is, Shunsui, if he’s not in the Real World, where is he? Where else is there to go? The World of the Hollows? Can you even get there? Can we? For now all we can do is investigate the leads we have, and we know for certain that he has been in the Real World recently. If he has allies there, we need to find them and stop them — and if he’s experimenting on individuals there...”

“No,” Nagesu shook his head. “The girl wasn’t a Plus Soul. Her aura wasn’t right. I don’t know what it was, but I know what it wasn’t. Which reminds me, Keitarou’s own aura was odd, too. I couldn’t detect him, even when he stood right in front of me. That’s never happened before.”

“Not at all?” Midori looked alarmed, and Nagesu nodded.

“He was making no attempt, as far as I could see, to hide himself from me, being that he stood in plain sight — but no, I couldn’t pick up a hint of his aura. I always have before, but this time I didn’t even sense his Kidou.”

“Is that possible?” Guren demanded. Nagesu shrugged.

“Scientifically, a complete lack of spiritual presence indicates a complete loss in reiryoku potential,” he said slowly. “However, there are theories that indicate the exact opposite. People in the Real World don’t sense our presence because their spiritual awareness is far too low to accommodate our frequency, yet we can still impact on them all the same. There are hypotheses that a similar gulf of power is possible between shinigami.”

“You’re saying that Keitarou’s ability has moved to such a level that it’s now beyond a Captain with Bankai to detect it?” Yuuichi looked horrified.

“That would suggest he was more powerful than Genryuusai-sensei,” Juushirou breathed, alarm glittering in his hazel eyes. “But surely... that kind of spirit power...”

“Before everyone gets scared, I think that’s probably not the case with Keitarou-kun,” Shunsui interjected casually, and everyone turned to glance at him. “Yes, I know, I know not the first thing about scientific theories. But I was in the Rukon and I was there with Shikibu Naoko, who is not a Bankai level Shinigami, nor even ranked at adjutant level, though granted she’d be perfectly capable of assuming such a role if the need arose. My point is that, when she released her sword, she sensed Keitarou’s reiatsu. True, her weapon has a prior acquaintance with Keitarou, but when we were in the heartland of his former camp, I also picked up what was definitely his aura. And, Nagesu-sama, so did you — or rather, Sekizanha — at the Gate you had Naoko-chan investigate. Correct?”

“That’s true,” Nagesu admitted, furrowing his brow in consternation. “In which case...”

“Reidoku enhances natural ability, it doesn’t mutate it into something different from what it already was,” Shunsui said simply. “That’s how I understand it from the descriptions of Seimaru’s behaviour, anyway. Keitarou was always extremely good at concealing his reiatsu and cloaking himself with Kyokkou and other similar spells. I would guess that, if he wanted to suppress all trace of himself, he probably is able to do so.”

“You think the reidoku has had a permanent effect on him?” Anabomi asked, and Shunsui lowered his head soberly.

“I think that’s highly likely,” he said, meeting Juushirou’s gaze. “We don’t know for certain what his current status is. I think we should be more alarmed by the potential he does have — remembering the ruthlessness with which he manipulated Endou Shouichi to his death, not to mention his attempts on J... Ukitake’s life and his actions towards Naoko-chan, his ability to control other people can’t be ignored. That is our real danger. We don’t know to what degree he might have perfected this technique, nor whether he is as limited as he once was in terms of only being able to attack one person with his Bankai at a time.”

“It’s possible he’s already been using that ability, given Nagesu-sama’s testimony,” Hakubei suggested. “This Hollow-girl of his might carry his power inside of her.”

“That might be,” Nagesu acknowledged. “She certainly fought as though she didn’t care if she destroyed herself. It reminded me of your testimony in fact, Shunsui-dono — of the fight in the snows between you and Ukitake when you both were students.”

“Mm,” Shunsui’s eyes clouded slightly, and Juushirou frowned, moving to change the subject.

“What if he was using it on someone else?” he hazarded. “From what’s been said about the Rukongai incident and Seiren-sama’s illness, we know that turning Hollow can make you lose your reason and act more aggressively. Keitarou wouldn’t need to use his ability on someone he had already broken — would he? More likely he’d use it in other ways — ways we haven’t considered.”

“Such as?” Nagesu asked, and out of the corner of his eye, Juushirou was aware of Hirata’s anxious flinch. He pressed his lips together for a moment, then,

“I was thinking of the Onmitsukidou,” he said at length. “Suzuki Naoto. The man who has apparently disappeared from existence since he escaped from Second’s cells.”

“He didn’t quite just disappear,” Midori said bitterly. “He killed one prisoner, attacked the Seventh and, if I’m properly informed, made inroads into your own division — although that’s off the record, since you didn’t seem keen to make it an official report, Ukitake.”

“He had left my Division by the time the Onmitsukidou arrived,” Juushirou dismissed this quickly. “Nobody in Thirteenth has been able to clearly identify him, and nobody was hurt. It was my decision as Captain that we had already investigated thoroughly and the Second’s people weren’t needed. Besides, that’s not my point. Midori-sama, Kai and I already discussed once the idea that Suzuki could be a puppet like Onoe. When we encountered him, well, he wasn’t like that. He seemed in his own mind, but there was still something... off about him. One of my officers likened him to someone already dead. Kai told me that he was poisoned, and it’s pretty much for sure that Keitarou had a hand in saving him. Correct?”

“We believe so,” Midori said cautiously.

“Well, when Keitarou first put his spell on me, I was completely able to act of my own accord,” Juushirou said pragmatically. “I couldn’t hear my swords speak, but I didn’t know I was already under his control. Thinking back, I’m sure I only got out of that prison because he intended me to go. What if he’s used the same technique on Suzuki... and the night he escaped from the cell, it was because Keitarou ‘activated’ him like he activated me... to kill?”

“And what, Keitarou has since reclaimed him?” Yuuichi demanded.

“Either that, or discarded him,” Juushirou nodded. “Maybe that’s how his power has changed. Perhaps, instead of creating zombies like Onoe, or damaging people the way he injured me... perhaps his technique is now so perfected that he can infiltrate someone and utilise them even when they’re within their own wits, and without hurting their spiritual abilities. Suzuki was capable of using Kidou, both to escape the Second and to attack the Seventh.”

“It’s a persuasive hypothesis, even without proof to back it up,” Nagesu admitted. “I didn’t meet this Suzuki, but your explanation makes sense, Ukitake. I suppose in this regard your own experience is critical.”

“Not really,” Juushirou responded, “but what Yuuichi-sama said about Naoko also made me wonder. Keitarou used Naoko’s own power against her, by infiltrating her sword, rather than releasing Chudokuga into her. It made me think that, if he could utilise Naoko like that, in order to control multiple people, maybe he now has ways of using his own zanpakutou that are less limited than when he killed Shouichi-sama.”

“You think he can control multiple souls at once?” Kyouki asked sharply, and Juushirou nodded solemnly.

“I think it’s a logical progression, based on how he used Naoko,” he said soberly. “Suzuki may or may not have been one of his puppets... but it doesn’t mean he’s the last or the only one.”

“Naoko-chan said in the Rukon that she thought Keitarou was building an army,” Shunsui rubbed his chin. “In some respects, maybe she’s right. Perhaps that is what he’s doing... only not quite in the way we thought.”

“That means that taking action against him has become top priority,” Nagesu said frankly. “We need to move on the Real World and suppress his movements. We need to capture him as soon as possible.”

“No, we need to kill him,” Midori said bluntly. “That’s the only way to stop this particular criminal from reoffending.”

Nagesu flinched, but sighed, nodding his head.

“Probably,” he agreed. “And any children along with him, too. We can’t risk this continuing into another generation. One of Keitarou’s children has already taken the life of a Vice Captain and several healing shinigami, and we've had enough reports about the son to suggest he's as dangerous, if not more so. I don't like the kill-on-sight motif, but in this particular instance, I think it must be sanctioned."

"There are enough members of the Council here to sanction such a vote for action, if you wish to call it," Guren pointed out. "Tokutarou-dono is the only absentee — but I can't imagine why he would be opposed to the motion."

"My brother would support anything that involved eradicating a threat like Aizen Keitarou," Shunsui said darkly. "I will speak for him in this regard, Guren-sama. He would want me to. I'll be going to Eighth in person in a day or two to deliver my usual reports on the Squad. I can relay any decisions taken to him then and bring back any concerns on his part on my return — but I'm sure that his will and mine are the same in this."

"I agree with Shunsui," Kyouki nodded. "Tokutarou feels strongly about the danger a man like Keitarou poses. He would not mind the vote being carried in his absence."

"I cannot sanction an order to kill," Retsu said mildly, "without the consent of my Clan. I can, however, support a motion to capture Aizen Keitarou and bring him before full Council justice."

"Even your vote can be overridden, Retsu-sama, if enough of the rest of us pass a motion to kill," Yuuichi said frankly. "I am in favour of destroying the threat, as we have failed to do before."

"Retsu-sama's opinion is duly noted," Nagesu responded. "I shall consider the Kyouraku officially in absentia, though Shunsui-dono, I would be grateful if you reported the results of our discussion to your brother. I have so much to do already... it would be a burden off my mind if you could take on that duty."

"With pleasure," Shunsui nodded. "If there are any issues, I'm sure he'll contact you directly, but I don't see why he would raise a complaint. He's more brutal about these things than me, and I've heard his opinions on the Keitarou subject many times before."

"I'm sure," Nagesu looked weary, but nodded his head. "Then are there any other Council dissenters to the motion suggested?"

There was not a single murmur of a reponse, and Juushirou frowned, his gaze flitting to Hirata. His friend's pale eyes had become clouded, and Juushirou knew he was thinking of his missing sister. He did not object, however, and Nagesu nodded his head slowly.

“Then it is passed,” he said heavily, “by a majority vote of six members from seven present. Keitarou and his children are officially enemies of Seireitei and as such, adjudged outlaws. No punishment will be meted out to any who end their lives, irrespective of rank, and any who knowingly choose to shield them will be brought to answer charges before the Council of Elders.”

“And Eiraki-hime?” Guren asked sharply. “What of the woman who murdered my son?”

“If the measure applies to Keitarou and his offspring, it applies equally to my sister,” Hirata said quietly. “The Endou Clan has no objections to her inclusion.”

“Hirata?” Juushirou saw Shunsui’s gaze flit in the direction of his neighbour, and Hirata shrugged.

“She killed Guren-sama’s son, and remains unpunished,” he said simply. “There is nothing I can do. The Endou intend to maintain positive relations with their neighbours the Kuchiki, and my sister Eiraki is a felon.”

“I would like to request, however, that capture is considered as an option in the case of arraigning suspects whose guilt is less clearly proven,” Retsu said softly. “I do not believe in killing any individual, let alone one who has no recourse to a fair trial. I understand from personal experience the loss of kin at the hands of Keitarou, and whilst my people will not participate in any attempt to kill him, we will not try to prevent any such searches from taking place. His guilt is beyond doubt. In the case of Eiraki-hime and the children, there is the potential issue of coercion or zanpakutou manipulation. I would like to request that death is only sought in the absence of any opportunity to take these enemies captive.”

“Including the ‘Kohaku’ Souja-dono talked about, the one that Suzuki told Kai had the power to destroy the whole world?” Midori demanded. “Retsu-sama, with due respect, this is why your healers were taken out in the Spiritless Zone. They lacked the ability to properly defend themselves — they weren’t alert to the danger until it was already upon them. If Suzuki’s testimony is right, then for the good of all of Seireitei, eliminating this Kohaku is as paramount as eliminating Keitarou himself. It matters not whether he has acted against us yet — after Seireitei has been devastated will be too late.”

“If and when a case is proven against him, we shall discuss it further,” Retsu’s tone maintained its usual calm, but Juushirou could see steel in her soft blue eyes. “The testimony is suspect, and we have no proof that such an enemy even exists. For now, therefore, the subject is academic. We are not at a Council meeting, but a Captain's one, and it is impolite to our fellows to discuss things in such a way without their participation."

"Then we will leave the matter as we have decided, and move on," Nagesu adjusted his spectacles absently. "We were agreeing the deployment of shinigami in pursuit of Keitarou's base."

"So we're going to the Real World?" Shunsui asked. "All of us? Don't you think that's a bit irresponsible, leaving Seireitei unguarded?"

"Well, First are going to the Academy," Nagesu glanced at Yuuichi, who nodded. "That leaves twelve active Divisions. I propose that three or four are dispatched to the Real World en masse to deal with Keitarou. Third will be one of them. The remainder will stay here and ensure normal tasks are completed and Hollows are disposed of. In the unlikely event that we fail, it never hurts to have a back up — but I believe Keitarou is in the Real World, and what he is doing there is of risk to a lot of people. We can't leave it alone."

"I agree," Kyouki said at length. "Fifth will come with you, Nagesu. We don't know what kind of army Keitarou might've amassed. You're not fit enough to take him on alone right now, and I doubt you'll listen if I try to tell you to stop behind, so instead I'll come and back you up. How does that suit?"

"Thank you, Kyouki-sama," Nagesu offered her a grateful smile.

"Sixth will also accompany you," Guren decided. "It seems prudent for Captains with Bankai to attempt to eradicate a illegal shinigami with Bankai of his own, and I have a score with Keitarou for both my son and my brother. Shirogane and I will attend the Real World also."

"I still wonder whether we should really send so many powerful individuals to the Real World..." Shunsui began.

"I agree with Nagesu-sama," Mareiko said softly. "Nagesu-sama, I would volunteer Twelfth's services to the Real World, but... I..."

"Eleventh and Twelfth should remain here," Yuuichi said categorically. "Minaichi's still not right in the head over Sakanoue twenty five years on, and Sekime, your shoulder was wrecked up by those creatures back then too, wasn't it? Seems stupid to me to send Divisions who'd only be in the way."

"Yuuichi-dono, that was harsh," Retsu chided, but Mareiko shook her head, looking relieved.

“No, I agree,” she said honestly. “I’d only get in the way. I’m not sure how I’d feel, faced again with creatures like those who killed my Captain. I’d rather stay behind... if Nagesu-sama doesn’t mind.”

“Eleventh and Twelfth will stay here, then. Yuuichi-dono, if you would inform Minaichi, I’d be grateful,” Nagesu decided. “Ukitake? What about you?”

“I’ll stay here,” Juushirou said frankly. “Someone has to, and Thirteenth isn’t a barracks I can easily leave unattended at the moment. I’d like to remain in Seireitei, just in case a threat chooses to come here.”

“Where Ukitake is, I will be too,” Shunsui added.

“Then we still need one more squad to the Real World,” Nagesu reflected. “I would rather take four, to be on the safe side.”

“I’ll bring some of Second,” Midori suggested. “The Onmitsukidou — in other words, my Vice Captain and my Third Seat, and all officers under their direct command — they’ll remain here, and continue their duties here. But I will bring a deployment of the other Division members and join you in the Real World. That will be three and a half divisions deployed there — and one at the Academy. The rest will remain here, plus the Onmitsukidou. That seems satisfactory — don’t you think?”

Nagesu pursed his lips, then nodded.

“We should begin preparations immediately,” he decided. “Third, Fifth, Sixth and Second will leave for the Real World a week from now. First will head to the Academy at the same time. All other Seireitei duties will be left to the eight Divisions remaining behind. Is everyone clear and settled on this action plan?”

There were moments of assent, though Juushirou cast Shunsui a troubled look across the chamber, and Shunsui shrugged.

“Then it is passed,” Nagesu’s voice cut through the air once more. “We will gather again in one week to dispatch forces to apprehend and remove the threat that is Aizen Keitarou — by whatever means necessary. Meeting is hereby dismissed.”

The Senkaimon was definitely somewhere in this area.

Joumei stepped carefully over the thick leaves of a low sprawling plant, avoiding the curl of a tree root and pushing back the lower branches of a flourishing laurel tree, plunging deeper into the heart of the forest that had surrounded his home for as long as he could remember. Though there had been no logical reason for it, he had skirted a wide berth around the black hole that once had led to the heart of his people's lair. Like a wild animal avoiding the site of a previous disaster on instinct, Joumei's feral wits were alert and twitching as he probed through the woodland patch, trying not to remember the decaying bodies that lay beneath his feet.

It was not a proper burial, but, until he had completed his aim, he dared not risk returning to the den. Keitarou had proven that he could control Joumei's body even in the deepest depths of the Sekkiseki barrier, and to hide there would only put the Kitsune himself at a physical disadvantage. Out in the open air, Keitarou's lure would be more effectively cast, but the longer he spent above ground, the stronger Joumei had felt his own spirit power becoming. It had taken less than twenty four hours to rid his system of the effects of the Sekkiseki, the last lingering sluggishness pushed aside by the warm evening air, and he allowed a rueful smile to touch his lips, gazing up at the bright specks of light that littered the night sky through the thick foliage.

Foxes hunt at night. Keitarou called us animals. I wonder if he knows how right his judgement is. We preserve and protect our pride, but really we're no better than wild beasts scurrying to shelter in holes beneath the earth. I don't want that for my people any more. We've hidden long enough — but if even the hiding place isn't safe, well, it's time to adapt and move on. Hiko, Izumi and I have worked towards that end for a long time. Perhaps now it will come to fruition.

He licked his finger, holding it up to the breeze to test the direction it was coming from, then slipped downwind, automatically moving from shady patch to moonlit silhouette as he tried to leave as few traces of his presence as possible. There was nobody physically following him, but Keitarou was not his only potential enemy, and he did not have either the time or the will to tangle with those who might mistake him for an intruder.

I asked Hirata-sama to dissolve his protection of us, and any connection to the Kitsune. In a way, though, that died with Souja-dono. He was the link that bound us together, since Father died. We none of us imagined a world like this... who knew how important one person's life could be? I suppose the old adage is true. It's when something is lost that you understand it worth.

He frowned, remembering Hiko's frantic, blood-stained body and the crash of stone and dust as the ceiling of the underground chamber had come tumbling down around him.

There's only Izumi left now. At the very least, I have to make sure she lives through this — whatever happens to me after tonight.

He paused at a particularly thick patch of green, running his hands lightly over the leaves. They had been disturbed recently, and as he pushed them aside, a slab of stone became visible, the crudely carved character for 'friend' scrawled across its surface. Old and mildewed, swathed in plant matter, this was the final resting place of Keitarou's cousin Daisuke, and Joumei squatted down beside it for a moment, resting his palm against the damp surface.

Daisuke-sama.

He let out a sigh, absently brushing his skin against the stone.
I never met you, but Father used to talk about you. How you used to come here, every spring without fail. How you'd bring us news and supplies, and speak with Father about important things before disappearing back into the mists again. Thanks to you, this area remained safe during the purges of Endou Shouichi and Endou Seimaru. Thanks to your messages, we knew when to hide beneath the earth, avoiding the hunts for exiled Urahara. This area remained peaceful and is still peaceful even now. I'm glad you're buried here. You protected this place, and so we protected your place of rest. At least, till now.

He wrapped his arms around his knees, contemplating.

He had been very young, the first time his father had brought him here. Confused and a little rebellious, Joumei had trailed behind Shunmei's larger steps, almost falling headlong into a plot of ferns along the way. Shunmei had hauled him up with a grin, lifting him over a particularly nasty tree root, and then they had been there, at the grave itself. It had not looked like much, and Joumei had asked his father bluntly what the point was of coming to the burial place of someone forgotten by the world. Shunmei had admonished him then, tapping a finger against his nose and shaking his head.

"Because Daisuke-sama existed, so now do we," he had said gravely. "Understand this, Joumei-kun. Not all Urahara are our enemies. Some are our friends, and loyal and steadfast ones at that."

Joumei remembered his confusion, gazing up at his father with startled eyes and gripping on to the long, stone-calloused fingers.

"But everyone hates us. We betrayed them," he had whispered. "Kaa-sama said so. We shouldn't ever go above ground alone, because if we do, people will come to punish us."

"Our history is a chequered one, and one day you'll understand all of it, because one day the burden will be yours," Shunmei had told him simply, ruffling his fingers through Joumei's silvery hair. "For now, it's enough to know that this man was our kin, and not our enemy — and because he lived, we survived the purge. Be grateful for his existence, and honour his memory. Even if it isn't a grand tomb or memorial, it is at peace and a pleasant place."

"So it is," Joumei spoke out loud now, getting to his feet and brushing the leaf litter from his hands. "Now I begin to realise exactly how dangerous your life must have been, Daisuke-sama. You were Keitarou's ally and friend, yet chose to protect us without his knowledge. You died in his place, a martyr to his cause, yet you took our secret with you to your grave... and now, because of you, I can take action against Keitarou and his assassin daughter. The world moves in a funny way sometimes. Father said you considered us the same as you. I won't apologise for disagreeing — Keitarou has always been our enemy, and even if it upsets your ghost, I don't intend on turning back."

He glanced at his fingers, then spread out his hands, closing his eyes as he extended his senses to scan the surrounding area for traces of the Senkaimon. They were still there, fleeting but compromised, and Joumei frowned, moving towards them and running his fingers against the tattered edges of the gate.

Someone tampered with this, and now it won't open, at least, not safely. Well, I didn't count on it being a safe transition, anyway. The Gotei have almost certainly given up on activating it, and I don't blame them. It's very unstable... opening it once might make it implode on itself and swallow up whatever happens to be inside. That is, if it hasn't already collapsed in on itself... but I'll have to take the risk.

He flexed his fingers, thrusting them out against the expanse of space where he knew the Gate had originally been.

I guess the Gotei learned their Senkaimon technology from Keitarou, but it's originally a Urahara skill. Doubtless Keitsune-sama worked hard on its development, but he wasn't the only one. Before everything went wrong, my ancestors were also heavily involved in Senkaimon research. And more, in the time since we've lived in exile, we've perfected ways of opening and closing Gates in manners that allow us quick escape from one part of Soul Society to another. De-activated experimental Gates are all over Seireitei, and thanks to them I've managed to relocate most of the surviving Kitsune to safer pastures — but right now I need all my focus and concentration to open this gate... and go to Rukongai for myself.

As he had anticipated, the spiritual framework inside the Rukon gate was unstable, tendrils of malevolent black energy snaking up from the floor and out from the walls like tongues of acrid smoke.

They brushed against the edges of his clothing, leaving singe marks against the worn fabric as they reacted with the Sekkiseki dust that still lingered against his robes, and Joumei skirted around them as best he could, leaping deftly over a chasm that had begun to rip its way through the tunnel and quickening his pace towards the far side of the gate. This was only an internal passageway, built to facilitate movement between parts of Soul Society during an earlier experimental age, but, though it lacked the instability of the Dangai that parted this plane from the Real World, Joumei was educated enough to know that disappearing into a tear in the passage could be the same thing as dropping into eternal oblivion. The tunnel would probably not take him back, he reflected grimly, should he manage to survive the encounter with Keitarou and his kin. But there was no guarantee that he would walk away from the fight, and besides, such things as escape passages were an easy thing for foxes to find.

About three quarters of the way through the tunnel, he spread his hands, thrusting the palm of his left fist against the wall of the tunnel with deliberate intent. It burned and sizzled against his skin, but he ignored the sensation, forcing his own magic to override the built in coordinates of the gate. It was a skill which his father had taught him, and his grandfather before that, to divert a gate to a different exit in times of pursuit. It was simply one of the many survival techniques the Kitsune had employed to remain alive, but Joumei knew that, in comparison to his ancestors, his life had been relatively free from trouble.

Daisuke-sama helped, but it was when Misashi-sama got involved with shielding us after Daisuke-sama died that things really began to stabilise. We began to believe we could survive, instead of waiting to be killed every time we broke the surface.

Joumei gritted his teeth, pressing the palm of his other hand alongside the other and closing his eyes as he fought to warp the tunnel's direction without splitting it.

Because of that, maybe, I'm a weak, failed figure trailing in the shadow of those gone before me. I said I've been preparing for Keitarou's attack, but really, I was caught unawares. I knew it was coming, yet still lost lives. Father would never have been so careless, nor Grandfather before him. And now I'll put my life on the line to avenge a friend, but in the past, would my predecessors have done the same? Would they have not closeted themselves away in the shadows and let the world turn by without getting involved?

He opened his eyes, as he felt the judder that indicated his effort had worked, and he sighed, removing his hands and glancing at the surface burns that now patched across his calloused skin.

I was friends with Souja-dono, and that makes all the difference. Father encouraged alliance with Hirata-sama, but with Souja-dono and I, it was different. We grew up together. We were cubs from different litters... birds from different nests... but running through the forest, climbing trees and playing at soldiers, those things disappeared. We were the same, and we played like we were. I was an exile, he was a future lord — but we were truly friends, and that's what hurts the most. I put both my closest friends in mortal danger, and both of them paid for it with their lives. I've failed both as a Kitsune and as a vassal of the Endou-ke. I can't even protect my own sister... I have to leave that to the shinigami.

He took a deep breath into his lungs, watching as the air before him slowly parted to reveal glimmers of light, the first rays of moonlight penetrating the blackness that had enshrouded him.

Unfortunately those aren't Keitarou's thoughts, but mine. Whether he seeks to kill me or not, I already know I've failed in almost every single objective. Only, if I'm going to be killed for it, then I'm going to make sure my death is useful where my life has not been. And that begins here, in the hunting ground of my enemy.

He already knew that the girl who had killed Souja had been entirely lacking in reiatsu, and so although the coast appeared to be clear, he stepped out of the gate cautiously, sniffing the air for anything that seemed out of place. He had landed in the midst of a grassy meadow, broken up in the middle by an elderly tree whose roots were covered with clusters of small white daisies, and above it all hung the white disc of the moon, its glow bright enough to illuminate the surroundings in its clear silver haze. It was a peaceful scene, but Joumei knew that his entrance would not have gone undetected. Keitarou would have sensed his coming, and prepared for it accordingly, and so the open space was a curse rather than a blessing.

Foxes hide in shadow, but this place has no real shadow, not with the moon so bright and clear. The tree is the only place to hide... which means that I won't be doing much hiding there. They'll expect me to do that — but even if I drop low, this grass isn't long enough to conceal me from sight. I can suppress my reiatsu, but so long as Keitarou is inside of me, I might as well not bother.

His eyes narrowed for a moment, then he let out his breath in a rush of resignation.

Well, if I can't hide, I might as well try the opposite technique. I'll tell them that I'm here, and see what their response is.

“You have more nerve than I thought,”

The voice, soft and even, echoed out of the air and Joumei flinched, half-sure that Keitarou had made connection with his thoughts once more. There was a chuckle, then the faintest flicker of reiatsu, and the scientist materialised before him on the grass, a look of amusement and derision on his clever features.

“I wonder about your strategy, though,” he said softly, his muddy eyes glittering coldly. “Coming into the heart of my lair — what have you proven? You’ve found me — but so what? Did I bring you here to me? You can’t be sure if I did or didn’t. It would certainly be easier to kill you here, away from the protection of the shinigami... maybe this whole thing has been a lure to bring you to the Spiritless Zone.”

“If it was, it worked to my benefit, because I wanted to come here,” Joumei took a step back, his words stiff. “I told you that you wouldn’t make me kill myself. You can’t destroy a Kitsune that easily. You want me, you’ll have to kill me yourself. But I think you ought to know... that killing me won’t stop anything at all. It won’t change anything. Nobody will cry. Nobody will care. And the fight will go on exactly as it did before.”

“On the contrary,” Keitarou’s eyes narrowed to near slits. “Eradicate the Kitsune and I eradicate one big problem in my path. You’re right if you think nobody will mourn you, but your existence is enough of a nuisance to me to make me take action against you. You, and all of your kind. With your coming here, I can complete the set and move on to the next point of my plan.”

Joumei’s lips twitched into a chilly smile.

“You’re afraid of my people,” he said matter-of-factly. “I felt it, within you, when you tried to make me go over the cliff’s edge. I played your game, and you played mine. It told me enough to bring me here, but also, other things about you. Things from deeper within. The truth about your family, and the real reason you came into our earth and tried to slay us all. I know, and because I know, I don’t care if it costs my life. I’m expendable, because I know things which you don’t about why your plan is flawed.”

“I don’t have time to discuss politics with vermin,” Keitarou’s arm barely seemed to move, but somehow the glittering silver of Chudokuga’s blade was now clasped loosely between the fingers of the scientist’s right hand. “I have your soul right here, in my hand. I can pull your heart out, vessel by vessel, and you would be able to do nothing to stop me.”

His eyes blackened.

“I would like nothing better than to do that,” he murmured, “to avenge the wrong done my father, over a century ago. Or will you claim that your people did not betray him and send him to his death?”

“I don’t deny things which are probably truth,” Joumei’s fingers flickered with Kidou energy, ready to flare a barrier around his body to deflect any attempt by the sword to penetrate his chest. “The past is what it was. The present is now. The future is what you think you can control, but you’re wrong. Even your prophet can’t do that.”

“I control your future, which is all that matters right now,” Keitarou snapped, and Joumei chuckled, shaking his head.

“You already put your Bankai into me, and yet I am moving of my own will,” he said softly. “I found you because you’re inside of me and I can track back into your thoughts just as you can manipulate mine. Your shikai doesn’t work against me — we already proved that. What other weapons do you have at your disposal? I’m not going to kill myself, but I don’t see how you can kill me, either. You don’t know how to fight in the same animal way you made Hiko and I confront each other. You don’t have those skills... which puts you at a disadvantage. I came here knowing that I might die, and I don’t care if I do. Therefore you can’t scare me.”

Before Keitarou could respond, a knife came flying through the air towards them, thudding against the bark of the tall tree and missing Joumei’s ear by a bare inch. Despite himself, Joumei felt his hackles rise, a chill running down his spine as he turned to face the intruder. She was young, maybe younger than Izumi, and slightly built, but killing intent blazed from her aura, and the hatred in the depths of the blue eyes told Joumei that he had found the girl who had killed his friend.

“Get away from my father,” her words were harsh and laced with anger.

“Saki-chan.” Keitarou’s gaze flitted to his daughter. “It’s quite all right. This creature is already under my control... he won’t be able to lay a finger on me. Your skills are not needed here — go back to the others and help your brother with the village supplies.”

“I’m going nowhere,” Sakaki bristled at the dismissal, but held her ground. “I don’t care who he is or where he came from. It’s my job to kill people who intrude on our business. It’s my job to protect you and the village and everything else. Besides, I can kill him. He doesn’t even have a proper weapon — it won’t take long.”

“You killed Souja-dono,” Joumei’s eyes became slits, and Sakaki snorted derisively.

“I did, and I’d do it again,” she said bluntly. ‘He was an idiot who came to a place he wasn’t wanted — just like you. He tried to fight me, and thought he could beat me, but he failed, and so he died. See,’ she turned to Keitarou triumphantly. “I told you that I’d killed him. I told you there was a corpse! That idiot Koku might’ve taken it away somewhere, but who cares about him and them anyway? The fact is I did my job and killed an intruder, and I’ll kill this one too!”

Her sword was already drawn from the scabbard, and Joumei gazed at her, taking in the resolution in her slender frame.
The weapon is the girl, not the sword.

He frowned, trying to process the dichotomy.
A girl with no reiryoku at all, yet a killing aura enough to put an experienced fighter on his guard. Is this what you faced too, Souja-dono? I don’t know how she took you down, or what base skills she employed, but looking at her, I can believe it for the first time. This girl is a killer. She’s nothing but a killer... and that’s why she’s capable of destroying lives with such ease. It’s not about spirit power or strength, but the base instinct to slaughter those who cross her path. But wait... she said...

He raised his gaze to Keitarou, eying him thoughtfully.

“You haven’t told her?” she asked softly. “Your own daughter, and she doesn’t know? I’m surprised. Even your own kin — you don’t trust them with the truth?”

“Truth?” Keitarou arched an eyebrow, and he moved to rest a hand on Sakaki’s shoulder. “Truth is a subjective word, depending on the person speaking. Truth itself is often a lie, cloaked in better colours. I won’t be lectured on it by the spawn of a family that abetted my Father’s death.”

“Let me kill him, Otousama,” Sakaki’s voice became slightly plaintive, the sullen note of the teenager creeping into her words. “I can, and I’ll gut him good. Koku isn’t here to get in the way this time. I’ll do it. There’s plenty of space here, and he won’t be able to hide from me.”

Keitarou hesitated for a moment, then he released his hold on her shoulder, and Sakaki burst forward, the razor sharp edge of her blade thrust out towards Joumei’s torso as though she intended to slice him open with her very first swing. Joumei jumped back, fumbling at his belt for his own dagger, but Sakaki smashed it out of his hand with the swing of her weapon, bearing down on him with a triumphant glint in her eyes.

“Your friend Souja at least had some will to fight back,” she taunted, as he ducked out of her way. Strands of silver hair fell to the ground, telling him how close he had come to being properly cut, and Sakaki laughed, driving forth once more without even a second of hesitation to draw breath. Joumei dropped to the ground, rolling across the grass and scrabbling for the hilt of his own dagger, only just managing to grasp hold of it in time to push back a decided thrust towards his throat.

“That’s it. Fight me,” Sakaki goaded him, the glitter of the predator bright in her eyes, and Joumei gritted his teeth, using the dusty blade to counter the savage swings. She was still toying with him, yet he could tell that the intent was real, and with a jolt he realised that the Sekkiseki dust that still lingered on his body and his weapon would have no effect on this attacker.

An assailant without spirit power shouldn’t be underestimated. Just because she couldn’t be a shinigami or live in Seireitei doesn’t mean she can’t cause significant harm to those who can. You learned that the hard way, Souja-dono, and now I look like doing so too.

His fingers glittered with Kidou, and he thrust his hand forward, muttering the words for a deflection technique. It glanced off Sakaki’s blade, pushing her back just long enough for him to scramble to his feet, putting a foot or two more space between them as he weighed up his chances.

Kitsune don’t learn to fight like shinigami do. All I learned I learned from playing with Souja-dono... and it’s not enough.

“You fight like him,” Sakaki twitched her sword from right hand to left and back to right, eying him in the same way a hunting hawk would size up a mouse, and Joumei was struck by the resemblance she bore to the Clansfolk he had always served. This realisation unnerved him, and he swallowed hard, understanding anew the root cause of Sakaki’s savagery.

She’s an Endou, but she lacks a way in which to manage it. Hirata-sama’s hawk is legendary, but he gained control over it. Others have been controlled by their spiritual partners, and have become ruthless killers. But this one, it’s all her own. She is the killer. She doesn’t need the sword’s spirit to influence her temperament. It was born into her. She’s the zanpakutou’s desire to hunt in human form... born to kill and maim and nothing else. That’s why she’s such a deadly weapon. And this is a fight to the death, just like yours was, Souja-dono.

Sakaki launched herself at him again, and this time Joumei was ready, the spell already glittering around his fingers as he prepared to thrust her back with some force, but, to his dismay, he felt his arm forcibly drop down by his side, the burgeoning spell flickering and dissipating into the atmosphere. He glanced up in dismay, seeing the amused smile on Keitarou's features, and cold dread spread through his body as he understood.

You're not going to let me kill your daughter. You'll let her play with me, but if I do anything that looks threatening, you'll stop it before it begins. You're toying with me too. I saw into your thoughts, but you saw a little bit into mine. Fighting like this, it's impossible to keep you out. You know what I'm planning, and you'll intervene. You'll make sure I can't win.

"I told you, Kitsune, your death here suits me fine," As though hearing his thoughts — which he probably had — Keitarou spoke, his smooth, even tones grating against Joumei's nerves. "Sakaki wants to play, so I'll let her play. But I'm not fool enough to let you hurt her. I don't mind by what means you lose your life. I'm sure I told you that I wouldn't stop until you were dead... death by Sakaki's blade suits me just as well."

"He's no competition," Sakaki snorted. "He can't do a thing to hurt me, Tousama. He barely knows how to hold a weapon, and he can't match my swings."

"Well, I don't suppose he was trained by an Onmitsukidou to hold his blade," Keitarou's words were rich with irony. "How the foxes have fallen. I was imagining a deadly enemy... and instead I find a fool who can't even avenge the death of his friend."

Fool? Yes. Probably that's true.

Joumei fought to move his heavy body once more from Sakaki's path, but this time the weapon slashed into his upper left arm, swinging back across to score a matching wound across his upper chest. He yelped, jumping back and guarding his upper body with his good right arm, but Sakaki simply laughed, adjusting the hold of her weapon and using it to hook beneath the dagger Joumei held, sending it flying across the grass a second time.

"This is boring," she mocked. "Souja was much more interesting to fight than you. He at least tried to keep his life. You don't care enough about yours, and it makes it dull."

"Finish it, Saki-chan," Keitarou turned away, gesturing to the bloody Kitsune with a flick of his left hand. "We're wasting time here, and there's more than enough to do."

"Yes, sir!" Sakaki surged forward anew, blade gleaming in the moonlight, and Joumei felt his entire body paralyze, Keitarou's influence seeping into every nook and crevasse, overloading his nerves and tendons and rooting him to the spot. Sakaki's weapon bore down on him, ready to sever his jugular, and fear lurched in Joumei's heart. I can't die yet. Souja-dono, I promised I'd avenge you. I came here to do that. I came here, and that means... that means...

He drew ragged, heavy breaths into his lungs, forcing himself to stay calm.

He feeds off my fear and reads my thoughts because I can't hold them back. I need to focus. I need to... I need to... I need to find his fear. I need to bring that forth, and then...

"If you kill me, it won't protect your visionary!" he exclaimed, forcing the words through rebellious vocal chords as the shadow of Sakaki's weapon began to fall towards him. "If you kill me, others will take my place. You're afraid that a fox will hurt him, but you've misjudged! I'm not the last of my kind — and there are other foxes by the prophet's side!"

As soon as the words had left his lips, he felt the hold over his body slacken, the sudden jolt of release giving him the time to sidestep away from Sakaki's swing, reaching up to grab the blade with his left hand. It sliced through the skin of his palm, but he held it firm anyway, shaking it free from its wielder's startled hold.

"Hey, what are you..."

"I'm not the only fox living in Seireitei, and it's not me you're hunting, nor Hiko," Joumei spoke in low tones, glancing across at Keitarou and seeing the stricken expression cross the muddy brown eyes. "I disbanded my people long before you came to hunt us. I sent them far and wide. They're all over Seireitei, now. You could never possibly track them down. They might even be in the Gotei. Killing me does nothing to save your prophet!"

"Papa?" Sakaki faltered, apparently registering the change in Keitarou's demeanour, and Joumei took advantage of her momentary lapse to thrust his hands forth against her chest, energy glittering from his fingers a third time.

"Hadou no Sanjuu Ichi. Shakkahou!" he exclaimed, and, as he felt the burning hot flames of Kidou sear through his scorched fingers, he almost thought he could sense the fragments of Souja's spirit on the wind, watching him and willing him on. The illusion gave him strength, and he redoubled the energy, resolution glittering in his silver eyes.

The flames exploded through Sakaki's upper body, blazing a hole through her chest and reducing her heart to ashes on the spot. She fell, silent and stunned to the ground, a crumpled heap against the fresh green grass, and Joumei took a step back from his handiwork, taking a deep breath into his lungs to steady himself. The whole area smelt of scorched flesh, his and hers, and in the haze of smoke that now separated them, he raised his gaze to Keitarou's horrified ones.

"A life for a life," he said coldly. "You see, you're not as smart as you think you are. Your daughter is dead because you make stupid decisions and assumptions. This world isn't your world — it's changed and moved on. People have accepted the Kitsune into communities, they've mixed and settled beyond the confines of that dirty, darkened mine. Who knows where they've all gone? Certainly not me."

His eyes narrowed.

"You killed my friend, I killed your daughter, that makes us even," he added. "The future you're so afraid of, its still to come. You can't prevent it — no matter what you do to me."

"Sakaki!"

A sudden flare of energy prevented Keitarou from responding, and Joumei found himself thrust back against the trunk of the tree with a thud, sliding down alongside where Sakaki's original dagger was still embedded.

"Katsura!" Keitarou's composure had apparently been shattered by Sakaki's death, but at the appearance of this fresh burst of energy, he responded, anxiety in his tones as he fought to reassert control. It was not Joumei, though, but the newcomer on the scene that had attracted the scientist's attention, and, at the sudden, oppressive waves of rage-driven reiatsu, the Kitsune leader could not keep the fear from flooding through his own body.

The intruder was older than Sakaki, perhaps Souja's age, with tousled dark hair and blue eyes that had been darkened by thunderclouds of fury. He paused for a moment by the spreadeagled body of the fallen teenager, moving to brush a gentle finger against her cheek, and then he turned, fixing his gaze on Joumei.

"You did this?" the words were soft, but there was no keeping the rage from his tones, and Joumei brought his hands together in front of his body in readiness to flare a protective barrier, defiance in his own expression. He nodded.

"She killed someone I cared about," he said flatly. "You can consider me her karma."

“Karma?” The newcomer, who Keitarou had called Katsura, got slowly to his feet, dusting Sakaki’s blood from his fingers, and turning to advance on his opponent. “Then let me introduce you to some karma, too. You killed my sister. You can’t think for a minute that I’ll let that pass.”

“Katsura, stop it,” Keitarou’s words came a surprise to both Joumei and the interloper, who glanced at his father in disbelief.

“You expect me to stand back and let this go?” he demanded.

“There’s a greater danger,” Keitarou’s tones were soft, and Joumei knew that he had read enough from the Kitsune’s own thought processes to know that his words had contained truth. “Killing this one won’t destroy the threat, and unless we act... unless we do...”

“Sakaki is my sister,” Katsura’s words were low-spoken. ‘If I don’t give her justice, what other justice is there for her? Do you think I’m just going to let this one escape, after doing that,’ he thrust his hand out at the charred corpse, “to a child?”

“A child who murdered innocent people!” Joumei spat back, using the embedded dagger to pull his aching body to his feet. Katsura’s reiatsu was oppressive and intimidating, but despite it, the man’s words had sparked his temper. “A child who killed healers, and who killed a man who would never have raised a weapon to a girl under normal circumstances? Your sister is dead because of things she did!”

“And you’ll die for the things you’ve done,” Katsura’s eyes were ice cold.

“Katsura, I’ve told you once!” Keitarou’s voice was impatient, but Katsura shook his head, not taking his gaze off Joumei for an instant.

“I’ll avenge Sakaki,” he said blackly. “You were the one who told me that a big brother protects his siblings.”

“If you make another move, I’ll use Kidou and pull you back by force,” Keitarou’s words were even, and despite himself, Katsura faltered.

“Otousama?”

“Let it go,” Keitarou spoke quietly.

“But!”

Joumei did not wait to hear any more of the dispute. Using the break in the reiatsu pressure, he slipped into shunpo, forcing his heavy, weary body through the Spiritless Zone atmosphere until he was sure he was far from the field and it's grisly contents. Keitarou's judgement had surprised him, but deep down he understood its rationale.

He knew I told him the truth. And now, having his power inside of me... he thinks he can use it to find the real threat. Which means...

He glanced at his hands, then,
I shall go back to Seireitei, and hand myself in for the vigilante murder of a suspect, as well as the illegal manipulation of a Senkaimon to the Spiritless Zone. I will tell Hirata-sama everything, and then I will submit myself to execution. I will not see my sister or any other Kitsune again. I will not give him what he wants... but while I have life, I shall use it as wisely as I can. Even if it's just a brief respite... I have to do what I can.

"Why did you stop me!"

Back in the field, Katsura wheeled on his father, distress and frustration in his blue eyes. "He killed Sakaki! He hurt your daughter! Why would you let him go unscathed?"

"He's not unscathed," Keitarou held up Chudokuga, tilting it slightly so that the moonlight caught off the silver blade. "My Bankai lurks within him. I can monitor him, and Katsura, right now we need that source of information. I've learned something new, and it's changed things. I need him alive."

"And what of Saki-chan?" Tears glittered on Katsura's lashes, and he dropped down at his sister's side, brushing the waves of dark hair from her face and gently closing her eyes. "What about my sister, Otousama? Are you just discarding her, after all she's done for you? For all of us?"

"Your sister's foolish acts led to this," Keitarou sighed, replacing his weapon into his obi and rubbing his brow as though he could physically smooth out the wrinkle lines that crossed his brow. "Don't argue with me, Katsura. There are losses and gains in war, and Sakaki acquitted herself as a warrior should. If you truly want to avenge her, you have to stop focusing on the individual problems and settle on the bigger picture. We've taken no losses till now... Sakaki is the first, and I should like to make her the last."

"And what of Kurotsuchi?" Katsura demanded, slipping his fingers around his dead sister's and squeezing her hand loosely. "What of Koku, who's disappeared without a trace? What of them, Otousama? I never thought you'd discard Koku, of all people, and..."

"Kurotsuchi is probably dead," Keitarou admitted, "but his loss is nothing to us. He had already exceeded his usefulness, and garnered too much interest from the Gotei. You told me that yourself, and you were right.”

He glanced at Sakaki’s body, then sighed again.

“Her too,” he added. “The Gotei knew of her by name and sight. The shinigami she killed got back there alive. He gave them enough for that silver-haired fool to come here and find her. I told you once before that mistakes made could cost us all dear. Sakaki paid for that with her life. You were luckier — but you can’t say you’ve made no errors so far.”

“Sakaki’s life isn’t just a piece in a battle plan,” Katsura objected, getting to his feet and dusting down his clothing. “I won’t stand for it, Otousama. I don’t care what she did — she was my sister. There’s only us to find justice for her — who else will? She’s fought for you the whole way, and now... if you won’t avenge her, then I will. I’ll find that silver-haired man and I’ll slit his throat.”

“And if doing so resulted in your death?” Keitarou demanded. “He’ll go to Seireitei. I’ve picked up on that from his thoughts — he’s heading in search of a Senkaimon and he’ll go back to report to the Endou. If you follow him, it will be the end for you. You won’t have a place to come back to — I won’t take you back, if you choose to defy my instructions. Stay here and help your mother prepare Sakaki for burial. It’s seeming more and more likely that we’ll have to breach Seireitei before long, but it’s not time yet, and if you go now...”

“Koku’s there too, isn’t he?” Katsura cut across his father, a dark look in his eyes. “He’s there, because he’s not here, but you’ve left him alone. Have you abandoned him too?”

“I wouldn’t ever abandon Koku,” Keitarou said gravely. “Our lives depend on it, yours as well as everyone’s here. I’m monitoring the situation and he’s safe enough so far. But in order to retrieve him, I have to have the Gotei taken care of. And if you fly in there now, guns blazing... when we don’t know what kind of threats are there...”

“Right now, I care about Sakaki,” Katsura snapped back grimly. “I’m going to Seireitei, Father. I’m going to find him and pull his heart from his chest myself, the way he burned a hole in Sakaki’s. I’m going to show him that my family can’t be treated like that. I’ll kill anyone who gets in my way. If it kills me, so be it. I’m decided. I’m going.”

“If you go, there won’t be a place to come back to,” Keitarou repeated. “If you go, you put us all at risk. It will be on your head — I won’t take you back a second time.”

Katsura frowned, gazing down at Sakaki's body, then he shrugged.

"It doesn't matter," he said softly. "I don't believe in all the things you do, Otousama, but I do believe in protecting my family. As the eldest, that's my job. I'll avenge Sakaki, even if it kills me. I'll kill shinigami, if I have to. If they catch me, I'll tell them nothing about you and nothing about anything. But this is my choice. You won't change my mind."

Author's Note:

A lot seemed to happen in this chapter o.O.

My writing of this has been slowing right down lately, with the hunt for a job and other stuff pressing on me. I went back the other day and read through some of the reviews for Maki, and the support really touched me all over again. I'm pretty sure at this point that (yes I keep saying it but this time I do mean it) Sukuse will be the last Juu-Shun based fic I write, but re-reading the reviews have reaffirmed my determination to finish this story and do it properly. Usually when I post chapters, I'm about 15 ahead of what I'm posting, but this time around I'm only writing chapters a few ahead of this one. There's a good chance this might mean updates will slow down, but if they do, please keep poking me and make sure I don't give up ;) You people are seriously the ones who keep me writing, even when everything else is crazy.

Sasakibe Choujirou Tadaoki.

So I've been wanting to do this for a while, and by this I mean involving Sasakibe in the plot of this story. I had dabbled with the idea of doing it in Meifu, but hadn't been completely sure of just how old he was, so I played safe, and left the matter open. Now we know for certain that he is of the right vintage to be here, well, here he is.

I wanted from the moment Byakuya spoke the eulogy to include him under his real name, too.

Historically, it was not uncommon for samurai — or nobility, or others of status of some kind — to be referred to by a name which was neither their family name nor their given name. A famous example of this is, of course, Minamoto no Kurou Yoshitsune, who is known by his given name, Yoshitsune in modern times, but in historical documents is often known as "Kurou". Kurou means ninth son, and Yoshitsune was the ninth son of the Minamoto at the time. Therefore this 'nickname' was his "rank" within his family. Not all nicknames are like this, however — his cousin, Yoshinaka, was known by the name "Kiso" and his other brother, Yoritomo was known as "Kamakura-dono" (Lord Kamakura) because of the places from which they came or governed.

Taking it back to Bleach, Yamamoto Genryuusai Shigekuni and Sasakibe Choujirou Tadaoki are the same kind of names. Shigekuni and Tadaoki are archetypal traditional Japanese male names which you would probably not find commonly today in Japan but historically would not be out of place. When young men came of age, they were given a proper name, taking one character from the person who sponsored and oversaw that coming of age, and one other character. Both Tadaoki and Shigekuni fit this process — both are two-kanji names with specific readings familiar to an older historical period.

504 told us how Genryuusai got his name. I think most folk knew it was a nickname, but now we understand its evolution. It makes sense to consider Choujirou like this too. The characters for Choujirou are “chief” or ‘long’, “next”, and “man/person”. In 504, we got told that Sasakibe wanted to be Genryuusai’s “right hand man”. Choujirou roughly means “The main person next in line”, or Genryuusai’s right hand man. Therefore I believe it’s a nickname given to him by Genryuusai which has stuck into common parlance.

Whatever the truth of it, I wanted Sasakibe to appear here under his given name. I think it’s perfectly possible that there was a time when only Genryuusai called Sasakibe by the name Choujirou, and in the little he appeared in Bleach in modern canon, we didn’t see anyone but Genryuusai refer to him as that either. When he received that name, only Kubo knows. But Japanese names do not have middle names as we understand them, not even historically.

As a result, in this story — even if nowhere else — Sasakibe will be Tadaoki. And that’s that.

515

I had to put a note in here just to say that — without spoiling — this week’s manga chapter is the best in the arc so far, pretty much hands down. For the first time in a LONG time, Vraie is not bitching about the manga. Miracles can happen... now, if we can just have some closure for 494 please, Kubo-sensei...

46. Koku's Dream

Chapter Forty Five: Koku's Dream

“It’s getting late.”

Ketsui stifled a yawn, turning to gaze out of the window of the compact Thirteenth Division archive. The night over Seireitei was a clear one, and the moon shone brightly through the window, illuminating the grounds in a deceptively bright glow.

From her seat across the table, Izumi let out a sigh, raising her gaze from the book she had been poring over and fixing Ketsui with a look of irritation. It was true, she reflected, they had been at work in the little alcove for a good number of hours together, and it was clear from her companion’s demeanour that he was not used to spending so much time studying in this manner. For the young Kitsune, however, it was a matter of course — and, having grown up mostly beneath the ground, the passing of daylight hours meant little to her. At her expression, Ketsui offered a rueful grimace, shrugging his shoulders.

“I don’t have your concentration span,” he acknowledged sheepishly. “We have been in here since dinner, though, Ichimaru-san, and we’ve spent a good part of our time going over the same few figures. If we don’t call it a night soon, I might fall asleep in here and that will be hard to explain to Fukutaichou tomorrow when I miss morning drill.”

Izumi closed the book with a snap, resting her chin on her hands and surveying her companion critically. He did look tired, she reflected grudgingly. Truthfully, she had expected him to flag before this but, as they had spread the notes from Mareiko across the surface of one of the more secluded desks within the small archive, she had been surprised at how quickly he had picked up both her methods and the shorthand style in which the original notes had been scrawled. Izumi had no words with which to explain the various theories and systems of calculation, yet as he had watched her work, he had quickly grasped her line of thought, occasionally making suggestions that had made her stop and stare at him in surprise.

I don’t really believe that intelligence is inherited. It’s more a case of hard work and dedication.

The girl’s silver eyes narrowed thoughtfully.

Maybe I'm wrong, though. Perhaps there's something in the Urahara genes that I didn't understand before.

"Ichimaru-san?" At the intensity of her gaze, Ketsui frowned, looking confused. "Is there something wrong? Obviously you've a lot more experience in this than me, but I did promise Taichou that I'd look out for you, and so... well... I don't want to leave you here working on your own. It is late, and, well, the division has had unwanted visitors in the last few days. It's not impossible that they were looking for you, and didn't find you where they thought you'd be."

Izumi's eyes became slits as she remembered Juushirou's report about her brother and Hiko, and then she sighed, rubbing her temples. He's right, damn him. But I'm so close to breaking through to the core of this. These notes are so well produced, I almost missed it, but there's a serious calculation flaw in one line of logarithms and I wanted to pan it all out properly before I went to bed. I'll probably dream about it, if I don't, and it isn't as though I can ask him for his thoughts.

She glared across the table, suddenly resentful at Ketsui's ignorance.

If he could understand me as easily as my brother, it would be so much easier.

"All right, what did I say?" Ketsui held up his hands in mock-surrender, and despite herself, Izumi started, looking at him in surprise. "You were glaring at me as though you wanted me anywhere but here. I thought I'd been quite helpful — was I wrong? Because my skills aren't necessarily tied to the academic, you know. I'm good at swords and stuff, but that's because that's my background. I haven't had any training in this, so I'm trying to pick up what I can as you race along."

You're wrong.

Izumi processed this with a weary sigh.

You're so stupid you don't even realise it yourself, yet you're actually very bright. I don't understand that contradiction, but it's true all the same. You're completely different from your brother. Maybe he's the showy one, but you're far more useful and I... I trust your motives a lot more. Yet you say such idiotic things. If you were a Kitsune, I'd slap sense into you, but you're not... and I don't suppose you'd understand, even if I tried to tell you. It's frustrating... dealing with someone who has the brain but none of the knowledge. It's such a waste. I don't understand shinigami.

She scooped up the book she had been reading, returning it to the pile of others at her right hand. Slowly and reluctantly she began to gather up Mareiko's paperwork, and Ketsui offered her a rueful grin, moving to help.

"We can come back to this," he promised. "I know it's probably extra hassle having me around, but... Ichimaru-san?" as Izumi paused, glancing again at the sheet of paper she held in her hands. Her brow creased, her fingers gripping the sheet more tightly as she ran her gaze over the list of figures again.

There was definitely something not right, and yet...

"What's up?" Ketsui's voice from behind her made her jump, for she had been so deep in concentration that she hadn't noticed him get to his feet, coming to stand at her shoulder in order that he could read the document more clearly. She waved the sheet in his face, frustration clear in her expression, and Ketsui frowned, taking it and glancing over it.

"This sheet bothers you, huh?" he asked softly, and Izumi nodded.

"But you can't figure out why?"

Izumi shook her head, her eyes glittering with annoyance, and Ketsui offered her a sheepish grin.

"Well, one thing I've learned about you, Ichimaru-san, is that you understand all of this a lot more than I ever will," he said honestly. "If you say something's up with these numbers, I believe you. But I don't think we're going to get anything done about it this evening. It's a matter of... hang on a minute."

He frowned, setting the sheet back down on the paper and running his finger down the list of figures. Izumi stared at him incredulously, half-wondering if he'd had some kind of arithmetic epiphany, but as she watched, Ketsui's finger slipped from the numbers to the list of terms below, his eyes narrowing as he processed each one carefully. At length he shook his head.

"I don't know what the calculations say or don't say," he said at length. "It's beyond my level of education in all respects. But I wonder... about this. I don't know if it means anything or it doesn't, but... if those were really the spell traces discovered on the Senkaimonin the Rukon, well... it seems odd to me."

Izumi's brows knitted together, and she took the sheet back, poring over it once more.

"I don't know how much you know Kidou," Ketsui continued, "and I'm not the best person in the division at it, ever. But I did pass it at the Academy, and I have had training since I've joined here. I was never so bad at the theory behind all these things — spells and technique and most of all, reiryoku distribution. So even though I might not be able to fire all of those spells like that practically, it seems like... an odd combination to me. I mean, if you wanted to conceal where you were going to, surely you'd use some kind of barrier combination in with that mix? Perhaps I'm crazy, but... don't you think that it's a bit, well, showy for a gate that's meant as an escape route?"

Izumi's eyes widened, and she raised her gaze, staring at him in disbelief. Ketsui scratched his head, looking awkward.

"Or maybe I just don't know anything about science," he conceded. "Or Kidou application. And I'm tired. It's fine. Ignore me if it's not important."

He really is an idiot. An intelligent idiot, but an idiot.

Izumi rolled her eyes, turning her attention back to the sheet of paper.

He's right, though. I've been looking at it scientifically, trying to make it add up, but it's far more fundamental than that. The spells used to seal the gate are all spells which utilise particular facets of reiryoku. They all leave a definite trace of the person who fired them, and there's no attempt to cloak it. More, there's no spell to seal the gate from prying eyes. The shinigami were able to draw on the emissions from the Senkaimon and deduce that Keitarou had opened it, and that he'd gone to the Real World. One of those slips might be considered an error of judgement if the enemy was in a hurry, but even if they were... this enemy doesn't seem like he would make two such basic mistakes. In which case, we shouldn't think of them as mistakes at all... but... lures?

"Ichimaru-san?" Ketsui gazed at her quizzically, and Izumi tapped her index finger against the sheet of paper absently.

These figures were recorded by the Head of the Urahara in the Rukon, and it took him to the Real World. He saw Keitarou there. Those things Ukitake-dono reported to me because he thought them important to my study. But he attacked my brother after that, which means his movement is fluid. And if the Urahara head saw him in the Real World, then almost certainly he isn't using that place as a permanent base. This gate, all of it, its designed as a diversion. He wanted to bring the Urahara head to the Real World, so he could show himself, and distract the shinigami in that direction whilst he... did something else. But what? Attacking Oniisama and the mine can't be the end of it. It has to be something more. Something bigger. Something that requires the shinigami to be away from here...

Her eyes became huge, and she grabbed Ketsui by the sleeve, giving his arm a little tug. She flickered her fingers in an automatic attempt to communicate, but at her action Ketsui frowned, shaking his head.

“I can’t read your signs, Ichimaru-san. Whatever it is, I can’t understand.”

Wretched stupid pointless shinigami and their worthless education systems.

Izumi bit back her impatience, instead reaching for a sheet of fresh paper and her writing brush. The ink stone had almost dried in the gentle warmth of the summer evening, but she scrubbed the brush against it anyway, drawing a ring in the centre of the paper and dividing it into three parts. Ketsui stared at her, bemused, but she ignored his expression, instead focusing on her diagram. The brush tip was too scratchy and dry now to write proper kanji, and in any case, Izumi wasn’t sure she wanted a written record of her suspicions, but nonetheless she persevered, scraping a single character into each of the three divisions, then jabbing at them with her finger.

Ketsui furrowed his brow, trying to make out the haphazard kanji, and Izumi prodded each section in turn once again, gazing at him expectantly.

“Ru... Sei... Gen.” Ketsui’s eyes narrowed, then, “Rukongai, Seireitei, Real World?”

Well, at least he’s literate. Thank goodness for small mercies.

Izumi sighed, nodding her head. She ran her finger around the outside of the circle, then with her hands indicated the opening and shutting of a Senkaimon. Pointing to the Rukon segment, she made the gesture again, then pointed to the Real World. At length she repeated the action a third time, this time placing her finger on the middle segment marked with the kanji for Seireitei.

He probably won’t follow, but I have to make him understand. If I don’t, how will I make anyone else?

Ketsui did not respond immediately, and Izumi glanced at him, expecting to see a look of complete confusion on his fair features. As she met his expression, however, she was taken aback by the look of horror that had surfaced in the man’s pale eyes.

“You think he’s not there at all, don’t you?” he whispered, grabbing up the diagram and running his finger over it. “You think it’s too obvious — the science from the Gate is too good. You think he’s moving from place to place, and that we just haven’t anticipated his real plan of action yet.”

Izumi nodded her head, relieved, and Ketsui’s eyes darkened.

“In that case, the Kidou is a distraction, and so the use of it makes sense,” he murmured. “If Keitarou’s not really in the Real World, then he’s anywhere but. There are plenty of rumours circulating, especially since it was decided that certain divisions were going to be deployed there to hunt him, so the stories about Nagesu-sama seeing him there must be true. And if they’re true, then... probably that’s the place they’re least likely to find him.”

Izumi nodded again, and Ketsui sighed, dropping the diagram back down onto the table and moving to gather up the remaining sheets of paper.

“It’s late,” he said quietly. “Tomorrow, we ought to report this to Taichou, but there’s nothing we can do right now. The squads are still preparing, so we’ve time. I might be jumping to conclusions, but if Keitarou wants to act against the shinigami somehow, he’s set the decoy for a purpose. If he wants to reduce our numbers here and weaken our forces, then he’ll not make any move until he’s sure the decoy has worked. We have a little time... tomorrow we’ll talk to Taichou and see what he thinks. All right?”

He eyed her keenly.

“I have understood you right, haven’t I?”

Izumi nodded her head, holding out her hands for the science notes, and Ketsui obediently handed them over.

“You think Keitarou’s ultimate target is here, and that all of this is designed to that end,” he observed, “and I think you’re probably right. In the Rukon, he attacked healers when they were split up into two groups, using different agents, right? It’s not impossible that he’d try the same strategy again, only this time on the core of Seireitei and on a much bigger scale. We know he’s not operating alone, yet the allies we know he has... weren’t sighted in the Real World. That means they must be somewhere else, even if Keitarou himself is — or was — in the Real World. So, even if my opinion isn’t worth a lot in this, I’ll back you up. Even if it means taking on the views of the Captains en masse. If squads go to the Real World and deplete our forces, then clearly we’re under threat. And it’s not then just a case of your safety, or Koku’s, but everyone’s.”

Koku...

Izumi frowned, moving towards the window as something odd assailed her senses.

That’s another thing. Another anomaly that I can’t account for. That boy... it’s almost as if... but is that possible?

She pressed her lips together, considering the possibilities.

I don't have any evidence, so there's not much I can do. Not much... but something. I don't like the feel of that reiatsu. Something is afoot... something I should be able to stop. Oniisama said I should be of use here in whatever way I can — so I suppose that's what I ought to do, tiresome as it might be.

Without a backward glance at her companion, she pushed open the window further, deftly leaping over the sill onto the soft grass below. Behind her, Ketsui let out an exclamation, but she ignored him, hurrying across the grounds towards the door of the main building. It was locked, but she quickly manipulated the fastening open, slipping inside the darkened barracks. Ketsui's reiatsu flickered at the edge of her awareness, and she knew he was not far in her wake, but she did not slow down. Instead she fixed her senses on the alien flare of energy, pinpointing its exact location.

There. Maybe I need evidence to prove my suspicions, but I don't need anything to keep matters from getting out of control. That reiatsu shouldn't be allowed to flow through a place like this, and I intend to stop it. Right or wrong, I have Oniisama's orders to think of, and they surpass everything else. If he says the shinigami are our allies, then they are... which means using whatever means necessary to clamp down on anything that's not.

Her eyes were open, her limbs spreadeagled on the ground, as though she had fallen from a height and landed in an ungainly position against the grass. Her lips were parted, forming an 'o' of surprise, yet her skin was ash pale, the blood already draining from her body. There was no lifebeat. Just those eyes, accusing and frightened, a young girl not yet an adult, with the glint of a killer lurking in their depths. The light in the eyes was fading now, making them appear more grey than blue. Grey like the clouded sky of the Rukon.

There was anger. The atmosphere was full of fury, rage building to a point that it was hardly possible to hold it back. Shouting voices, but words were not coherent, and a flash of images, each one disorientating and confused. Tears were falling, or was it rain from the heavy overcast sky? They were angry, that was for sure. A silver fox, something cold glinting in his eyes, stood high and proud, blood staining his fur as he gazed down at the scattered fold below. Where the girl had been, branches of pine now covered the spot, cloaking the blood and hiding the corpse from view. A shadow cast across the ground, and then, in a moment it was gone, its loss creating a sudden hollow ache.

The other images were there too, now. It was becoming harder to separate them. There was a dead girl... no, now a man, now men and women, dressed in black, their robes shredded and covered in blood. There were monsters — had the monsters killed the girl, or was that the fox? He could no longer see the animal, for it had disappeared like moonlight when the rain had begun, but all around the forestland the trees had begun to take monstrous shape, their branches reaching out like clawed hands, their wizened trunks the uneven deformity of an unmistakably Hollow mask. Glints of light, like sharp teeth cut through them, dark energy surrounding them as they fell like destringed puppets onto the floor. They did not rise again, but he could not see their faces. They were nothing, not even dust — just dead for whom he could not feel anything at all.

And then in the rain, there were voices. Two living souls — both robed in black and white. One wore a white coat, like that which he had seen before, but where? He was not sure, and the symbol on the back appeared no more than a rain-smudged blur. There was blood on the cloak and on the blade, but it was the other whose body was enveloped in darkness. In his hand, the hilt of a weapon, yet his fingers were breaking and twisting, his expression one of desperation and terror as his features began to morph into something else. He was fighting, yet it was a battle he could not win. It was a battle to the death, and like the others, he would be felled.

There was a jerk, and suddenly the perspective changed. He was inside the shinigami, now... inside his head, inside his eyes, merging with his very consciousness. The shinigami's feelings flooded through him, stifling his own objective perspective and drawing him deeper in until he and the shinigami were one and the same.

It was still raining, the blood and water mingling to form a grotesque kind of swamp beneath the feet of the two men. Was it sweat or was it rainwater that made the shinigami's hair slick against his cheeks? Was it tears or the inclement weather that had blurred his vision, making it hard to see the enemy's features through the haze?

The sky had never been this heavy before in all the times they had come here, yet even a zanpakutou could not cut through the thickness of the atmosphere. The shinigami drew breath with difficulty into ravaged lungs, his fingers slipping slightly against the hilt of his weapon as his opponent lurched towards him once again. Something silver wobbled through the air towards him — a swing but not a swing, as the weapon faltered and slid beneath the enemy's thickening, calloused fingers. The eyes, gleaming and red bulged from sockets too small to hold them, and a tell-tale sheen of white had begun to ooze from the other's pores, slipping over his nose and mouth until all that remained was that vivid, crimson gaze.

"Stop this!"

The shinigami found his voice, forcing back his wet hair from his face with his left hand, whilst parrying the weak, drunken shot with the sword in his right. It jerked and twisted against the hand too clumsy to hold it, falling with a soft thud onto the muddy ground, yet the wielder paid it no mind. Instead an ungodly screech emitted from beneath the bare white surface of what had now hardened into a mask, pocked and uneven as it tried to harden under the relentless assault of the rain. The blood on the enemy's clothes and arms seemed in complete contrast to the sudden waxiness of his skin, and he launched his body forward, arms outstretched, yearning for the kill. His fingernails scraped against the white fabric of his opponent's haori, leaving bloody prints across the sodden cloth.

The shinigami's blade swung down, almost by instinct rather than by design. With a single sweep it sliced through the corner of the mask, sending cracks through every corner of it and causing bits to fragment and break away. Pale lips became visible, moving with difficulty as though fighting against some unknown force. There was a moment of restraint, as the crimson eyes dulled, and through those chapped, colourless lips came words.

"Help... me."

The tones were hoarse and strained, each syllable squeezed through vocal chords which were no longer responsive to their owner's instructions. In the pall of fighting, a clubbed hand reached out, in desperation, towards the other's blade, and despite himself the shinigami took a step back, no longer wondering if it was rain or tears that saturated his lashes.

"Heiji," he murmured, and at the sound of his name, the creature's body lurched up, true agony in the crimson eyes. For a moment they met gazes, then another blood-curdling shriek broke forth from the pale lips, and the moment of sanity was broken. As the toxic level of reiatsu whipped around them both, a mixture of rage and then despair thudded over the shinigami's body.

Help me.

The enemy's words resonated against his senses, over and over, in time with the beat of the rain. As he raised his sword, defending himself from a clawed swipe with only just enough conviction to push the attacker away, he understood what his companion had truly been asking for.

He glanced at his sword, and a ripple of regret washed through its spirit in answer to his question. Was it the overcast sky reflecting on its surface, or had the silver of the blade dulled slightly, as though going into mourning for an ally well loved?

Summoning his resolve, the shinigami hardened his heart, forcing himself to see only a beast before him, lurching and in pain. It was a Hollow. It was his enemy. To kill it was his duty. It must end now.

The blade came down in a decisive arc this time, sweeping through shell and bone to the soft tissue beneath, and in the cascading spray of blood, there was a bloodcurdling scream of pain and despair as the creature fell to the ground. It writhed and moaned against the mud for a moment, and the shinigami did not hesitate, striking cleanly through the jugular. The moans became gurgles, bubbles forming against the pale lips, then the body lay still. Bit by bit the shell coating began to fall away from the hands and arms, and, as the shinigami stepped over the body towards the head, he realised that it had not been a creature at all.

It had been Sakanoue Heiji, the young man he had mentored and looked on as a son, who now lay dead in the Rukon mud before him. A Sakanoue who had been hurt beyond all recognition, tainted and broken beyond saving. A Sakanoue who had begged him for help... A Sakanoue who he had killed with his own sword.

Discarding the weapon as though it were made of burning metal, Atsushi cradled the broken body desperately in his arms, searching in vain for the signs of life he knew were no longer there. Even the final rattle in the man's throat had dissipated into silence, causing a dull hush to fall over the scene, broken only by the splashing drops of the rain which was beginning at last to abate.

Slowly and painstakingly, Atsushi broke the remainder of the mask that still covered the upper part of his protege's face, gently smoothing the flakes of white away from his Vice Captain's skin. The eyes were still open, but no longer that gleaming red and, with a heavy heart, Atsushi closed them, gazing for a moment at the body with hate and grief surging through his veins.

"I won't forgive you," he muttered, reaching for the bloodstained sword with renewed resolve as he got to his feet, swinging around in search of his target. "I won't forgive you for this,

Kusakawa!"

Koku's eyes snapped open, his breath coming in short, panicked gasps, and he grabbed hold of his blanket, for a moment too disorientated and frightened to realise where he was. He struggled into a sitting position, the images still vivid in his thoughts, and as he did so, he realised that he was crying, the shinigami's lingering sense of grief causing the tears to stream down his cheeks.

"Sakaki," he murmured, then, "Saka... noue?"

"Koku?" Tsunemori's voice came out of the darkness, anxious and uncertain, and the next minute the room was bathed in a soft Kidou glow as the young officer activated the lamp. Though the light had shown him that whatever he had seen had not been real, the sudden brightness disorientated Koku's scattered wits, and he closed his eyes, half afraid that his feelings would overwhelm him and make him nauseous once again. If that happened, he knew, Tsunemori would likely panic and send for more help, and for Koku, whose senses were already on overload following his nightmare, the idea of anyone else entering the small chamber was enough to make his head throb even more. Tsunemori's presence was gently controlled and unthreatening, but at that moment it felt to Koku as though his companion was flaring his reiryoku at the highest level possible.

"Are you all right?" Tsunemori was beside the bed now, and Koku forced his head up to meet the other's concerned gaze.

"A bad dream," he managed. "Just... that."

"A dream?" Tsunemori frowned, then, "Do you want me to send for someone?"

"It's just a dream," Koku shook his head, then regretted it, as his world swam and his brain protested. "I'm fine. I'll sleep again. I'm sorry."

"You look really pale," Tsunemori observed. "Taichou said that we were to keep an eye on you... if you're unwell, I'm supposed to send for Edogawa-san."

"I told you, it was just a... a dream," Koku protested, but Tsunemori shook his head.

"I'm going to do as I'm told," he said firmly. "I'll be back presently. She's only a few doors down, and I'm sure she'll be able to help. Bad dreams are one of the things she and Taichou both told me to look out for... and orders are orders."

With that he was gone, hurrying down the hall to wake Mitsuki, and Koku shivered, foreboding flooding through his body. He gazed at the Kidou lamp, seeing the silhouettes of the fighting men once more brought to life in the flickering glow, then the broken body of Sakaki, and his heart lurched into his throat as once more he felt the overpowering sense of another's rage.

Sakaki is dead.

With one eye to the door, he pushed back his blankets, pulling himself unsteadily to his feet.

Katsura... I have to stop him. I have to stop him, before he... before he can't be stopped. I have to find him and make him listen.

His vision danced and swayed again, making him feel even more seasick, but urgency added to his determination. Tsunemori would doubtless be back in seconds with Mitsuki in tow, and then she would sedate him as she had done before. He would lose precious time, and he wouldn't be able to stop Katsura, and then...

He stepped out into the hallway, taking a couple of uneven paces along the passage, leaning heavily on the wall in order to prevent himself from falling headlong.

A silver fox killed Sakaki. A silver fox felled the sacred evergreen, and then the souls of the dead whimpering in the wind... the long past, but is it really past? Too many images, and I don't understand. I can't tie them all together, but that fox... I've seen it before, somewhere. Somehow. Keitarou-san always talked about foxes, too. He was worried by them, and now... this.

He had about made it six paces along the hallway before a sound at the end of the corridor made him glance up. Half expecting to see Mitsuki standing there, a gentle reprimand on her lips and a vial of soporific in her hands, he was struck silent by the sudden glitter of argent eyes, followed by the overwhelming urge to sleep. He clawed desperately at the bamboo panels, but it was no good. His body had given up the fight, and as he slid to the floor, he was sure he caught sight of silver hair framing a pale, impassive face. Then the world went dark, and he knew no more.

“What the hell did you do to him?”

Ketsui stepped out from the shadows in Izumi's slipstream, casting his companion a look of alarm as she knelt down at the young invalid's side, checking absently for a pulse before brushing back the tousled hair that covered his brow. She tut-tutted slightly under her breath, then raised her gaze to Ketsui's quizzically. Though she did not have the power of speech, even a short time in Izumi's company had taught Ketsui that that particular look was one of defiance, and he sighed, shaking his head.

“So I guess that answers the question about how much you know Kidou — if, in fact, that was Kidou. You do have skills other than scientific knowledge, even if you can’t use a sword,” he said with a grimace. “Fine. All right. I guess you’re right that he shouldn’t be out here on his own. I thought Tsunemori-san was with him tonight, but maybe something happened.”

Izumi pursed her lips, eying Koku critically, and Ketsui arched an eyebrow.

“That’s the look you were giving those notes of Taichou’s in the library earlier,” he reflected, moving down to crouch at Koku’s other side. “The ‘I want to investigate this further,’ look. This kid isn’t a science experiment, though. He’s Taichou’s business and we’re not to interfere in it — but we’re protecting him from harm. He’s not dangerous.”

Izumi shot Ketsui an incredulous look, followed by one that was undoubtedly pity, and Ketsui sighed.

“Fine, to you everything is an experiment,” he reflected wearily. “We’ve been in the archive all day, and now it’s past midnight. We’re finally finished for the night and now you want to dissect this poor kid too? Well, it’s a no go. Firstly, we don’t have orders to. Secondly, this is Taichou’s business, not ours. Thirdly, we have enough to pursue with what we were talking about earlier. And, finally and most importantly, you’re a recruit and I’m a Tenth Seat. That means you’re meant to follow my orders and not the other way around.”

Izumi stared at Ketsui in indignation, and Ketsui met her gaze with an even one of his own.

“Whatever you did to him, you’re not going to do it to me, too,” he said matter-of-factly. “What you are going to help me do, though, is get him back to his room before anyone finds out he’s escaped.”

Izumi’s expression became one of disbelief, and despite himself, Ketsui laughed.

“People don’t often answer you back, do they?” he realised. “I’m serious, though, as it happens. If we’re found here, with him, there’ll be questions. People will want to know why we’re still up, and then they might ask questions about you. And you don’t want that to happen, especially considering what you’ve already uncovered. I’m in charge of you, so it wouldn’t be any good for me, either. You put him out for the count somehow — I trust that means he won’t wake up for a while?"

Izumi sighed, looking resigned, then shrugged, nodding her head. She dusted her hands off, as if to say, "I'm done with it," and Ketsui eyed her keenly.

"Meaning I'm carrying him? Well, fine. I can do that," he said easily, moving to scoop Koku's limp form up in his arms. Though he wasn't as well built as Tenichi, Koku's undernourished body posed little challenge and he hoisted the unconscious boy up more securely into his arms, indicating the door of Koku's chamber with his head.

"You open the door and make the bed and I'll dump him in it. Then we'll disappear before anyone sees us. Hurry up and don't argue! I can hear voices — I think Tsunemori-san will be coming back this way soon and I don't want to answer awkward questions."

Izumi shot him a poisonous look, but stalked forward anyway, pushing back the door with very bad grace and disappearing inside. Ketsui rolled his eyes, but followed her, finding that she had at least managed to pull back the covers so that he could deposit his burden neatly inside. Izumi cast the blankets over Koku's limp form with a dismissive sniff, as though she felt herself above such things, and Ketsui grinned.

"We're leaving here, now," he said matter-of-factly, and, before the young woman could protest, he had grabbed her by the arm, pulling her into a flash-step. Dropping out of it outside the door of the Thirteenth archive, he released his hold, taking in her censure with amusement.

"Better here than where we were just now," he remarked lightly, and Izumi put her hands on her hips, her delicate features twisting into a most unladylike scowl. Ketsui returned it with a graphic grimace, then he sighed, dropping back against the wall.

"I think it's weird too, but I don't want to get involved," he said honestly. "The boy, I mean. It's Kirio-nee's task, and not mine. I'm fine being out of it and you should be too. You're not safe here, right? So it doesn't make sense getting involved in other stuff too. We've already dug deep into dangerous territory today. Let's not add more. Right now our priority is with the notes you have and what we think they mean... all right?"

Izumi pressed her lips together, folding her arms across her chest, and Ketsui nodded.

"Something happened," he agreed. "I don't know what it was, but I felt it too. I didn't like how it felt, if I'm honest. It felt like... we were better staying out of it."

Izumi lowered her head slowly, and Ketsui saw resignation enter her gaze.

"Tell me something. Does Taichou know you can lay a guy out with just one stare?"

Izumi shrugged her shoulders again, a faint hint of mischief glittering in her silvery eyes, and Ketsui rolled his eyes again.

"Taichou's assignment is turning out to be high maintenance," he realised. 'If I'd known that before I took it on, maybe I'd have said no. Clearly you can protect yourself... Ichimaru-san?' As Izumi shook her head firmly. "If you can drop someone to the ground just by looking at them, nobody is going to touch you. That poor lad didn't get more than a few paces towards you — if you can put an enemy out that easily, then..."

Izumi shook her head again, looking mournful, and to Ketsui's surprise, she reached out to grasp his sleeve, giving it a little tug before letting it go. His eyes narrowed.

"You seriously tried to use it on me just now, didn't you?" he asked suspiciously, and Izumi nodded, a faintly sheepish glint in the depths of the argent eyes.

"And come to think of it, you stared at me pretty hard in the Archive earlier." Ketsui tilted his head on one side as he considered. "I suppose you can control it, but... were you trying to lay me out then, too?"

Izumi pursed her lips, slowly shaking her head, but there was hesitation in her expression, and Ketsui's frown deepened.

"But just now, you were serious?"

Izumi nodded.

"And it didn't work?"

Izumi shook her head.

"So there are people it doesn't work on?"

Izumi shrugged, and Ketsui realised that the frustration in her expression was real.

"This was the first time, huh," he reflected, and Izumi nodded. She sighed, looking troubled, and Ketsui felt sorry for her.

“I guess it’s not for me to ask about, anyway,” he reflected. “Probably you’re tired, and if you already used it on Koku, maybe there wasn’t any juice left for me. Or maybe it just doesn’t work on me — I don’t know, you’re the scientist. I’d rather you didn’t try it on me again, though. Whether I annoy you or not, Taichou gave me a job, and I figure we’ll do it right. If you skip out of sword drill by putting me to sleep, you won’t get any better at it. And while you’re here, they’re skills you’re expected to have — otherwise folk will be suspicious.”

He grinned, tilting his head on one side as he gazed at her.

“When I first was assigned to look out for you, I was really uncertain how to act,” he admitted, “but I enjoyed working in the library with you, and all the science stuff we’ve been doing lately. And maybe I can’t understand your sign language, and you can’t speak to me in words, but I feel like I’m coming to understand you anyway. I don’t know a lot of things about you, but I do understand Taichou’s reasons for putting faith in you, and I think you’re right, where Keitarou is concerned. So it’s all right, if you can’t put me to sleep. I’m on your side anyway. We’re both going to do what we can to bring someone dangerous to heel. That’ll help me and it’ll help you — and so we have a common aim, don’t we? We’re allies now, right?”

Izumi looked surprised, then she smiled, slowly nodding her head.

“Then it’s settled,” Ketsui assured her. ‘Now it’s late, though. I’d walk you to your room, but that might be seen as inappropriate if Naoko-san is on duty, so I guess I won’t. Don’t put anyone else to sleep in the hallways, all right? I’ll see you tomorrow, early, after breakfast. And Ichimaru-san?’ as the girl turned to leave, “I think it’s better nobody knows we were abroad like this this evening. All right? If Koku remembers seeing you, well, maybe it would be better if people assumed he was wrong. Otherwise everyone will find out your secret power, and I think that might cause chaos.”

Izumi sighed, but nodded, and Ketsui patted her lightly on the shoulder.

“Tomorrow, then,” he said firmly. “Sweet dreams.”

Izumi pushed his hand away, but it was not with quite as much indignation as her earlier scowl and, as Ketsui watched her disappear down the hallway towards her own quarters, he pursed his lips pensively.

I don't understand what it is about her, but I do know that she understands science. The hime image is completely broken apart when you give her books and data, and whats more, I'm finding that stuff interesting too. We do have a common goal and though I can't ask her what her reasons are, I really do feel we're connected somehow. Maybe Keitarou-san hurt someone close to her — those tears the other morning made me wonder if Taichou had given her some bad news.

He ran his fingers absently through his pale blond hair, turning on his heel and making his way towards his own chamber, where Kira was already lost in dreams.

Working with Ichimaru-san makes me realise there are really high stakes involved — stakes a Tenth seat and a recruit shouldn't normally be tangling with. If what we think is right, we've stumbled onto something big and that's a little frightening to take in. At least it means I can keep my word to Taichou about helping her. Now I've seen her work, and spent time with her on something she cares about, I don't feel so awkward around her. But I do like being with her. She's smart and different and I've not met anyone like her before. I never thought anyone would bring out the dormant science gene in me, but it seems I was wrong. But if her magic doesn't work on everyone... that means there are people who could hurt her. So I have to make sure I stick to the rest of Taichou's brief, too. I have to make sure Ichimaru-san is kept safe... and if that means lying about what happened tonight, well, then that's just what I'll have to do.

"Well, whatever disturbed him, he seems to have overcome it on his own."

Mitsuki brushed her fingers against Koku's throat, feeling the steady beat of his pulse beneath her touch. "He's sleeping soundly enough now, so it doesn't look as though I need to use any chemicals on him this time. You were right to alert me, Tsukabishi-kun, but in this particular instance, he seems to have settled without my help."

"Taichou said that any bad dreams should be taken note of," Tsunemori admitted. "Since I let him escape from here and run riot around the gardens once because of my lack of attentiveness, I didn't want to risk this being another case like that. He seemed really quite upset, and he was crying... so I thought I ought to alert someone about it."

"You did exactly what you should, and if it happens again, follow the same procedure," Mitsuki advised, withdrawing her hand from Koku's throat and brushing back the messy hair from his brow. "He seems stable enough right at the moment, but I'm not happy with his recovery, and I want to get to the bottom of why. His appetite is uneven and his reiatsu unsteady... and these dreams are bothering J... Ukitake-taichou, so they're bothering me too. It might be a case of post-traumatic shock, but I suppose we'll see."

She sighed, getting to her feet.

"For now, though, there's nothing to be done here," she concluded. "Tsukabishi-kun, when he woke up, did he say anything in particular? You said he was crying... was there anything else?"

"Mm," Tsukabishi's brows knitted together thoughtfully, and he nodded his head. "Well, I might've misheard him, but it sounded like he said 'Sakanoue.' There was something else, too, but I didn't make that out."

He looked rueful.

"I might've just imagined the other word, too," he admitted. "It wasn't really clear, just I heard Fukutaichou mention that word — that name? — in a conversation with Shikibu-san the other day, and so it struck me as familiar."

"It means nothing to me," Mitsuki owned. "Oh well. Keep doing what you're doing, and if there are any more disturbances, let me know, all right?"

"I will," Tsunemori promised. "Honestly, it's a relief to me that he's gone back to sleep on his own. He didn't seem like he was in a particularly... cooperative frame of mind, and I didn't want to have to physically haul him back to bed."

"Fortunately, we're spared that," Mitsuki's eyes twinkled with amusement. "All right. If that's the case, I'm going back to bed. Here's hoping we have a peaceful rest of the night, huh?"

With one last glance at Koku's sleeping figure, she withdrew from the small bed chamber, pulling the door softly shut behind her.

"Mitsuki?"

Juushirou's voice from the shadowy hallway behind her made her jump, and she swung around, meeting his concerned gaze with a sheepish one of her own.

"I didn't sense you there," she admitted. "I was so busy thinking about the boy, I didn't pick up your reiatsu at all."

"Something happened to Koku?" Juushirou moderated his tones, gesturing for her to come away from the bedroom door, and she did so, shrugging her shoulders.

“A nightmare, but he seems to be settled again now,” she said frankly. “Tsukabishi-kun came to get me, but by the time I saw him, Koku was asleep again.”

“I suppose that’s a good sign,” Juushirou sighed, rubbing his brow, and Mitsuki was aware of how weary her old classmate looked. She frowned, reaching out to take him by the wrists, and he started, gazing at her in surprise.

“You should be resting, too,” Mitsuki murmured. “You’re working far too hard, and we both know where that will lead if you’re not careful.”

“Yes, but I don’t have a choice about it,” Juushirou grimaced. “I’m sleeping pretty lightly at the moment. I sensed a flurry of reiatsu and came to investigate, but it seems you have it all under control.”

“Seems so,” Mitsuki agreed. “Koku’s resting, so there’s no need for you to be up, too.”

“Your concern is reassuring, but I can’t just sit back and let the division run itself,” Juushirou shook his head. “There’s too much at stake, especially given that the Captains have now decided on an expedition to the Real World to flush out Aizen Keitarou.”

“Are you going?” Mitsuki asked sharply, and Juushirou smiled, reaching up to touch her cheek briefly.

“Would it worry you, if I was?” he asked softly, and Mitsuki snorted, swiping his hand away.

“Don’t be an idiot, of course it would,” she said frankly. “This person has tried to kill you specifically on at least one occasion, maybe two. I don’t want you anywhere near him, whatever the provocation.”

“Mm,” Juushirou pressed his lips together for a moment, then, “well, I’m not going. I’m staying here, but it will mean an increase in Thirteenth’s workload. We’ll have to take on the duties of the missing however long it takes them to flush out whatever they’re looking for... and that might be tricky, given the nature of the opposition.”

“I suppose I ought to go back to Fourth,” Mitsuki looked guilty. “I’m another burden adding to your existing ones, and I don’t need to be here, not now. Koku is doing a lot better physically, and he doesn’t respond to me as well as he does to Hikifune-san. He’s on edge around me, so it’s more than likely I’m not helping him — maybe I’m making his stress worse. If you want me to leave, I will. I don’t mind. I’m much recovered now, and...”

“You’re not going anywhere,” Juushirou put his finger to her lips, offering her a sad smile. “If this is the only way we get to spend time together, so be it. You’re not a burden, so don’t think of yourself that way. And you have helped Koku a lot — he’s just frightened generally, not of you specifically.”

“Possibly,” Mitsuki acknowledged. “It’s a bit hurtful, though, as a healer, to be constantly met with this wall of resistance.”

She sighed, shrugging her shoulders.

“In any case, before I forget, Tsukabishi-kun said that Koku said ‘Sakanoue’ when he woke up from his dream. Does that mean anything to you?”

“Sakanoue?” Juushirou’s eyes widened in consternation. “As in the Eleventh’s former Vice Captain, Sakanoue?”

“I wouldn’t know?” Mitsuki looked blank. “I haven’t been here in a long time, and it’s an entirely new name to me. Tsukabishi-kun said he wasn’t sure he overheard right, only that he’d heard Houjou-kun say that name a few days ago. It might not even be relevant, but... he didn’t seem to know who Sakanoue could be either, so...”

“Well, he died a long time ago. Twenty five years ago, to be exact — before we even graduated,” Juushirou’s eyes had become grave, Mitsuki noted, and she frowned.

“You think it is relevant, don’t you?” she asked. “You think it means something.”

“I think most things mean something,” Juushirou admitted. “Koku said your name when he first saw you, and it might’ve been coincidence, and it might not. Now he’s said the name of a dead officer who even I didn’t meet... but who was the Eleventh Vice Captain who died in action in the Rukon twenty-five years ago. Your life was threatened in the Rukon, and your comrades died. I don’t like the potential connections there.”

“Juushirou, what exactly is bothering you?” Mitsuki asked gently. “Something is, I can tell. Something relating to that boy, his dreams... it’s not like you to latch on to tiny fragmentary clues that might mean nothing and try and pull them together into one big picture.”

Juushirou was silent for a moment, then he reached up to tuck a stray wisp of Mitsuki’s hair behind her ear.

“I’m not sure,” he admitted. “I haven’t got it worked out in my own mind, and I don’t know how to explain the bits I have. I’ve probably already said more than I ought to an officer without rank, and whilst I trust you... right now it's complicated."

"Juushirou..." Mitsuki's eyes flickered with hurt, and Juushirou sighed.

"I'm sorry," he murmured. "Maybe when things are calmer, we can talk. We haven't been able to lately, and when we have it's all been tied up with the latest crisis. But we will talk, Mitsuki-chan. I promise. When this is over, we will."

Mitsuki gazed at him for a moment, then, slowly, she nodded her head.

"I understand," she said softly, though she could not keep the swell of melancholy from wrapping itself around her heart at his expression. "I'm sorry, Juushirou. Goodnight."

"Goodnight," Juushirou echoed, and Mitsuki could see identical pain in his hazel eyes. Not wanting to see it any more, she bowed towards him, turning on her heel and making her way slowly but purposefully back down the corridor to her own small chamber.

Once there, however, she dropped back against the door, burying her head in her hands.

Maybe too much has changed. Perhaps there is just too much between us, now, to make it work in the way it might have done before.

She let out her breath in a rush, moving towards the window to push back the shutter and allow the night air to ruffle through her hair.

There are things I haven't told you, and things you're not telling me. Yet I still love you like I did when we were students. That hasn't changed. And if something's bothering you... it bothers me too. You still can't understand that a healer's heart picks up every single fluctuation in another's reiatsu, and even more so with someone she cares for like this. I don't like it when you shut me out, Juushirou-kun. Even if I understand, I don't like it. And I can't help but get a bad feeling that... we're never going to get that chance to talk.

Author's Note

Just in case it isn't clear, Koku dreams about Sakaki's death at the same time it occurs. The events of this chapter are therefore running almost simultaneously with the ones of the last — in the dark of the same, death-stalked night.

47. Rage

Chapter Forty Six: Rage

Opening the Senkaimon had been more difficult this time.

Joumei slipped through the back streets on the outskirts of Seireitei, pressing his body tight against the wall to avoid the gazes of the security guards on duty. They seemed busy and distracted, and as he observed their flitting about, Joumei could sense a general tension in the air. It was like the calm before the storm, a storm that these officers probably didn't have the rank to fully understand, but Joumei thanked his stars for their occupation, dropping down into an alcove between two old storage sheds with a heavy thud. He reached his good hand up to his shoulder, ripping apart the fabric to reveal the slash across his upper chest before repeating the action with the cut to his arm and wincing as the frayed edges of the ragged cloth raked through the seeping wound. They were nasty gashes, and had bled profusely, but a cursory examination told him that they had not pierced any important vessels. Already the flow of red was slowing, and Joumei spat on his hand, rubbing it briskly across his arm, doing the same again with the cut on his chest. It was not ideal, especially considering the grime and dust coating his fingers, but he had not travelled with any better antiseptic, and he did not have the time to worry about patching up his body.

He was here and at present, in his own wits. Whether Keitarou was lurking, ready to pounce, or whether the shock of his daughter's death had stunned him into a moment of hesitation, he didn't know, but he was smart enough to realise that the other individual — the young man, Katsura — would probably be on his tail physically, even if his father held back psychically. There had been true hate and rage in Katsura's order, rage like Joumei had never encountered in the whole of his life, and despite his frequent proximity to death, it had frightened him.

His brow creased, derision at his own cowardice washing over him. A man resolved to death doesn't fear attack. He does his duty and that's all I'm good for now. I've killed and I'm tainted and there's no way to reverse either one of those actions. While I'm rational, I'll report to Hirata-sama, and entreat him to confine me. I'm willing to answer for the death of the girl — to him or to a greater power. With no Kitsune to lead and my sister safe, my life is forfeit and I shouldn't care about preserving it. There's no going back, Joumei. Stop distracting yourself — let's go.

He had entered Seireitei somewhere near the Thirteenth Division's barracks, where he had visited Juushirou so covertly following Souja's funeral. It was further from Seventh than he would've liked, but at the very least, he had learned his father's stealth drill to perfection, and, ignoring the stinging pain in his arm and upper chest, he hauled his thin body up onto the roof of the nearest building, pressing himself low against the tiles and pulling himself carefully along the edge, concealing his body behind the narrow rim edging.

"Be where they don't expect you," his father had told him, "even if that has to be in plain sight. Birds are up. Butterflies, too. Foxes don't fly, so they won't look up to find you, but you can always look down on them."

Down is where the guards are, and I don't have time to play with them.

Joumei inched towards the small gap between one roof and the next, crossing the divide with little or no hesitation and beginning to progress across the next. Although he knew his reiatsu was suppressed far below the levels that a shinigami could sense him, he was on edge all the same. The pursuit had not yet materialised, but he felt certain it would come... and it was not just that which now concerned him.

He turned his gaze towards Thirteenth Division, consternation flickering across his silverish blue gaze.

He can sense me. He must know I'm here. If everything I picked up from Keitarou's thoughts is true... there's nothing I can do to stop him finding me. I have to find Hirata-sama first, else it doesn't bear thinking about. If I'm right about what Keitarou's really planning...

A shiver went down his spine involuntarily, and he hastened his pace, dragging his body as nimbly as he could manage between the various buildings until he could see the courtyard and emblem of the Endou Clan from his cautious hiding place. He had refrained from using shunpo up till now, afraid that even the faintest flurry of energy would give away his location and prevent him from reaching his destination but, with the target in sight, he let go of his inhibitions, pushing his body into shunpo and dropping out of the step onto the cobbles of the Seventh Division.

"State your business!"

Almost as soon as he had arrived, a huddle of officers crowded out from the wooden buildings, each one bearing a weapon of some sort, though Joumei was relieved to see that many of them were simple asauchi and not the more complex shinigami zanpakutou. There was at least one seated officer in their midst, however, a tall, austere looking young man whose weapon was clearly something more, and it had been he who had spoken, the imperious note in his tones implying he was not used to being defied.

“I have business with your Captain,” inwardly bemoaning his raggedy appearance, Joumei bowed his head low before the advancing man, holding up his hands to show that he carried no weapons of his own. “I mean no harm, but I must see Hirata-sama, as soon as possible.”

“Hirata-sama?” The man swung his sword in a flourish, a gesture clearly intended as much to impress the junior officers as to intimidate their intruder, and his lip curled in a derisive sneer. “And you think that I’m fool enough to let a bloody ragamuffin into the core of our Division without asking any questions? You insult our pride by even stepping over our cobbles... wearing... whatever that is you’re wearing.”

He extended his weapon, brushing the tip disdainfully against the torn flaps of Joumei’s hakamashita, then withdrawing it with a shudder.

“This is a shinigami barracks, peasant. Not the kind of place for your kind. I don’t know how you got in here, but I suggest you repent your impudence and withdraw, before you find yourself a good deal more bloody than your current state.”

“I can’t go back,” Joumei’s pride flared at the clear insult, but he railed in his temper, making no attempt to follow the man’s orders. “I told you, I have urgent business with Hirata-sama. Please, send a message to him. It’s extremely important I speak to him — I can’t leave here until I do.”

“I’m sure you can... in one way or another,” the man prodded his sword up against Joumei’s chest, forcing the Kitsune to stumble back despite himself. “Perhaps you didn’t hear me. This is a shinigami barracks. You are not a shinigami... you are not even washed, and your manners are atrocious. I should kill you for your cheek in even daring to breathe the same air as us, and certainly for considering yourself in a position to order my Captain and Lord to attend you at a moment’s notice.”

His eyes became slits.

“Last chance. Leave on your own, or I shall remove you. In pieces, after I use this,” he swished his sword again, “to dissect you.”

“Please,” As the man drew closer, Joumei threw his pride and his sense of self-protection to the wind, grabbing hold of the trailing ties of the shinigami’s pristine obi and tugging on it desperately. “I’m begging you, send a message to your Captain. It’s important, it could mean people’s lives. You can do what you want with me, but it’s vital I speak to him. I need to speak to him. Please, tell him Joumei has come. I know he’ll see me... he told me that if I needed to, I should come.”

“You’ve crossed the line,” the man’s expression went from derision to anger, ripping the obi from Joumei’s bloody grip and pushing the tip of his blade up against the Kitsune’s jugular. “Touching a senior officer’s uniform is offence enough for a recruit, let alone a vagabond, but to lie about the intentions of a man as honourable as Hirata-sama, that is unforgivable. Do you think that a Lord has any time for something like you? Be glad I’m a merciful man, else I would torture you for your crimes... as it is I shall simply slit your grubby throat, and you should be grateful for such forbearance.”

“Please, tell him Joumei has come,” Joumei reached out for the obi again, ducking around the weapon and extending his other hand to grab hold of the black fabric of the officer’s hakamashita. “Tell him Joumei has come. I’ve come to report. I’ve come to report!”

“Unhand me, you filthy creature!” the shinigami was beside himself, reaching out to grab Joumei’s wrist and throwing him down against the ground, raising his weapon as if to decapitate him on the spot. All around Joumei was dimly aware of the huddle of mesmerised recruits, each one staring at their senior officer in dazzled silence, all of them awed by the spectacle unfolding before them, but none of them making even the slightest of movements towards the barracks and the Captain’s office. Joumei’s heart lurched and sank as he realised his predicament. Had he escaped Rukongai just to die here, at the hands of one of Hirata’s trusted retainers?

“Wait!”

The single word ripped through the tension, casting a sudden hush over the gathered recruits, and to Joumei’s surprise, the officer pulled back his blade, turning with a mixture of impatience and deference to greet the newcomer on the scene. From his position on the ground, Joumei could not see the speaker, but he was aware of brisk footsteps towards them and the sound of the man who had challenged him sheathing his weapon, bowing as if to welcome a superior officer. Joumei’s heart pounded in his chest, and he grimaced, aware once again of his cowardice, for despite his resolve, his body was relieved it had escaped death a second time.

“What’s going on here, Ohara?”

It was a woman’s voice, Joumei realised now, but he did not dare move, in case his doing so brought a fresh assault in his direction. There was the sound of the male officer clicking his tongue against his teeth, then,

“Just a peasant trying to push his luck and demanding to see the Captain. I think he’s out of his wits, and he certainly has base manners. Look,” he tut-tutted again, “my obi is covered in his blood and grime. I was going to teach him a lesson for trespassing — Lord only knows how he got in here, but I was going to send him out in pieces, since he refused to go on his own.”

“An intruder?” There was a pause, then something grabbed the collar of Joumei’s abused clothing, hauling him to his knees. A hand thrust itself roughly under his chin, forcing his head up, and for the first time he caught sight of the newcomer, surprise reflecting in his argent eyes as he took in her appearance.

She was young, far younger than he had expected from the firmness of her orders or from the quick obedience of his tormentor, yet one glance at the blue eyes told him that despite her youth, a true hunter’s spirit lurked within her soul. She wore the same uniform as the man, crisp and clean, yet somehow the neat lines only emphasised the slightness of her form, and Joumei estimated that her height could not be close to the man she had called Ohara. She was dark haired, her long hair tied back in a functional warrior’s tail that made her look more of a soldier than a lady, but there was something else in her bearing which gave Joumei the sudden impression that whoever she was, she was of significant rank and knew it.

There was a long silence, then the girl pressed her lips together, tilting Joumei’s head from side to side, then giving him a little shake.

“Well?” she demanded, her tones clipped and impatient. “Why are you here? What do you want? Are you a halfwit, like Ohara thinks?”

“I have urgent business with Hirata-sama, ma’am,” Joumei forced words hurriedly through shaken vocal chords, wanting to bow his head but unable to on account of her tight hold. “My name is Joumei. I was told to come here and report to him.”

“Joumei?”

Suddenly the girl’s grip on his throat was gone, and she took a step back from him, clear surprise in her voice. “Did you say Joumei?”

That's who you are?"

"Yes, ma'am." Joumei's heart constricted as he saw the sudden clouding of her blue eyes, half expecting her to draw her sword and behead him on the spot. She did no such thing, however, turning to Ohara with a sigh.

"I'll deal with it myself," she said at length. "You have plenty enough to do. Leave this to me. I'll handle it."

"But hime," Ohara was clearly displeased with this instruction, for Joumei felt the thud of a sandalled foot against his back, almost causing him to overbalance forward once again. "A derelict like this? You shouldn't be wasting your precious time handling such vermin. Please, allow me to dispose of him. I will quite gladly blood my blade if it saves you from further unpleasantness."

"I've said I'll handle it, Ohara, and you can consider that an order," the woman's words were firm and edged with steel, but Ohara was not noticeably crushed by the harshness of her rebuff. He sighed, bowing his head to her command, then gesturing for the recruits to join him across the yard. Left more or less alone, Kikyue reached out a hand to grab Joumei's arm, yanking him to his feet with more force than it seemed her lithe body possessed. Joumei let out a yelp, almost tripping over his own feet at the suddenness of the movement, but Kikyue did not stop until they had reached a more sheltered corner of the yard, out of earshot of the other Seventh members. She deposited him unceremoniously against the cobbles, putting her hands on her hips and glaring down at him expectantly.

"Well? You said you had a report to make? Make it."

"I..." Joumei faltered, then shook his head. "I can't."

"Can't?" The woman arched an eyebrow. "Or won't? You were frantically begging to see the Captain a few moments ago. I'm the most senior officer currently on duty, and he's not available to take your message. Therefore report to me. If it's that important, you can entrust it to me and I'll pass it on myself."

"I can't," Joumei repeated, frustration in his eyes. "I can't put anyone else in danger..I can only... your Captain..."

"You intend to put Taichou in danger?" Suddenly the girl's hands were about the throat of Joumei's hakamashita, and he found himself thrust up against the wooden wall of the barracks, the beams creaking on impact. He winced as his spine clattered against the unforgiving surface, but his companion showed no sign of caring, one hand grasping the flaps of fabric tight beneath Joumei's chin, the delicate fingers of the other pressing against his brow.

"Endou are very good at swordplay," she said, her tones taking on a sudden dangerous edge, "but I'm also extremely experienced in Kidou. One spell and I blast your brains from your skull. Don't think I'm ladylike enough to be squeamish. I've seen worse and I'm quite prepared to deal with the aftermath, unless you decide to tell me precisely why you're here and what you intend to do to my Father. Who sent you? Why did you come here? I swear, if you mean any harm..."

Father?

Joumei's eyes widened with dismay as his sluggish brain suddenly realised who it was who had him pinned to the barrack wall.

"Ki... kyue... hime?"

The words dropped from his lips half disbelieving, and at the sound of it, Kikyue snorted, pressing her face close so that her gaze bored deep into his.

"You know my name," she murmured. "A vagabond from the Districts knows who I am just from a few casual words. Well, but I shouldn't be surprised, should I? Not since you're a vagabond whose name my brother knew... and more, who met with Souja-nii, the night before he died."

Joumei swallowed hard, struck speechless by the resentment in her tones, and Kikyue's lips thinned.

"I'm right, aren't I? The man Souja-nii defied Father to go see, the one who told him something about Aizen Keitarou... that was you, wasn't it?"

Joumei chewed on his lip, then slowly, he nodded his head. Kikyue's eyes darkened.

"Then report to me," she repeated blackly. "Tell me who you are and what you want. Why are you here? What do you intend to do to Father?"

"Nothing," Joumei found his voice, resisting the urge to push her bodily away from him with his bloodstained hands. "I'm sorry, hime. I didn't realise... I didn't know who you were. We haven't met before... if I had known, I would have behaved with more respect."

"I don't want your respect," Kikyue spat out at him, anger and frustration flaring from her aura. "I want some truth! Why did my brother come see you? Did he die because he came to see you? Who are you? Why wouldn't Father tell me about you? What do you want with my family?"

Joumei was silent for a moment, then he let out a heavy sigh, reaching up his hands in a gesture of surrender.

"I mean the Endou no harm," he said soberly. "Your brother was my friend. He was a true and good friend in whom I trusted implicitly and for whom I would have given my life. It's true we met, but the information I gave him was intended to prevent harm, not cause it. I would never have hurt Souja-dono... never."

"Information... such as?"

"Something I thought he needed to know," Joumei was vague. "That is the truth, hime, and as much as I can tell you."

"Why can't you tell me more?" Kikyue's hold had loosened, and Joumei saw the glitter of tears against her lashes. "Why am I not good enough to know? Is it because I'm a girl? Because I'm a proper fighter and I can do anything the men here can! Why would they keep you a secret from me — what is your connection to my brother and dammit, why couldn't he or Father trust me to know about you? If you and Niisama were such good friends, why did I only ever hear your name when he was dying, and never once before that?!"

She released her hold completely, taking a step back from him, and Joumei pulled himself gingerly to his feet, bowing his head low towards her.

"I've come to speak to your lord Father, if I may," he said softly.

"You can't. I told you, he's not here," Kikyue shook her head impatiently. "I'm the highest ranking officer on duty. Father's gone to District Seven — Mother sent an urgent message for him and he left before dawn."

Her expression became bitter.

"Mother's been ill since Oniisama died," she said flatly. "She has nightmares and believes horrible things will befall Father, so she becomes hysterical and sends for him at a moment's notice. You might not think I'm good enough to report to, but I'm all there is. It's me or nobody."

Joumei eyed Kikyue for a moment, then he shrugged his shoulders.

"There's much I can't tell you, but little I still have to protect," he said with a heavy sigh. "I have come to confess to the vigilante murder of the girl who killed Souja-dono, and to submit to Seireitei's justice."

He held out his hands.

"I have poison within my body which can turn on me at any time, and I do not want to put anyone innocent at risk," he added. "Please, secure me in a cell beneath the Seventh and cuff and confine me as you see fit. I shall not resist your arrest."

"Vigilante... murder?" Kikyue's expressions went through a full gamut of emotions, then, "Souja-nii's killer? Is dead? You..."

"I promised myself that I would avenge him, and so I have broken Seireitei law in several ways," Joumei admitted. "I would give my life for your brother, and fully intended to when I acted, Kikyue-hime. I don't know whether he lost his life because of what I told him, or whether my information came too late to prevent damage... but I swore to myself I would be his justice, whatever the consequences to myself. My life has no other value, so I have come to submit to your Captain, and tell him everything I know."

"To my Captain," Kikyue's eyes narrowed as she absorbed this. "About Aizen Keitarou?"

Consternation flickered across Joumei's expression, and Kikyue nodded.

"I thought so," she murmured. "Whatever you want to tell Otousama, it has something to do with what you told Oniisama, the night he died. Oniisama never could tell us everything — he was far too badly hurt, and he'd lost too much blood to be coherent. But that's why you can't tell me. Father's instructed you, hasn't he? He lost Souja-nii, and he doesn't want me to know in case I hare off looking for revenge. You won't tell me where you found that wench, nor anything else you learned. Right? You'll only tell Father, because Aizen Keitarou's a Captain's prey, no matter how the rest of us think about it."

"I'm sure Hirata-sama would not want harm to befall you, hime," Joumei said softly, "and I know Souja-dono wouldn't sanction it. He spoke of you often, when we met... he loved you very much, and if I am soon to join him on the other side of existence, I don't want to do so knowing I'd brought you harm."

"You don't need to tell me anything about my brother," Kikyue snapped, but her eyes had softened, the tears that now trickled down her cheeks making her appear more like the young woman she was

than the composed commanding officer who had given Ohara his orders. "I knew him better than you did. But I suppose if it's like that... I can't override Father's will. He's my Captain, and even if he's acting from an emotional standpoint, I guess I can't... I promised Ojisama not to..."

She swallowed, dashing the tears away.

"I don't know when Father will be back," she admitted. 'If you can't talk to me, is there nobody else? Oh... what about Juushirou-dono?' Her eyes glittered with sudden comprehension. "Juushirou-dono was there when Niisama died, too! I didn't know your name, when Soujannii said it, but Juushirou-dono..."

She ran her fingers absently through her thick dark hair, and Joumei could see the grief and agitation that lurked just beneath the surface.

"It's not like I want to remember the day my brother died, but I can't forget it," she murmured, her tones low as though she was trying to control her emotions. "I see him lying in the forest, I see myself strike down the boy who saved him, and I feel Juushirou-dono pulling me back. Then, I see Onisama lying there, so helpless and bloody... fighting even to speak. I remember every single word he spoke, every look he gave, everything. I dream about it even now. It hasn't faded, and maybe it never will. But it means I know... his last words, I remember them clearly. And I know that what he said, Juushirou-dono understood. So if you won't speak to Father, will you speak to him instead?"

"Ukitake Juushirou-dono?" Sudden hope flared in Joumei's heart, and he nodded his head. "That's right. Juushirou-dono is a Captain as well, isn't he? If it was him... I could... maybe I could..."

"Then I'll send for him," Kikyue cut across him, raising her voice to make contact with the recruit group at the far side of the yard.

"Ohara! Send a recruit to find Tenichi. I want him to go to Thirteenth Division right away and sweet-talk his old Captain into coming here at once. Quickly! The sooner the better."

"Hime?" Ohara blinked, but shrugged his shoulders. 'Very well. You,' he pointed at the nearest youngster, "go do as Kikyue-hime orders. Be quick about it!"

"Yes, sir!" The recruit hurriedly saluted, scrambling off to obey the instruction, and Kikyue turned back to Joumei.

"I don't intend on locking you up," she said matter-of-factly. "The only crime you've committed in my eyes is taking my brother's vengeance from my Clan. But... I can see it in your eyes, when you speak about him. Even if I don't know anything about you, I know my brother did. I know he trusted you, and you him... so I guess that gives you as much right to the girl's blood as any of us."

"I would sooner you restrained me, hime," Joumei put a hand to his chest grimly. "I don't know how long before the poison activates, but when it does, I may turn violent. I would sooner not die before I have made my full report, but I won't have Souja-dono's sister come to harm. Besides, someone is likely to come after me. I might bring that person here, and..."

"I won't get hurt," Kikyue cut across him, folding her arms across her chest. "Just because I'm young, or a girl, you shouldn't underestimate me. I was the hime whose power rose too quickly and too violently for me to even go to the Academy, let alone train through the normal methods. I had my zanpakutou earlier than any of Seventh's other members... and I'm not Third Seat just because I'm Taichou's daughter. I can fight my corner, and with all respect, right now you don't look capable of much in that line."

"But hime, I..."

"You're Father's man, and Souja-nii's friend. For now, that will do, though it won't suffice forever," Kikyue put a hand to the hilt of her weapon, sending him a warning glance. "Besides, it doesn't seem like there's much more time for talking. I don't know how good your senses are, but mine are pretty good. Something's in the air, and that something is coming this way. Whatever is following you... it looks like it's about to show itself."

"What?" Horror flooded Joumei's expression as he realised that his companion was right, and that where the air had been clear before, suddenly the dull swell of rage that had engulfed him in the Spiritless Zone was beginning to creep once more across the atmosphere. Kikyue frowned, muttering a very un-ladylike curse, then she raised her voice again.

"Ohara! I want Nakata and Hajime-dono out here now, and tell them to come armed and ready for a fight! Never mind the recruits — we're about to get a visitor, and this one means business!"

"You're up early."

As the members of the Thirteenth Division not on dawn patrol finished their morning meal and headed to begin their usual tasks,

Ketsui paused to greet Izumi, stifling a yawn with the back of his hand then offering her a rueful grin. "I'm surprised to see you around at this time — you're not scheduled on any of the patrol or drill rotas and with the work we did last night, I'm amazed you're even awake. If Kira-san hadn't accidentally dropped his sword getting ready for dawn patrol this morning, I might not have made it up for breakfast myself."

He stifled another yawn, eying the young girl keenly, his grin widening as he saw the look of long-suffering derision cross her face. She grimaced, rolling her eyes skywards, then grabbed him by the arm, giving it a little tug before gesturing in the direction of the library. Ketsui's eyebrows disappeared into his floppy fair fringe, and he shook his head.

"There's nothing else we can do there right now," he said softly, his expression becoming grave. "After what we discussed last night, the next step is telling Taichou. You need my help to do that, don't you? Or does Taichou understand your sign language better than I do?"

Izumi shook her head impatiently, then reached into the sleeve of her hakamashita. Carefully she pulled out what appeared to Ketsui to be a rolled up scroll, but the next moment it was gone, and she eyed him expectantly, her gaze darting back in the direction of the archive. The corridor was still busy with people, coming this way and that, and after a moment of consideration, Ketsui pursed his lips, then let out a heavy sigh.

"Fine. You win," he said reluctantly. "I'm following you. Lead the way."

Izumi nodded in satisfaction, setting off at a bright pace along the corridor and, as he loped after her, Ketsui realised that even if he was feeling the effects of late sleeping and early rising, his companion apparently was not.

The archive was deserted at that time in the morning, and Izumi had clearly anticipated this, for she shut the door with a sharp click, pushing one of the big heavy chairs up against the runner to prevent anyone else from pushing it open unexpectedly. This done, she crossed the room towards the table where they had been working the night before, pulling the scroll from her sleeve and spreading it out on the wooden surface.

Ketsui came to gaze at it over her shoulder, letting out an exclamation as he realised what it was.

"When did you write this? Did you actually even sleep last night?"

Izumi shot him another scornful look, then gave the paper a little shove in his direction. She folded her arms across her chest, glaring at him, and Ketsui grimaced, reaching out to scoop the single sheet of parchment up.

“I see. You don’t trust me to report it clearly and concisely to Taichou, so you’ve written me a failsafe script to help me along. Is that about the root of it?”

Izumi nodded, and Ketsui gazed at the neatly sketched out diagram once more, taking in the carefully scribed figures and the abbreviated notes that framed the page. Izumi’s writing was in an archaic style, her use of characters far more traditional than the rough script he had learned as a child, but her calligraphy was of superior quality, and he found that even though some of the kanji were unknown to him, he could work them out all the same. He ran his finger over the notes, realising that his first impression had been mistaken and, far from being abbreviated, they were, in fact, uniquely structured sentences, comprehensible but unlike anything in spoken Japanese.

But Ichimaru-san doesn’t speak, so I suppose she wouldn’t think about things like that. Maybe she writes in the same way she signs... perhaps if I read this more closely, I’d understand her language better.

Out loud he said,

“But you’re coming with me, aren’t you? You can jab me in the back and glower at me if I read something wrong. It’s your work, anyhow — not mine.”

Izumi pulled a graphic face, moving over to the window and pushing it open.

“Ichimaru-san?” Naoko’s voice from the yard made Ketsui jump, hurriedly shoving the scroll into his obi. “What are you doing, hiding in the library? Didn’t I tell you yesterday that I wanted to see you right after breakfast this morning?”

“Shikibu-san?” Ketsui pulled himself together, coming to stand at the recruit’s side, and at the sight of him, Naoko let out a sigh.

“Ah, she’s with you, is she?” she observed wearily. “Well, I didn’t tell you, so I don’t suppose you’d have found out any other way. I need Ichimaru-san this morning. All recruits have to sign and seal certain paperwork on arriving in the division, and Ichimaru-san’s not filled in any of the necessary documents since she’s been here. They’re waiting for her in Fukutaichou’s office — now that he’s finally dug them out from the mountain of junk he calls his paperwork in tray — and I need to countersign them, so I’d like to get it done before he comes back off morning patrol and starts getting in our way.”

She arched an eyebrow.

“Unless, of course, you have something more pressing to do?”

“It’s all right, Shikibu-san,” Ketsui held up his hands hastily, shaking his head. ‘I had no idea you needed Ichimaru-san, but it’s all right. I have... I have another errand I need to take care of, anyway, and paperwork is important. I’ll see you later,’ this last to Izumi. “Wait for me under the willow tree in the gardens and I’ll come find you there.”

Izumi gazed at him for a moment, and Ketsui was aware of the gravity in his companion’s silver eyes. She nodded her head, then bowed to Naoko, pushing the window fully open and dropping nimbly down onto the grass outside. She turned, saluting Ketsui in a way that seemed more an exchange of trust than a gesture of respect towards a senior officer, and then she and the Third Seated officer were gone.

Ketsui dropped back against the wall of the archive, letting out his breath in a sigh. He had trained with Naoko as a recruit, and even now knew that it was often best not to argue when she had something specific in mind to do. Though in terms of rank, Enishi had always held the higher honours, Ketsui was fairly certain that even the Vice Captain would not win in a battle of wills with Shikibu Naoko, and, he reflected wryly, had probably volunteered for dawn patrol that morning in order to clear his office and avoid the long lecture about disorganised documentation that was doubtless coming his way.

Still, it means I have to take Ichimaru-san’s knowledge and report it to Taichou, so I shouldn’t waste any time.

Ketsui pursed his lips, patting his obi absently.

It’s not good to have something like this in writing, not if it can be traced back to Ichimaru-san. If she starts signing documents, then someone will be able to make a match, and while I’m pretty sure everyone in Thirteenth Division is trustworthy, if someone really did break in the other night, it doesn’t mean it’s entirely secure. I don’t know what Ichimaru-san is hiding from or why she might be in danger, but I did promise I’d protect her. Taichou obviously brought her here to figure out things the rest of us haven’t been able to — so it’s my job to act as her voice now and make sure the people in command know about it too.

Glancing for a moment at the jammed door, he decided against trying to move the heavy chair back in place, vaulting instead over the windowsill and out onto the grass beyond.

“That’s not the usual way people exit libraries, unless Thirteenth has developed some new habits since last I was here.”

An amused voice greeted his landing, and he glanced up, surprise and pleasure crossing his face as he recognised his brother.

“Ten-nii! What are you doing here?”

“Much as I’d like to say it’s to see you and Kirio, I have an errand from Kikyue-dono and she’s not usually a person to argue with, especially not at the moment,” Tenichi pulled a face. “Do you know where Ukitake-taichou is right now? I have to speak to him — apparently he’s needed at Seventh, though for what I couldn’t tell you.”

“Taichou?” Ketsui pursed his lips, a troubled look crossing his brow as he remembered the precious scroll Izumi had entrusted to him. “I was about to go look for him myself. At this time, probably in Ugendou. Fukutaichou isn’t here, and Shikibu-san is using his office, so I imagine Taichou would be in his own quarters.”

“Fine, then I’ll come with you and nobody will get suspicious about my being here,” Tenichi suggested warmly. “It seems like a long time since we’ve spoken, and I’m sure that’s mostly my fault.”

“No, I think it’s just a case of being busy,” Ketsui rubbed his temples. “Kirio-nee has said you’ve visited, only I’ve not been around at the time. I’m sorry for that, Nii-chan. It wasn’t on purpose.”

“Like I ever thought it was,” Tenichi snorted, though for a brief instant Ketsui thought he saw his companion’s greenish eyes cloud over. “If a Tenth seat isn’t busy, he’s not pulling his weight properly. It’s all right — besides, I’ve had plenty on my plate too, and Kirio said you’d been dumped with a recruit. It’s a lot of hassle, I bet — taking on someone new all of a sudden and out of season like this?”

The question was innocent enough, but Ketsui hesitated, unsure of how to answer.

Taichou entrusted Ichimaru-san to me, which means that I can’t talk about any of our work to anyone, not even Ten-nii. Even though I trust him more than anyone else in Soul Society... I decided I wasn’t going to be a burden on him any more, and I was going to do things for myself. Well, if Keitarou was involved in your abduction, Ten-nii, reminding you about it might upset you again. I don’t want to ever see you the way you were when Souja-dono died, so even if I trust you... no, because I trust you, I can’t tell you any of this.

“Ketsui?” Tenichi was looking concerned, and Ketsui roused himself from his reverie, offering his companion a rueful smile.

“She can’t hold a sword, and doesn’t really seem inspired to try,” he said honestly, “otherwise there’s nothing much to say. Recruits are recruits. We’ve all been there. She’ll shake down and be fine. And I don’t consider it a burden — it’s actually an honour that Taichou trusted me with the job. I’ve never had this much responsibility over a recruit before.”

“An honour, huh,” Tenichi rubbed his chin, turning his gaze away from his brother to glance around the division barracks, then he sighed.

“Well, it’s not like it’s my business. I’m a foreigner in these parts now, and so your recruits are hardly anything to do with me.”

“Maybe that’s true, but that doesn’t mean you can’t ask,” Ketsui assured him. “I’m just trying to stand on my own two feet and think about things for myself, that’s all. If I have to mentor someone else, I can’t always be running to Nii-chan or Kirio-nee for help, now can I?”

“I suppose not,” Tenichi ruffled Ketsui’s hair playfully, and Ketsui shoved him away.

“Oniichan! I’m not six years old any more!”

“No, thank goodness, or I’d still have you hiding under blankets whenever there was thunder or lightning over the village,” Tenichi’s words were teasing, but there was something strained in the light-hearted words, and Ketsui frowned, eying his brother more closely for the first time. There were shadows under the older man’s eyes, he noticed with surprise, and Tenichi looked weary, the creases in his brow making him appear troubled. He sighed.

“Seventh has been chaotic lately, hasn’t it?” he asked softly, and Tenichi started, staring at him in surprise.

“What do you mean?”

“I heard about the intruder, and how you almost blew up half the boundary fence getting rid of him.”

“Yeah, and a fine scolding I got for it afterwards,” Tenichi said darkly. “Don’t worry about me, Ketsui. I’m fine, I can handle a little extra work and right now that’s all I can do. Besides, I didn’t nail the guy. I wanted to, but he slipped my hold. I heard a rumour he’d come here... was that true?”

“I didn’t see anyone, but it’s a rumour here too, and most people think it’s true,” Ketsui agreed. “Nobody was hurt, though, so whatever he came here for, he was obviously scared off and hasn’t been back.”

“You didn’t see him?” Tenichi asked anxiously, and Ketsui laughed, shaking his head.

“I didn’t, so you can take that worried look off your face,” he said firmly. “I mean, it Ten-nii. I was assigned the most boring task of everyone — babysitting the recruits within the barracks, and I didn’t get to see or even hear anything except Shikibu-san giving orders late into the night. Nor did Kirio-nee... nor did anyone, apparently. It really was a non-event, and Taichou didn’t let the Onmitsukidou in to search, so I guess he thinks its a settled issue.”

“A settled issue, huh,” Tenichi’s lips thinned, then, “Okay. If you didn’t see him, I guess it doesn’t matter if he came to Thirteenth. But the boy who Kirio brought back — the one who was here when I came to report Souja-dono’s death to Fukutaichou — is he all right? Kirio said he’d been targeted... did they resolve that at all?”

“Resolve..?” Ketsui frowned, remembering the encounter the previous night, then he shrugged.

“I haven’t had much to do with him, but I’ve heard he’s been up and around a little, so I guess he’s healing properly,” he hazarded eventually. “I haven’t had a single conversation with him, but if he can get up, that must mean he’s doing all right. I don’t know anything about anything else. Kirio-nee would be able to tell you, but I’ve had my hands full with Ichimaru-san.”

“I suppose so,” Tenichi looked thoughtful, but before Ketsui could ask him anything, they reached their destination, and the Eighth Seat strode forward, rapping smartly on the wooden door.

“Ukitake-taichou? I’m sorry for the abrupt invasion, but it’s Kotetsu Tenichi. I’ve come with an urgent message from Kikyue-dono — can I come in?”

“Tenichi?” Juushirou pushed back the door, glancing from older brother to younger, then, “and Ketsui too? Are you part of this deputation as well, Ketsui, or...?”

“No, sir. I had another matter to discuss with you, and met Ten-nii in the grounds,” Ketsui shook his head. “Seventh’s message seems an urgent one, so I thought he should speak to you first.”

“Well?” Juushirou cast Tenichi a quizzical look, and Tenichi reddened slightly, faltering for a moment beneath the intensity of his former Captain’s stare.

“Tenichi?” Juushirou’s prompt was soft-spoken, and Tenichi sighed, bowing his head before the older man.

“Kikyue-dono would like you to come to Seventh immediately, sir,” he said, his words suddenly deferential and polite in a way that made the two men seem like strangers, instead of former Captain and subordinate. “She said that there was a visitor and it was urgent. Apparently that’s why she sent me... she thought I might convince you to come more easily than a stranger.”

“Kikyue, but not Hi... Endou-taichou?” Juushirou questioned, and Tenichi shook his head.

“Taichou was called away at dawn,” he replied earnestly, at last managing to meet Juushirou’s gaze. “Apparently Ai-hime sent for him, and he left before most of us had risen.”

“I see,” Juushirou’s eyes became sober. “And Shunsui’s no good, either, is he? Today’s he’s going to Eighth to deliver reports to his brother... that’s why it has to be me?”

“I don’t know,” Tenichi admitted. “Kikyue-dono is in charge, and it was you she asked me to...”

“What was that?” Before Tenichi could finish his explanation, Juushirou clapped a hand down on his shoulder, sending an anxious glance in the direction of the Seventh Division barracks. “An unfamiliar reiatsu... and an angry one at that. When Kikyue said a visitor...”

“An attacker?” Ketsui whitened, his hand going instinctively to protect the scroll in his obi, and Juushirou’s expression became grim.

“I’m going to Seventh,” he said frankly. “Tenichi, Enishi is on patrol, but Naoko is in his office. Go report to her in full whatever it was you were sent to tell me, and that she’s to take charge here — in the event of any danger, she’s to send to Twelfth without waiting for my authorisation, and if Enishi comes back in the meantime, she should convey this information to him. When you’ve done that, return to the Seventh as quickly as you can. Ketsui,” he turned his gaze on the anxious Tenth seat, even as Tenichi saluted and disappeared into shunpo, “go find your recruit and stick to her like glue. Do you understand me? Whatever you had to tell me, it can wait till I come back — in the meantime, that task ought to take priority over anything else you had planned to do.”

Ketsui stared at his Captain’s grim expression, then nodded his head.

“Yes sir,” he said softly. “At once.”

The words had barely left Kikyue's mouth before the swirl of burgeoning reiatsu exploded into the courtyard of the Seventh Division, the force of the creature's shunpo exit enough to blow apart the slats of the substantial new barrier fence as though they were made of nothing more than paper. At first Kikyue struggled to see the face of their intruder, the haze of dust and reiatsu surrounding his body was too great but, as the debris from the explosion began to settle, she saw for the first time that it was not a creature at all, but a young man of around the same age of both Joumei and her brother. He was lean and dark haired, his unkempt appearance enhanced by the flickering energy around his body. He did not appear to be carrying a weapon, but the gleam in his blue eyes was both unmistakable and deathly familiar, and Kikyue swallowed hard, recognising both the intent to kill and the instinct for it lurking in those vivid depths.

Despite herself, Kikyue felt a chill run down her spine, and, more by instinct than conscious thought she grasped the hilt of her own weapon, moving to stand in front of the bloodstained Joumei. She cast the silver-haired refugee a sidelong glance, taking in the tension in his weary frame and the glitter of consternation in his argent eyes, but there was no time to say anything further, for with a second devastating whirl of reiryoku energy, the interloper advanced, his aura alone causing the Endou crest to rattle and tug free from its chains above the division gate. Like it had been fired forth from a cannon, it flew through the air, smashing through the roof of the division's training gymnasium with a tremendous crash. The severed chains dangled folornly in the breeze, colliding with a mournful, clanging chime.

"Everyone, get inside!" She screamed, and across the courtyard, the recruits who Ohara had been overseeing mere moments before shrank back towards the safety of the squad outbuildings. Though Kikyue inwardly derided their cowardice, she was also relieved at their quick obedience, for she had soon realised that she would struggle to protect both them and the Kitsune, and Ohara had not yet returned with his companions to help bolster Seventh's defences. Had Hirata been there, it would've been a different matter, she acknowledged to herself grimly, but he was not, and it had never been her battle strategy to stop and think of might-have-beens when there was a job to be done.

She summoned her courage, trying to emulate her brother's calm, professional front, then took a step forward, drawing her sword resolutely from its sheath and standing straight and indignant before the intruder.

“Get out of the way,” The man’s aura prickled with frustrated energy, his blue eyes absorbing her stance. “My business isn’t with you.”

“This is Seventh Division,” Kikyue held her ground, though her heart was pounding in her chest just from the force of his reiatsu. “I’m the senior officer in charge. An incursion here is an insult to my squad and my Clan and I don’t take either one of those lightly.”

“I told you, my business is not with you.”

“No, but you made it my business the moment you came here,” Kikyue twitched her weapon slightly in her grip. “You can leave, or I will kill you. Those are your options. Once you step into our territory, you take our justice. The Endou are hunters... we track down our prey.”

“Kikyue-hime, please, step aside!” From behind her, Kikyue could hear Joumei’s voice, “He’s Keitarou’s agent. He came from...”

“Do you think I haven’t realised that?” Kikyue’s eyes sparked with genuine anger at this, her resolution quashing her fear. “I’m not a little girl or a pampered princess, whatever Father might’ve told you about me. I can work things out for myself... if he’s come after you, he’s clearly on that side and that means it’s my job to kill him, no questions asked.”

“But hime...”

“Shut up!” Kikyue cut across the protests, staring instead at the ebb and flow of the intruder’s unusual reiatsu as she worked out how best to counter it. She had never before seen anyone whose spirit power was visibly glittering around their body, fluctuating and flaring like sunspots of iridescent light, and with a jolt she realised it was because it was raw and uncontrolled, a sleeping instinct driven by rage and hatred rather than by any formal training or instruction. Somehow this knowledge bolstered her, for she had trained long and hard against her Father’s Wind Hawk as a girl, and she had learned to counteract raw power with skill and speed.

“He’s Keitarou’s son, hime!” Joumei’s words broke her concentration once again, shattering her focus as the meaning of them sunk in. “The one who killed Souja-dono was his sister, he said so! He’s here to avenge her... and if he hurt you...”

“Keitarou’s son?” Kikyue’s eyes became slits of glittering rage, her own aura flaring and dancing indignantly as she regarded her enemy anew. It was true, she realised with angry clarity, for the blue eyes were a hunter's eyes and though they had never met, she could see enough in the curve of the man's jaw and the sweep of his brow to make a match between his features and that of her beloved dead brother. Somehow this only made her more furious, as though just by breathing this newcomer had somehow sullied Souja's memory, and she let out a soft hiss of disdain, shaking her head.

"I see. So this creature..is the spawn of my traitor aunt? A bastard Endou child?"

"Fine words from a little girl with a toy blade," her opponent's words dripped with hatred, and he raised his left hand, flicking it in the direction of the four or five recruits lagging behind the others, still within sight of the courtyard. He twitched his fingers out towards them, and to Kikyue's horror, a wave of psychic energy pulsed through the air, warping and distorting the atmosphere and sending the juniors crashing to the ground where they stood, each one laid out cold against the cobbles in a single strike. He turned cold blue eyes back towards her, a challenge in his gaze.

"They're not dead. Not yet," Every syllable of the man's icy words sliced through her. "Can you protect them from me with a pathetic piece of metal? I don't think so. Do as the vermin says and step aside... he's my prey, and I came to take his life. I didn't come to wage war with the dregs of the Endou gene pool, but if I have to go through your body to get to his, I'll do that too. Right now I don't care who I eliminate, so long as I reach the one I came for."

"Well, then we have a problem," Kikyue retorted blackly. "I'm not going anywhere. As a shinigami, it's my brief to kill you on sight. As an Endou, it will be my pleasure. Your sister killed my brother. Let me return the favour to your family by speaking for you. Mezame, Kaisoushu!"

Author's note:

Well, so the Kestrel is finally released. Kikyue's zanpakutou is called Kaisoushu 壊爪狩, which means "Broken Talon Hunter". The release command, 'Mezame' 目覚め means "awaken". More on it in the next chapter/AN.

Also, this week's manga — did anyone else feel like we stepped into the Wizard of Oz? "I'm going to take you to the palace! Come with me!"

Or maybe I'm just a bit bitter because Juu didn't get any dialogue...

48. Vengeance

Chapter Forty Seven: Vengeance

The mixture of reiatsu swirling through the powerswept Seventh courtyard was enough to make anyone feel dizzy.

Joumei dropped back against the wall of the barracks with an involuntary sigh, rubbing his temples as he struggled to focus on what was about to take place. His mind, tired and befuddled though it was, wanted him to step forward and interfere, but his body was unwilling to move... and so he found himself a helpless witness. He had once more become pathetic, he reflected bitterly to himself, yet there was nothing he could do. He had built up a long term tolerance to Sekkiseki, having been around it since he was a small child, but he had never been exposed to massive levels of reiryoku before, and he was quickly finding this to be his achilles heel. Inner Seireitei's enriched environment was already harsher on his battered body, but Katsura's appearance here had been the last straw. Whatever strength he had wielded in Rukongai, here, in the heart of the shinigami's spiritual domain, it was magnified many times, and had the building not been there to prop him up, Joumei felt sure he would've sunk to the ground, unable to even raise his head under the pressure of such hostile energy.

The sister had been one thing, but the brother...

His eyes narrowed.

Keitarou called him Katsura. It's the first time I've heard that name... which means this one... is probably outside of Seireitei's predictions. He's the unknown — the wildcard — and he's clearly something of a threat.

He moved clumsy fingers to his chest, feeling it tighten, but to his relief he could not sense the threads of the lurking, watching spider. He did not know whether Keitarou was watching the whole proceedings through his eyes, waiting for an opportunity to intervene to Kikyue's detriment in the way he had manipulated the fight in the Spiritless Zone, but at the very least he was not using him as a weapon in his own right.

His gaze flitted to the courtyard. Maybe Keitarou could not manipulate him fully this time, he acknowledged to himself, for if Katsura and Kikyue's flaring power levels were affecting his own spiritual awareness, maybe it was also weakening the exile's hold on his soul. Whichever it was, he was too weary and drained to move, the real strain of the last few days crashing over him in spades now that he had reached his intended destination and resolved on how to act.

His gaze darted in Katsura's direction, and he frowned.

If I can live a little longer, I can report to Hirata-sama, but better that one takes my life than Kikyue-hime's. I couldn't protect Hirata-sama's son, and doubtless his daughter is stronger than I'll ever be, but if there's a need, I'll have to meet it. I can't fail again.

A fresh flurry of reiryoku seared through the Seventh Division grounds at that juncture, and Joumei jerked his gaze across the cobbles to where the resolute figure of the Seventh Division's Third Seat stood, sword in hand. She had spoken what was probably a release command, though Joumei could not clearly make out her words, for the next instant the whole length of the silver blade had been engulfed in a whoosh of energy, sending scattered pieces of broken fencing flying across the yard in a miniature tornado. Despite himself, Joumei's expression became one of surprise and consternation. Did Kikyue also possess a Wind Hawk? Could such power be inherited? Souja had once told him that his sword, Iwanosuri, had manipulated stone, so Joumei had assumed that elements could not be passed from parent to child. As the chill wind whipped around the division, however, he found himself hurriedly rethinking his hypothesis.

Souja-dono used to talk about Kikyue-hime, and how she had started training so very early, but he never did tell me what her power manifested as. I jumped to the conclusion she was weaker than her brother... maybe I was wrong.

A sudden hush followed, and, as the dust and debris began to settle once more, Joumei blinked, squinting to make out the result of the young woman's release. Her blade had elongated and sharpened, curving slightly more than a normal katana, and the hilt, patterned with gold and fawn thread, extended from a diamond guard edged in sky blue crystal. It shimmered as it caught the light, or no, that was not just the effect of the sun's rays for, as Joumei watched, the glittering fragments of energy began to draw together. Spellbound, he watched as they knitted themselves into the unmistakable grey silhouette of a bird, two ghostly wings spreading out one on either side. It hovered like a hunting kestrel above Kikyue's head, and as Joumei's gaze flitted to Katsura, he realised the invader had faltered, similarly startled by this sudden manifestation.

It was then Joumei noticed that the very tip of Kikyue's blade had disappeared, the raggedy edge of the metal suggesting it had been broken somehow. Joumei's eyes widened as he realised what it meant. A shikigami? Kikyue's sword power is... spirit manipulation using her own blade?

Oblivious to her companion's thought processes, Kikyue thrust her sword forward, the kestrel above her head opening its beak in a silent screech of defiance. It launched itself across the cobbles at speed, an eerie glitter in its translucent eyes, and Katsura's expression hardened, his hands coming up instinctively to defend against its strike. A wave of psychic energy distorted the atmosphere once again, but the kestrel wheeled above it, sending another silent proclamation of its intent to hunt before coming in for the kill.

"Hadou no Sanjuu San: Soukatsui!" Kikyue slammed her free hand down against the end of the weapon's hilt, and the kestrel spirit arced in the air, extending its wings in acceptance of her command. It opened its claws, light glittering from the ends of its talons, and as Joumei watched in horrified fascination, he realised that this too was another facet of Kikyue's zanpakutou — a shikigami who could fight on her behalf, while she still held the blade in her hands.

"Get back from me!" Katsura's tones were angry, not frightened, and a second pulse of energy hit the kestrel head on, sending fragments of greyish energy like pieces of ash into the ether. The blue light exploded between them in a sudden glare of azure reiryoku, and it was all Joumei could do to shield his eyes against the sudden intensity of the glare. As the light levels began to return to normal, however, he saw that Kikyue had not been so distracted, for she had launched herself forward with a cry of defiance, the jagged end of her broken blade sweeping down towards Katsura's undefended left side. Distracted momentarily, Katsura stumbled back, only just managing to deflect her swing with a poorly formed flare of energy.

Joumei's heart clenched in his chest.

I underestimated the Endou hime. My apologies, Hirata-sama. I had no idea your daughter was capable of this.

The kestrel had gone, apparently dispersed by the kidou explosion, but as Katsura turned his focus to deflecting unarmed the determined slashes of an expert sword, Joumei saw the bird begin to take shape once more, the scattered pieces of its ghostly body pulled together like some kind of spiritual magnetism. Hunting spirit glittered in its eyes, and it seared down fearlessly towards Katsura from the other side. Slow to react, Katsura raised a hand to deflect it, but the bird neatly avoided his attempts, and Joumei winced involuntarily as the bird's talons ripped through the man's shoulder, leaving long jagged cuts through his clothing and his skin. Blood began to seep from the wound almost immediately, but if Joumei had thought Katsura was pinned back, he soon found himself mistaken.

A tremendous spasm of psychic energy rocked the barracks, dispersing the kestrel a second time, and forcing Kikyue to take a step or two back, shielding herself with an instinctive barrier Kidou.

"Two on one is a cheap fight trick," The intruder spat out, clearly all the more annoyed by the assault.

"So is attacking recruits who can barely hold a sword," Kikyue snapped back. "You chose to come here. The consequences are on your head. I told you that I'd kill you. Maybe you think shinigami are a pushover... but Endou ones aren't."

"That's not what I heard!" Katsura snapped back, anger and frustration in his bright blue eyes. "Your brother was killed by a girl with not even the faintest fragment of spirit power, you know. Duped and cut down by a child. I saw the blood and I know what happened to him. He was carved up on the end of Sakaki's blade, and good riddance to him too! Shinigami do nothing but cause trouble... and if I could, I'd kill you all!"

"Don't you dare speak like that about my brother!" Kikyue screamed back at him, and, as though reflecting the disturbance in her emotions, the kestrel's form wavered slightly, its intent to attack lessened and its body becoming more translucent than ever. Katsura smirked.

"Well? I thought you had the conviction to kill me," he said softly. "Are you backing off already, just because I made one little comment you didn't like?"

"I told you I'd kill you, and I will, dammit!" Kikyue flew forward again, but this time Katsura had her measure, and he ducked out of her range, flaring his own energy once more to force her onto the backfoot.

"Doesn't look like it," he taunted her, and to Joumei's dismay he realised that the interloper had moved beyond reason or rationale. Intoxicated by his own flood of power, his rage pumped reiryoku through his body, transforming it into the impetus to kill. He was, effectively, out of all control — even his own.

He hasn't been trained. His abilities are messy and his control nonexistent. Because of that... he's a loose cannon. Who knows what he's capable of... or how long he can sustain this before he burns himself out.

“Kikyue-hime!” At that moment Ohara rushed into the yard, Nakata and Hajime in tow, but Joumei’s relief at seeing the arrival of reinforcements was short-lived, for Katsura wheeled on them with an irritated glare, sending a concentrated flare of psychic energy in their direction. Nakata dropped to his knees immediately, Ohara not far behind him, and though the third man remained on his feet, Joumei could see his brow crease in determination, his gritted teeth and the white knuckles of the hand that gripped his zanpakutou showing that only force of will and resolution to aid his comrade was keeping him on his feet.

“Pitiful,” Katsura’s words echoed eerily around the devastated barracks. “I thought the Endou were more than just talk, but I guess you were lying. I’ve got your measure now, and I know how to kill you.”

“Shut up talking!” Kikyue snapped, her gaze flitting briefly to her fallen companions, but Katsura tut-tutted, taking a step towards her.

“They won’t do anything to help you,” he said dismissively, his eyes focused intently on her, and Joumei saw the kestrel hovering above Kikyue’s head once more, this time in a defensive posture, its body language announcing that it was ready to strike if the attacker came any closer. Katsura was unphased, however, for he took another step forward, and Joumei saw a truly terrifying smile cross his features.

“What?” he challenged. ‘Do you think your bird scares me? Do you think you scare me? Don’t be silly. I came here with a purpose and I intend to complete it. I want that,’ he waved a hand in Joumei’s direction, a ripple of energy following the line of his gesture, “and I want it dead. All other corpses are bonuses. They matter nothing to me, and nor do you.”

Somehow Joumei managed to fling up a barrier of his own, deflecting the worst of the casual psychic flare, but under the pressure of Katsura’s reiryoku, the defensive spell shattered like fragile glass, fragments of his spiritual energy joining the morass that already hung heavy over Seventh’s territory.

“I told you you’re not going to get him,” Kikyue rallied her determination, putting herself once more directly in front of Joumei, weapon drawn and tension running through every sinew of her body. From this range, Joumei could see the beads of sweat coursing across her brow, and Katsura laughed, apparently amused at her bravado.

“I can read your mind,” he said softly, and a chill ran through Joumei’s entire body, the same sense of horror reflected in Kikyue’s own gaze. 'I know everything you're thinking — about your brother, about that,' he cast Joumei a derisive glance, "everything. The moment you started thinking about your brother's death, you opened yourself up to me."

He shrugged his shoulders.

"Normally I can't penetrate through the thoughts of people with high level spirit power," he added, "but today seems to be my lucky day. Past experience has told me that if their emotions are shattered, I can read even those minds far more easily. And who knew? It looks like that was true. So I can avenge my sister... and send you to join that brother that you loved so much."

His gaze hardened.

"You call yourself a hunter," he murmured, "but you're the one who's ending up hunted."

Almost before he had finished speaking, his aura glittered with renewed energy, and Joumei's heart lurched in alarm as he realised that Katsura was gearing up to fire a decisive attack at his opponent. He intended to finish the battle, and then...

"Kikyue-hime!" Hajime's sword glittered briefly with light, as though he were preparing to release, but Katsura flicked a hand in his direction, knocking the blade clean from the Fourth Seat's grasp and sending the officer tumbling back onto the ground.

"Don't interfere. I'll kill you properly afterwards," he said coldly. "Right now I've business with your hime — and the vermin who thought he could interfere with my family."

"People who mess with the Endou don't live to tell the tale," Kikyue managed to rally herself, but Katsura snorted.

"You said it yourself," he said derisively. "In your own words — a bastard Endou. Isn't that what you called me? What applies to you applies to me, Kikyue-hime. It seems we're cousins... and in this respect at least, we're extremely alike."

He extended his hands towards her, unclasping his fists, and a concentrated pulse of energy shot out across the yard, making the entire atmosphere sway and twist as it crashed like a wave over the Seventh barracks. Kikyue seemed to brace herself, but Joumei could see that her kestrel's power had faded until the bird was little more than a ghost watching from above. He struggled to pull himself into a more upright position, taking one stumbling step and then another towards the epicentre of battle. Even as he fought to block the wave, however, he knew he wouldn't make it. The pressure of Katsura's oppressive reiatsu, coupled with his own weakened state made him slow and clumsy, and try as he might he could not bring together the concentration needed for one last shunpo jump. Even if he did get there, it might not be enough, but nonetheless... nonetheless...

The next instant Katsura's blaze of psychic energy ricocheted back across the yard towards its master, sending him flying off his feet with the force of the blow. He landed on the cobbles with a thud, momentarily dazed, and Joumei stared at him in disbelief, trying to work out what exactly had just happened. He had been so intent on his own movement that he had not registered a change in the spiritual pressure across the yard but, as he raised his gaze, he saw a fresh figure standing between Kikyue and Katsura, half silhouetted in the light of the sun. A white haori framed his body, the distinctive slashes of the number thirteen emblazoned across the back in black, and long white hair whipped against his shoulders in the breeze, torn loose from whatever tie had kept it neatly in place. In each hand he held a sword, long and pointed with a juttied back fin at the midpoint, the right one of which was glittering with residual light, as though it had just fired some kind of attack. Joumei swallowed hard, unable to comprehend what he was seeing.

"Juushirou... dono?"

Kikyue's voice broke through his confusion, and he stared at the interloper anew, his fogged brain finally putting together the pieces and identifying the new arrival.

Ukitake... Juushirou?

"Stand back, Kikyue," Juushirou's words were lacking in any of their usual geniality, and without a word, Kikyue did as she was bidden, something in the Captain's tones quashing her killer instinct and compelling her to obedience. She lowered her sword, the kestrel dissipating into nothing more than dust, and Juushirou turned to glance at Joumei. They met gazes for the briefest of instants, then Juushirou turned his attention back towards Seventh's intruder who was now picking himself up, getting to his feet and glaring at the newcomer in obvious disgust.

"What the hell was that? Who the hell are you? Get out of my way!"

Joumei could not see Juushirou's expression, but from the flicker of reiatsu that flared then settled briefly around the Captain's body, he knew that the District shinigami was unamused.

“This is Seireitei,” he spoke quietly, and suddenly the soft clinking of tokens on the thin reiatsu ribbon connecting his blades was the only sound in a yard that had fallen once more into a deathly hush. “I don’t know who you are or why you’ve attacked my comrade’s division like this, but launching an assault when the Captain is away is a coward’s game.”

“If he were here I’d kill him too!” Katsura spat out, and Joumei realised that the psychic energy was beginning to build up around him once more, the momentary lull having done nothing to calm his anger. “I told the girl, I’m not leaving till I get what I want! I’ll kill you too, if I have to — I’m not going to turn tail and run away. Shinigami don’t scare me... I’ve killed enough of them to know they’re not a challenge. If I have to, I’ll take you out too. You’ve been warned. Stay out of what isn’t your business.”

“I see,” Joumei saw the silver light glittering around the edges of Juushirou’s sword grow more substantial, and he gasped, his breath suddenly stifled as Juushirou allowed the stoppers on his own reiatsu to relax momentarily. “In that case, there’s nothing to talk about. Sougyo no Kotowari and I will have to subdue you by force... and have you answer to Seireitei’s justice.”

It was Katsura’s reiatsu that was flooding Seireitei.

Mitsuki rested her hands on the sill of Koku’s sick room, chewing on her lip as she interpreted the raw waves of energy coursing relentlessly through the atmosphere. Though she knew that her healing skills made the force all the more potent, she was not fool enough to believe that an aura of this level would be ignored by the Captains in the surrounding vicinity. It was distorted and rough, as though it had flared horribly out of control, and Mitsuki’s fingernails dug into the wood of the sill, drawing blood from the tips without her even noticing the pain. This was as far as possible from the young man who had smiled and teased her in the Spiritless Zone, and who had come in such fear and secrecy to beg for her silence. There was no mistaking the killing intent in his presence, and it tore at Mitsuki’s heart.

She sighed, turning back towards the bed. There was nobody else at Koku’s side at present, else she knew that she might throw caution and sense to the winds and head off to find Katsura herself, but she was only too aware of the risk of leaving a vulnerable young patient alone. She had undertaken to care for him, regardless of how much he seemed to resent her presence, and she knew that her responsibility as a healer would not let her abandon him. He was still sleeping deeply, apparently having overcome the trauma of last night's bad dream, and there would be nobody to miss her if she did slip out, yet she soon discarded the idea with a sigh.

Juushirou is trusting me. I can't let him down. If anything happened to Koku in my absence...

Another spirit power had risen to meet Katsura's, now, she realised, and though she had never seen the release before, she recognised the flare of reiatsu as belonging to the person who had slashed Koku's gut. Hirata's daughter. Which means... what does it mean?

A murmur came from the bed, and Mitsuki sat down reluctantly at the young man's side, watching as his eyelids twitched then flickered open, a dazed, hazy expression in their brown depths. He blinked a few times, as though to bring her into focus. He was breathing more quickly than normal, she realised, and his pale skin was unnaturally flushed, as though he were beginning a fever, but as she put a hurried hand to his brow, she felt only cold, clammy skin. She frowned, pushing her concern over Katsura aside and scrutinising the young man's demeanour more carefully. He was sweating profusely, she noted in alarm, though it was not pain but fear that was reflected deep in the brown eyes, and Mitsuki wondered if he was even able to see her at all. For a moment he didn't react to her touch, but then, as though triggered by some unknown force, he pushed back her hands, struggling to bring his body into a sitting position. Dragging huge gulps of air into his lungs, he rubbed his brow, and Mitsuki wondered whether he was trying to suppress another bout of nausea. She opened her mouth, about to speak, but before she could, thin, pale hands reached out to grab her around the wrist, making her jump.

Koku's lips moved, the sound barely coherent, but Mitsuki's heart almost stilled in her chest as she understood the three syllables he had uttered.

Katsura.

She stared at him in dismay, her mind racing. She could feel the overwhelming spirit pressure — could Koku possibly feel it too? But even if he could, that didn't explain... it couldn't explain how...

"I need to go... Katsura." Koku was speaking again, his words broken and hoarse. "Have to... stop him. Need... to... go..."

"Woah," Mitsuki regained her wits, grabbing him firmly by the shoulders and pushing him back down onto his pillow. "You're not going anywhere, Koku-kun. You're under orders to stay here and they're orders I'm going to make you obey. You just had another bad dream, that's all. Rest, and it will all..."

"He'll be killed," Koku's words were barely more than a whisper now, and Mitsuki gazed at the tears that now glittered on the young boy's lashes, stricken by the depth of emotion in his brown eyes. "Please, Edogawa-san. Let me go. Here... is no good. I can't... he can't hear me. I can't... make him stop."

At first, the real implication behind Koku's words didn't sink through Mitsuki's own sense of confusion, but, as little by little Koku's last words penetrated her thoughts, she sighed, her hold on his shoulders loosening.

"Stop him? Stop him how?" she murmured, and Koku swallowed hard, closing his eyes briefly to pull together his composure before meeting her gaze with a troubled one of his own.

"He isn't listening," he admitted softly. "I can't... reach him from here."

"Reach... him?" Mitsuki's eyes narrowed, then she drew breath sharply. "You mean... read his mind?"

"I can't read your thoughts now, Mitsuki-san, but I have read people's minds before. I don't know if it's normal or if it isn't — I don't know enough people with spirit power to ask"

Katsura's own words came suddenly to mind, and she drew her hand back from Koku's body, eying him in consternation.

"Can you read my mind? Or... or his mind?"

"No," Koku looked frustrated at her lack of comprehension, but he shook his head. "I can't. Only Katsura... if he wants to hear me, he will."

"You know Katsura from before?" Mitsuki demanded, and Koku drew a heavy breath into his lungs, lowering first one leg then the other over the side of the bed and grasping hold of Mitsuki's sleeve for support. He didn't answer her at first, and though Mitsuki knew she ought to be stopping him, she made no attempt to interfere. At length he shrugged.

"It's hard to put into words you'd understand," he admittedly.

"So you and he... are allies?" Mitsuki's brain lurched and wheezed back into life, putting together the fragments into a bigger picture. "He saved my life, and you tried to save Souja-dono's... so I suppose that makes sense. But... this reiatsu..."

“He’s angry,” Koku looked troubled. “I should’ve stopped it. Last night... I was going to...”

He rubbed his temples furiously, as though trying to recall something, and Mitsuki’s brows knitted together in consternation.

“Last night?” she echoed. “Last night, when you had your nightmare?”

“I don’t have nightmares,” Koku said grimly. “I wish I did. But right now, I... I need you to... believe me. I can stop Katsura. Maybe I’m the only one who... who can. And I want to stop him. I need to. I don’t want him to kill anyone... and you don’t want to lose any more friends, do you?”

“Kill...?” Mitsuki stared at Koku in alarm, and the young boy nodded.

“This reiatsu is out of control,” he whispered. “If we don’t stop it, someone will get hurt. Maybe Katsura, maybe... someone else. I can’t tell, it’s too... it’s too wild. It’s making me dizzy, but it’s my fault. I should’ve been able to stop this. Last night... I should have...”

Mitsuki gazed at him for a moment, then she got to her feet, hauling him up alongside her. He stared at her, non-plussed, and she offered him a rueful smile, kicking a pair of spare sandals across towards him.

“It’s cold on the cobbles, and you’ll split your feet,” she said matter-of-factly.

“You... believe me?” Koku stared, and Mitsuki nodded, grabbing a spare robe from a hook on the wall, and wrapping it firmly around Koku’s thin shoulders.

“I don’t know what connection you have to him, but I don’t want to see him — or anyone else — killed,” she admitted. “I don’t know why he came, or why he’s so angry, but this is not good. It’s just going to become a bigger incident, and if that happens...”

She froze mid-sentence as another, more familiar reiatsu pierced the air, and her heart clenched in her chest.

“Juushirou,” she whispered, horror curling around her heart, and Koku gritted his teeth.

“We have to go. Now,” he begged. “Otherwise... someone is definitely going to get killed.”

Mitsuki nodded her head, moving to open the sliding door. Before she could touch it, however, it moved back on its own, and she jumped back with a yelp, almost falling over Koku in her surprise.

“Edogawa-san?” Kirio flung out a hurried hand to right her companion’s balance, casting her a concerned look. “I’m sorry, I thought you’d have sensed...”

She trailed off, seeing for the first time Koku’s attire, and her eyes widened, a question in her expression as she glanced from Mitsuki to the young Rukon stray.

“Edogawa-san?” she murmured, and Mitsuki grimaced, hesitating for a split-second before making up her mind. She grabbed Kirio by the hand, giving it a little tug.

“Your shunpo will be better than mine, since I’m still healing,” she observed, “and with all the reiatsu, I’m not sure I can aim straight. Please, Hikifune-san, we need your help. I don’t want Koku running around the streets of Seireitei, but we need to go to Seventh. Something’s happened, and...”

“Seventh?” Kirio looked alarmed, then she shook her head. “But Taichou’s gone there. Ketsui told me so on my way back here... and just now, I felt his sword. If you go... if either of you were to go... interfering in the Captain’s business is...”

“People might die if we don’t go,” Mitsuki said seriously, and Kirio bit her lip, casting Koku another glance.

“This has something to do with you?” she asked, and Koku nodded his head.

“I think I can stop it, if I’m there,” he said softly. “Someone will die if I don’t go and try. I don’t want... anyone else to die. Anyone else.”

Kirio gazed at him for a moment, then her eyes softened.

“You’re serious,” she realised.

“We’re wasting time,” Mitsuki interjected. “It might sound crazy, Hikifune-san, but I believe Koku. I believe that if we go to Seventh now, we can stop anyone getting hurt. We can diffuse the situation. I’ll take responsibility with Ukitake-taichou — I intend to take full responsibility for it, anyway, whatever the outcome. But we can’t waste any more time here. We need to go. Now.”

Kirio pursed her lips, then she sighed, reaching out to curl her other hand around Koku’s wrist, tightening her hold on Mitsuki’s.

“I guess we’re going, then,” she said resignedly. “If people’s lives are at stake, I guess I have to just believe you. You're a healer, and Taichou trusts you, so I will too. And I'll just have to hope I survive the fallout later."

Likewise.

Mitsuki's heart flip-flopped as she registered the seriousness of the decision she'd made, but she knew it was too late to go back.

Whoever Katsura really is, I knew about him and protected him without bothering to find out everything about him. Maybe that was a mistake. Even if Koku knows him... no, because Koku knows him and wants to stop him, it makes me think there was something I needed to know and don't. Because of that, I've made naive choices... and if he hurts someone here, it will be partly my fault. Even if it's just a case that his spirit power has overloaded and he can't control it. I have things I need to talk to Juushirou about, clearly — but right now it's Katsura I'm most concerned with. We have to stop this... everything else can go from there.

She nodded her head at Kirio.

"I promise, it will be on my head," she said soberly. "Let's go."

Calling me to that poky little room to sign some dusty documents when there's so much more to be done was not the best use of time ever.

Pushing back the sliding door, Izumi stepped daintily out into the grounds, glancing around her for any sign of Ketsui, but he was nowhere to be seen and she let out her breath in a resigned sigh, picking her way carefully across the grass towards the willow tree, being as careful as she could to avoid the lingering dew that still clung to some of the denser patches. Though she liked the change of having soft earth and living flora underfoot, she had soon learned that damp tabi were not considered an acceptable reason to go inside and dry off, and, after a couple of drill sessions with wet feet, she had learned where best to step if she wanted to avoid a chill.

Naoko had been brisk and business-like with the documentation, and though Izumi had had no way to ask, she had got the distinct feeling that there was more than routine paperwork on the officer's mind. Despite her general apathy towards Seireitei's black and white clad military, Izumi had a certain amount of respect for this young woman, who, in a world that was still overtly masculine, held such sway and respect over all those around her. For that reason, she had listened obediently and followed instructions quickly and concisely, and as a result she had been finished quickly, hurrying from the office to rendezvous with the younger Kotetsu boy. Her scientific theories were still buzzing around her brain, and she was impatient to make sure that he had reported everything to Juushirou in clear, coherent detail. The shinigami chain of command was another mystery to her, but she had realised quickly that, whilst she was here, it would be better to adhere to it if she wanted to get anything done at all.

It's a pain, though. Shinigami have such odd rules. They care so much about such little things, and pay no attention at all to such huge ones. I suppose Oniisama knew what he was doing when he sent me here, but... Oniisama?

Izumi frowned, resting her hand against the trunk of the tree as she tried to pick out the very faintest of presences on the wind. Had she imagined it, or was that Joumei's reiatsu?

But why would he be here? Ukitake-dono said he wouldn't come, not so long as it was dangerous. It's surely still dangerous and Ketsui-dono and I have only just come to the proper conclusions about our enemy... why would you come here again so soon, Nii-sama?

She closed her eyes, reaching out her senses to try and latch on to that brief, familiar aura, but it was gone, swallowed beneath the waves of another, and Izumi could not be sure it had ever been there in the first place. She opened her eyes with a sigh, turning away from the direction of the Seventh, and sinking back against the trunk of the tree, reaching out to brush the delicate fronds of the willow with her fingers.

Imagination? Maybe. I didn't realise how much I would miss him, if I was so far away from home. Now I can't go back, and Hiko is dead, and... I suppose it makes me miss him all the more. He wouldn't come back here, though. He's not foolish. He'd stay away.

"It's just for a while, and for the sake of getting Keitarou's neck in a noose," she could hear his voice now, and see him darting from this chamber to that, gathering up whatever he thought she might need and pausing only to impart information at her in fits and starts. "I know you won't like it, and I'm sorry, but it's all I can do. This place will be attacked... I don't know when, but it's bound to be, now he's come so close. Juushirou-dono is honourable and he'll look after you. In return, do what you can for them."

Oniisama, you really do know how to hand out the most irritating jobs.

Izumi twisted the green leaves absently over her finger and thumb, bending but not breaking the delicate branch from which they hung.

I do like the fresh air, though, and sunlight is more and more appealing the longer I'm here. I suppose... I could've been landed with a worse mentor, too. He's not a Kitsune, but even though he's an Urahara, he doesn't seem like one tied up with the hate laws of that Clan. He has brains, and fortunately he seems to know how to use them.

A faint smile touched her lips.

I might actually consider liking him, if he didn't have such military manners, and if I didn't have to be here, running around at the shinigami's beck and call all the time. All this rank business is so silly. They're so stupid and frustrating and dense. It's mortifying to consider, but it's only the fact Ketsui-dono's allowed me to work on what I should be working on and has covered for me over sword drill that my life here is bearable. Why would I ever want to wave a sword around? It's ugly and ungainly and forces and kinetic energy are infant studies. Still...

The smile faded.

If what we worked out last night is true, things are going to get very, very dangerous here quite soon. Not just for me, but for a lot more people. Ketsui-dono might need to persuade Ukitake-dono that Keitarou is coming, but I know the probability is high. The evidence all points to that one hypothesis... I'm certain we're not wrong.

"We meet again."

The voice was soft, and at the sound of it Izumi opened her eyes wide, wheeling around to face the speaker with an expression of dismay on her young features. Tenichi was lounging up against the far gate of the garden, blocking her path between the grounds and the outer barracks. Though she had neither heard or seen him approach, he had clearly been there for a moment or two, for his sword was already drawn from his sheath and he was swinging it lazily back and forth in front of his face. At her clear distress he grinned, moving into a more upright position, and taking a casual step or two towards her.

"I didn't expect to see you here, all alone." Tenichi's tones were conversational, but Izumi was immediately on her guard, taking a step back as she read the fluctuations in his spiritual aura and understood his true reasons for singling her out were less than benign. "It must be fate that I get sent with a message and just happen to find you, loitering with intent like this in the Division gardens. Ukitake-taichou and Houjou-fukutaichou aren't around, Naoko-san is apparently busy, locked as far away from here as can be in a mound of paperwork, and half the rest of the division are on patrol. If my reiatsu reading is right, Kirio and Edogawa-san just left here too, and Ukitake-taichou thinks I'm reporting to Naoko-san, so he won't care if I don't follow him right away. My timing couldn't have been more fortunate — I must remember to thank Kikyue-dono later for sending me here like this.”

He offered her another smile.

“I thought you people only lived underground, but it looks like you’ve made a change in your usual living conditions of late,” he observed. “An interesting coincidence of timing — you appear at Thirteenth right after you and your companions found me in District Seven.”

Izumi glared at him, rallying her reiryoku to use her defensive hypnosis, but to her dismay the bright glare of the sun made it a struggle to hold his gaze without blinking or looking away, and Tenichi nodded in satisfaction.

“Now you know why I came into the garden this way,” he said conversationally. ‘With the sun behind me like this, you can’t stare me out like you did before. Oh, I know you did,’ as Izumi flinched back in surprise and consternation. “Twice, I think. I remember, just before I blacked out, and again, when I heard your name. I worried how best to counter something like that, and then it dawned on me.”

He gestured to himself nonchalantly.

“I don’t look like them, but there’s some Urahara blood knocking around inside of me, you know,” he added. “My father was apparently a pretty good scientist, and I can cobble together theories and draw conclusions from them enough to get by when it comes to strategy. In the darkness, you had power... but in the daylight, it’s not so effective, is it? You’re not used to the light... this is my environment, not yours. If you can’t stare into the sun, you can’t lay me out on the ground. I’m not as stupid as you think I am. I graduated top of my class at the Academy, and even if that means nothing to you, in these parts it’s considered quite a feat of achievement. You might’ve fooled everyone else into believing you’re a Gotei recruit, but I know better. I know you’re not.”

He took a step towards her, swinging his sword all the way round in a sweeping arc before taking it more firmly in his grip, and to Izumi’s dismay, the blade began to glitter with a dull reddish energy.

“I know who you are,” All levity had gone from Tenichi’s tones now, and, backed by the sun’s glare, the red haze reflected in his green eyes seemed all the more sinister. “You’re Izumi, you’re from that cursed silver haired tribe, and you shouldn’t be here. More, you shouldn’t be lurking around my brother. I don’t trust you, and I don’t want you anywhere near him. You don’t belong in Inner Seireitei.”

He raised the sword, and Izumi's heart skipped a beat as the glow of energy around the weapon grew denser still.

"I would ask you to leave, but I know you will just come back," he said softly. "I don't know what lies you've told Ukitake-taichou, nor what story you've fed my brother, but it's too dangerous to leave you be. It's time to begin sweeping up the loose ends, beginning with you. Kiba o muke, Reihahen!"

As the naginata began to take shape, Izumi took a step back against the tree, understanding the real raw edge to the other's reiatsu, and the genuine flare of killing intent that underpinned it. The gleam in the other's eyes had not been present when he had been their prisoner, his confusion and faltering answers making him simply suspicious, not someone she considered a potential threat. Yet now she knew that Tenichi was dangerous, and more, he had put together the information he knew about her in order to track her down.

Not a fool then. The younger brother, the older brother... I've underestimated both, but in completely different ways, and now...

She took a shaky breath into her lungs, trying to calm her rising panic. Tenichi flexed his fingers, gripping hold of the staff as the branches of the tree began to tremble and shake under the influence of his aura. In dismay she hurriedly stepped away from it, but Tenichi merely laughed, shaking his head..

"Ketsui needs to educate you better. You clearly don't know that a naginata is a range weapon, and a zanpakutou like mine can reach you wherever you think to hide," he said acidly. "This is the end of our short acquaintance, Izumi-san. Kobahashi!"

Author's Note: Kaisoushu

So when I think of Kikyue, I have this image in my mind of her, reiatsu flaring, with this spectral kestrel wheeling above her head, ready to take down her foes. Unfortunately I can't draw, so it stays in my head. I hope I conveyed some part of it in this chapter. Though up till now all of the Endou have had specifically elemental abilities, somehow this seemed to fit Kikyue's nature, as well as the fact her spirit power was high at an extremely early age. This is, of course, a shikai release. Kikyue doesn't have Bankai, though I would say she had potential to do so in the future. If it isn't already obvious, Kikyue is the most spiritually powerful of Hirata's three children. Souja was strong, and gifted in many respects, particularly the forming of Hell Butterflies, and he was a far more natural leader than his sister. But Kikyue's spirit potential is much higher. Souja's age, gender and position in the Clan put him in the Vice Captain's position, and he was not weaker than other Vice Captains in this regard — but Kikyue's weaknesses are her impetuosity and inexperience, rather than the ability of her weapon. The fact she can withstand Katsura's assault also shows this — where Joumei and her squadmates are thrown back, it is only when Katsura uses Souja's death to break down her mental barriers and starts reading her thoughts that he is able to put her on the back foot. I think it fair to say that Katsura's abilities put him at the very least at Vice Captain level.

The kestrel shikigami comes from the broken tip of Kikyue's blade, hence why the sword name means "Broken Talon Hunter", as referenced in the previous AN. It is formed from her own reiryoku, so when she weakens, so does the bird. It is capable of physical attacks, and also of acting as a medium for Kikyue's kidou, as witnessed in this encounter with Katsura.

For anyone who doesn't know what a shikigami is, it's a kami (literally, god, but really a more minor spirit) summoned and utilised on the behalf of its master or wielder, a person of spiritual prominence, eg Onmyouji. These can take the forms of animals, birds or other things, and are manipulated by someone with the spiritual knowhow to control them — but doing so also carries risk. This is why Kikyue had to begin her training at such an early age, so that she was able to gain control of her shikigami, rather than it gaining control of her!

And Tenichi. Well, what to say about him. Sigh.

49. Kin

Chapter Forty Eight: Kin

In the moments following the surge of reiatsu around Sougyo no Kotowari's blades, Joumei felt certain he must have lost full consciousness. Caught up in the swell of another shinigami's powerful reiatsu, he had been vaguely aware of his legs buckling beneath him, the reassuringly solid surface of the wall suddenly not so reliable as he began to slip towards the ground. Colours and lights had flickered and flashed through overloaded senses, as though someone had taken his body and spun him round and round several times before dropping him like an unwanted pebble onto a rocky shore, and then, as soon as it had come, the sensation was gone and he found himself lying on the ground, heart racing in his chest and the burning sensation of bile at the back of his throat. A desperate sense of self-preservation made him scramble into a more upright position, fearful of what the unexpected lull had meant.

For a terrible instant he thought that Juushirou must have been defeated, yet as he blinked and brought the world back into clearer focus, he saw the Captain, haori still flapping around his slender body, standing tall and proud with his released swords still gripped in both hands. As he struggled to relocate the wall which had been his firm anchor up until moments before, he caught Juushirou's eye, and a jolt of understanding, followed by one of humiliation washed over him.

It had been only a passing glance, but Joumei had seen concern in the hazel eyes, and he knew that Juushirou had toned down his reiatsu for his benefit.

Yet again people protect me, when my life is already worthless. I don't want more lives sacrificed here, especially not for my sake.

He opened his mouth to speak, but no words came out. Even if he had managed to form sounds, though, he knew that nobody would hear or heed them. Juushirou's attention had returned fully to the matter in hand and the invader, momentarily put off guard by the rebounding of his own psychic wave back towards him, was recovering his composure. Energy prickled around his fingers, more explosive than psychic this time, and Joumei's eyes flitted to Juushirou's left hand blade.

My judgement is skewed, so maybe I understood it wrong, but it looked as though Juushirou-dono took in Katsura's energy through that sword then fired it back from the other. If he'd done that, surely it would've rushed through his body too? He doesn't seem to have taken any harm from it, though. Father never talked to me about Juushirou-dono's sword, and I don't know if he ever saw it... but if it's really capable of absorbing and returning that level of condensed, savage reiryoku without taking damage himself, it must be a pretty fearful weapon. No wonder my senses were scrambled. No wonder Hirata-sama puts faith in him... if I'm right, it's possible this sword is more powerful than even the Wind Hawk.

"I would advise against firing any kind of Kidou in such a closely confined area," Juushirou was speaking now, his words calm and matter-of-fact, yet still lacking in any of his usual warmth. "If you weren't paying attention the first time, let me advise you before there's a second that burns this whole place to the ground. My sword has the power to return anything you fire at me. Anything at all. Your weapon becomes my weapon, and I have barely begun to release my sword. Your most sensible course of action is to surrender and be taken into custody, before anyone has to get hurt."

"Surrender?" Katsura's aura glimmered ominously, then he snorted, shaking his head derisively. He jabbed his finger in Joumei's direction once more, and though no attack came swirling through the air this time, Joumei's heart felt suddenly cold at the killer intent in the other's blue eyes.

"I came here to kill that," he said blackly. 'That killed my sister, and I want its blood in return. I don't care about you or any of the other shinigami. I'll kill any of you who get in my way. If you give me that,' he jabbed his hand at Joumei again, "then I'll leave this place intact. But I'm not going to just turn tail and disappear. If it costs me my life, I intend on avenging my sister's murder."

"Your sister murdered my brother first!" Kikyue's words broke through Juushirou's momentary stunned silence, and Joumei swallowed the huge lump rising in his throat, seeing first shock then horrified comprehension sweep through the hazel gaze.

"Your... sister?" he murmured, followed by, "Kikyue, you know who this lad is?"

"He's Keitarou's son, Juushirou-dono," Kikyue's voice shook — with hatred or emotion, Joumei couldn't tell. "Joumei came here to report to Father that he'd killed the bitch who took my brother. Then he appeared," she thrust her sword in the direction of the intruder, and Joumei was struck by the similar resentment in her gesture and in Katsura's own. It was the Endou features, he realised with dismay, twisting into a mask of hatred, and glancing at Juushirou, he realised that the Captain had realised the same, for Juushirou looked as though he had seen a long dead ghost.

“Eiraki-hime,” he murmured, then his eyes darkened, and Joumei saw the pale fingers tighten around the hilts of both weapons.

“I don’t know what happened between Joumei and your sister,” he spoke in matter-of-fact tones that belied the troubled expression on his face. “Nor does it matter that I find out. I want to know, though, whether Kikyue’s words are true. Are you truly Aizen Keitarou’s son?”

“Why would I tell that to someone protecting someone I hate?” Katsura countered, and Joumei felt the faint ripple of frustrated energy tease its way through Juushirou’s lean form. Somehow he kept his hold on his temper, however, and the silver swords remained silent, however much they hummed with suppressed energy.

“Are you Kohaku?” At length Juushirou’s question came, and Katsura laughed, shaking his head.

“You wish,” he said softly. “My name is Katsura. Aizen Katsura. There. Does that make you happy, shinigami?”

“Kat... su... ra?” Now there was no mistaking the stricken expression on Juushirou’s features, and Joumei frowned, surmising that his earlier supposition had been right.

Seireitei didn’t know about this one. Nor did I.

“That’s right. Katsura,” there was a level of swagger in the other’s tones now, a sort of hedonistic giddiness in his stance, and Joumei chewed on his lip, understanding Katsura’s lack of fear in the face of such a dominant zanpakutou.

Keitarou told him to hold back, but he came anyway. Probably he knows his life is forfeit both here and there, but his resolve is firm nonetheless. He came to avenge Sakaki, and that’s all that’s on his mind. To avenge his sister’s death... by killing me. I brought a volatile explosive into the heart of Shinigami territory without even realising it. Ichimaru Joumei, what a careless fool you’ve become.

“Now you know my name, are you content to either die or step aside?”

“On the contrary,” Juushirou seemed to gather himself, his reiatsu settling and pooling once more into the weapons’ gleaming blades. “If you’re Keitarou’s son, then it’s my duty to kill you.”

“Do you think you can?” Katsura mocked, and, to the watching Joumei, the flinty smile Juushirou gave in return was truly terrifying.

“It’s not in my nature or usual practice to kill those who, spiritually, are no more than babes in arms,” he said disparagingly. “I would prefer you to surrender, so I can hand you over to people better suited to dealing with complicated prisoners and difficult political circumstances. I am still a shinigami Captain, though, and the kill-on-sight order does extend to me. Whatever your provocation, you are considered a felon and an outlaw and as such, expendable. I’m not inclined to kill someone who hasn’t shown themselves to be a danger... but from the manner of your approach here in Seventh, clearly you’re a threat and it’s my duty to stop you.”

He raised his weapons, and Joumei felt the swirl of dizzying reiatsu begin to rise once more.

“Your last chance to surrender,” he said softly, “or I will be forced to enact the Council’s decision without mercy.”

“Juushirou! No!”

What happened next, Joumei did not really know, for one minute Juushirou had been preparing to activate his sword, and the next three more figures had appeared in the Seventh courtyard — two dressed as shinigami, and one in little more than night robes, the loose fabric giving away the fact that his torso was heavily bandaged underneath. One of the shinigami had darted forwards, grabbing Juushirou’s right arm with little attention to her own safety, and Juushirou cursed, pulling back his weapon in a hurry and casting the newcomer a startled look.

“Mitsuki? What are you...?”

“Please, don’t kill anyone,” the girl called Mitsuki begged, not loosing her hold on Juushirou’s white-haori sleeve, and to Joumei’s surprise the Captain lowered his weapons completely, passing his left blade into his right hand before moving to pry her free from his robe. She held firm, however, despite his best attempts, and Joumei was struck by her persistence.

“Why did you come here?” the Captain demanded, followed by, “Hikifune?! What is Koku doing here? I thought you of all people had better sense than to...”

“I ordered her to,” Mitsuki cut across what had appeared to be the start of a scolding, and Joumei’s gaze fell once more on the straggly third member of the party. He was thin and clearly weak, for he had sunk down onto the cobbles the moment they had dropped from shunpo, yet the moment Joumei met the boy’s brown gaze, he felt a sense of cold foreboding swallow him up inside. There was something closed in Koku's expression, an odd tension in his body, and Joumei's eyes flitted across the courtyard to where he felt sure Katsura must be rallying his power to launch a new attack.

Keitarou sent another ally into the fray to distract Juushirou-dono, so that Katsura could kill me and escape. I should've known better than to assume I'd thought out all of the layers of his plan... but I hadn't realised that the poison was so deeply ingrained into the roots of the tree.

To his surprise, however, Katsura had lowered his hands, a stricken expression on his own features. He was no longer looking at Juushirou, nor at Joumei, but instead his gaze was fixed on the shabby newcomer, and Joumei saw him shake his head slightly, as though something had been said that troubled him.

"I can read your mind,"

With an inward gasp, Joumei remembered Katsura's own words to Kikyue what seemed like an eternity earlier, and his eyes snapped back towards Koku, alarm flooding through his sluggish body.

He's giving him new orders. He's transmitting on a frequency the shinigami can't hear... so they won't be able to prepare. I need to warn them... need to make them understand... what... he...

The next moment the brown eyes met his and the thought died in his throat, colours lurching and swimming before his gaze. He struggled to pull the fragments of thought back together, but they drifted tantalisingly away from him, swamped and distorted by unwelcome images of the underground tunnels and the bloodsoaked bodies of his Kitsune kinsfolk. He buried his head in his hands, but covering his eyes could not remove the pictures from his brain.

"Let go of me, Mitsuki!" Finally Juushirou shook himself free, shooting his companion an unreadable look, and Joumei could tell just by hearing his voice that tension was coursing through every single inch of the Captain's body. "I know you don't like it, but this is the Council's order. I told him to surrender, and he refused. He's hurt members of Seventh and threatened lives. Do you expect me to just stand back and let him do as he pleases?"

Mitsuki did not answer, and when he raised his gaze, Joumei saw her shoot the Captain a pained expression. She reluctantly took a step back, turning to glance in the direction of the intruder. He seemed to sense her gaze on him, for he turned, and Joumei drew breath sharply as he saw horror and dismay flood the young man's features.

"Stop this," Mitsuki's words were soft, but they carried across the silence of the Seventh's barracks. "It isn't right. Please. Stop it."

Katsura hesitated, the killing aura around his body completely dispelled by the unexpected intrusion, and he glanced from Mitsuki to Koku, clearly uncertain about what to do. Juushirou took a step forward, and Joumei could see what was clearly the beginnings of a Bakudou spell glistening around his fingertips. So despite his earlier resolve to kill, Joumei reflected, the District shinigami was going to take a prisoner anyway. Was this Mitsuki such an influential figure that she could change a Captain's mind? Or... no. Joumei frowned, berating himself for being so slow. It wasn't that she was important or influential — but that Juushirou did not want her to get hurt in the fall-out of his sword's attack.

He cares for her. Keitarou's been smarter than I thought, bringing Juushirou-dono's Achilles heel into the heart of battle so that his loose cannon son can escape unscathed.

"For God's sake, run!"

Before Juushirou could fire the Bakudou spell, a bloodcurdling scream erupted from Koku's lips, making Joumei jump at its sudden shrillness, and causing the shinigami who had been crouched at his side to start, staring at him in dismay. Across the courtyard of the Seventh, the dazed and fallen figures of Kikyue's subordinate officers were beginning to recover themselves, and Kikyue too had taken hold of her weapon once more, clearly ready to release the kestrel in pursuit of the foe should he put up a fight. Yet something had changed in the intruder's entire demeanour. Juushirou darted forward, spreading his fingers into the Bakudou, and Katsura brought his hands together for a final pulse of powerful spiritual energy, disintegrating the binding spell in a haze of blinding light. As the dust and glare cleared, Kikyue let out an exclamation of dismay, for where the boy had stood a moment before, there was now no sign.

"He's escaped!" The officer who had kept his footing for the longest uttered a stream of ungentleman-like curses, turning to glance at the two officers behind him, who were picking themselves up off the ground, rubbing dazed heads and fumbling for lost swords. "Kikyue-hime, permission to chase after him! Given that amount of energy expended, he can't have shunpo'ed far!"

"I'm coming too," Kikyue said frankly. "Juushirou-dono, I'm sorry I brought you into our problem. Clearly this is an Endou matter and the interloper is an Endou's life to take. My men and I will take care of it from here."

She bowed to him curtly, then was gone, her companions following her shunpo with staggered steps of their own, and Juushirou sighed, sealing and sheathing his sword. He rubbed his temples, clearly troubled, turning towards Joumei.

“Was what he said true?” he asked softly, and Joumei nodded.

“I killed Sakaki,” he said grimly. “I came here to confess to her murder, and be judged accordingly. My life has no worth to protect it, Juushirou-dono. Please, don’t trouble about me. Go after the enemy... I was foolish to come here and bring such danger to Seireitei, but I didn’t understand...”

“Taichou!” Kirio’s words broke through his sentence, and at the urgency in it, Juushirou turned to glance at his Sixth Seated officer, faint censure in his gaze.

“I hope you have an explanation, Hikifune,” he said quietly, and Joumei could hear the disapproval in his tones. “Removing a patient from the secure custody of the division and bringing him into a battle situation is a serious matter. Edogawa-san has no authority to give you orders and you know that. You should have remained in Thirteenth. You and Koku both. In the meantime...”

He turned, words failing him as he glanced around him, and Joumei’s eyes widened in surprise as he realised the healer who had clung on to Juushirou’s arm so desperately a few moments earlier was now nowhere to be seen.

“Mitsuki?” Juushirou’s lips moved almost subconsciously, a moment of panic in his gaze, and Joumei knew his suspicions had been right.

Juushirou-dono is in love with that girl. Even though it looks like she’s an agent of the enemy... Keitarou’s arsenal always has dug deep roots.

“I’m sorry, Taichou,” Kirio was penitent, and she bowed her head low before her superior officer. “I know it was foolish, and I realise I shouldn’t have done it, but Edogawa-san was adamant. She said there was danger and that people were going to die. The reiatsu was upsetting Koku, and... we weren’t to leave him alone... so...”

“So you brought him into the field of battle,” Juushirou cut across her, and Kirio flinched, nodding her head.

“I’m sorry,” she repeated. “It was a stupid thing to do. I just got caught up in Edogawa-san’s urgency, but I didn’t... it’s no excuse. I just had to... she wanted me to help, and I... felt that I...”

“You felt you had to do something about it?” Juushirou’s gaze flitted to Koku, a thoughtful expression on his face, and Joumei wondered if the Captain knew more than he was letting on. “I think that’s something we’ll need to talk about in more detail, but for the time being, I want you to take Koku to... Koku? What are you doing?”

For the young invalid had pulled himself unsteadily to his feet, half stumbling, half walking across the broken barracks towards where Joumei sat huddled against the wall. At the sight of him, the Kitsune instinctively flinched back, but Koku was not repulsed by his reaction, merely sinking down on his knees a foot or so away from the other man.

“I’m sorry, Ukitake-dono,” he said contritely. “It’s my fault we came here. All of it is my fault, not Edo-gawa-san’s and not Kirio-san’s. I asked them to bring me here. I wanted to stop... people getting hurt.”

“I see,” Juushirou’s lips pressed together for a moment, then, “and did you think that, by coming here, interrupting my battle and letting someone who had attacked and threatened the members of this division go free, you had prevented people getting hurt? Their lives are all still now in danger, because we failed to take that young man into custody.”

“But the fox is hurt,” Koku’s words were only half-focused, his brown eyes slightly dreamy as he reached thin, grimy fingers out to touch the edges of Joumei’s torn hakamashita, and he twitched back, wrapping his arms protectively around his body.

“Get away from me!” he spat out. “I know what you are and if you think I’m going to let you touch me...”

“Kirio, take Koku back to Thirteenth,” Juushirou said frankly. “Clearly he’s confused and upset by the environment, and when he calms down, I’ll have things to say to him — and to you — but for the meantime...”

“If you take me back now, the fox will die.” Koku’s words were sing-songy and melodic, yet there was an edge to them that made Juushirou stop mid-sentence, eying the youngster anew.

“Koku?”

“There’s poison inside of him. You can’t break it. He can’t, either, but I can. I can break it.”

Koku’s hazy brown eyes bored into Joumei’s silvery ones, and the Kitsune suddenly felt as though he were drowning. He was falling over the edge of that cliff, sinking deep beneath the earth, chased into the tunnels... the roof was coming down over Hiko’s bloodied body once again, then he saw the corpses of his kin, overlaid with that final glimpse of Sakaki with her heart burned out. He felt the ice cold fingers press against his sword-torn torso, sending judders of pain and energy through him as his spirit power and the young boy's made contact, but he found himself unable to pull away. He coughed, choking, as something dark and cloying suddenly wanted to erupt from within him, the pain in his heart so excruciating he felt it was about to burst and then, with the next heartbeat, he was enveloped in a delirious, glorious freedom, as though tight restraints had been removed from his chest. He choked again, vaguely aware that something dark had begun to break forth from his mouth and his ears, drifting like smoke into the air before disappearing like harmless ash on the wind. Koku's touch was gone from his body, and so was the pain, and, as he blinked the world back into focus, he saw the young boy on his hands and knees, face grey and breaths coming in ragged, heaving gasps. He looked on the verge of passing out, yet as Joumei stared at him, he managed a faint smile.

"It's gone," he said faintly, and Joumei's fingers went to his chest, eyes widening as he realised the implication in the boy's words. "It was harder this time, but it... it's gone."

Keitarou's hold over me. He... did he just break it? But why?

"I don't understand," he murmured. "I killed the girl... why would you..?"

Koku's smile widened slightly, but it was a detached smile, making his whole expression somehow surreal.

"I don't like people dying," he said simply, and Joumei paused, processing this for a moment.

"You called me a fox... you know... who I am?"

"I saw you before, in the tunnels," Koku agreed. "I wanted to help you then, but I was... I was too late. People... died. But a fox escaped. It was you, wasn't it? The silver fox who escaped the hunter and lived to tell the tale?"

Numbly Joumei nodded his head, remembering again Hiko's death, and the subsequent conversations with Juushirou and his companions over Keitarou's intent.

I should've seen that link before. The one who gave the warning to Juushirou-dono about the attack on the Kitsune... who else could it have been but you? But then that means I'm wrong. I've understood nothing... nothing at all.

"Joumei? Are you all right?" The next moment Juushirou himself was at the Kitsune's other side, preventing further conversation, and Koku wobbled, almost falling headlong onto the cobbles. Instinctively Joumei reached out a blood-stained arm to catch him, and Koku cast him a startled look, receiving a rueful grin in return.

One good turn deserves another. Maybe Keitarou is wrong, too. Perhaps the apple falls further from the tree than I'd understood. I need more information before I create further ructions and risk further lives. Whatever I don't know, I'm now in this boy's debt. I need to know whether that kindness has a price... or was given freely.

"What did you do to him?" Kirio was at Koku's other side, supporting his body now with her own arms, turning an accusing expression on her charge, but Koku had moved beyond words now, and it was Joumei who answered.

"He didn't hurt me," he assured her. "On the contrary... I think he... healed something within me."

"Healed you?" Juushirou was taken aback, and Joumei nodded.

"Keitarou's hold over me is gone," he said softly. "I don't know how, but I can tell that it is. That kid broke it. Somehow, when he touched me, it unravelled and just... fell apart."

"Koku did?" Juushirou's gaze flitted towards the young invalid, who, his energy apparently spent, had slumped into a semi-conscious stupor in Kirio's arms. "Then is that why he wanted to come here? To help you? At first you sounded like you recognised him, but then..."

"I don't know why he came here," Joumei said truthfully. "I've never met him before. I thought I knew... but I realise now that I don't know anything about him at all. I jumped to the wrong conclusions, but I don't suppose I understand why he did what he did. I just know it's true. He broke Keitarou's hold over me. He called me a fox that survived the hunter and lived."

"Koku is an idiot, but he really doesn't like people dying. And apparently he doesn't like them dying to the point he'll put everyone in silly danger to make sure it doesn't happen," Kirio muttered. "I'm really sorry, Taichou. I should've known a whole lot better."

She glanced at Joumei.

"I don't know who you are, but you look a lot like our recruit, Ichimaru-san, so I'm guessing you're family of hers?" she hazarded, and Joumei nodded. "Perhaps that's why Koku was aware of you... maybe Ichimaru-san said something to him, or... not that I can think of when she'd have managed to do that... but... maybe it was you Koku wanted to run away. Because otherwise...”

“Otherwise it was the young lad called Katsura,” Juushirou looked troubled. “We will have to investigate this more thoroughly when he’s more able to talk... and Mitsuki is still not back. Perhaps she’s gone to Fourth, or returned to Thirteenth, but I can’t pick up her reiatsu.”

He sighed, getting to his feet and hauling Joumei to his.

“I would ask her to look at your own wounds, but for now, it seems picking up the pieces of this Division before the Captain returns will have to suffice,” he added. “Kirio, I want you to take Koku back and ensure he does not leave his room this time under any circumstances. Carry him back, please — I don’t want to put him through another shunpo when the last one clearly affected him and he looks so grey. In the meantime, I’ll see to settling things here and then return myself. Kikyue’s made it clear that she considers this an Endou matter and honestly, I’m not sure I feel like overruling her until I understand more about what happened here today. In the meantime, Joumei, I think it best you stay close to shinigami territory and don’t venture too far afield. If everything said in that confrontation is true, this is not an enemy you should face alone, and Hirata would be cross if we let you. At the very least, your evidence must be heard... so I think it’s best you come back to Thirteenth with us.”

“I don’t want to bring trouble on your Division too,” Joumei protested, and as though he had heard the man’s words, Koku raised weak, clumsy fingers, reaching out to brush Joumei’s arm. At the contact, a prickle of something like electricity rushed through his body, and he gasped, his chest constricting.

“Koku? Are you still with us?” Kirio gazed down at her burden, concern in her eyes, and Joumei saw the heavy lashes lift, blurry eyes seeking his out.

“You can’t stop it,” he murmured, his words so faint and slurred together Joumei could only just make them out, “but you should go there. Please, go there. To Thirteenth. It’s... not his fault...”

With that his energy seemed to desert him, but just before Koku’s fingers slid away from Joumei’s skin, an image flashed into the Kitsune’s mind, and his eyes widened in horror.

“Izumi!” he exclaimed. “Izumi’s in danger at Thirteenth!”

The heavy tree branch juddered and shattered into a thousand wooden splinters, and Izumi dropped instinctively to the ground, her heart pounding in her chest as she felt the whoosh of them passing over her head. She could sense Tenichi's reiatsu all around her now, for it had tainted every broken fragment and they scattered like rain around her prone body, scraping against her hands as she tried to cover her eyes and face. How much control he had over the tiny shrapnel she did not know, and though her brain feverishly struggled to calculate the force and range of the weapon she had seen for only the briefest of moments, her panic jolted her rationale apart, making it impossible for her to come to a clear conclusion. Her scientific theories were no protection against the immediacy of facing weaponry, she realised with a sickening sense of foreboding. This was why the shinigami practiced so long and hard with blades — for the times where nothing but brute force could protect them from harm.

Other people hold swords, and other people don't have any scruples about killing. If you can't fight back, you die. It's no different being a shinigami from being a Kitsune. Niisama thought I was safe here, but clearly, I'm not.

"Is that the best you can manage?" Tenichi's voice had shifted slightly, indicating he had moved his position, and Izumi snuck a glimpse between the strands of her silvery fringe, watching as he picked his way over the shattered remains of the tree branch. He positioned himself directly before the garden's white boundary fence, swinging his weapon around in an experimentary wheel before readying for his next attack. He had not moved enough for her to use her hypnosis, she realised with consternation, but the thin panels of wood would provide much more devastating ammunition than the unwieldy, stubborn branch of an aging tree, and she instinctively tensed, wishing she had run for more protective ground but now knowing she could not risk getting to her feet.

"I had expected more fight," Tenichi moved closer to her, prodding her prone body with the tip of his weapon, and causing her to flinch, but he laughed, taking a step back. "No, I'm not going to slice your pretty throat just yet. I want information from you first. I want you to tell me who you're working for... and why you're here. I want to know precisely what you intend for my brother."

Izumi raised her head defiantly, glaring at him, and Tenichi swung his weapon between them, allowing the sunlight to glint off the silver tip. The glare caused Izumi to blink, shielding her gaze once more, and Tenichi nodded.

"Don't look at me," he commanded. "Answer my questions, and then I'll decide what's best to be done with you."

His eyes narrowed.

“You might think I’m not geared to kill women,” he murmured, “but if its Ketsui who’s at risk, there’s very little I won’t do. I have far too much to lose to just stand back and let you run around on whatever nefarious ends brought you here. I’m not fooled, even if everyone else is — so talk.”

Izumi pulled her body into a sitting position, still shielding her eyes from the sun’s glare with her left hand, and with her right she rubbed her throat, opening and closing her mouth and then shaking her head. Tenichi pressed his lips together pensively.

“Are you trying to convince me that your mute act in the tunnels wasn’t an act?” he demanded, and Izumi could hear scepticism in his tones. “Do you believe I’m simple? Whatever you did there, there’s nobody here who can speak in signs. To communicate with anyone here, you must have a voice — so prove it. Use it. Tell me where you came from and who you’re working for. Do it quickly... else I’ll take the risk and kill you anyway. It’s no bones to me. It would actually suit me better that way — but I want to know what errand you were sent here on first.”

Izumi clamped her mouth shut obstinately, lowering her hand from her throat, and Tenichi’s grasp on his naginata tightened as he waved it in her direction.

“You think I’m bluffing?” he challenged her. “You think I won’t dare hurt you, here, in my old Division lands? But there’s nobody to come to your rescue. The only person on site who could seriously challenge me is Naoko-san, and she’s as far from here as she can get, locked away with all the division paperwork. Do you think I’m careless enough to let my spirit power flare so much it can be felt from across the other side of the division?”

He grinned, and Izumi caught a side-glimpse of the expression, chilled by the lack of emotion in the other’s eyes.

“Ukitake-taichou sent me to report to Naoko-san,” he said softly. “I didn’t obey that order, but I did go towards the office. I was going to report, but I saw you leave, and I took my opportunity to follow you instead. But before I did...”

He held up his left hand, and Izumi saw a glitter of kidou pass briefly across the palm.

“I cast a barrier spell around the Vice Captain’s office,” he continued evenly. “I’m quite good at Kidou. I’m only ranked at Eighth Seat within Seventh Division, but that’s because I transferred and had to rank up again in a Clan squad from a lower start position. If I’d stayed here, I'd have outranked Kirio and Atsudane. I'd have been Thirteenth's Fourth Seat by now, only I chose to leave. Everyone here knew it, and I knew it too. Rank is deceptive when you come from the Districts, as are power levels. Everyone at the Academy tipped me as a future officer of rank and position, and that's my ultimate target. I want to leave behind the Kotetsu family past, and build a new name — for me and for Ketsui, here and in Seventh. I don't intend to let you — or Keitarou — or anyone else get in my way."

He lowered his hand back to the pole of the naginata.

"I know my Vice Captain's death is something to do with you people," he said coldly. "I know you're cursed, and you're dangerous. Whatever lies you told Ukitake-taichou, you won't fool me with them. Souja-dono's death happened because he met with you — the night you found me, and the night he died. The Onmitsukidou told me it was all your fault, and he was right about everything else he told me, so I believe he was right about you too. Endou-taichou might believe you're his people, but I don't. I'm sure you're working for the devil and because of it, my Vice Captain died. You lured him into visiting Rukongai, so that bitch would see him and cut him down. I've heard the rumours, that someone predicted his death! I bet it was you people, in your dark tunnels and with your shadowy magic, twisting things to your own ends!"

His voice shook with anger, and despite herself, Izumi flinched back, her eyes widening in surprise as she interpreted the meaning in his words.

Predicted...?

"Now you're here, stalking my brother, and I won't have it," Tenichi had still not finished. "I won't let Ketsui get hurt! Whatever Father did or didn't believe, that past is past! I won't let Ketsui be dragged down into Keitarou's games by creatures like you, and if that means blooding my blade and slitting a few throats, then that's what I'll do. The Endou believe in getting vengeance for their dead. If I can be even a little bit Souja-dono's vengeance, maybe then... maybe then it will finally all be over!"

In her consternation, Izumi's hand had momentarily slipping from its position shielding her gaze, and Tenichi cursed, tilting his weapon to dazzle her a second time.

"Don't try anything," he warned her. "I'm quite serious. I can kill you any time I please, so the quicker you talk, the better it will be for both of us."

He's not working for Keitarou.

The realisation shot through Izumi like a bolt of lightning, followed by,

We thought he was, but he thinks I am. He thinks that the Kitsune are Keitarou's people, which means...

She swallowed hard, waving her hands hastily in front of her face as if to indicate that he'd got the wrong impression, but Tenichi's brows knitted together, his jaw hardening at her lack of forthcoming.

"I don't understand hand twitches," he said darkly. "I told you. Speak to me. I don't believe you can't do it... you're just refusing. You're prevaricating, hoping I'll back off. I guess that I will just have to show you that I'm serious."

But we're not enemies!

Izumi's frustration bubbled over inside of her, and she opened her mouth, but although she could mouth the words, no sound came out. Tenichi snorted, and Izumi felt his reiatsu swell again, as he prepared to launch another attack. Panic surged inside her, rooting her to the spot, and everything seemed to go into sudden slow motion, with only the racing beat of her heart growing quicker and louder within her skull. The pulse was so loud it deafened her to the splintering of the wood fence, softening their whistling flight through the air, yet this time she could not duck or dive in her own defence. Her own mistake, coupled with Tenichi's paranoid assumptions kept rattling round and round within her head.

He's Daisuke-sama's son. He's not our enemy. I'm not his enemy. We were wrong. He was wrong. Everything was wrong...

She screwed up her eyes, expecting to feel the stabbing pain of wood shards burrowing deep into her pale flesh, piercing her organs and stilling her life, but, instead of rushing agony and death, she felt the flare of something else, alien and strange, yet unmistakeably real. From somewhere outside the dark, deafening world of her panicked heart she thought she heard language, and she opened one eye cautiously, the other snapping open the next second as she registered the scene before her.

A thin sheet of what Izumi could only describe as glass had sprung up between her and her attacker, and the broken pieces of fence wood had glanced harmlessly off it. Despite how delicate the crystalline barrier appeared, it had stood firm, for the sharp edges of the projectiles had been physically blunted on impact, some of them splitting in two as they fell to the ground.

It was the figure standing to her right, however, almost concealed from view by the remains of the broken tree that really took her breath away. Sword drawn, and with a look unlike any she had ever seen cross the gentle, half-dreamy features stood Ketsui, his entire body rigid and his gaze fixed not on Izumi herself, but on Tenichi. Izumi's gaze darted between the two brothers, her brain digesting slowly what had occurred. The barrier was Ketsui's, and he had clearly come to her defence — but in that split-second, the entire dynamic of the situation had changed. Tenichi's expression had lost its killing gleam, distress and confusion marring his features, whereas Ketsui, by contrast, had no hint of emotion or hesitation in his entire demeanour. Instead, Izumi realised, he had become the shinigami Juushirou had charged him to be — her protector, no matter what.

There was an uncomfortable silence, then Tenichi's lips moved, his words muffled slightly by the barrier of glass.

“Ke..tsui?”

There was complete disbelief in his tones, as though he had not anticipated this turn of events, not even in his wildest imaginings, and Ketsui's eyes narrowed slightly at the sound of his name. Instead, however, he turned to glance at Izumi, running his eyes over her body in a cursitory manner. He was looking for injuries, Izumi realised, but something in the intensity of the gaze made her uncomfortable and her face flooded red with indignation and embarrassment, longing for him to look away. Being rescued by Ketsui ought to be more mortifying than it was pleasing, yet there was a certain rush of pleasure in the knowledge that he had come to her aid anyway. Whilst her hime's pride rejected the dominant way he had glanced her over, she realised for the first time how pathetic she must look, her hands trembling now that the immediate risk of death had abated.

I am just a child, still, as Niisama likes to tell me. I don't understand anything about shinigami, but believe myself superior to them anyway.

“Explain,” Ketsui's gaze had returned to Tenichi now, and the barrier of glass fragmented and shattered into tiny shards of reiatsu, absorbed into the already heavy atmosphere. “Taichou sent you to report to Shikibu-san. Why are you here, with your weapon released? Why are you attacking my recruit?”

Izumi flinched, again humiliated by the possessiveness in Ketsui's voice, but at the sound of it, Tenichi seemed to come back to life, anger and frustration animating his handsome features.

“Is this your doing, too?” he demanded, jabbing his naginata in the Kitsune's direction. “Did you corrupt him to believe your lies?”

Hypnotise him with your demon magic? Does he know what or who you really are?"

"Answer my question," Ketsui had stepped forward now, putting him physically between Izumi and Tenichi and blocking the glare of the sun as he did so. "Releasing a zanpakutou without due cause is an infraction. Attacking a foreign division's recruit is a serious incursion. Putting the life of my comrade in danger is something that, as a member of Thirteenth Division, I find unforgivable. I've asked you to explain yourself, Kotetsu Tenichi. Answer me, or I will make my sword do the asking."

"What are you talking about?" Tenichi's expression went through the widest range of emotions Izumi had ever seen, his hands gripping Reihahen's pole so tightly that his knuckles had turned white. "She's a spy. A spy for the enemy. Don't you understand? She's here to hurt you. She's probably put you under some demon spell... she'll be the death of both of us!"

"Ichimaru-san... is a spy?" Ketsui arched an eyebrow, then he snorted, shaking his head. "Do you think Ukitake-taichou would allow that? Don't be foolish. Nii-chan, what's wrong with you? This is crazy, and not like you at all. Tell me what you mean by it... you have to know that nobody's going to look on this lightly."

"I told you," Tenichi's composure had been completely shattered by Ketsui's appearance, Izumi realised, and the sudden switch of approach from indignant shinigami protector to anxious younger brother had only served to shake him further. "She's an enemy's spy. Keitarou's spy. She was there, when he brought me back to Seireitei. She and her people, all of them... lurking, waiting, in the shadows. She used her magic on me... and then her people got Souja-dono killed, all for Keitarou's sake. It's all because of him, and if they connect it to us... don't you understand what this will do to us? Father was Keitarou's cousin — I don't want anything to happen to you because of..."

"Ten-nii?" Ketsui's brow twitched with consternation as he tried to follow this convoluted and incoherent explanation. "Are you saying you met with Keitarou? That he was the one who kidnapped you... and you knew that all along?"

Tenichi bit his lip, apparently realising for the first time he had let something slip he ought not have, then he sighed.

"The Onmitsukidou said it," he whispered. 'If I cause problems, or prove useless, then there's always you. And then... she appeared,' he jerked a clumsy finger in Izumi's direction. "One of the cursed fox people, pretending to be a recruit, using her dark arts on you, convincing you she's your ally, trying to..."

"Ichimaru-san is my ally," Ketsui cut across his brother firmly. "She's my subordinate officer and my recruit. I have direct orders to protect her and help her, orders which were reaffirmed this morning. I don't want to fight you, Nii-chan, but you're not giving me a lot of choice. If you're going to keep saying these crazy things, and if you're going to threaten her safety, I have to stop you. Ukitake-taichou has given me that instruction — find my recruit and stick with her. I'm here, and I'm not going to let her be hurt — not even if the person attacking happens to be you."

"You have no clue what kind of creature you're protecting," Tenichi spat out, his reiatsu fluctuating as though considering a new attack, and Izumi sensed Ketsui's own reiatsu rise and settle, ready to respond in kind.

"I know she's somebody worth my protecting," was his response. "I don't need to know where she came from, but I know enough to know she's not Keitarou's spy. I don't know what's driven you on this wild goose chase, and I'm sorry I didn't realise everything in Seventh had made you this upset, but this is insane. I don't want to fight you, Tennai. Of all the swords in Seireitei, I never wanted to cross weapons with yours in circumstances like this! It's not something brothers ought to do — Mother would have cried, if she had seen us like this!"

"Don't bring Mother into it!" Tenichi snapped back, and despite his calm, Izumi saw Ketsui flinch at the sudden venom in the older boy's tones. "Mother's dead, and she left me to protect you! She told me, and I promised, and I'll do as I swore to her I would!"

"I don't need you to protect me, if it means you do something like this!" Ketsui lashed back, and Tenichi's grip on Reihahen tightened yet further, a trickle of blood running unchecked over his clenched fist where the nails had driven into the palm beneath. "You left Thirteenth so that I could become my own shinigami, and I have! I'm making my own decision to obey my Captain's instructions, and if you were in your right mind, you'd never even dream of questioning Ukitake-taichou's orders! Mother wouldn't sanction you using her as a reason to hurt someone who's innocent, and..."

"She's not innocent!" Tenichi interrupted his brother mid-flow, the pitch of his voice rising with the overspill of his emotions. "If you can't see that, you do need my protection, so don't you use Mother to justify protecting that creature from my blade!"

"I won't let Ichimaru-san be killed," the moment of hesitation had passed, because there was steel now in both the eyes and the voice of the younger Kotetsu. "I know what she's capable of, and I know who she is. I don't need to know her past... I know who she is right now, and that's someone of benefit to me and to Soul Society. I trust her, as my division-mate and my comrade, and I will not let her get hurt! If you don't lower Reihahen, I'll have to use my weapon as more than just a barrier. It's your last chance. Seal your sword and submit it. We'll work everything out, somehow... but put your weapon down."

"She's bewitched you," Tenichi whispered, his eyes glittering with a mixture of desperation and what Izumi could only consider madness. He was unstable, she realised with a jolt, and no matter how calmly or rationally Ketsui spoke to him, there would be no getting through. It would become a fight, brother on brother, and then...

"Izumi!"

Joumei's eruption onto the scene caused both the brothers to jump, Tenichi almost releasing his hold on his weapon in his dismay, and Izumi's heart flip-flopped in her chest, taking in her brother's pale complexion and blood-stained clothing. Despite the fact he was obviously in a bad way, his fingers were already glittering with kidou energy, as though ready to launch an attack, and before she knew what she was doing, Izumi had found her legs, scrambling to her feet and stumbling across the grass to grab him by the arm.

"So you summoned your allies to back you up?" Tenichi had clearly passed into the world of hysterics now, his eyes glittering with instability. "Fine, then I'll kill you both, both of you, here and now. Then your curse... you won't be able to curse me any more. You won't be there... you won't... won't hurt Ketsui... you won't..."

"Not if I don't kill you first, Kotetsu Tenichi," Joumei's gaze was pure ice, and he put a protective arm around his sister's shoulder. "I told Souja-dono to be careful of you. I guess I was right. If only he'd been able to act on it. Maybe you'd be where you belonged, like the traitor you are."

He extended his hand, Kidou forming into a flare inches from the tips of his fingers, but Izumi could tell it was ragged and incomplete, and her brother was pushing himself. She tugged on his other arm, a pleading look in her eyes, but before she could convey her thoughts in hurried signs, Ketsui swung his sword towards the pair of them, putting a glass barrier between them and Tenichi. The kidou glanced as harmlessly off the blockade as the wood splinters had done moments earlier, fragmenting into its component parts, and Joumei glared at Ketsui in indignant rage.

“You...”

Niisama, no!

Izumi's fingers moved before she even realised it.

Ketsui is protecting me. Please, don't hurt him. Please, don't do anything to hurt him, he's on our side! We've been wrong... everything is wrong!

“Wrong?” Joumei stared at her blankly, and Ketsui took another step or two towards his brother, meeting the other's gaze gravely. Joumei's impassioned entrance had apparently brought him back to the calm and reason of a shinigami on duty and, though the expression in his pale eyes was still a pained one, the rage and indignation was now nowhere to be seen. Instead he held out his free left hand, beckoning for the older man to submit his sword.

“Surrender your sword, Kotetsu Tenichi,” he said softly. “I'm arresting you for the attempted murder of Ichimaru Izumi, and it will be worse if you continue to fight.”

“Arresting... me?” Tenichi could barely do more than mouth the words, and Ketsui lowered his head in a heavy, yet determined nod, casting Izumi a sidelong glance.

“Ichimaru-san, go fetch Shikibu-san from the office. Bring her here at once.” he instructed, and Izumi faltered for a moment, then bowed her head in acceptance of the instruction. A brief, harried smile of gratitude touched Ketsui's lips for the most fleeting of instants, then it was gone, and his attention returned to his brother, who, shaken to the very core of his being, had begun to shed silent tears.

“Surrender your weapon,” Ketsui repeated quietly, and as she squeezed her brother by the hand and hurried off to do her mentor's bidding, Izumi could hear the weight of his grief in every syllable he spoke. “This is your last chance. If you do not, I will be forced to subdue you in the name of Thirteenth Division. Ukitake-taichou gave me strict orders. I intend to follow them, even against you. If in any part of your mind right now you think you are protecting me, then please, at least listen to my voice and do as I tell you. If you don't want to hurt me, don't make me fight you. Please don't make it harder for me than it has to be... give up Reihahen and submit.”

It was turning out to be a costly mistake.

Keitarou stood high above the valley, leaning against the dead trunk of a hollow birch tree as he gazed down at the landscape below.

Beneath him, he could both sense and see the fleeing form of his oldest child, the spurts of ragged reiatsu like a beacon across the unfamiliar terrain. Despite his anger and his frustration at his son's disobedience, Keitarou found that it was grief, not rage, which was at the forefront of his mind.

“That’s what a proper older brother should do — protect his siblings from harm. You have to be strong and unafraid, in order to set them an example. Maybe I can see that you’re ready to be their oniichan, more than I’d realised before.”

His own words, spoken so long ago, returned to haunt him, and, just as clear, the reedy tones of the eight year old Katsura, as he had solemnly given his word.

“I will. I’ll be their nii-chan, Father. I promise.”

I didn’t imagine how deep or dark that promise would turn out to be, all those years ago.

Keitarou reached his free hand up to push the stray wisps of his sandy brown hair out of his eyes, letting out a sigh of regret and resignation.

Having children was the first mistake. Keeping them with me was the second. Coming to love them was the third. You were right all along, Chudokuga. It was foolish of me to think I could balance my family and my goals and come out of it unscathed. Eiraki’s reaction when I returned Sakaki’s body to the village is one I will never forget... and now I have to return and tell her that her eldest, her pride and joy...

You became a fool when you met that girl, and decided to make her more than just your pawn.

Chudokuga’s words were unsympathetic.

The damage began when you first decided you loved her — once you love one person, you can’t turn back from loving more. It’s an unattractive trait in someone like you — and eternally frustrating for a zanpakutou like me.

Maybe that’s always been my weakness.

Keitarou pressed his lips together sadly.

Daisuke was the first, not Eiraki. I considered him like a brother, and buried him myself. I murdered Endou Shouichi as much to avenge my cousin as I did to satisfy that spoiled Seimaru’s greedy whims. I have often acted rashly from love, Chudokuga. It has just eroded me more and more with time — like a creeping senility, fudging my wits and clouding my judgement. Maybe the fox is right — it’s no longer my world and I have ceased to understand.

So you’re giving up?

Chudokuga was derisive.

Why are we here, anyway, Keitarou? You told your son if he chose to avenge Sakaki that you would not take him back. You disowned him — so why the need to come and see his end for yourself? The shinigami will catch him, and kill him, and you want no part of that. He has betrayed himself through his weakness and his naivety. Let him go.

Keitarou did not answer, turning his gaze back towards the ground below, and there was a restless rustle as the spider's silhouette shifted across his psyche.

The fox has gone, by the way.

Gone?

Keitarou's brow wrinkled in consternation, his attention momentarily drawn from the hunt below, and Chudokuga snorted.

You didn't notice? You are distracted. Perhaps it is senility.

Remember who your master is, and don't be impertinent. Explain yourself — what do you mean, gone?

What I said.

Chudokuga spoke evenly.

I can no longer sense his pulse alongside yours. Either his heart has been stilled by the shinigami, or... somehow, he's broken your curse.

Impossible.

Keitarou's eyes became slits.

Nobody can do that, except me. Death is the only release from Chudokuga's Bankai — isn't that what you told me? Ukitake Juushirou was an aberration -Shikiki's quick intervention saved his life — but surely now, in your current form...

There was another rustle, then Chudokuga sighed.

To my knowledge, there is no way to break that spell, short of you undoing it yourself.

It replied at length.

You are my master, and I have not chosen to withdraw it. He must have died... perhaps your son was responsible.

Do you really believe that?

Keitarou was sceptical.

Katsura's been fleeing from the shinigami all the time we've been here. If the bond has only just been broken, that means it wasn't at his hand.

I know.

Chudokuga's voice was little more than a hiss.

I don't believe I suggested that pathetic, over-emotional wastrel had done anything at all.

Keitarou froze, his eyes widening with alarm.

"What are you saying?" he demanded out loud, and there was the sensation of the spider scuttling back into the alcoves of his mind.

The shinigami are drawing closer. Unless you want to see your son ripped apart like a fox before the hounds, I suggest we leave. You were heading to the Real World. The formula you carry needs to be conveyed to Haruya and his companions tonight, or they'll be of no further use to you. The speed at which their cells were decaying — this emotional prevarication is unnecessary, and will compromise your plan.

"I know," Keitarou rubbed his brow. "Very well. Chudokuga, indulge me in one last favour, then we'll go. I haven't forgotten our aims, and I believe in them just as I did before. If your insinuations are what I think they are, then the sooner we act the better. The shinigami will leave Seireitei and go hunting Haruya and the others in less than a week, now. We will strike then, and hope and pray to whatever Gods are listening that it's not too late.

You believed the fox's words, then?

I know they were true. I felt it from him... I saw it inside of him. He didn't give me enough to tell me how or where, but I know there are others, and that we don't have much time left.

You no longer believe he's the one we need to kill? Even though you felt it from the moment you saw him that this was right?

The images only penetrated my consciousness superficially, and it was a long time ago.

Keitarou sighed.

I thought it was right, at the time. I saw it and I felt that this was the one... but... maybe not.

Your indecisiveness is making me ill.

Chudokuga's words were cutting.

Ask your favour and then let's go.

Mm.

Keitarou turned his gaze back on the pursuit below, pulling the tantou from his obi and running his finger over the silvery blade.

I won't take Katsura back. He has no place with me, if he cannot obey my instructions. But nor can I return to my wife and tell her I let her favourite son be killed. Therefore...

He trailed off, unable to form the words, even in his thoughts, but he felt the swell of Chudokuga's resignation, and knew the spider had understood.

I am a fool, too, for letting you convince me to be a part of this, but if it will get you back on track, I suppose it won't hurt. Very well. Consider it a test run for when we storm Seireitei proper.

50. Call of Duty

Chapter Forty Nine: Call of Duty

It all happened when the Captain was out.

Naoko suppressed the urge to groan, tugging absently at her thick tail of chestnutty red hair as she stood before the desk of the Vice Captain's office. She had been buried deep in paperwork when Izumi had arrived, the girl unusually flustered and out of breath. The silver-haired Kitsune had abandoned any pretence of manners, bursting into the chamber and grabbing Naoko by the arm, but at the urgency in the girl's eyes, Naoko had bitten back her objections, the hairs pricking on the back of her neck as she realised something was properly wrong. As soon as she had left the office compound, she had felt the threads of released zanpakutou reiatsu drifting on the wind, her brows knitting together as she had identified both that of Reihahen and Ketsui's zanpakutou, Reihashou, rising in obvious confrontation. Her worst fears had been confirmed when she had arrived at the scene, however, to find Ketsui, Reihashou still released in his right hand, taking the sealing Reihahen from his brother's grasp. Tenichi had sunk to his knees, apparently not able to stand or to speak, and as Naoko had drawn closer, she had seen that he'd begun crying, the tears rolling silent and unchecked from eyes that were pools of distress. Ketsui, by contrast, had been completely impassive, but Naoko had trained the boy herself, and she had known that it was no more than an act.

In the shadows of the damaged willow tree, Izumi's enigmatic brother, himself bloody and tattered, had been standing silent watch over the Kotetsu brothers, and, at Naoko's appearance, he had lowered his head in a gesture of respect. Izumi had hurried over to join him, her own anxious gaze pulled in Ketsui's direction, and Naoko had drawn a deep breath into her lungs to steady her own composure, before clapping her hands together and demanding in her usual, crisp manner, what exactly had taken place. Tenichi had been beyond words, and it had been Ketsui who had explained, in calm, almost mechanical tones, his reasons for arresting his brother. Tenichi had not resisted the arrest, nor spoken a word in his own defence and as a result, Naoko had seen no alternative but to have him taken to one of Thirteenth's own holding cells, to await the return of her Captain. She had just sent the recruit Kayashima to fetch Juushirou from the Seventh when Enishi and his patrol had marched briskly into the compound, and for the first time in her twenty five years as an officer of the Thirteenth Division, Naoko had been overwhelmed with relief that, now, she could pass the matter up the chain of command.

Enishi had listened to the whole story with a grave expression on his broad features. He had spoken to Ketsui briefly, then sent the boy away to calm down and clean up. Finding Tenichi unable to speak for himself, he had instead instructed the two Kitsune, along with Naoko herself to assemble in his office to await Juushirou's return, and there, ten minutes later, they remained.

"Of course, if the Taichou were back, he'd probably have sent for the Onmitsukidou," Naoko spoke now, twisting the ends of her hair absently around her finger in her agitation. "I don't want to do that, Fukutaichou, but I don't see what else we can do. This is... beyond us."

"I can't believe it of the lad," Enishi sat back in his seat, rubbing his chin pensively. 'I've known Tenichi a good long while, trained with him and always thought him a solid soldier, not the kind to descend into hysterical overreactions. I suppose you don't have anything to add to this?' this last to Joumei. "I have to confess, I was damn surprised to see you here in the thick of the fray. I'd understood your sister's coming here was an undercover matter... yet people seem to be talking about foxes freely and, well, here you are."

"I was at Seventh," Joumei shook his head. "I went to report to Hirata-sama, about a matter I thought important, but he was away. I spoke to Kikyue-hime, and then the division was attacked. Kikyue-hime sent for Juushirou-dono, and he came and helped defend the Seventh's territory. Then there was an interruption..."

He paused, pursing his lips as though debating what else to say, and Naoko's eyes narrowed slightly at his hesitation.

"An interruption?"

"Not relating to this," Joumei dismissed the question with a flick of his cut hand, now crudely bandaged in the coarse linen bandages that comprised the First Aid supplies in Enishi's office. "I sensed that Izumi was in trouble, and came here. They were already facing off when I arrived."

"And Tenichi threatened your life, Ichimaru?" Enishi's gaze rested on Izumi, who nodded her head.

"The evidence indicates Reihahen was used in an offensive manner,” Naoko said heavily. “The fence and part of the tree are ripped up. Ketsui said it too, Houjou-kun. He had to release Reihashou to deflect Tenichi’s attacks. Tenichi seems to think that Ichimaru-san and her brother are in league with Keitarou somehow... probably because he’s not party to the information we are about your origins,” she glanced at Joumei, “but even so, it’s out of character. He’s never acted that way before. Never, and certainly not to the point where he’d induce Ketsui to draw his own weapon in response.”

“Ketsui’s acted damn smartly,” Enishi said frankly. “Whatever the reasons, well, I’m going to let the Taichou and those in the know pry those apart. To me it looks like all the business at Seventh has pushed Tenichi to breaking point, and Ketsui got involved to prevent him doing something they’d all regret. It’s rough on the lad, but I’m sure it’ll be soon patched up. Nobody is dead, so that makes it easier.”

He glanced at Naoko.

“But I agree with you, Shikibu. Shihouin ought to be notified. He was cross when Taichou didn’t let him infiltrate this place the last time, but this time, we’re none of us in an objective position to deal with it and since the name Keitarou’s come up, I think we have no choice.”

He gestured towards her.

“Your spirit power is better than mine for delicate matters, so I’ll ask you to send him a Hell Butterfly. Word it as you see fit — but tell him as briefly as possible. Details can wait till he’s here — just tell him to come himself, else I’ll be ripped to shreds by Ukitake for letting the Onmitsukidou run riot around his barracks without supervision.”

“Yes, sir,” Naoko let out a heavy sigh at the thought of contacting the Shihouin’s second in command, but she nodded, pressing her hands together then parting them to reveal a delicate blue-black butterfly. It fluttered its wings a couple of times before launching into flight, disappearing through the open window into the world beyond, and Enishi watched it go with an approving nod.

“Good, then we’ve done all we can do, till either they or the Captain gets here,” he said with a gusty sigh. “I don’t like this business one bit. Shikibu, why didn’t you realise they were fighting? I’d have thought you’d have stopped it sooner.”

“I knew nothing about it,” Naoko shook her head, and Izumi’s fingers fluttered into life, causing Joumei to frown.

“Izumi said that Tenichi told her he’d put a barrier around the office, so as not to be disturbed,” he translated, and Naoko’s expression became stricken. “He told Izumi that the only person on premises who could realistically challenge his sword was you, Shikibusan... and as a result, he made sure you weren’t able to by using a spell. Probably Kyoumon, I imagine, but I don’t know.”

Enishi let out a low whistle, and Joumei nodded.

“Tenichi-dono intended to kill my sister, Houjou-san,” he said quietly. “The only reason he did not was because Kotetsu Ketsui put his duty to his Captain over his loyalty to his brother. I am eternally indebted to that sense of duty, but it doesn’t change the severity of the crime. Tenichi was mistaken in his belief that either Izumi or I have any connection to Keitarou, but in normal circumstances, he ought, surely, to have reported his concerns to a superior officer? The fact is that he did not.”

“Ketsui said he believed his brother thought he was protecting him,” Naoko remembered. “I suppose we’ll talk to him more later, and Taichou will too, but Joumei-dono is right. If Tenichi was troubled about something, he ought to have reported it to either his superior officer — who is Kikyue-hime, or Endou-taichou himself — or, if he felt the problem was here, he could’ve spoken to any one of us. The circumstances of this are unpleasant. We will get to the bottom of it, but its the intent that bothers me. That and the complete loss of sanity. How he could have thought he’d manage to commit a murder using his zanpakutou without anyone realising it was him... it’s like I’m talking about a complete stranger, not a man I once had under my command.”

“Well, all of that will doubtless fall into place when the Captain returns, and when we’ve had a chance to calm down and look at all of it properly,” Enishi said comfortably, getting to his feet and slipping his sheathed sword back through his wide-banded obi. “For now, there’s no point in sitting around in here when there are other jobs to be done and officers to be seen to. They’ll sense the reiatsu, too, and we don’t want a mass panic. I’d rather everyone was at their assigned post when the Onmitsukidou arrive.”

“You’ll handle Shihouin when he appears, I trust?” Naoko cast Enishi a quizzical glance, and received a rueful grin in return.

“If you like. It’s my job,” he agreed easily. “Joumei-dono, it would be better you stayed here too, for now. If you don’t want to meet with the Onmitsukidou, then we’ll try and arrange it that way, but in the circs...”

“No, I’ll talk to them. Izumi and I both will, in a manner of speaking,” Joumei glanced at his sister, who nodded. “I have a lot of questions, too, and now this has come to a head, the Kitsune are running out of safe boltholes. Here seems as good as anywhere... we’ve not much choice but to put our faith in the shinigami, since there is nobody else to help us now. We share an enemy, so this is where we should be... at least, until I can speak to Hirata-sama and discharge my original duty.”

“Then it’s decided. In fact, I’ll let you into Ugendou, and you can wait there,” Enishi decided, reaching up to pull a key down from a hook beside the door. “It’s easier there. Nobody will go to Ugendou unless Taichou is back.”

“Ugendou is Taichou’s private office and quarters, Houjou-kun,” Naoko was doubtful, but Enishi shrugged.

“Protecting witnesses comes before namby-pamby niceties about private space and such like,” he said matter-of-factly. “This is a war situation, Shikibu — or if it isn’t yet, it very soon will be. Thirteenth’s integrity has been breached and one of it’s members attacked. Taichou would tell us to do what was necessary to calm the troops and ensure that everyone was safe. Tenichi didn’t fight back, and is safely locked up in the cells. I have the key on my belt, so nobody will be letting him out by mistake. In the meantime... I think the fewer strangers the rest see running around the better. Especially bloody, tatty ones.”

He clamped a wide paw down on Joumei’s uninjured shoulder.

“I’ll try and see about finding you something clean to wear, but in the meantime, let’s see to getting you hidden,” he added. “Your sister can stay with you — I’ll excuse her duties for the day.”

“What about Ketsui?” Naoko asked, and Enishi frowned.

“I doubt he’ll want to talk to anyone much about this,” he said wisely. “Let him have some time to calm his head and come to terms with the whole business. We’ll deal with him again later. In the meantime... meeting dismissed.”

As Hajime had surmised, it was not difficult tracking Katsura’s fleeing reiatsu over and across the terrain of District Seven. Though he was still using shunpo, Kikyue could feel the rough edge to each one of his steps, the tiny flare of energy which gave away his presence and her eyes narrowed in determination, inwardly promising herself that she would not let this one escape. Joumei had taken her brother’s killer, but here was a felon on which she could exact both her frustration and her longing for revenge, and so she would show him no mercy, not once she had him in her sights.

“Kikyue-hime!” Hajime was at her left hand, his steps keeping even with hers, and as she glanced to her right, the young Endou was aware of both Nakata and Ohara in her slipstream. Both men looked a little dazed, Nakata’s usual swagger somewhat dampened by Katsura’s psychic attack, and Ohara’s features pale and shadowy, his eyes like smudges against his skin, but they were both there at her side, swords ready and the sight of them boosted her confidence yet again. Katsura’s killing impulse had been oppressive and his ability to discompose her would have been costly if not for Juushirou’s intervention — she was not foolish enough to realise that the enemy was probably possessed of a similar level of spirit power to her own. The difference was, she mused darkly, tightening her grip on her zanpakutou’s hilt, that she had been rigorously trained in all the arts of a shinigami warrior, and the attacker had not.

“He hasn’t gone far,” she spoke now, flicking her finger in the direction from which she had sensed the young man’s last shunpo step, and without a word of complaint her companions also adjusted their path to bring themselves back in line with her own. “Juushirou-dono’s right — he’s powerful, but no more than a spiritual baby. He has no particular art to his technique, and as such, probably can’t control it. He flared so much of it at Seventh — he must be beginning to tire. I doubt he’ll put up much of a fight when we find him.”

“What are your orders, hime?” Ohara asked gruffly, and Kikyue’s pale eyes became slits of predatorial intent.

“Do you need to ask that?” she snapped. “He desecrated our division barracks, attacked our recruits and insulted the Endou. Even if that wasn’t the case, his very life is offensive. He is Eiraki-basama’s spawn, and as such, an outlaw by Council Law. You know full well the dictum decided by the Council of Elders, as the Taichou reported on it to us in full. We have full release rights, and in this case, no need to play the mercy card.”

Her lips thinned.

“His whole existence invites our reprisals,” she said darkly, “but his sister murdered Souja-nii. I intend to find him, cut him down and take him back a corpse, Ohara. He is a felon and should be treated with no greater respect.”

“Understood,” Hajime spoke briskly, his usual professionalism in his calm tones. “Then our orders are kill on sight, as the Council decreed. Nakata, Ohara, you heard Kikyue-hime. This is not a combat situation. We need not wait for him to face us fairly, nor treat him with compassion should he beg for it. He is an animal and we are hunting him down. No more questions. Take your sword and be prepared to kill.”

“I asked Kikyue-hime, not you, Hajime-dono,” Ohara was put out at the matter-of-fact authority with which the older man had phrased his orders. “I am perfectly capable and willing to raise my sword in my Lord’s name, and for the honour of the Endou. I merely asked whether it was Kikyue-hime’s will we take and interrogate a prisoner, that is all. It hardly requires you to affirm such a command, given by an officer of higher birth and blood.”

“I suggest you mind your rank and put your mind to the task at hand,” was Hajime’s blunt rejoinder. “Your peacock pride has no place in this battle, Ohara. We’re hunting an enemy of Soul Society. This isn’t an excuse for you to flaunt your skills to impress the lady.”

“Hajime-dono!” Ohara was scandalised, and Nakata chuckled, clearly amused.

“We understand the drill, Hajime-dono,” he said comfortably. “There are four of us, and it’s clear that the attacker’s spirit is broken. It will barely be sport for one of us to cut him down — nobody views this as any more than a clean-up mission.”

“If only we had not had to rely on the help of that District Captain,” Ohara opened his mouth to continue his protestations but, after catching Kikyue’s gaze, decided against it, shifting his angle instead to the subject of Juushirou’s involvement. “It looks bad for the Endou, hime, if we are constantly running to one of such inferior birth for help.”

“We’d’ve probably all been splattered into the ground without his help,” Nakata observed tactlessly, before Kikyue could say anything. “I can’t say I knew too much about what he did, but I found the cobbles coming to meet me before I could take much more’n a step, and you seemed to be pretty much the same. Maybe that’s been broken now, but whatever power it was...”

He shook his head.

“Not normal, this one. Sooner we put an end to him the better. Most like he’s one of that exiled Urahara’s experiments, and who knows what’s been done to him to make him capable of such unnatural attacks.”

“He said he could read our minds,” Hajime remembered. “Hime, do you think that was true?”

“Yes,” Kikyue agreed reluctantly. “I think he could, and reacted accordingly. I’ve never come across it either, so maybe Nakata’s right. As for Juushirou-dono, Ohara, we’re indebted to him in this case, but from hereon in it’s an Endou matter and he’ll understand to keep out of it.”

“District Captain or otherwise, any sword that can stand up to Taichou’s Wind Hawk is worth having on your side,” Hajime agreed. “Ukitake-taichou probably turned the scale in our favour.”

“He should’ve killed the lad, then,” Ohara sniffed, clearly not persuaded. “I don’t understand anything about today’s events, hime. First that straggly, rag-bound vagabond, covered in blood, then this heathen with his psychic witchcraft... and that’s another thing! Where was Kotetsu during all of this, pray? My recruit sent him to Thirteenth as you ordered, but Ukitake came and no sign of that layabout District wretch! Where was he when we needed him? His ranged sword would’ve been an advantage in such a battle, yet where was he? You should discipline him thoroughly for his tardiness on our return, hime — in fact, with your permission, I shall see to it myself. He has developed quite an attitude in recent weeks.”

“Ohara has a point, Kikyue-hime,” Hajime frowned, casting his companion a sidelong glance, and Kikyue bit her lip.

“I don’t know where he was,” she admitted. “I hadn’t thought of it till now, but he didn’t return to the Seventh. I will find out when we get back, and if he has no good reason for it, then you may do with him as you see fit, Ohara — just leave him alive, as the division and Father have use for him.”

“Yes, hime. With pleasure,” A smug, slightly mollified look touched Ohara’s features, and Kikyue sighed.

“Hime, he’s changed paths again!” Nakata let out an exclamation at that point, thrusting his free left hand out towards the west, and Kikyue turned her head, a thoughtful look crossing her gaze.

“He’s trying to evade settlements,” she realised. “He’s going to end up with no place to go. If we continue through the valley at this pace, we’ll reach a point where we can take a short-cut through the undergrowth and round him off before he gets to the river. I can’t imagine he’s going any other way — if he thinks he has a chance of escape, he has to lose our trail somehow, and the river is the only viable way in which he might manage to do that. We need to nail him before he...”

“Kikyue-hime!”

Anything Kikyue might have been going to say was lost for the next minute Hajime let out a yell of dismay, charging at the young princess and throwing her bodily to the ground, causing the both of them to roll over a couple of times in the dirt. Angry and indignant, Kikyue was about to fire an impulsive Bakudou into her fellow officer to get him to move when she heard the clatter of metal on metal and, as Hajime pulled back from her line of sight, she caught sight of Nakata, his blade trembling with effort as he fought to hold back the swing of another.

But it was not the man they pursued who had attacked her, nor was it another ally of Keitarou’s, but her own officer and subordinate, the aloof, noble-blooded Ohara Masayuki.

“Ohara?” the word escaped more as an unconscious breath of surprise, and Hajime got to his feet, dusting himself down cursitorily before holding out a hand to pull the hime to her feet.

“Beg pardon for the roughness, hime,” he said softly, and wordlessly, Kikyue allowed herself to be helped, noticing as she did so that a drop of blood was dripping down Nakata’s cheek from a cut above his left eye, and that the swing of the sword he now held back had been not the first, but the second. In the split-second Kikyue had turned her attention away, Nakata had thrown himself into the line of the blade, whilst Hajime had pinned her to the ground... otherwise, she realised with a jolt, Ohara’s weapon would most likely have injured her, and badly.

“What the hell is going on?” she demanded, and as the words left her lips, she caught sight of Ohara’s eyes and the look she saw there chilled her to the very bone, for, though his body was in perfect battle stance, his features sculpted into a look of resolute aggression, his eyes were pools of utter terror.

“Ohara, what are you playing at?” Hajime had put himself between the Fifth Seated officer and the Endou princess, and Kikyue struggled to assert herself, trying to piece together what was going on and how the situation had been so quickly changed. Ohara took a step back, disappearing into shunpo and re-appearing a foot or so away from Kikyue’s left side and it was all she could do to raise her own weapon, the blade of Ohara’s slicing through the sleeve of her hakamashita before she could push the offending weapon back.

As she did so, she saw tears of fear and frustrating glittering in Ohara's eyes, and his lips moved slightly, their movement soundless but enough for Kikyue to make out the word "hime."

"He's not in his wits," she realised. "Someone's making him do this."

She swung her zanpakuto more firmly, forcing Ohara to skip back to avoid being cut open, and turned to Hajime.

"Someone doesn't want us chasing that boy," she said grimly. "Someone's here, somewhere. I don't know where, or how it's been done, but I know it's the truth. I've heard the stories of Keitarou and what he can do, and this is how he works. He makes puppets of people, and causes them to do terrible things to cover his tracks. We should've expected it... there had to be someone somewhere, waiting to protect the Katsura boy."

"But what can we do?" Nakata had also moved to block Ohara's path to Kikyue, asking his question over his shoulder as he dove in to deflect a fresh swing. "Damn it, Ohara! Don't you have any Endou pride? At least fight against it. That's your hime you're waving that thing at — imagine what Hirata-sama would say if you drew blood from his daughter after already losing his son?"

At this, Ohara's expression became even more pained, and for a moment his swing faltered, his entire body becoming tense as he fought against whatever spirit had free reign within him. His lips moved again, but no words came out, and Kikyue knew he could not even reclaim sovereignty over his vocal chords, let alone prevent himself from launching another attack.

"It doesn't matter," she spoke in low tones. "Don't you remember what happened to Great Grandfather? He jumped to his own death because of Keitarou's sword. Shouichi-sama was a legend among Endou warriors — if Keitarou was able to make a man like that kill himself, then there's nothing Ohara can do against it. Like it or not, we have to deal with this and quickly, before it becomes a bigger incident."

"You mean kill him?" Hajime had already raised his weapon, but Kikyue held up her hand.

"I'll deal with Ohara. Nakata is here to help me," she said firmly. "Yougo after the felon. We're not going to let Keitarou's messing around deprive us of our prey. That boy's life is forfeit to the Endou. Go make sure you take it."

"But hime!"

"For Souja-nii's sake, do as I tell you!" Kikyue snapped. "You know what order my brother would've given, and I'm giving it in his place! Go find and kill that boy. We'll manage Ohara. Do your duty to the Endou, Kitabata... unless you think that, as a woman, I'm too feeble to act in my own defence?"

"Of all the things I know of you, hime, I have never thought you feeble," Hajime spoke softly. "Very well. I will hunt him down and show him no mercy."

With that he was gone, just as, with a tremendous yell, Ohara launched a fresh attack at the young hime, sword slicing through the air on a collision course with her jugular. Again she parried the swing, shifting immediately from defensive to the offensive as she fought to get her fifth seated officer onto the back foot. Hajime's quick and clinical suggestion of killing the officer lingered in her mind, but she knew that, if she could, she wanted to avoid taking this path. Seventh had lost enough, she reasoned bitterly, and if another officer died because of Keitarou's machinations, it would only be more shame and grief for her Clan. Besides, as she pushed and slashed against Ohara's determined blade, she could feel the fear and despair resonating from his body. In all the time she had commanded him, never had she seen him look so miserable or broken, his arms and legs moving in perfect battle formation, but his soul willing with every spiritual inch for it to stop. He had not released his zanpakutou, she realised with a jolt. He had clamped his lips shut, and from the blood starting to trickle out from the corner of his mouth, she felt certain he was forcibly holding them closed with his teeth to prevent himself from uttering the words that would release his sleeping blade.

He doesn't want to hurt me.

Kikyue ducked another swing, putting a couple of paces space between them as she considered her options.

I don't know how to stop Keitarou's influence, though. I don't think there is a cure, short of killing him.

"Hime, Hajime-dono is right," Nakata was at her right hand, his own voice tense and full of consternation as he gauged the situation. "There's no cure for this. If it's what happened to Shouichi-sama, I know full well there's no way of beating or curing it. I knew your Great Grandfather. So did Hajime-dono. We both know what kind of a man he was, and we both remember the day he died. Anyone with the power to topple that kind of shinigami will eat Masayuki-dono alive from the inside out. He knows it too."

Kikyue returned her gaze to Ohara, seeing his lips twitch slightly, and he once more fought to keep them shut. His sword shook slightly in his hands, and Kikyue saw the blade edge turn minutely back towards its wielder as though making an attempt to slash his own body, before the pressure of the controlling impulse proved too much, and the sword drove down once more in Kikyue's direction. Taken off-guard by the suddenness of this thrust, Kikyue stumbled, falling back onto the ground, but as Ohara's weapon drove down towards her, Nakata was once more in his way, Ohara's weapon slicing cleanly through his upper right arm and running almost the full length from shoulder to elbow. Nakata winced, his hold on his weapon loosening, but he did not try to pull out of the way, and Kikyue realised with a jolt that, unless she acted, it would not just be Ohara but Nakata too who would probably lose his life.

I've sent Hajime-dono on to deal with Endou vengeance. What's wrong with me?

She pulled herself to her feet, inwardly berating her hesitation.

Has losing Oniisama made me so aware of grief and pain that I dread inflicting it on another family? Am I so haunted by what happened then that I've forgotten how an Endou hunts and kills? Nakata and Hajime-dono are both right. This is not a battle that can be won through reason or reserve. It can be handled in only one way, and I'm the senior officer on duty.

She grabbed Nakata by the shoulder, pulling him forcibly out of the way of Ohara's weapon, and Kaisoushu's blade began to glitter with an eerie light. As she glanced at it, Kikyue was struck by the sudden hope and relief that flared in Ohara's eyes, and his bloody lips twitched into a faint smile, as though accepting her decision.

So at the end, and despite all your prancing and flouncing, you are an Endou too, Ohara Masayuki.

Kikyue felt indignant spirit power flaring up inside of her as she prepared for Kaisoushu's release.

You prefer to die by Kaisoushu's claws than to taint your honour by shedding the blood of your Clan leader's line.

"Mezame, Kaisoushu,"

The release was barely more than a whisper, but as her blade lengthened, the sky blue aura of light engulfing it, she felt a resolve and defiance of her own forming deep within her heart.

I won't be defeated by Aizen Keitarou. Oniisama, you always said that I was too impulsive and I didn't think things through — but since you died, I've done nothing but think. I'm an Endou and that's my nature and my pride... but that pride isn't just here inside of me. It's a part of who we are as Seventh Division — the Division you died for, and the Division I intend to protect.

The kestrel shimmered for a moment over her head, its wings flapping silently as it awaited her command, and, as Ohara drove forward for the final time, she lowered her left hand, spreading her fingers to indicate her target area was the other man's heart. The kestrel uttered its soundless cry, before diving down, down, down like a bullet towards the other shinigami's upper body. Ohara swung his sword at it, but the kestrel's purpose was Kikyue's own and it was not to be swayed, ducking and weaving around the swings to drive the possessed officer off balance. As he stumbled, the kestrel gave a flick of its wings, plunging its beak deep into Ohara's upper chest. At the contact he let out a gasp of pain and surprise, his bloodied lips parting for the first time, and all colour drained from his face. He fell to the ground, a mix of emotions flooding his normally aloof gaze. There were tears on his lashes, Kikyue realised, though whether they were of relief or of pain, she could not tell. The kestrel's spirit disappeared into Ohara's body, surrounding it for a moment in blue light, and then, as the weapon slipped free from the other shinigami's fingers, the glow of light was gone.

"Kikyue-hime?" Nakata was already wrapping up his damaged arm with a length of his obi, casting a glance between his commanding officer and the still figure on the ground, then, "is he dead?"

Kikyue raised her blade to glance at the broken tip, and a faint, sad smile touched her features. Gently she pressed her fingers to the end of her sword's hilt.

"Bakudou no Kyuu. Geki," she murmured, and Ohara's body jerked and twitched against the ground, as snaking tendrils of reddish light began to push their way through the man's skin and clothing from within, strengthening until his entire aura was bathed in crimson. Nakata let out an exclamation, but Kikyue ignored him, instead moving over towards where Ohara lay and bending down to touch her index finger against his throat.

As she felt the gentle pulse of his heart, she knew her gamble had paid off, and she shook her head.

"We're going back to Seventh," she said simply.

"But hime... Ohara..?"

"He's alive," Kikyue got to her feet, holding Kaisoushu over Ohara's body as the fragments of sky blue light that had once been her kestrel returned in slithers to reform the end of her blade. She gave the sword a shake as if to reseal it before returning it to its sheath with a sigh. "I'm not going to let Keitarou dictate the life and death of anyone else in Seventh Division, Nakata — not my kin, not my subordinates, not anyone else. He's had his way with us enough, and I won't do it. Sacrificing anyone else — whether it be Ohara, a recruit, or Father himself — is not on. I won't have it. Ohara might've been his puppet, but I'm not and he can't make me be. I'm not going to be made to kill my own men."

"But if it happens again?" Nakata knotted the torn length of the *obi*bandage, tearing the end free with his teeth before moving to stand beside her, and Kikyue shrugged.

"I sent Kaisoushu's kestrel deep into his heart," she explained. "I can't reach there with my Bakudou, but Kaisoushu's shikigami is a spirit and can get places I can't go. It was a gamble — I've never tried to use Kidou like that before, but I thought, if I cast the spell from within Ohara's body, I could render him motionless and keep him that way. I remembered from the story of my Great Grandfather and others that it's the heart that Keitarou's power controls. Piercing the heart breaks the spell but kills the victim — so enveloping it in Bakudou would probably work to stop him attacking — whilst we tried to work out a way of saving his life. Whatever it is, it's still spirit power, and so Bakudou ought to be able to hold it... at least for now."

She cast Nakata a glance.

"Go find Hajime-dono," she said briskly. "I'm fine here, and I'll wait."

"But what about the boy..?"

"Haven't you realised yet? Hajime-dono's released his sword," Kikyue replied simply. "It will be over soon, if it isn't already. Go fetch him. With your arm like that, you're no use carrying Ohara, and he's too heavy for me to manage. The boy's body can stay and rot where it is for now — Ohara is more important and we can come and claim the rebel corpse later, when things are a little more calm. We need Hajime-dono — so don't delay. It's an order, Nakata — we're returning to base."

Nakata met her gaze for a moment, then sighed, bowing his head in acknowledgement.

"As you wish, Kikyue-hime," he said softly. "Message understood."

It was not normally a long walk from the Seventh to the Thirteenth, but with the added burden of the half-conscious Koku to take into consideration, Kirio had made slow process along the cobbles towards her home division. Koku had insisted on trying to walk, unwilling to let himself be carried, and though at first Kirio thought he was pushing himself to avoid the humiliation of being carried by a woman, from the pained look on his features, she had quickly realised that physical contact with her was causing him some discomfort. He had not attempted to speak at all since they had left the Seventh, but had surprised her by being able to shuffle one foot shakily in front of the other, and at the sight of his determination, Kirio felt her frustration with his obstinacy fading into a reluctant respect.

Had he really wanted to leave Thirteenth in order to save the silver-haired stranger's life? The man had been a kinsman of Thirteenth's recruit, Kirio remembered, yet even knowing that didn't make his request make sense. As far as she knew, Koku and Izumi had never met, and even if they had, it did not explain how he had known to interrupt the fight, nor why Mitsuki had been so persuaded to give him his way. She had wanted to ask more questions, but with her Captain clearly displeased and on edge at Mitsuki's impulsive behaviour, she had decided it was wiser to hold her tongue. The silver-haired stranger had been concerned for his sister's safety, and had disappeared into a shunpo Kirio privately felt sure he could not maintain for long, and Juushirou had quickly reiterated his orders to her, a sharp note in his words that she was unused to hearing from her Captain. She did not know whether Juushirou was concerned for Izumi, or for Mitsuki, or the devastated Seventh... nor whether it was the blooded, silver-haired stranger roaming at whim around the Gotei that had got the older man's attention. Whichever was the truth, though, Koku was her responsibility and, even though the young stray had clearly done something to help, Kirio felt certain that she would receive a firm scolding later on.

At the very least, I need to get Koku back home. If I can do that, and it turns out he's fine, maybe Taichou will let me off. Maybe.

She cast her companion a sidelong glance, taking in the glazed look in the brown eyes, shadowed beneath hooded lids. Koku's complexion was greyer than she had seen it before, but the lack of anything in his eyes concerned her more than if he had been moaning and complaining of pain. He seemed there but not there, as though the encounter at Seventh had sapped away half of his life energy, and now it was all he could do to press forward, one slow, agonising step at a time.

"We're almost there," she reassured him, but there was no response, and Kirio sighed, tightening her hold around his upper body and feeling his flinch and sudden tensing at their further contact.

"I promise, as soon as we get back to your room, I'll let go," she said softly. "I'll tuck you in and you can rest. I have to stay with you, but I'm sorry about the man-handling. Just, Taichou is cross... and... I am going to make sure I do what he tells me, so he doesn't get more cross. Clearly you're not well enough to be out of bed, and if that's the case..."

"I'm all right," Koku spoke absently, as though he was only half listening, but the sound of his voice reassured his companion.

"You're not," she told him firmly, "but if you're arguing with me, you're starting to feel better. I don't know what you did to the man at Seventh, nor who he is, except Ichimaru-san's kinsman, but you probably shouldn't have pushed yourself so far. It's a lot, and you're still recovering. You're barely eating — no wonder you have no strength to move about."

"I'm fine," Koku raised his gaze slightly, his eyes focusing on the dotted clouds speckled above their heads, and Kirio saw sadness touch his eyes. "He would have died. And now I can't hear... it's like... my mind is silent again."

"Your mind?" Kirio cast him a confused look, and Koku shrugged impatiently.

"It's nothing to do with you," he told her frankly, then lapsed back into silence, and Kirio let out a heavy sigh of frustration.

"It will be, if I end up on morning and midnight chores for a month because of taking you out of Thirteenth's territory," she retorted. "I don't understand much about what happened today — who the person was who attacked Seventh, why that happened, what Ichimaru-san's kinsman had done, or anything else. At the very least, if I'm going to get punished on your behalf, you should explain to me what I'm being punished for."

"I didn't ask you to come. Edogawa-san did," Koku closed up, turning his gaze away, and Kirio bit back the report burning on her tongue, realising that despite his ill-tempered responses, Koku's body was trembling from the shock and exertion of the morning's events. Fortunately, they reached the gate of the Thirteenth at that moment, and as they approached, Kirio's brow creased in consternation, for standing at the main gate was an officer she did not know, robed all in black. From the man's impassive gaze, she quickly realised that he was one of the Second's Onmitsukidou officers, though from the lack of adornment on his uniform, he was not one of significant rank. He was standing to attention, but as she approached, he moved to bar her path, a quizzical look surfacing in the depths of those hollow eyes.

“State your name and business,” he demanded, his words gruff and entirely lacking in honorifics, and Kirio cast him an indignant glare.

“State yours!” she retorted. “This is my division, and I belong here. I don’t have to answer to the authority of an unranked secret operative!”

“Kai-dono ordered me not to let anyone into the division bar Ukitake-taichou, when he returns,” the man was unmoved, his gaze flitting briefly to Koku, before returning to Kirio herself. “State your name and business, and be quick. Your friend looks about to fall down, and I’m not going to help you drag him off the cobbles.”

Kirio bristled, but realised that Koku had indeed begun to lose his footing, and she sighed, casting the officer the filthiest look she could muster.

“Hikifune Kirio. Thirteenth Division, Sixth Seat,” she snapped, and the man held out his hand.

“Your sword, please.”

“You are not taking my zanpakutou!” Kirio was incredulous, but the man shook his head.

“I need to verify it. That’s all,” he said flatly. “Your sword, please.”

Kirio pressed her lips together in displeasure, slipping her hand down towards her obi and drawing her gleaming katana from its sheath, pointing the blade at the officer’s torso.

“If you want to verify it, I can release it into you,” she said darkly. “As you observed, I have an injured... an injured recruit who is sick and in need of medical attention. He can’t get that out here on the street. I am not obliged to take orders from you, or from Kai-dono, not when I have instructions that supersede his authority from my Captain, Ukitake Juushirou. I am ordered to return here and attend to my comrade’s injury. Step aside, or I will make you.”

“Kirio-san?” Koku stirred slightly at this, casting her a look of consternation, but Kirio paid him no heed, tapping the exposed tip of her sword against the Onmitsukidou’s black uniform.

“Move, please,” she said softly. For the first time the Onmitsukidou appeared discomfited, for he hesitated for a moment, then stepped reluctantly aside, allowing her to pass through the gate. She nodded at him curtly, resheathing her weapon before carefully guiding Koku into the Thirteenth Division conclave. Other members of the black-clad secret ops were dotted around the inner perimeter, making her decidedly uneasy, but Koku's legs buckled under him at that point, and it was all she could do to catch him before he fell headlong.

"I'll carry you inside," she said briskly. "It will be quicker, and Taichou said not to use shunpo. If I did, you'd probably be sick, so bear with me touching you a while longer."

Koku seemed to be beyond answering, and Kirio managed to support his slim body in her arms, carrying him the short distance back towards the small sick room. Though she received many glances from the Onmitsukidou officers, none of them questioned her presence, and before long she had lain Koku down on the bed, covering him with the worn blankets and putting the back of her hand against his brow to check for fever. He was cold and clammy, rather than burning up, and she sighed, lifting the jug of water from the bedside shelf and pouring an amount of it into the nearby mug, pressing it to his lips.

"Drink," she said gently. "You can sleep, then, but you've exhausted yourself, and it will help."

To her surprise, Koku did not fight her, obediently taking the cool liquid into his mouth, and once the vessel was drained, she set it aside.

"I guess it's my fault as much as anyone's, for bringing you to Seventh," she reflected. "I don't know all your reasons, and maybe I should have asked them before I agreed. I don't know why I was so quick to react... but..."

"Because I wanted you to," Koku's voice was barely above a whisper, but there was no mistaking the bitterness in his tones, and Kirio shot him a confused look.

"Koku?"

"Sometimes, it happens," Koku's features twitched into a grimace of disgust. "I don't mean it to... just... sometimes it does. If I know something is wrong... people around me... they feel it too. It makes them act... carelessly. Or... worse. I'm sorry, Kirio-san. I will tell Ukitake-dono that it was my fault."

"I don't know what you're talking about, but it's fine," Despite herself, Kirio grinned, bending to ruffle the tousled brown hair. "I'll take responsibility for my own actions. You didn't do anything to me, and I was silly. I should know better. Don't worry so much about it. Taichou will probably just give me some horrible duties for a while..."

since nobody died, and you helped Ichimaru-san's kinsman somehow, he'll probably forgive me. Probably."

Koku was silent for a moment, then,

"The fox... I... him too."

"The fox?" Kirio frowned, eying her companion in confusion. "Ichimaru-san's kinsman? Him?"

"Yes."

"Why do you call him a fox?"

"He is a fox. A silver fox," Koku said simply. "He came here. I knew... I touched him, and he... saw too. Then he felt... he came here... and..."

"You're not making sense," Kirio scolded. "I don't know what you're talking about. If you can't finish your sentences, close your eyes and get some rest. We'll talk about it when you wake up, and..."

"Too late. Already over," Koku murmured, though his lashes were becoming heavier as he began to lose his battle against the lure of sleep. "Tenichi-dono... is in trouble. It's not his fault... Kirio-san."

"Tenichi?" Kirio, who had been on the verge of dismissing Koku's words as meaningless babble, froze, staring at him in consternation. "What about Tenichi? What does he have to do with anything?"

"Because of the foxes... but its wrong. It's all wrong..." Koku's eyes closed, opening briefly for a second, then closing properly. "Stop him... before... it is his fault."

Pale fingers brushed against Kirio's arm, then fell limp against the bedcovers, and Kirio gazed at her companion in consternation, watching as his breathing evened out into that of deep sleep.

Tenichi?

Her gaze flitted to the window, remembering the Onmitsukidou, and her brow creased.

No, that doesn't make sense. Why would...

She got to her feet, moving to the window, and her heart caught in her throat as she made out the lone figure of Ketsui standing across the division gardens, his hands resting against the fence. He wasn't looking in her direction, but Kirio could tell just from that glance that something was wrong with him. His body was rigid with tension, and as her gaze drifted further across the grounds, Kirio's own heart stilled in her chest. The barrier fence that normally stood so white and straight was ripped apart, the ground covered with wooden shrapnel, as though it had been raining splinters.

Reihahen.

Kirio cast Koku a troubled glance, then back out at the debris. Tenichi was here. Tenichi released Reihahen, and now the Onmitsukidou are here. Someone must've sent for them. Not Taichou, he's still at Seventh, but... maybe Naoko-san or Fukutaichou. Which means whatever happened here... its serious.

She glanced at Koku again, bending to listen to his breathing for a moment.

He's fast asleep. If I left him, nobody would know. With all these people around, nobody is likely to break in... and I can't just leave it like this. I can't leave Ketsui looking like that. Besides, Koku told me... he said that I should...

She faltered, her brows knitting together.

If I know something is wrong... people around me... they feel it too. It makes them act... carelessly. Or... worse.

Koku... Is this what you meant? Taichou would be cross, if he knew I'd left you alone. Edogawa-san isn't back yet, and there's only me to help you if you wake. But... but...

She turned back towards the window.

Tenichi is my friend. Whatever happened here, I need to know. I don't know how Koku knew about it, or what else he knows about anything, but I can't just ignore it. I need to find out exactly what happened at Thirteenth this morning, and why it resulted in Reihahen tearing apart Thirteenth's grounds.

Ketsui's Zanpakutou.

I didn't give the name last chapter, but this I did. It's name is Reihashou, 霊玻璃哨, which means, roughly, "Glass Spirit Sentinel". I decided it would be neat to have the two Kotetsu brothers with similar sounding sword names, though the second 'ha' kanji is different in both. Technically the kanji order means spirit-glass-sentinel, but I wanted to preserve that sibling similarity, so please, allow me a bit of artistic licence ;) The idea for Ketsui's zanpakutou to be glass was suggested by a friend of mine back when I was figuring out Tenichi's zanpakutou, and it just seemed to be fitting in so many ways. Finding a kanji character for glass was hard, though, as the Japanese generally use "gurasu" in katakana ;), so I think I ended up with a pretty outdated one.

For anyone wondering why Izumi's hypnosis doesn't work on Ketsui, it's because of Reihashou. Izumi's hypnosis is her spirit power — it's an ability to influence another's spiritual aura with hers, and sink it into sleep. Because Reihashou's innate power allows the construction of spiritual barriers, Izumi's hypnosis cannot penetrate Ketsui's aura, therefore making him entirely immune to its effects.

Bleach 520

The first time I read this chapter, this week, I was actually quite upset by it. Not because anything unexpected or unpleasant happened in it, but because of the general atmosphere surrounding a certain individual on receipt of a certain message. And the highly notable absence of a certain other individual in relation to that message. I shall say no more, but those who have read will surely understand my meaning. The last part was epic though. Even though it screws up Meifu's timeline vs the manga again, I love that final twist. It's one in the eye for every idiot who's ever dared to doubt or underestimate the (in my view) undisputed Queen of Seireitei... but I never expected it to be so beautiful when it happened.

It's also making me want to write the scene Kubo has not yet written. I am holding off for now, because I'd rather he wrote it, but if he doesn't... watch this space ..

And in other news:)

Today I got my university results and found I passed my MA degree with distinction. I'm goin' to graduation in July =D.

51. Justice

Chapter Fifty: Justice

The shinigami was gaining on him.

Katsura paused momentarily beneath the shade of an overhanging willow tree, grasping the trunk desperately as he struggled to drag breath into shattered lungs. The after effects of the fierce battle in Seventh's compound had taken its toll on his reiryoku and, with the collapse of his rage had come the gradual erosion of his spiritual abilities, till even shunpo was more than he could manage. To begin with, he had been able to evade the persistent pursuit of the four seated officers, ducking and diving into holes and gulleys and using what was left of his reiryokuto push himself just that bit ahead. A short time before, something had happened to reduce the number of pursuers from four to one, but if he had thought it would be easier to avoid one individual than four, he had soon realised how wrong he was.

He had Endou blood, but so did they. And as he had come to hunt his sister's killer, now the remaining predator was seeking his life.

He did not know which one was still on his tail. It wasn't the young woman who had challenged him, with the spiritual bird that had swooped and dived towards him, but one of the men, his reiryoku older and more settled, yet somehow darker and edged with blood. It was the reiryoku of someone who had killed before, and was not afraid of killing again, and though Katsura felt certain that, if he had been at full strength, he would've been able to counter, in his current state, he was at a significant disadvantage. He could not read the man's thoughts, but he was sensitive enough to auras to know that it was tinged not with hate or rage but simply focused intent. There would be no using this one's emotions against him, Katsura told himself grimly. He was not like the young hime— his approach would not be swayed by mention of the dead Souja.

And he was getting closer.

Katsura rasped another breath into his already burning lungs, pulling himself over the exposed tree roots and taking off once more, this time in the direction that he knew from past visits led towards the river. If he could get there, he thought feverishly, he could use the water as a barrier to separate him from his pursuer, maybe even use the current to take him further away from the man's range. It would be a gamble, since he had never been much of a swimmer, and Rukongai had afforded him little opportunity to practice. But it was the only chance he had.

Though why am I running, really?

He gritted his teeth, pushing through the ever longer blades of grass and plunging headlong down a steep bank, ignoring the mud and gunge he had trampled through as he reached the fork in the path, taking the left arm that wound down towards the river.

I have no place to go back to. I told Father I would avenge Sakaki, and I failed. I'm on the run, and I have nowhere to run to. This whole world belongs to shinigami, but the other one belongs to Father. This time he will kill me, and there's no reason to expect the shinigami to do any less. That white haired guy made it clear they'd had orders.

He grimaced, reaching to push his long, messy hair out of his eyes. Of course, I hadn't thought that far ahead. I didn't care if I got killed, it wasn't really a big issue, so long as I avenged Sakaki. I couldn't protect her as her brother, and so the least I could do was avenge her murder. It's all I could think of... impulsive and hot-headed as ever. I didn't expect to see Koku... I didn't expect... him to be there.

He swallowed hard, remembering the sudden flurry of reiatsu and then the younger boy's appearance onto the scene, flanked by a shinigami he did not know and another, one whose face and whose stricken expression haunted him almost as much as his young ally's had done. In that moment, he had dropped his mental barriers, and Koku's forcefulness had broken through. His screech had been inaudible to anyone else at Seventh but, to Katsura, it had been as deafening as thunder, stopping him in his tracks.

"Please, Katsura, don't do this," the younger boy had begged. "Please, don't hurt anyone. I don't want you to kill anyone else."

"That one killed Sakaki," Katsura had protested, but Koku had held firm, resolution in his troubled gaze.

"I don't care. It's not for you to blood your hands over," he had responded, his words wavering slightly as Katsura's spiritual focus had loosened the link between them. "This is a fight you can't have. You can't win it. All that can happen is that you're killed, and I don't want anyone else to die. Vengeance only brings more vengeance and more death, and I don't want that to happen to you. Please, Katsura, stop this."

At first Katsura had not known how to respond, but then he had seen Mitsuki's expression, and, for the first time, the hint of bandages trailing out from beneath Koku's rough robes. The realisation had hit him like a splash of cold water, waking him suddenly from his fit of rage and making him starkly aware of the peril he was in.

Koku is with the shinigami. Koku is here, but he's safe. He's with Mitsuki-san, and she's been treating him with her healer magic. Father isn't worried about him, because he's not in any danger right now. But my coming here, it might have put him in danger. Was that what Father meant... why he tried to keep me from acting? Koku couldn't sit back and let me die, and because of that, he's put himself in danger to come stop me. I came to avenge Sakaki, but instead, maybe...

He shook his head, pushing the thoughts impatiently away.

Enough. Whatever the truth, I can't go back. If Koku is there, I won't go back. Not even for Sakaki's sake. What I'll do, I don't know... but I won't do anything to hurt Koku.

He turned, cutting through a copse as he wound and weaved his way towards the river's edge, extending his senses once more for any trace of the shinigami. At first he could not feel anything but the gentle breeze, but then, with a sudden chill he realised that the presence he was seeking had read his moves far more clearly than he had realised. As he crossed into a more open stretch of land, glittering silver barbs shot out from the shadows, piercing him in the chest and abdomen and causing him to fly back against the trunk of a nearby tree. He slid down against it, coughing and choking as blood invaded his perforated lungs and began to soak through his clothing, pooling onto the ground around him. He blinked, his vision already blurring from the shock of the impact, just about able to make out the four or five long silver barbs which, like needles through cloth had burrowed mercilessly through his ribs to the soft tissue beneath, paring the flesh and splitting the bone as though they were little more than butter. He coughed again, struggling to bring his fingers up to touch the barbs, but as he lifted his hand a few inches from the ground, his entire body juddered, and, one by one, the projectiles withdrew themselves, each movement sending fresh pain searing through his whole body. With nothing to hold back the flow, the blood gushed from the gaping wounds, and he gasped, a sudden sense of cold washing over him as for the first time he made out the silhouette of his assailant.

It was the older man, the one who had managed for a time to keep his footing in the face of Katsura's own psychic onslaught. He was standing a foot or two away, blooded sword in hand, watching him impassively. There was nothing angry or impetuous in the man's gaze, just that same predatorial intensity he had felt in the pursuing aura, and Katsura's breath escaped in a rush as he realised he had been well and truly hunted down.

For a moment the man just stood there, then he raised his sword a second time, and Katsura gazed at him helplessly, knowing that this would be the final blow.

"Hajime-dono!"

A fresh voice broke onto the scene, causing the shinigami to pause and turn to acknowledge the sound. His name was Hajime, Katsura noted dully, but already the edges of his vision were becoming blurred and he could barely draw his thoughts together.

Well, at least he knew that. At the end, he knew the name of the man who had killed him. Wasn't that a mark of a warrior?

He smiled, a silly, bittersweet smile, remembering the stories his mother had told him when he had been tiny, of soldiers and brave deeds on the field of battle.

Maybe, if he ended his life here... then maybe...

"...orders of Kikyue-dono," the new shinigami was still speaking, but Katsura could no longer make clear sense of the words. There was a murmur of something in response, then a whoosh of reiatsu, as both he and then, at length, the one called Hajime slipped into shunpo, moving with speed away from the scene.

Katsura blinked, struggling to draw air into savaged lungs.

So the hunter had not considered him worthy of a final blow.

He closed his eyes.

For a bastard Endou, perhaps this is the only ending they see as fit. Tomorrow they'll come for my corpse, and doubtless, they'll string it up. Tomorrow they'll triumph over me. Tomorrow... I hope... Koku can't... see me. I hope... he never has to know.

A shudder ran through his body as it struggled to take in the air needed to keep breathing.

Shut off... my connection... when... left... Seventh. Maybe... he... won't see me. Maybe... I hope...

Tears glittered on his lashes.

I'm sorry. Koku-kun. Couldn't keep... promise. Sakaki-chan... couldn't avenge you. Both of you, please, forgive me. Forgive... me.

With that the last of the tension slipped out of his body, and the world of darkness swept in, dragging him down into the depths.

“...and that’s everyone.”

Juushirou wiped the dust from his hands, glancing again at the list of Seventh Division members in his hand, and then back out at the rear courtyard, taking in the expressions of the younger members with a troubled sigh. Several of them were in tears, others biting their lips to prevent a complete and humiliating emotional breakdown, and Juushirou was aware that the most junior members were still in their teens — little older than Hirata himself had been when they had first met. They lacked training and combat practice, completely unprepared for the rigours of squad life even before the murder of their Vice Captain and subsequent events had thrown the whole of the Endou domain into complete confusion, and, as he watched a young boy attempt to conceal his trembling lip behind the sleeve of his hakamashita, it was all he could do to resist the urge to hug him.

His mind and his heart were both far from the Seventh, but as a Captain, he knew that his duty was to remain with those who could not protect themselves until a senior officer returned. What had begun by his attempt to check all the recruits were in one piece had ended up in a full division examination and evacuation, for as he had marshalled the dazed and dizzy youngsters into the main building, he had discovered the damage wrought within by the Clan emblem’s missile-like flight through the roof of the central hall. Several lower ranked members had taken splinters, one or two others suffering from concussion or other minor injuries, and Juushirou had quickly ascertained that the highest ranking officer on the premises was Hirata’s Tenth Seated officer, who, despite his best attempts to keep order, was being run ragged by his panicked subordinates. There had been nothing to do but help, and so, what seemed like an age later, the entire rest of the division had been neatly assembled in ranks outside the rear of the building whilst he made sure that nobody had been crushed or otherwise badly hurt.

Fortunately, everyone had turned out to be present and more or less intact and, though there had been some tears, Juushirou’s presence had reassured many of the more scared young ones that they were not about to die.

But till Kikyue comes back, I can’t do much but stay here. Even though there are other things I ought to be doing.

His gaze flitted in the direction of Thirteenth Division, and he frowned.

Joumei said Izumi’s name, then disappeared. I hope it wasn’t remiss of me not to go with him. I promised his sister protection, but with a threat like that Katsura still roaming loose, leaving Seventh to its own devices without a competent officer in charge would be like signing the death warrants of these kids. I didn't realise how many junior officers Hirata was trying to handle... no wonder he's been so harried lately. And speaking of Katsura...

He pressed his lips together, not liking the direction in which his thoughts were heading.

Mitsuki told me she was saved by someone with dark hair and blue eyes. Then Keitarou's son appears, with Eiraki's features, and suddenly I knew who that someone was. More, Mitsuki's reaction and his — they'd clearly met before. I thought it when I saw him and the kind of power he used... raw, untrained power that would've been able to rip apart a Hollow — and then she appeared and her expression confirmed my worst suspicions. It's too much of a coincidence for this not to be the same person. But now I don't know where she is, either. Her reiatsu is completely gone from my senses, and I couldn't follow her even if I wanted to. I have so many questions, for her and for Koku — in particular, why they came into danger to interrupt the confrontation — but for now I have to do what's right in front of me and trust in others to hold things together in my absence. Naoko is still at Thirteenth, and Enishi should've returned there by now. If there's any danger there, I'll have to trust them to take care of it for me, because I can't just abandon Seventh like this.

He cast the gathered shinigami a glance, pursing his lips thoughtfully. Turnover in the Endou division went through periods of highs and lows, based on squabbles and insurrections at home which, despite Hirata's careful leadership and his father's wise counsel, still erupted between more power-hungry branches of the Clan. Hirata had always tried to build his division based on ability, rather than Clan connection, and, certainly with his senior officers, he had more or less had his way, but as older officers had retired or chosen to resign from the division in order to inherit territory and begin dynastic expansion, so young and inexperienced juniors had been sent in their place.

His gaze rested on the red, dusty face of the Tenth seat, a man in his middle forties, with a portly middle and a stubby sword thrust through the substantial obi at his side. Despite his apparent appearance of fine living, he had proven surprisingly levelheaded when faced with a crisis, and Juushirou decided that he could be trusted to report with accuracy, despite the immediate chaos.

"Masaoka, when did your Captain leave the division?" he asked, and the man immediately saluted, bowing his head.

"Early this morning, sir. Before dawn, sir. The Lady Ai sent a summons, sir, and he was gone before Kikyue-hime assigned patrols for drill."

“I see,” Juushirou clicked his tongue against his teeth. “And he gave no indication when he’d come back?”

“Not to me, sir,” Masaoka bowed again, clearly both awed and relieved by Juushirou’s presence. “Maybe to Kikyue-hime, but she just said to continue with our tasks as normal.”

“Well, it will be difficult to do that with this place in such a mess,” Juushirou turned to glance thoughtfully back at the building. “Masaoka, are you usually in command of a sub-patrol?”

“Yes, sir. Within Souja-dono... I mean, within the first patrol, sir, I sometimes lead scout missions,” Masaoka’s red face became impossibly redder as he stumbled over the name of his deceased Vice Captain, and Juushirou’s eyes softened at this obvious attempt to cover his grief. He nodded.

“Then I want you to take the men you normally lead and begin to clear the debris from the main hall,” he said. “Any recruits who were unaffected by this morning’s incident should join you. Don’t try to move the insignia itself — that can wait — but at the very least the damaged area ought to be made safe.”

“Yes, sir,” Masaoka saluted again, then wheeled on the assembled officers.

“You heard Captain Ukitake! Follow me!” he barked out, and then, without waiting for a response, he huffed and puffed his way inside, followed by a gaggle of hesitant but relieved juniors. It reminded Juushirou a little of a mother duck and her ducklings, and he stifled the inappropriate smile at this image, turning back to the rest of the gathered officers.

“All the recruits knocked out by the attack in the courtyard should retire to their quarters,” he said softly. “Anyone else, I want you to take brooms and other tools and sweep the outer courtyards clear of debris. If Hir... Endou-taichou returns to see his division in a shambles, he’ll be cross... which is something none of us wants. In the absence of Kikyue-dono or any other senior officers, I think it best that all hands move to clear the mess.”

There was an exchange of glances between some of the younger ones, but, and Juushirou wondered if he had pushed his position too far by trying to give orders to Clan children clearly fresh out of the Endou nest, but one of them, a tall, gangly boy offered a clumsy salute, grabbing his neighbour by the arm and giving him a tug as he headed off to obey the command. One by one the others followed, and, as the handful of recruits Katsura had dazed trailed slowly off towards the sleeping quarters, Juushirou leaned back against the wall of the building, letting out a sigh of relief.

Thank goodness for Hirata's discipline. They might be scared, and not up to much yet, but they're still learning to respect authority and in a crisis situation, that's the most important thing of all.

He frowned, glancing around him.

That reminds me, Tenichi should've been back by now. I hope Naoko didn't keep him... I told him to come back here, and right now, he'd be a help in dealing with the juniors. Masaoka is surprisingly helpful and authoritative, but I know Kikyue and Hirata consider Tenichi's authority above his rank, sometimes, and he knows these kids better than I do.

He ran his fingers through his lank blond hair.

What a day for you to choose to go to District Eight, Shunsui. I can't even send a kid next door to summon the Eighth, since Sora will be trying to manage things all by herself. It's already proving to be a complicated and particularly unpleasant day... especially if Joumei is right and that Katsura boy really is Keitarou's son. It means Shunsui's right — again — and there really are more than just two of them. Maybe there are more than three... but even if Joumei did kill the girl — and I've no reason to doubt that he did — it's pretty clear that Keitarou has other weapons he can unleash on us, and that they can be used to devastating effect. If I hadn't come when I did... who knows what would've transpired here.

Still, all I can do now is send an urgent message to District Seven, and hope that Hirata gets back here as quick as is possible. Kikyue's working hard and doing her best, but she can't manage everything on her own, and right at the moment, leaving the Division unattended is only asking for trouble.

He pushed open the door of the main building, picking his way carefully around debris and industrious recruits who, fired up by the occasional sharp order from Masaoka, were putting their all into the clean-up operation.

For a Tenth Seat, he has a good amount of presence. Perhaps Hirata should consider him for promotion — he can certainly keep his head in a crisis.

He nodded his head in the officer's direction, receiving another stiffly formal salute for his trouble, then he was past the scene and stepping out into the front courtyard. Though the folorn sounds of the sign's severed chains dangling in the wind created an eerie, lonely sound, the front of the Division was really not that badly damaged and, as he paused beneath the archway, eying the chains critically, he realised that it would probably be possible to reattach the insignia with relatively little trouble.

A good chain maker might be needed, but probably all it will take is some work on the links in the middle. They weren't broken, just ripped open... I think that someone will be able to do something about that.

“Juushirou?!”

So lost in his contemplations was he that Juushirou had not heard the approach of his friend, nor sensed his familiar reiatsu, and he visibly jumped, turning around with a mixture of dismay and relief to see Hirata standing on the other side of the pathway, staring at him with a look of clear incredulity in his pale eyes. His gaze flitted up to the gap where the sign had been, and his eyebrows raised slightly, a questioning expression touching his features.

“Dare I ask what occurred here in my absence, and why you’re here on my doorstep, examining broken chains like a metal worker?”

The question was voiced softly, but Juushirou picked up on the edge in the words, and the sharp nip that now touched the summer breeze. He frowned, coming to rest a hand on his friend’s shoulder.

“I don’t fully understand myself,” he said honestly. “Seventh was attacked in your absence. Kikyue sent Tenichi to me for help, and so I came.”

“To you? Not Eighth or Sixth?” Hirata was startled, and Juushirou shook his head.

“Shunsui is away with Tokutarou-sama till tomorrow,” he said gravely, “and Kikyue sent for me, I think, because Joumei was here... and she thought it better that way.”

“Joumei?” Now Hirata’s expression was a mask of shock. “But why would he be here? And Kikyue... she knows nothing about Joumei, so why would she suddenly make assumptions... what went on here this morning, Juushirou? Tell me everything, and tell me now. Every bit of it — where is my daughter, and why is my division’s sign missing?”

“It’s not missing, it’s nicely adorning the middle of your central hall, but I have Masaoka and his patrol dealing with the problem,” Juushirou told him succinctly. “He’s a good officer, Masaoka. Listens well and has a presence with the young ones, most of whom are scared out of their wits. As for Kikyue, she took some of the senior officers on a pursuit mission. It seems Joumei made himself unpopular somewhere, and brought an unwelcome follower... who is the one who laid waste to your division. He fled, and Kikyue took up the chase.”

"I see," Hirata removed his spectacles, rubbing the bridge of his nose. "Clearly I chose a bad day to go visiting my wife."

"I don't think any day to leave Inner Seireitei is a good one at the moment," Juushirou said honestly. "How is Ai-hime? I heard she'd summoned you, so I assumed she was once more unwell."

"Yes..." Hirata's expression became shadowed, then he shrugged his shoulders. "She has dreams, and hysterics, and believes I've been killed like Souja. Sometimes the only way to calm her is for me to go home and show her that I'm in one piece. Then she calms, and the doctors can get her to sleep, but it's some hours round trip. If my doing so is going to create problems, I will have to send a message to Father and tell them to keep Ai sedated, at least until things here are more peaceful. She hasn't reacted to Souja's death at all well — understandably."

"Ai-hime isn't a warrior, nor does she understand the price of bearing arms," Juushirou spoke soberly. "I'm sorry, Hirata. I wish I could be of more help."

"You clearly have been," Hirata gestured to the Division. "If you're here, you're obviously neglecting your own squad on my behalf. I should be the one apologising... but for the time being, I'd like to beg your company a little longer. A full report on the day's events is overdue, and I'm missing a lot of the pieces of this puzzle. What did Joumei do? Why did he come here? Who was the attacker? What business had they with my Seventh, and does it connect to Souja?"

"I can't answer all of those things," Juushirou admitted. "I only know a very little, coming into the battle mid-way myself. I can't even tell you where Joumei is, currently. I think he went to Thirteenth... but not having been back there myself..."

Hirata eyed his friend for a moment, then,

"You're worried about something there?"

"I am," Juushirou confessed. Slowly he outlined the morning's events in proper detail, and Hirata's eyes narrowed.

"Keitarou's... son?" he murmured, and Juushirou nodded.

"Then Joumei said something about Izumi, and vanished," he agreed. "I sent Kirio and Koku back to Thirteenth, but I don't know where Mitsuki went and I haven't been back to check. I'm trusting that Naoko and Enishi are both there and able to deal with whatever it is... but it's hard to be a Captain and not manage to be in two places at once."

“You should go back now, then,” Hirata said decidedly. “I’m here, and I can deal with my squad myself. Kikyue will probably return soon, and then we’ll get everything in order and I’ll have her report to me in full. Your duty here is over, Juushirou — your own people probably are waiting for you.”

“Are you sure?” Juushirou looked doubtful, but Hirata nodded.

“I’m grateful to you, as always, for being such a good and loyal friend,” he said, offering a tired smile. “In this world, sometimes it’s the only thing that keeps me going — knowing that whatever shadows I have to face, I have people there to face them with me. But Thirteenth has plenty to deal with too, and I can’t keep you from your own duties. I can handle my own Division, believe me. It’s all right. You can go.”

“Then...”

“Ukitake-taichou! Ukitake-taichou!”

A breathless cry broke across Juushirou’s response, and the white haired Captain swung around in consternation, seeing a slim figure haring across the street towards him.

“Kayashima?”

At the sight of Hirata, Kayashima faltered, then bowed very properly, before turning to his Captain.

“Taichou, Shikibu-san sent me to fetch you back to Thirteenth at once!” he exclaimed.

“At Thirteenth? Why? What’s happened?” Juushirou grabbed the youngster by the shoulders, giving him a little shake. “Calm down and report, Kayashima — what message did she give?”

“Yes sir,” Kayashima’s eyes were bright with urgency, but he obediently moderated his tones, eying his companion earnestly.

“Kotetsu Tenichi tried to kill Ichimaru Izumi and Ketsui-san arrested him, but now he’s locked in Thirteenth’s cells and nobody knows what to do and Shikibu-san wants you to go back at once, please!”

“Tenichi did what?” Juushirou’s fingers slipped away from Kayashima’s shoulders, horror flooding his features. He glanced at Hirata, seeing the same floored expression mirrored on his friend’s features, and a cold chill ran down his spine.

“There’s no mistake in the message?” Hirata found his voice, casting Kayashima a sharp look, and Kayashima shook his head.

“No, sir. That’s the exact report, sir. I saw it, too. Shikibu-san and Ketsui-san taking him to the cells, I mean,” he reported fervently. “Because I was there, Shikibu-san told me to come report to the Captain and not to start any rumours about it, so I figured it was really important and I didn’t forget a single word of what she said. She said to make sure that Taichou came back with me, and so I ran all the way here.”

Juushirou was silent for a moment, digesting this. Then he let out a heavy sigh.

“Then I’ll go back,” he said sadly, meeting Hirata’s blank gaze with a troubled one of his own. “I guess the day is getting even longer and less pleasant as the hours roll on.”

“I’ll come with you,” Hirata suggested, but Juushirou shook his head.

“Kikyue will come back and need to report, and your juniors shouldn’t be left alone. A lot of them were very scared, and some of them got hurt,” he said quietly. “You need to stay here. I’ll send word as soon as I know what’s happened — and what Tenichi’s role in it is — but for now, your duty is with Seventh. And mine... it seems that mine is back at Thirteenth.”

As Kirio stepped out into the Division gardens, the true scale of what had occurred there hit her, and she faltered, gazing in dismay at the shattered remains of fence and tree branch that littered the ground. She bent to pick up one of the smashed splinters, blunted and split in two from some kind of impact, and as she ran her fingers over its surface, she could feel not one but two sword presences — that of the aggressor, Tenichi, and of a defender.

Ketsui.

She raised her gaze to where her young squad mate was still standing, silent and motionless alongside a broken stretch of fence, and she sighed, setting the broken wood down and getting to her feet. At her approach, he turned, apparently detecting her presence for the first time, and at the look in his eyes, Kirio knew that her suspicions were true. Her heart lurched in her chest.

“Ketsui...” she murmured, and Ketsui let out his breath in a rush, turning to lean up against the surviving wooden post support. He folded his arms across his chest, then, at length, he spoke.

“You’ve heard, then? I can see it in your eyes that you have.”

His words were cold and flat, lacking any of their usual emotion, and Kirio’s heart clenched once more. Slowly she shook her head.

“I haven’t been told anything,” she said softly. “I just happened to see the mess in the garden, and when I stepped out, I sensed Reihahen. The Onmitsukidou are everywhere, though... did someone get hurt?”

“No... nobody got hurt,” Ketsui rubbed his palm against his brow, shaking his head. “Not unless you count the kind of hurt that isn’t measured in blood and bandages... in which case, I’m still trying to get my head around it.”

Slowly and haltingly he recounted the events of the fight, and Kirio felt her worst fears realised.

“I don’t understand,” she whispered. “If Tenichi was so worried... if he felt things were so wrong... why didn’t he talk to us?”

“I don’t know,” Ketsui turned his gaze towards the savaged tree, shrugging his shoulders. “He wasn’t like my brother. He was like someone else. It was as though something had possessed him — but that’s the worst part of it, Kirio-nee. I knew nothing had. It was all his own — his reiryoku, his intent — his drive to fight. It was twisted and strange, that’s all. I can’t explain... like all the pressure on him had finally snapped something inside of him, and he’d lost a grip on what did and didn’t make sense. But the worst part of it was that he attacked her because he thought she was a threat to me. He tried to hurt her because of me. If I hadn’t released Reihashou... if he had succeeded, Ichimaru-san would’ve died because of me.”

There were tears in his eyes at this admission, and Kirio sighed, hugging the younger boy instinctively.

“Whatever Tenichi did, he did it, not you,” she murmured. “I don’t get it either, but I don’t suppose anyone considers it your fault. You did the right thing in stopping him, and, probably, when he calms down he’ll think so too. He’s been carrying so many burdens lately... probably they just rushed over him and he snapped. He’ll calm down, and it’ll be resolved. It’s a misunderstanding, right? I’m sure Taichou will find a way to work it through.”

“No... not this time,” Ketsui shook his head. “Kirio-nee, this is serious. Ten-nii said that he’d seen Keitarou. He said so and both Ichimaru-san and I heard him clearly. He said something about that Onmitsukidou, too — the one he attacked outside of Seventh. When you told me about the aftermath of that, you told me he'd said it was all all right and he wasn't in any trouble. But when he came here to report to Taichou, before any of this happened, he told me he'd got a good scolding for it. More than that, he asked me about Ichimaru-san. The way he asked... made me uncomfortable. I thought it was just because so much was going on, then — but now I'm starting to wonder. I don't think it's just a case of him seeing Ichimaru-san and snapping. I think he knew who she was — maybe things even I don't know — and had planned to kill her. He just needed to make sure people were out of the way, first... which this morning, they were."

"Me included, thanks to Koku's little adventure," Kirio chewed on her lip. "I'm sorry, Ketsui-kun. If I'd realised..."

"You can't see the future," Ketsui shook his head. "You didn't know what would happen — nobody did. I just think, looking back on it, that this was something Ten-nii meant to do. And I... I don't like thinking of it like that. It means my brother and I are at crossed purposes for the first time in our lives... and I don't know how to put things back. I don't know if I can go back. What he did today... at the moment, I don't think I can forgive."

"Ketsui?" Kirio stared at him blankly, and Ketsui offered a wan, hollow smile.

"I love my brother more than anyone in the world," he said sadly, "That's never going to change. He's the only family I have, and I don't want anything bad to happen to him. For that reason, I haven't told anyone but you what he said, yet, about Keitarou. But thinking on it, I know it's important that I report in full, when Taichou comes back and sends for me. Ichimaru-san and I have been working on something that connects to the Third's investigations and we've found evidence of other things to come — if I start concealing evidence now, I might make things worse. Nii-chan didn't fight arrest, and didn't refute the accusations, so it's not as though I can tell if he's angry with me now, but even if it makes him angry, I have to tell the truth. I've come this far — there's nothing else I can do."

"Do you think Tenichi was working with Keitarou?" Kirio asked the question she feared the most, and Ketsui shook his head.

"No, from how he spoke, it sounded more like Keitarou had bullied and backed him into a virtual corner, and it began with his abduction," he said gravely. "Ten-nii said something about Keitarou maybe coming for me if he caused problems or was useless or... I don't know what. He wasn't entirely coherent. His arguments didn't make sense. And I had to protect Ichimaru-san... so I was more focused on that.”

He buried his head in his hands.

“The truth is, I didn’t protect her because Taichou told me to,” he added reluctantly. “I ought to have done, but I know, deep down, that I didn’t. In normal circumstances, I wouldn’t have ever fought against Ten-nii. I would’ve tried to reason with him, and I certainly wouldn’t have arrested him. I wouldn’t have felt this angry or this determined... but I really... was prepared to release all of Reihashou’s power and fight against him properly if he persisted in attacking Ichimaru-san. It’s silly, isn’t it?”

He shrugged his shoulders.

“I’ve known her such a short time... Ten-nii’s been there all my life. I don’t know anything about Ichimaru-san. Her brother appeared in the middle of our confrontation, yet I didn’t even know she had a brother, not till then. Ten-nii knew him, though, and he knew Ten-nii. There’s so much in this I really don’t understand. Those gaps would normally make me hesitate, but this time they just... didn’t seem to matter. I didn’t care if I didn’t have all the answers. I knew I trusted Ichimaru-san, and so that was all I needed to protect her.”

Kirio eyed him for a moment, then,

“Trusted her, or something else?” she asked gently, resting a hand on the younger man’s shoulder.

“Kirio-nee?”

“Neither you nor I questioned Tenichi as much as we ought to have done,” Kirio leaned back on the broken fence alongside him, a troubled look crossing her features. “We believed he was all right because he said he was, because we trusted in him to talk to us if he was upset. He chose not to, and we don’t know yet, why — but what you said about Ichimaru-san then made me wonder whether the same applies for her, too.”

“I don’t understand.” Ketsui looked blank, and Kirio offered him a pensive glance.

“We didn’t understand Tenichi was in so much distress. We assumed we knew, so didn’t bother to find out,” she said matter-of-factly. “We love him, and because we do, we never thought to doubt him. We didn’t try to understand, because we thought we already did. Maybe the same is true for you with Ichimaru-san. Maybe you didn’t need to know all the details about her that Tenichi knows or anyone else because you’d already assumed you knew her. And maybe that happened because she's become more than just your duty. She's become your friend... no, perhaps, she's become something even more."

Kirio-nee?! "Dismay flooded Ketsui's expression, colour pooling in his cheeks, and Kirio shrugged.

"I'm just suggesting," she said quietly. "You said it wasn't Taichou's orders that made you raise your sword. What was it, then, that made you want to make sure nobody took that girl's life?"

"I know she's my ally," Ketsui pursed his lips, recovering his composure. "I don't think it's anything other than that, but it is true that I do trust her. I suppose I didn't know I trusted her enough to fight my own brother to keep her safe, but I wouldn't go back and do anything different. Ten-nii was in the wrong, not me. I did what needed to be done and it was right. But it hurts, Kirio-nee. Choosing sides between a brother and a trusted ally... hurts."

"So does being betrayed, huh?" Kirio squeezed his arm reassuringly. "I'm sorry, Ketsui. It was a bad day for me to go gallivanting off on my own whims. I should've been here — maybe I could've done something to help."

"No..." Ketsui slowly shook his head. "No, I don't think you could. I'm glad you didn't see Ten-nii the way he was today. It will stick with me a long time... the stranger that was my brother."

"I really find it hard to believe."

Juushirou rested his hand against the wood of the cell door, a troubled expression in his hazel eyes as he gazed through the slats at the prisoner huddled inside. He was curled up in one of the corners of the chamber, his head buried in his hands, and though Juushirou's officers had not restrained him with spirit cuffs, it was clear from his general demeanour that escape or uprising were the last things on his mind. Though Juushirou was sure that his former squad member could sense his reiatsu outside the door, he did not flinch or look up, and the Captain wondered whether Tenichi was afraid to meet his gaze.

He turned to cast Naoko a quizzical glance.

"Reihahen?"

"Fukutaichou's office, sir," Naoko's voice was unusually grim. "He thought it would be safest there, whilst all the chaos calmed down. The cupboard is locked, and he has the key. Nobody will be able to retrieve it without your authorisation.”

“I see.”

There was a long silence, then Juushirou sighed.

“Tell me again exactly what you believe happened, Naoko. I’m afraid it hasn’t quite sunk in. I can’t imagine under any circumstances why an officer like Tenichi would do something so outrageous, and with so little provocation.”

“I didn’t see the fight,” Naoko sounded regretful. “Tenichi apparently thought to put a kidou barrier around Houjou-kun’s office, so that I wouldn’t detect what he was about.”

“A barrier?” Ukitake’s brow creased in distress. “You’re sure?”

“According to Izumi, he told her so,” Naoko agreed. “I think she’s right, too. I thought I sensed something as I left the office, after she came to fetch me... but I was distracted by Reihahen and Reihashou and so didn’t give it any more thought till we were talking in the office afterwards.”

“And what has Tenichi said?”

“Not a word,” Naoko admitted. ‘He gave Ketsui his sword, and pretty much crumpled on the spot. He didn’t deny anything, or resist us, so we put him in here and I sent Kayashima to get you. You were longer than I thought you’d be,’ she added. “Did something happen at Seventh, too?”

“Tenichi was meant to report to you, but I suppose he didn’t do that, either,” Juushirou leaned up against the wall of the hallway, letting out his breath in a rush. “Yes, there was an incident, but Hirata has returned now and can handle it himself for the time being. I’m more concerned by this... and now the division is crawling with Onmitsukidou, which will hardly calm things down.”

“Were we wrong to send for Shihouin?” Naoko looked anxious, and Juushirou shook his head.

“No. It was right and it needed doing,” he assured her. “Sending for Kai himself was a smart decision — as was sending the Kitsune to Ugendou, so as not to cause more alarm than necessary. A lot of inexplicable things have happened today and my mind is still reeling, but for the time being I’ll deal with what’s right in front of me. You spoke to Ketsui, by the way?”

“Yes,” Naoko agreed. “Houjou-kun and I both did. He was clearly very upset too, Taichou, but in a way I haven’t seen him before. He was... angry. Not at us, or anything like that, but just... angry. Angry at his brother maybe — but it was a strange, simmering kind of anger that I've never known from him before. He answered all our questions civilly enough, but they were brief and to the point. Houjou-kun decided to send him to change and cool off, but told him not to leave the barracks, because we'd talk to him again later on. All he really said was the bare bones of what happened — he came across his brother with his sword released, he prevented him from hurting Izumi and he took his sword and arrested him as a result. Nothing more. Just that."

"And Izumi isn't hurt?"

"No, thanks to Ketsui, she's fine," Naoko agreed.

"Well, there's something to be said for small mercies," Juushirou groaned. "Very well, I understand as much as I'm going to. Kai's already made it clear he intends to take Tenichi into Onmitsukidou custody, and I think it might be for the best that that happens. I know he'll treat the boy as fairly as he can, and it's a more neutral territory than either here or the Seventh could be. While he's with Enishi in the office, talking the formalities of the matter through, though, I want to see if Tenichi will talk to me about it at all. He might not... but it's worth a try."

"I'll leave you to it, then, and go find Ketsui," Naoko suggested, and Juushirou nodded.

"Please," he agreed. "Tell him to come to the office... no, better to Ugendou. I'll deal with all of it there. If you can let Enishi and Kai both know that too — it's more private and further from prying eyes. Tell Makoto and Kirio to take charge of the usual chores and routines, and also that there will be no afternoon or evening patrols, on account of the Onmitsukidou manning the gates. We don't want any unfortunate accidents. Kira and Tsunemori can help them, if they like — which reminds me, Naoko, has Mitsuki come back here?"

"Mitsuki?" Naoko blinked, then shook her head, looking alarmed. "Why would Mitsuki have left here? She's with the injured boy — isn't she?"

"She was," Juushirou's lips thinned, as he fought to cover the panic that surged inside him at his companion's surprise. "I saw her at Seventh, earlier, but I thought she had come back here. Maybe she went to see Unohana-taichou, though. It's not important — I just wanted her to look at Joumei's injuries. They don't seem severe, but he was very grey and worn out when last I saw him."

“Oh,” Naoko’s expression cleared, though there was lingering doubt in the clever greenish eyes. “Well, it’s all right. We patched him up more or less with the emergency supplies in Fukutaichou’s office, and Fukutaichou found him something new to wear. He seems all right... a bit pale, maybe, but he wasn’t complaining.”

“Then I suppose it’s all right,” Juushirou managed a smile. “I’m sorry to have kept you, Naoko — and grateful for your quick actions this afternoon.”

“Well, I’d prefer it if you didn’t go babysitting another division the next time there’s an assassination attempt,” Naoko said drolly, “but all things being equal, and no corpses being reported, I think it could’ve been a lot worse.”

She cast Tenichi a glance, and her humour faded.

“He’s not right, Taichou,” she said softly. “I can’t explain it, but I know he’s not right.”

With that she was gone, hurrying back up the steps to the main division courtyard, and Juushirou swallowed his misgivings, turning the key in the lock of the cell door, and pushing the divide back. At the sound, Tenichi glanced up, and Juushirou could see from the puffy, swollen tissue around his eyes that he had indeed been crying. In all the years he had known the older Kotetsu boy, he had never seen him look so completely pitiful, and he steeled himself, remembering that he was facing a man suspected of attempted murder, not a victim in need of his support.

“Tenichi-kun?” he spoke softly, and at the sound of his name, Tenichi flinched, hanging his head once more. At his clear shame, Juushirou sighed, stepping into the cell and pushing the door shut behind him. He turned the lock with a soft click, and Tenichi shuffled back against the wall.

“I won’t try to escape, Taichou,” he said softly, his voice muffled somewhat by his hands. “I don’t want to be... out there. Even if you opened the door, I wouldn’t try to go.”

“What happened today?” Juushirou softened his tones, eying the younger man in consternation.

“I’m sure Naoko-san has explained it to you already.”

“I want to know it from your side, though,” Juushirou persisted. “I don’t understand it, Tenichi. I’ve worked with you — we all have — and we’re all confused and reeling from what happened here today. None of us can think why a rational, well-trained and intelligent officer like yourself would launch an unprovoked attack on an unarmed recruit, much less here, within the grounds of your old division, a place where you have so many friends!”

“She’s not a recruit,” Tenichi’s voice was flat, and Juushirou frowned.

“Yes, she is,” he replied evenly, and Tenichi shook his head, frustration clear in his eyes.

“She’s not,” he insisted. “She’s a fox. One of the silver haired people. Cursed people. People who cursed my Vice Captain, and people who cursed me. The Onmitsukidou said it... if I was no good, then there was Ketsui... and the silver haired people were cursed. Traitors. Evil people. They said it themselves! And then they were there, around Ketsui, and I couldn’t... I didn’t want... I didn’t want him to get hurt.”

The incoherent tirade ended in a pitiful whisper, and Juushirou only just managed to resist the urge to put his arm around the other man’s shoulders.

“Ichimaru Izumi is a recruit of the Thirteenth Division,” he said gravely. “True, she did not enter Thirteenth through the normal channels. I had forgotten that her people were the ones to retrieve you following your abduction... but I thought you understood they were Hirata’s people, and therefore, allies of your Captain and your Vice Captain, not ones who wanted to hurt them?”

“Fukutaichou went to see them, and he never came back,” Tenichi murmured, and Juushirou could see the glitter of desperation in the man’s gaze. “I couldn’t... do anything about that. I didn’t want Fukutaichou to die, and then...”

“Izumi was sent to my care as a refugee,” Juushirou made up his mind, and Tenichi stared at him blankly, floored by this sudden and unexpected announcement. Juushirou nodded.

“Their home, where Souja went to fetch you, was attacked and everyone in it killed,” he continued softly. “The man who killed them was Aizen Keitarou, and it’s believed that he took and deposited you in that location in order to discover their hiding place.”

“But...”

“Izumi’s brother was the only survivor from that raid, but he was also hurt in the attack,” Juushirou continued as though the younger man had not spoken, though the stricken look in the other’s gaze had not escaped his notice. “Joumei’s foresight in sending Izumi to me protected her... and I promised to keep her safe. Today you broke my promise to him and to her to keep her from harm. I find that hard to understand, Tenichi... especially since Thirteenth was a sanctuary for you and your brother, too, when first you left the Academy. Or had you forgotten the talk we had then, about your background and how you wanted to rise above it?"

Tenichi's complexion turned a sickly pale colour, and he sank back against the wall, shaking his head. If he had had the capacity, Juushirou thought, he would have begun to cry once more, but it was clear that his earlier efforts had exhausted his tears.

"It was Aizen Keitarou who took you hostage, wasn't it?"

Juushirou had not wanted to voice the question, yet he knew he needed more now than ever to know the answer. Tenichi flinched, but didn't respond, and Juushirou frowned, coming to kneel on the cold stone before his prisoner. Gently he rested his hands on the other man's slumped shoulders, meeting Tenichi's hopeless gaze.

"Tenichi?"

Slowly, Tenichi jerked his head forward in a nod, and Juushirou sighed.

"You lied to Kai, then, when you told him you did not remember your abduction?"

Another nod.

"Did he do anything to you during that time? Did he use his sword? Anything like that?"

"His sword?" Tenichi's head jerked up at this, and he let out a slight, hollow little laugh, shaking his head. "No, sir. He did not. He didn't manipulate me to do anything. I see what you're thinking, but it's not like that. He did nothing to me. He treated me... like family. Like he had... when we were small. And I was... I was stupid. I let my guard down and I didn't think..."

He buried his head in his hands again, scrubbing his poor, abused eyes with his palms, then,

"I'm not working for Keitarou," he whispered. "I know how bad it must look, but I never was. I never did. It wasn't like that, sir, I swear it wasn't. But everything is so muddled in my mind, now. He told me that he wanted to help people... people in Rukongai, people others had forgotten... starving people that made me remember being a refugee. And so I thought... I said... I would try to find a way to... to get food and supplies to the Rukon, for them. That's all I promised, I swear! I know it sounds foolish and naive, but it's the truth. In return he took me to Father's grave. That's where those silver people found me. They locked me up and prodded and poked me until Fukutaichou came to get me. Then Fukutaichou went to see them alone... and that night he went to Rukongai and was killed. I knew if anyone knew I'd seen Keitarou, let alone spoken to him, that my background... and Ketsui's... everyone would make connections and then... then it would be the end. But the longer I concealed it, the worse it became, and I couldn't... get out."

He took a shaky breath into his lungs, and Juushirou said nothing, waiting for him to find his voice again.

"It doesn't matter now, any of it," he said at length. "The Onmitsukidou — Kurotsuchi, or Suzuki, whatever he called himself — he kept coming after me. He told me where Souja-dono had gone, when everyone else was searching for him, and that I should be glad if he came back a corpse, because if people knew my secret, both Ketsui and I would fall. I wanted to help Fukutaichou, but I was also... afraid. If I had said something... but I didn't, and Fukutaichou died, and I... I felt like it was my fault."

"Nobody considers you to blame for Souja's death, Tenichi," Juushirou assured him gently. "Not even Hirata, and certainly not me. The night he went missing, he went to Rukongai, on an errand of his own choosing. He told his father and I as much, before he died. He broke rules and paid a high cost for acting without Hirata's permission. Maybe he did go to investigate your abduction, but you could not have prevented what happened. You could not open a gate to the Rukon, even if you had wanted to... and it was in the Rukon that Souja was hurt."

"But the Onmitsukidou kept saying things... threats... about the fox people, about Ketsui..." Tenichi swallowed hard, clearly wanting to bare his soul now that the first, horrible truths had begun to slip out. Conflicted, Juushirou realised that, just as he had done when a recruit, Tenichi was reaching out to the one person he had trusted in to accept and understand his point of view, despite the shadows in his past, and his heart began to ache as he realised that, here, in the Thirteenth Division's cell, Tenichi's dream of rising beyond the curse of his father's Urahara past was fading into dust. It would be hard to fight the suspicions and the disciplinary charges that were sure to come, but harder still to overcome the mental demons, and though Juushirou did not want to admit it, he understood all too clearly what Naoko had meant when she had said Tenichi was 'not right'. Though he was mostly coherent, and un confrontational, Juushirou could sense the wavering in the other man's aura, and he knew that the promising young shinigami he had recruited some several years earlier had begun to shred and fragment.

Another victim of Keitarou.

Juushirou's thoughts surged with anger.

If Tenichi isn't able to fight through this, it will be yet another reason that Keitarou can never be forgiven. I know from personal experience how good he is at messing with minds. He doesn't just destroy people by killing them — he can destroy them alive, too, till they no longer know which way is up and which is down.

"He told me that if I said anything about Keitarou to anyone," Tenichi was still speaking, and Juushirou forced his rage to calm, turning his attention back to the matter at hand. "If I mentioned seeing Keitarou, then Ketsui... if I was useless, maybe he'd go after Ketsui. I couldn't... let that happen. Ketsui is... is my brother. I promised... Mother..."

That was as far as he got before the words failed him, and Juushirou sighed, getting to his feet.

"Clearly this is deeper than it first appears," he said sadly. "You realise that I have no choice but to hand you over to Kai and let him deal with you from this point on. Keeping you here at Thirteenth isn't possible. We don't have the means to confine a prisoner of your spiritual calibre, and I'm afraid that, in your current state of mind, that concerns me. Right now, you are calm, but I can't be certain that you'll remain that way. Izumi is my responsibility, too, as is Ketsui. Both are members of my Division, and I have to protect them first and foremost."

"And I am not," Tenichi sounded pained. "I should never have left here, Taichou. I'm afraid of myself, lately. I don't know who I am, or why I'm thinking the way I do. Since I came back to Seireitei... no, since Fukutaichou died, I've not known which way to turn. When he told me that Fukutaichou wasn't killed on Keitarou's orders, I thought of the fox people, and I thought... it was because he went to see them that night, and then... and now I don't know what's right or wrong any more. I should be locked up. I'm losing my mind, and I don't... want to hurt anyone else."

"Who told you Souja wasn't killed on Keitarou's orders?" Juushirou demanded sharply, and Tenichi looked stricken, a moment of clarity piercing the muddled green eyes.

“Sir?”

“You just said ‘he’ told you Souja wasn’t killed on Keitarou’s orders,” Juushirou’s words were urgent now. “Who told you that? The Onmitsukidou? Suzuki Naoto? Did he tell you that, in one of these visits you say he made to you? Or was it someone else? Nobody in Seireitei has discussed anything of the kind — who told you it wasn’t in Keitarou’s plan, to kill your Vice Captain that night?”

“I... I...” Tenichi was clearly in distress, as though he’d said something he had sworn not to, but Juushirou was not about to give up, the encounter at Seventh fresh in his mind.

“Someone like a kinsman of Keitarou’s? A son, maybe? Someone called Katsura?”

“Katsu... ra?” Tenichi gaped, blinking at the Captain for a moment, then shaking his head. “I don’t know who that is, Taichou. I swear, I don’t. Keitarou did tell me he had children, but I never heard that name before — not ever.”

“You never met anyone — here or in Rukongai, by the name of Katsura?” Juushirou felt suddenly deflated, as Tenichi shook his head.

“I promise,” he said softly. “I didn’t meet anyone by that name.”

“I don’t suppose he always used the same name. A young man of about Souja’s age, with dark hair and blue eyes?”

“No sir, I’m sorry,” Tenichi shook his head again. “I don’t know who that is. I’m sure.”

“Well, it was worth a try,” Juushirou grimaced. “If not Katsura, then, who was it who told you?”

“I... I don’t...”

“You can tell me, or you can tell Kai,” Juushirou warned. “‘I don’t remember’ won’t work as an excuse any more, and it will come out, one way or another. Who told you that it wasn’t Keitarou’s order to kill Souja? I want to know... the truth, please, this time. It may be important. It may mean other people don’t die.”

“I can’t tell you,” Tenichi’s voice shook, but there was resolution in it that had not been there moments before, and Juushirou was taken aback by the conviction that now entered the man’s green eyes. “I’m sorry, sir, but I promised and I can’t do it. Even if it means I get into more trouble, I gave my word. Because he kept his promise to me... I’ll keep my promise to him. He’s the only person I haven’t let down or betrayed yet, and I won’t...”

“If this person is an ally of Keitarou’s, Tenichi, shielding him could cost you your life.”

“I don’t care,” Tenichi shook his head. “And he’s not, sir. At least, the Onmitsukidou wanted him killed, and I don’t think... he knew Keitarou because he wanted to. He said he didn’t have a choice, and I thought he was like me. He’s not an enemy. He won’t hurt anyone. Can’t... hurt anyone. He just happened to see something... and that’s all. He’s not done half the things I’ve done, and he told me, time and time again, to keep out of it, but I didn’t listen. I didn’t, and now today...”

The Onmitsukidou wanted him killed.

Juushirou’s heart skipped a beat as he put the threads of this together.

He happened to see something? Good grief, Koku?

Out loud he asked,

“Did this informant of yours tell you how he could be so sure this was true?”

Tenichi shrugged.

“He said it was a vigilante killing,” he said simply. “I saw the girl in Rukongai myself, sir. She tried to kill me, too, only she was made to stop because Keitarou...”

“Had a use for you,” Juushirou’s eyes became slits, and he nodded his head.

“All right, then for now, that’s all,” he said wearily, moving back towards the door. “The Onmitsukidou are here, and will take you into their custody from here. I will need to get to the bottom of this from all angles, and so will they. Answer their questions, Tenichi. This is a serious matter, and I have no power to pull you out of it, nor can I protect you from your own Captain’s opinion, when he comes to hear the full story. Don’t tell anyone any more lies, you understand? Tell Kai the truth, as you know it... he’s not unfair, but unless you do that, nothing can be resolved.”

Tenichi was silent for a moment, then he sighed.

“I’m losing my mind, anyway,” he repeated. “It’s all right, Taichou. I don’t need you to help me — or anyone else. Honestly, it’s sort of a relief, being shut away like this. Hearing the click of the lock makes me realise I can’t do any more harm. If you say that girl isn’t Keitarou’s ally, then I believe you — but sir, I wanted to kill her and I wanted it with the whole of my being. I wanted it to the point that, for a moment, I considered releasing Reihahen at Ketsui because he'd chosen to get in my way, and that terrifies me more than anything else. The fact I thought to hurt my own brother... I never felt like that before Souja-dono died. If they took Reihahen from me and locked me up forever... even if they killed me... it probably wouldn't be enough for me to expect forgiveness, or to forgive myself for what I've done."

He shook his head.

"I don't know myself, now," he owned. "I'm dangerous, and unpredictable, and I can bear weapons against my own brother. Attack unarmed recruits. Take the law into my own hands. And I can intend murder. I don't want to be that person any more. I don't care what happens to me... so long... so long as it's finally all going to stop."

Juushirou cast Tenichi a pained glance, but he could not find any words in response, and instead he just inclined his head, letting himself silently out of the cell and fastening the lock once more behind him.

As he walked up the steps towards Ugendou, his heart was heavy.

If only you had told me the truth from the start, Tenichi-kun. If only you'd come to me, knowing that I understood your past and your secrets, and confided in me. But I suppose Souja's death frightened you, and if Keitarou was using Suzuki to intimidate you...

He clenched and unclenched his fists, then,
Unfortunately, with Suzuki still missing, it's a lead we can't corroborate. As for the person you spoke to, I'm sure it was Koku. Koku came from Rukongai, and Tenichi was held in Rukongai, we know that now. Tenichi was at Thirteenth that night, late, after curfew. He said he came to see Ketsui, but what if that was a lie? What if it was Koku he came to check on? Enishi said that when Souja died, Tenichi came to report and he had to drag him out of the room before he disturbed Kirio's refugee. That refugee was Koku, so he'd have known... but he said nothing, so he was... protecting him. Tenichi mentioned a promise — a mutual vow, perhaps, to never speak of what they saw in Rukongai. But that would mean that, despite how close I've kept surveillance on Koku, he and Tenichi were communicating all the time since then without anyone picking up on it? It seems unlikely, but then, what in this is likely? Tenichi said the person happened to 'see' something. Does that mean he knows Koku can see things nobody else can? And if he does, maybe he'll be persuaded to tell Kai...

He rubbed his temples.

I can see that I can't put off dealing with the Koku situation any longer. I'll have to speak to him — tomorrow, if everything has calmed down by then. And then there's Mitsuki — but right now I can't add that to the pile of things already clogging up my mind. Shunsui will be back tomorrow, too. I'll speak to him, if I can, before I do anything about Koku, and then...

"Taichou!"

As he reached the main building, Kirio came hurrying across the courtyard towards him, an anxious look in her eyes, and Juushirou glanced at her, a pensive expression on his face.

"Is Koku all right?" he asked softly, and Kirio flinched, looking troubled. Slowly she nodded.

"Yes, sir. He's sleeping, sir. I'm going to go back there, I just... I heard from Ketsui, about Tenichi, and..."

"Tenichi will be going with the Onmitsukidou," Juushirou said gently. "He's confessed to the assault on Ichimaru Izumi and he's accepted that it will have consequences. There's nothing for you or I to do here, except our duties. Unfortunately the time for friendly reassurance is long since passed."

"Yes, sir," Kirio looked crestfallen, and Juushirou sighed.

"I need to talk to you about earlier today, too, but it can wait, for now," he said wearily. "Whilst the Onmitsukidou are on the premises, too, I think it unlikely any harm will befall the young lad."

"I locked the door," Kirio assured him. "I was going to go right back, sir, after I spoke to Ketsui."

"I will need to do that, too," Juushirou agreed. "For now, I imagine it won't hurt to let Koku rest and recover himself. For the time being, I want you and Makoto to take care of organising and overseeing afternoon chores. After I've finished speaking with him, though, I suspect Ketsui will need you more than Koku will... so you have leave to abandon your supervisory duties. I will make other arrangements."

"Thank you, sir," Kirio was grateful, but Juushirou knew from the shadows in her eyes that she was far from placated. He patted her gently on the shoulder, then turned back towards the main building, making his way back towards Ugendou.

And now, God help me, I have to deal with this in the way a Captain should... and only hope that out of this day of chaos comes some inch or ounce of good.

52. Sacrifice

Chapter Fifty One: Sacrifice

The hut was dark.

In the shadows, the eight year old Katsura could make out sobbing, a soft, frightened sound like the whimpering of a small child who had become separated from its caretaker in the crowd of people that populated the lower valley. Though he could see no sign of anyone in the dim light that faintly illuminated his surrounds in a greyish haze, he stepped cautiously forward, certain that he was not imagining it and that this time, at least, the voice was not simply in his head.

The floor creaked slightly under his weight, and he paused, tensing, but nothing flew from the shadows to attack him, and the child continued to cry, apparently oblivious to his arrival.

The chamber was cold, and though there were the cooled, blackened embers of a fire in one corner, it had clearly not been lit for some time. Running his fingers against the wall, Katsura's skin brushed against the familiar sensor for one of the spirit lamps his father had taught him how to use and he closed his eyes, screwing up his brow beneath his floppy fringe as he focused his energy on bringing it to life. At first it refused to cooperate, but after a few minutes it fizzled and began to glow, gradually brightening his surroundings and allowing him to see for the first time where he was.

Scraps of paper were scattered across the floor, whether blown by the wind or discarded by some unknown hand, Katsura did not know. He bent to touch the nearest fragment as it skittered along the wooden floor alongside his foot, but despite his best attempts, he could not make out the squiggles that decorated the page. As he released his grasp on it, allowing the sheet to flutter once more to the floor, he caught sight of a fleeting movement in the far corner of the chamber and he turned to see a curtain hung over a portion of the wall, twitching and dancing in the light evening breeze.

No, it was not dancing, but being moved, and a prickle ran up Katsura's spine as he realised the muffled crying was coming from behind this fabric divide. The parchment scraps forgotten, he hurried forward, almost tripping over his own feet in his haste to cross the short few metres, for he knew that the one beyond the curtain was the one who had been calling to him. Grabbing it in grimy fingers, he tossed the worn cloth aside, and then stopped dead, staring in disbelief and confusion at what lay beyond.

Wooden bars, fashioned from imperfect bamboo sticks separated him from a tiny room that lay like a prison cell beyond, a rumpled blanket on the floor and a yellowed ceramic dish scattered with grains of rice and clumps of congealing soup the only indication of furnishing. It was not the cell itself that caught Katsura's attention, though, but its only occupant, a grimy, miserable specimen of a young boy who was curled up against the wall, tears streaming down his cheeks and his tiny shoulders shuddering with the violence of the sobs. At the sound of the curtain being flung back, he raised his gaze, his melancholy dark eyes meeting Katsura's for the first time, and in that moment, the older boy felt a jolt of something dart through his senses. The child too seemed to flinch, his eyes widening slightly, then, the next moment he was stumbling to his feet, his thin, fragile body pushing forward to the barred divide and his tiny, pale fingers stretching plaintively through the bars as though trying to grasp hold of Katsura's sleeve.

Too startled by the suddenness of the gesture to pull back, Katsura instinctively reached out to brush his fingers against the child's wriggling ones, feeling their cold, clammy surface. The child tried to speak, his lips not coherently forming the word, but, as they touched, Katsura heard the boy's tearful voice echoing through his head.

"Onii... chan."

Katsura froze, staring at the child in disbelief, but the boy's hopeless gaze had been replaced by a sudden flare of hope and determination and he scrambled forward, pressing close against the wood bars as he strengthened his contact with his impromptu visitor.

"Oniichan." This time the word was spoken, the word trembling but somehow certain in its intonation, and Katsura found he could not pull away, not when his young companion had reached out for him so wholeheartedly.

A flicker of broken, fragmented images flashed briefly across his mindscape, slithers of information but in a strange and disjointed order. As the boy's grip on his hand tightened, the pictures grew more vivid and compelling, yet although they were a violent melee of slashes and shadow, Katsura did not feel afraid. Somehow he felt he had come here to find this child — to protect him, maybe — and as he settled himself down against the bamboo cage, he felt the youngster follow his example, leaning up against the bars without releasing his hold on his rescuer for one second.

"Oniichan." The word was steadier this time, a firmness in the piping voice that had not been there before, and Katsura realised with a jolt that the tears that had stained the boy's cheeks had ceased to fall. Faint, disbelieving hope flooded the youngster's dark gaze, and Katsura was struck by the intensity of the stare. This child, with whom he had never spoken, and whose name he did not even know had been waiting for him, even calling for him, and the fact that this stretch of the village was nominally out of bounds had temporarily slipped his mind. All he could think of was that he had stopped the boy's tears.

Gradually, the youngster's eyes closed, his head lolling trustingly against Katsura's shoulder through the bars, and Katsura tightened his grasp on the tiny fingers, reaching tentatively to brush his other hand through the fine, dark muzz of hair that fell in shaggy, uneven waves to the child's chin. A dull hum of mental energy told him that his companion was sleeping, perhaps for the first time in some while, and a faint smile touched his lips.

I helped. I made him stop crying. Just like in the village, I helped.

"Katsura?"

The voice from the doorway made him start, swinging around guiltily as he registered the shadow of his father in the entrance of the hut. At the sight of him, Keitarou let out a heavy sigh, crossing the floor slowly and sinking down a metre or so away from his eldest son's position. He said nothing to begin with, his gaze flitting from Katsura to the sleeping boy, then he slowly shook his head.

"You shouldn't come here. I thought you understood that this was out of bounds."

"He was crying," Katsura said feebly. "I heard him."

"If you hadn't walked here, you wouldn't have heard anything."

"No, I don't mean like that," Katsura glanced at the sleeping boy, then, "In my head. Last night, I heard him. He was crying and calling to me, Father. I had to come find him and stop him from crying."

"Called to you?" Keitarou's gaze too shot sharply to the younger child. "You had a dream about it?"

"Mm, I think," Katsura frowned, then nodded. "I don't know, really. I just knew he wanted me to come here, so I did. I'm sorry I broke the lock, Father. I didn't mean to do that, only I had to get inside, and it was so stuck... and I pushed it too hard..."

"He's fast asleep," Keitarou pursed his lips together thoughtfully. "I've never seen him sleep like that, not in the whole of... but you're all right? You don't feel strange at all? You're not seeing any odd pictures, or feeling anything unusual?"

“Pictures?” Katsura looked confused, then shrugged. ‘Yeah, I saw some, but they weren’t that strange. I mean ,they were plenty strange, but they were just like,’ he gestured with his free hand. “They were his pictures, not mine. I wasn’t bothered by them. I think they scared him, though.”

He hesitated, then,

“Father, who is he?” he asked softly. “When he saw me, it was like he knew me. He called me ‘oniichan’, but I haven’t met him before, have I? Have I seen him in the village? And why is he here, in this place? It’s cold and scary, and I don’t think he likes it.”

Keitarou looked pained, and for a moment he did not answer. Then, at length, he settled himself more comfortably on the wood, rubbing his weak leg absently.

“Forgive me,” he said sadly. “I’ve concealed it from you, and I’m sorry. I thought it for the best, but maybe... maybe not.”

He patted his son on the arm.

“His name is Kohaku,” he continued softly. “He’s five years old, and he’s been living here since he was a baby. You’ve never met him, but I’m not surprised that he recognised you. You see, Katsu-kun, Kohaku is your little brother. He’s here because he has bad dreams that make him and other people around him feel ill, so he has to be here,by himself like this. I kept you away because I didn’t want you to get sick too — but you don’t seem to be... maybe I was wrong.”

“My... brother?” Katsura reeled, staring at the child as if seeing him for the first time. “But... I don’t understand...”

“Your brother,” Keitarou agreed. “I’m sorry for concealing it from you. I thought it best, but it seems as though you’re able to reach him on a level even I can’t. His dreams and delusions don’t poison my thoughts, and maybe that’s why they don’t hurt you, either — since you’re his and my kin. On the contrary, you’ve calmed him — I don’t know how, and I don’t suppose you do either, but...”

“I heard his voice in my head,” Katsura remembered. “Nobody ever did that before — just spoke into my head without me trying to do it first. I think he was waiting for me, Otousama.”

He ran his finger over the tiny hand, then, “Can’t we take him home? He’s so scared here, and if it’s all right my coming...”

“No... no,” Keitarou shook his head. “Unfortunately, we cannot. You are fine, but I can’t be sure he won’t affect your sister, and she’s far too tiny yet to be able to cope with such a rush of spirit power, especially since she has none of her own to defend herself with. The people here are vulnerable, too. One person already became very sick and died because of Kohaku's spirit power, and so it's not safe to let him come home."

"Someone died?" Katsura looked stricken, and Keitarou nodded.

"It wasn't his fault," he agreed, reaching across to ruffle Kohaku's hair affectionately. "He didn't mean to hurt anyone, but I can't take the risk of it happening again."

"I see," Katsura frowned, then, "can I come here, then? Maybe, if I came once each day, I could talk to him and we could be friends. I think it would be nice, if I could do that. I'd like to play with him, and he doesn't hurt me."

"I'll talk to your mother, but maybe," Keitarou said cautiously. "For now, though, I'm taking you back home. Kohaku is sleeping, and hopefully he'll stay that way for a while. He's been quite bad recently, but I'm relieved to see him resting. It's hard to make him eat or do anything else when he's at his worst, and it's not nice, seeing him so troubled."

"What does he see, Otousama?"

"Things that nobody else can — things that haven't even happened yet, or things that happened a long, long time ago," Keitarou said matter-of-factly. "He's too young to explain them properly, but being here, like you, I can feel it radiate from him, and see the things he sees. It is a tremendous ability to be born with — a gift like no other, but great gifts carry great burdens, too. Remember that, my boy. Nothing in this world comes for free."

"If it's like that, I don't really want a great gift," Katsura reluctantly released his hold on the sleeping Kohaku's hand, getting to his feet. "I don't s'pose Koku wants it, either, not if it means he can't come home."

"Koku?"

"Mm," Katsura nodded, offering his father a grin. "I think he should be called Koku. Don't you think so? Kohaku is long, and he's only little, and anyway, it's a brother's job to give nicknames and stuff, isn't it? Some of the kids in the village have nicknames, and I think it would be nice, if Koku had one too. That way it's like he really is my brother, because I've given him a special name."

"I see," despite himself, Keitarou laughed. "All right. I suppose he won't mind, if you want to call him that."

He hugged his older son, patting him on the head.

"I'm proud of you, though," he added. "You broke bounds and that was bad, but you came here of your own accord, no matter how frightening it was, and that was good. You've begun to overcome your own terrors, and that's because you wanted to help Koha... Koku to settle, wasn't it? That's what a proper older brother should do — protect his siblings from harm. You have to be strong and unafraid, in order to set them an example. Both Sakaki and Koku will need that, in different ways — maybe I can see that you're ready to be their oniichan, more than I'd realised before."

"I will," Katsura's dark blue eyes became solemn, and he nodded his head. "I'll be their nii-chan, Father. I promise."

"Good lad," Keitarou grinned, slipping his hand into the other's and squeezing it. "But you also must promise me not to talk about this place or about Koku to anyone, understand? Nobody but your mother or I, never anyone else. It's for his own sake, and for the sake of other people. He wouldn't want to hurt anyone, and that's what might happen, if everyone knew he was here like this. All right?"

"Even from Sakaki?" Katsura asked, and Keitarou nodded.

"Especially from Sakaki, since she's the one most likely of all to be hurt," he agreed. "No, Katsu-kun, you must never speak to your sister about your brother. You might be all right knowing, but she almost certainly would not be. As a big brother — do you understand?"

Katsura was silent for a moment, glancing back at the still slumbering boy. Then, at length, he nodded his head.

"Yes, sir," he said gravely, "I understand."

"Katsura-kun, open your eyes."

Mitsuki's voice broke Katsura from the dreamlike stupor, and he opened his eyes, blinking a couple of times to bring her face into focus. There was something glittering and hazy between them, he realised blurrily, a cloud of energy filling the air and making it hard to see clearly her gentle grey eyes or her delicate complexion. Then, the next moment his awareness returned to him with a jolt, as he saw the young woman tilting something that looked very much like a sword hilt in his direction.

"Mitsuki... san?" the syllables came out jerkily, his hand rising automatically to push hers back, but she was too quick for him, looping her free hand around his wrist and pushing it gently back down onto the ground. The haze of energy dissipated into the ether, and Katsura realised it had been some kind of kidou, for now he could see clearly that, far from moving to hurt him, Mitsuki's sword blade had divided into particles of glittering light which now were embedding themselves deep inside the wounds Hajime's needles had left across his torso.

He wet his lips, then managed a single word,

"Why?"

"I shouldn't need to explain that," Mitsuki said matter-of-factly. "I'm a healer. I heal people. That's my job. The one who should be asking why is me — why, and how, and a lot of other questions."

Katsura pursed his lips, and Mitsuki's grasp on his wrist tightened.

"There's time," she said softly. "Seventh Division are distracted... and nobody else came out this far to find you. They won't disturb us, and right now, you can't move, let alone try to escape from me. That being the case, while I heal you, you can explain yourself to me. You can tell me what you were trying to do today... what your connection to Koku is... and, most of all... who you really are."

"You'd save a person not knowing all those things?"

"You saved me in the Spiritless Zone," Mitsuki did not falter. "My spirit power is weak yet, but strong enough to knit this kind of wound so you won't die. Besides, that wasn't one of the questions. I'm quite serious, Katsura-kun. I want to know... exactly what is going on."

"Right now... you look... like a Kuchiki," Katsura observed, resignation flooding his handsome features. "I didn't see it before, but that look... that tone of voice... it's there, isn't it? You are a Clan hime, Mitsuki-san... one who tends to the injured without discrimination, but a Clan hime all the same."

Mitsuki arched an eyebrow, and Katsura sighed.

"All right," he agreed. "Though when I do, you'll probably wish you'd not bothered coming to help me. More, maybe you'll want to hurt me yourself — I don't know. But I suppose... of everyone, I owe you that. I don't care much for Seireitei, but... I always felt that you were different, and I guess you're proving it again now. More... I know you helped Koku, too. I saw how you came with him... and I saw the bandages across his body. He was hurt and you helped him. You might not be my ally... we might be as far as we can possibly be from alliance now, but if you're at least his ally... then I will trust you, and hope... it's the right thing for me to do."

"Koku," Mitsuki's eyes narrowed. "So you really do know him."

"Mm," a sad smile touched Katsura's lips. "Yes. Yes, I do."

“Explain how.”

Katsura eyed Mitsuki pensively for a moment, then nodded.

“I met him when he was five and I was eight,” he said honestly. “He called out to me and I came to him. Like you did, in the forest — when the Hollow was attacking, I picked up your every thought and feeling and I couldn’t stop myself from coming to help you. Koku was... like that. He reached out for help, and I went to him. And I found him.”

He pressed his lips together,

“And then Father found both of us,” he admitted.

“Father?” Mitsuki’s brow creased thoughtfully. “So this was somewhere in Seireitei? Somewhere near here? Somewhere far?”

“I told you when we met I didn’t come from Seireitei,” Katsura shook his head, wincing slightly as the sword’s healing magic began to knit deep into his wound. “I didn’t lie to you then. We met in the Spiritless Zone. That was far from where I grew up, but... not as far as here.”

Mitsuki’s eyes opened wide with dismay, and Katsura nodded.

“I was born in Rukongai,” he said softly, “Twenty five years ago, in a part where the Shinigami no longer go.”

“Oh God...” Mitsuki’s face paled, and Katsura felt sure that if her hands had not been occupied in healing him, she would have clapped one of them over her mouth in her dismay. “But you said... your father. People in Rukongai... they don’t have... family. That doesn’t... but you said... born. You said... that. So...”

“Mm,” Katsura rallied his courage, meeting her gaze with a bittersweet one of his own.

“My full name is Aizen Katsura,” he said slowly, watching the stricken look flicker across the grey eyes. “But you’d already realised, hadn’t you? That when I said Father, I meant...”

“Keitarou,” Mitsuki bit her lip.

“And the reason I was there, in the forest, to save you that day?” Katsura let out a humourless laugh. “Because I was the one who was meant to kill you. I was meant to kill all of you. Only I felt I knew you... and I couldn’t do it.”

“Oh God,” Mitsuki’s fingers faltered from the hilt of her blade for a moment, before tightening, and Katsura shifted his body, moving his arm to touch her sleeve.

“Stop,” he murmured. “You owe me nothing. I killed your friends. The Hollow... I controlled it. I drove it at your companions and made it fight them. I saved you — but I put you in danger. Your friends... their lives... mine is the price owed. You shouldn’t heal me... not when I did such horrible things.”

“Healers don’t choose who to heal based on their deeds,” Mitsuki spoke quietly, but Katsura could see the tears on her lashes and could tell that the truth had shaken her. “We heal because it’s in our nature. Sometimes that puts us in harm’s way. Even if what you said is true, Katsura-kun... I won’t stop. This is my duty. As a healer, I don’t believe in killing. Not even if the person I’m helping hurt those I cared about.”

“But...”

“If you regret it, then you should use your life to atone for it,” the glitter of Kidou strengthened around Katsura’s body once more, and he felt the warm determination in its glow against his skin. “If you don’t, then not even my healing power can really save you. You are already dead, if you can take innocent life and not regret it.”

“Mitsuki-san...” Katsura hesitated, then, “I do regret it. I did it because I was told to, and I had always been raised to believe Shinigami were evil. But because I met you, I know they’re not, all. I can’t take back killing them, but I... am not proud of it. And most of all, not proud that you had to know I did it. I’m sorry... more to you than to them. I betrayed you most of all, yet you heal me all the same. I don’t deserve that.”

Mitsuki chewed on her lip, and for a moment there was silence between them, then she spoke, her words full of sadness.

“Twenty six years ago, I saw your mother in the forests of the Real World,” she said slowly, moving her hand to guide the particles of Yuuyugo’s blade deeper into the wound. “I knew then that she was with child. That child was you, wasn’t it?”

“Probably,” Katsura agreed.

“Then you’re Keitarou’s eldest child.” Mitsuki’s brows knitted together. “The Council searched for both Keitarou and Eiraki. They wanted Keitarou for many things, and Eiraki-chan...”

“Chan?” Katsura’s eyes widened, and Mitsuki nodded.

“Once, we were friends,” she agreed sadly. “Once, but a million years ago. The day I saw her in the forest, she tried to kill my cousin, and that I couldn't forgive. I learned then about Ribari, and that she'd been the one to poison him, too. I knew then there was no rescuing her... that Keitarou had destroyed her. But I wondered, sometimes, about the child. The Council — I know the Endou would've taken you and raised you, if only they'd found you, and then..."

She faltered, as the tears began to fall, and Katsura raised a bloody finger to wipe them from her cheek.

"It would've been a lie," he said simply. "I wasn't sent here today, Mitsuki. Even though what happened in Rukongai was because of Father's orders, and a lot happened because of it, I came here today for one reason and one reason only. I came because my sister was murdered — I came to be her vengeance."

"Your sister? Sakaki? The girl who killed Souja-dono?"

"And the others in the Spiritless Zone. Yes," Katsura nodded. "She was bloodthirsty, she was violent, but she was my sister and I loved her. Mother, Father, too. They're my family. If I'd been raised as an Endou, it would have been wrong. I regret hurting your friends, because I didn't understand. But I don't regret coming here today."

"Then I'm glad you didn't manage to kill anyone by doing so," Mitsuki said firmly. "Killing out of vengeance never solves anything. It only gives another family reason to grieve, reason to hurt. Sakaki was probably killed because she murdered Souja-dono. You came to kill because Sakaki was dead. Then someone would come kill you, and so on it goes. It isn't right, Katsura-kun. It's not justice, that way."

"It's the only justice that kid will get," Katsura replied sadly. "I can't expect you to understand, but I never met Souja-dono. I never met any of Sakaki's victims, and even if I had, well, I don't pretend I agree with everything she ever did. Or that we didn't argue. We did. But the most important thing to me has always been my family. and so I chose to come today. Father couldn't stop me. I came of my own free will. I can't go back — he made it clear that if I brought him trouble again, I shouldn't bother returning. I chose to come anyway. I knew I might be killed, but so be it. I had to put my sister's ghost to rest... and, maybe, sate my own feelings."

His eyes glittered slightly, and Mitsuki sighed.

"You're an Endou," she said regretfully. "You said it would have been wrong, if you'd been raised one, but today... I saw it, and just now, it flared up in your eyes again. Earlier... wasn't an accident, was it? Your power didn't just intoxicate you... you really meant to kill."

"I meant it," Katsura agreed regretfully. "I came to avenge Sakaki... and would've killed any who tried to prevent me, or died in the attempt. That was my choice... it was what I came here resolved to do."

"Then I'm the one who's foolish," Mitsuki reflected sadly. "Not all Endou have their claws out all the way when you first meet them, but... that will to protect, to defend, to fight and to kill... I just felt it raise inside of you again, even just talking to me. You can't help it being there, but it's there all the same. The hunting spirit of the Endou Clan brought you to be Sakaki's vengeance. I can heal your wound but I can't take that instinct away... which means... if I help you, you'll come back and try again, won't you?"

Katsura was silent for a moment, then he shook his head.

"I won't," he said pensively. "I won't, because it will make Koku sad. I don't want to do that. I don't want to hurt him, or his chances of finding the life he's never had, here."

"What do you mean?"

"You haven't realised that yet?" Katsura was surprised. "I told you, didn't I? We met when we were children. He was a little boy of five, a wretched sight in rags. Of all the people I've ever trusted, Koku is the one I trust the most. The person I have the strongest connection with is him, and it's been that way since that day."

"Then Koku is also from the Rukon," Mitsuki deduced. Katsura nodded.

"Yes and no," he responded, and Mitsuki looked confused.

"Yes... and no?"

"Well, as much as I am, he is," Katsura offered a hollow smile. "Koku is my brother, Mitsuki-san. I thought that should be obvious. Just like I was, he was born in the Rukon. Just as I did, he grew up there."

"Your..." Mitsuki's eyes became huge for a second time. "You mean... the boy Juushirou's been taking care of at Thirteenth... that boy is Keitarou's son too?"

"As much as I am," Katsura agreed.

"Then that boy is... Kohaku?"

'He is,' Katsura confirmed. "Does that shock you?"

"I don't know," Mitsuki bit her lip. "I've heard so many mixed reports, and I didn't know what to make of them. Stories of a demon, a monster, someone capable of destroying the world. Now you tell me that person is deep within the Division of someone I care about very much. I don't know what to think."

"Someone you care about..." Katsura's eyes became slits, then he sighed, shrugging his shoulders. "I don't know who that is, but you shouldn't worry. Whatever I've done, Koku... he hasn't killed anyone. He hates the idea of killing, and Father has never been able to control him. Only... Koku has... certain things about him that make him valuable to Father, and I'm afraid that it might mean... he's not safe, not even where he is now. I want... I've always wanted to live in Seireitei. I want it for him, too. For most of his childhood, he suffered so badly that he tends to pull away, not trusting people. He trusts me, but I think... nobody else, and if I'm not there..."

"I see," Mitsuki's eyes softened. "When you talk about him like that, I... begin to understand why he's so wary and seems so lonely. He doesn't sound like a demon at all, the way you describe him — and the boy I met, he doesn't seem like one either."

"He's not a demon," Katsura agreed, "but he's not very comfortable around people, and I've always looked out for him. We have a connection... and if I sever it, I need to know that he has others to look out for him. He has the same bad blood as I do — but he's so much more at risk than me."

"In what way?" Mitsuki lowered her sword, setting the hilt aside and reaching out to help her companion into a sitting position, eying the wounds critically. "A little more Kidou, I think. My sword is about spent, but I still have some magic I can use. Tell me about Koku, and I'll try and muster it."

"He acts as though everything is fine," Katsura sighed. "He makes out that he can handle the world, and puts space between it and him, but deep down..." he shook his head. "I've told you before, but I can read people. Their thoughts and things. With Koku, when we first met each other, our connection was telepathic. From then, we've talked that way, through thoughts as much as words and... I guess I've picked up on his feelings because of that."

He looked apprehensive.

"Are Seireitei really convinced Kohaku is a demon? Will it put Koku in danger, if you know his real name?"

"No, not if I can help it," Mitsuki shook her head. "But I don't know... if it's something other people should know yet. Like I said, there have been stories circulating — rumours about this Kohaku, and that he poses a threat to everyone and everything in Seireitei. If that's really the young boy Juush... Ukitake-taichou has..."

"Koku isn't violent, and he's not as headstrong or as impulsive as I am," Katsura said sadly. "He warned me that following this path was dangerous, and he was right. Just... he's not like other people. Not like any other people. He's just... not."

"I imagine that, in Rukongai, there are few with spirit power like you or he have," Mitsuki pointed out, but Katsura shook his head.

"No... I mean, not just in Rukongai," he responded. "In Seireitei, too. Probably in Inner Seireitei, even among the Gotei. Koku is not the same. That's why people think he's dangerous — but it's not like that. It's not like that at all. He has a lot of spirit power, it's true, and if he was of the mind Father is, he could probably use it to cause a fair amount of damage. But he's... different. He is stronger than I am. Maybe he's stronger than Father is — I'm not sure, but the way Father treats him makes me think that potentially he could be. Potentially. He has the ability to cause great harm, but Mitsuki, the idea of causing other people pain hurts Koku more than anything else. He hates other people's suffering... yet he's had to live with images of it for his whole life. The more he's surrounded by death, the worse it becomes."

"Other people's suffering," Mitsuki's eyes softened. "That makes him sound like a healer. It's the same for us, you know. We feel other people's pain and we have to reach out to help. It's an impulse that's hard to fight, and it can cost our lives."

Katsura's expression became troubled, and he sighed.

"I'm sorry," he murmured. "I didn't understand anything, and now I can't change it."

"No, but you can move forward," Mitsuki told him pragmatically. "That's why healers preserve life. If you have it, you can take action. You can atone for this. If you do, my friends didn't die for no reason."

Katsura touched a finger gingerly to the healing wound. What had seemed such a fatal, gaping hole only a short time earlier had now completely stopped bleeding, the pain dulled to little more than an ache and a thin, glittering haze of energy pulling the edges of the skin together, providing a makeshift scab through which his own body could mend. He drew his hand back, pursing his lips.

"Are you sure, using all this power on someone you know is a murderer?"

"You might be that," Mitsuki acknowledged gravely, "but right now, you don't sound like it. You sound like... a worried brother, looking out for his kin. Your aura changed completely... and... I like this you better. This is the Katsura-kun who helped me in Rukongai. This is the person I think you should try to be, if I heal your wound. So maybe, I thought, if I did that properly... you could try."

"Mitsuki-san..." Katsura began, but Mitsuki put a finger briefly to his lips.

"Tell me more about Koku," she repeated gently, and Katsura sighed, nodding his head.

"Even though we were both born in Rukongai, I really didn't meet Koku till I was about eight," he said quietly, his voice trembling slightly, and Mitsuki saw the distant look in his eyes as he remembered something she could not see. "Until then, I didn't know I had a brother. Father kept him away from us, and Mother spoiled me, but never spoke about him. It was as though he didn't exist."

"I don't understand," Mitsuki frowned. "Why would he do that?"

"Koku was different," Katsura explained simply. "Father thought it dangerous for him to be too close to us, especially as time went on. It was by accident that I met him at all. I didn't feel his thoughts, not exactly. It was as though something was crying out to be rescued — a frightened child, disturbing my sleep at night and haunting me during the day. Eventually I went looking, and I found the hut Father had locked him away inside."

"Locked...?" Mitsuki's eyes widened, and Katsura nodded.

"Koku... sees things," he said carefully. "I'm not sure how exactly to put it so that it makes sense, since it isn't really easy to understand. He sees things that other people can't see. Things that haven't happened yet. Things that happened long ago. When he was younger, they swallowed him up so he had no way of disseminating reality from delusion and his spirit power was so wild that it infected anyone who came near. One man went mad and died because he got too close, and so Father kept everyone away, just in case. He and Mother decided not to tell me about Koku because I might get into danger if I went near, but I found him all the same. He was just a frightened little boy to me, Mitsuki. I remember him, tears streaming down his cheeks, these pale clawlike hands reaching for me through the bars as though looking for someone to save him. I wasn't frightened. His delusions didn't poison me like they did other people. On the contrary, I was able to calm him. We bonded then, and when Father found us, we were curled up either side of the bars together, him sleeping peacefully and me holding onto his hand. That's when Father told me who he was and why he was there."

"Juushirou said that Koku had suffered from waking nightmares since he'd been here," Mitsuki remembered. "He asked me to look at him, but Koku wouldn't talk about it and didn't seem to want anyone to examine him properly."

"I guess he doesn't want to be locked away again," Katsura pressed his lips together. "It's only in the last five years or so that he's become rational enough for long periods of time. Father agreed to remove the interdict on his mixing with other people, and only under the condition that he became Koku, not Kohaku. People were afraid of Kohaku, because of the stories about the man's death and the aura of death surrounding the hut, so he had to become a stranger. Even my sister never knew that she had two brothers, and she always spoke to Koku so horribly because of it. I hated that, but he's just accepted it without a murmur of protest. He never called me Oniichan, and he called Father and Mother by their given-names, with honorifics, as though he was another person from the Rukon. He sacrificed his family ties for a taste of freedom, but it's never really been that. His world is still so small, despite the things he sees, and the power he has sets him apart from everyone. He has to hide so much, including his feelings about things. In some ways he's smarter and seems older than I am, but in others he's still not grown up. And even though he has rationality now... it doesn't mean the danger is over."

"Do you think that he could lapse back into a delusive state permanently?" Mitsuki asked softly. Katsura shrugged.

"I don't know," he admitted. "He doesn't talk about it much, not if he can help it, but I don't think he's been so well lately as he was before. Death... upsets him. I don't know for sure what happened when he decided to come here, but I think it's fair to say that he saw your comrade die before it happened, and decided to try and stop it, regardless of the consequences to him or to anything else. He's so frightened of returning to that world of nightmares that I imagine he'd do anything — even try and save the life of someone who posed him a threat — rather than let it take over him again. He's said more than once that he hates Kohaku's existence, and often speaks of him as though Kohaku were a completely separate person. Maybe that's why he accepted being Koku so readily — I don't know. Father would exploit things too, of course — force him to use his abilities to see future and past events and it took its toll. I... I wanted to treat him normally, like my brother, because I was the only one who could. I tried not to let him dwell on things — but it never goes away completely. I don't know if he can control it more. Back in Rukongai Father worked with him a lot, but that's not happening here. He had techniques, tools... things to help, but here..."

"I see," Mitsuki's lips thinned. "Whatever Keitarou was doing to support his development has broken down because he's been with us and none of us know what we're dealing with. And, on top of that, he's surrounded by people he doesn't know, in a place he knows nothing about... a place full of spiritual stimulants that Rukongai probably doesn't have."

"Yes," Katsura rubbed his chin in agitation. "I'm worried he'll be angry that I've told you, but I want him to be all right. Please, Mitsuki-san, you have to believe me when I say he hasn't killed anyone. Sakaki and I have blood all over our hands, but he has none. I'm sure he tried to save Endou Souja-dono because he believed it was the right thing to do, even though he must've known what would happen if he did. Please help him to find a way to stay here, and a place to belong. I think if he has that... if he has people who accept and understand him as he is... then maybe he'll be all right."

"You really do love him, don't you?" Mitsuki said gently, and Katsura nodded.

"The rescuing wasn't all on my part," he said honestly. "Koku and I have a special bond — like I said, he's the only one I could ever talk to through thoughts as well as words. I don't really know why that is, because people with strong spirit power I can't usually connect with like that, but he... well, like I said, he's not like anyone else."

"I've sensed pain and sadness from Koku's aura when I've been with him, and also, wariness to the world around," Mitsuki admitted. "Now I understand why. He isn't just out of his familiar environment, but dealing with things that most people can't even fathom. I can see why folk fear him — everyone fears the future, in some way or another, and to have someone who can see into it is unnerving and uncanny for most."

"Koku's said himself that he knows too much, and that's his weakness," Katsura agreed. "It makes him very lonely... but I don't want him to be that any more. His hallucinations are usually bad ones, but once he told me about a place he'd dreamed of, a peaceful place near a lake, with flowers and birds and insects, with a blue sky and not a single cloud. He'd never left Rukongai, and never seen those things, but he described it to me perfectly and even showed me his memory through our psychic link. When I came to Inner Seireitei, I saw it for the first time. It's the garden alongside Thirteenth, where we met that night I came to warn you. In his dream, he said he was sitting there, laughing and talking with people he could not see and whose voices he could not place. It was this place... and so I'm sure he's meant to be here. He might not have seen it yet but... that vision is my one hope for his future, whatever happens to the rest of us."

Mitsuki's eyes softened.

"When you speak like that, I know you're not really a killer. Not at heart," she said, the glow of Kidou fading from her fingers. She got to her feet, reaching to retrieve the hilt of her sword before pulling Katsura carefully to his.

"I don't know about that," Katsura admitted. "But I made my choice. I chose my family over my chance to make peace with you and your people. That was my decision."

"A sacrifice for war," Mitsuki murmured sadly, and Katsura shrugged.

"Perhaps," he agreed pensively. "But we all have to have faith in something. My colours are nailed to a different mast than Koku's. I understood that today, but it makes me believe all the more that he should stay with you people. You... are not my enemy. I don't know if Seireitei is, either. The one who killed my sister isn't a shinigami, so I'm not sure. But for Koku's sake, if that's where he is, I won't fight any more against the Gotei. In return... please make sure he's all right. Please help him find a place he belongs — because in Rukongai, he never had that."

Mitsuki was silent for a moment, eying him sadly. Then, "I'm going back to Inner Seireitei," she said softly. "If you are still here by the time the officers of the Seventh return, you will be arrested, charged and maybe put to death. I can't give you any more warning — my duty to my dead comrades won't let me cross lines any more than I already have. My life was saved by you, but also threatened by you. Therefore I saved your life, but I will not protect your life. That makes us even, I think?"

"More than," Katsura's blue eyes softened in grateful comprehension. "And Koku?"

"Koku is not a killer, and so long as Juushirou has him, no harm will befall him," Mitsuki replied solemnly. "The sins of the father aren't automatically the sins of the son. If Koku can be helped, I will try and help him. You have my word."

“Then that’s all I ask. It’s already more than I deserve,” Katsura flashed her a rakish smile, but it was tinged with sadness, and Mitsuki’s own clouded gaze told him that she knew they would never meet again.

Probably, the same goes for Koku and I too. Hard as it will be, I have to disappear. For his sake, maybe for Father’s, too... I have to not exist. I already shut off contact, and now I’ll have to maintain that block, no matter what happens, even if it means breaking another promise. I don’t know what the future will hold, but for now, all I can do is take Mitsuki’s challenge and see if I can find a way to atone for what happened in the Spiritless Zone. I owe her that at least, and if she has Koku’s interests in her sights...

He reached across to grasp her hand briefly in his, before letting it fall back at her side.

“Saving you was something else I don’t regret,” he said softly. “This person who you care for, don’t take them for granted. The world can change in a heartbeat, and its easy to get caught in the flow.”

With that he was gone, slipping into shunpo as he pushed his battered body through the streams of light to a place far from the furore of Inner Seireitei.

Reaching the edge of a quiet copse, he used what remained of his strength to pull his weary frame up into the branches of a nearby tree. Hiding himself among the foliage, a bittersweet smile touched his lips, as he recalled how Sakaki had loved to use trees in her stalking games.

Well, little sister, I hope your soul can rest without blood spilt in your name.

He closed his eyes, resting back against the hard, twisted wood of the trunk.

For Koku’s sake, I won’t take any more risks. If he’s there... today I saw clearly what he wants, and needs, even if he doesn’t realise it yet himself. You and I, we cast our lot with Father, but Koku never did. Now I see why, and... maybe it’s the right choice. I guess perhaps time will tell. If Father goes to Seireitei, it will be messy. I can only hope that — if that happens — Mitsuki’s Gotei are able to protect Koku.

“I wondered whether you’d bother coming back here tonight,”

As Keitarou stepped over the threshold into the village, he found Eiraki waiting for him, her body wrapped in a thin cloak against the unsettled breeze. Her expression was impassive, and her words cold, but Keitarou could see the red about her lashes, and she knew that no matter how hard she tried to conceal it, she was still a mother who had lost her daughter. Eiraki's normally vivid blue eyes — the eyes that Sakaki had inherited, passed down from the legendary Endou matriarch, Yayoi were dull and clouded, unusually lacking in spirit and life, and at the sight of her, Keitarou sighed, moving to put his hands on her shoulders. She flinched slightly, but did not pull away, and Keitarou knew that, despite her anger, she had been waiting for him, unsettled and desperate for his touch and reassurance that all would be all right. She had probably spent much of his absence preparing Sakaki's body for burial, he realised with sudden clarity, as he registered the specks of blood that tarnished her sleeves, and for a moment he closed his eyes, wondering how he would tell her the full truth.

"I wondered if you would come see your daughter buried," at length, Eiraki spoke again, breaking the silence that had fallen between them. 'I realise you have 'important things',' she spoke the words with genuine bitterness, "to do, which surpass your duty to your family in your mind's eye, but at the very least, I thought you could be a father for a moment, instead of a crusader trying to bring the world to its knees."

"Eiraki." Keitarou faltered, then bent to kiss her on the brow, genuine sorrow in his muddy eyes. "I'm sorry — I really, truly am. I didn't intend... if I had known what was going to happen..."

"I thought you knew everything that was going to happen?" Eiraki pushed him back, sudden life sparking in the bright, defiant eyes, and Keitarou caught a glimpse of the young girl he had first fallen in love with, who had gone through hell and high water to achieve his goals, even taking the life of the Kuchiki heir because it had made him happy. That spirit and rebellion had calmed and aged, her determination ploughed into her children and her loyalty to the Rukon people, but it somehow comforted Keitarou to know that within the woman still lived the girl who had truly understood him. He reached up to touch her cheek, then lowered his hand without making contact.

"I don't know everything. Even Kohaku doesn't know that, and I only pick up bits and pieces of the things he sees," he said softly. "When he was small, it was different. I could read much more from his aura, then — but as he's got older, and stronger... it's happened less. Besides, Kohaku isn't here... and if he knew Sakaki was going to die, he didn't tell me about it before we were parted."

“One child about to be laid to rest beneath the earth,” Eiraki’s voice shook, and Keitarou felt her hand slip into his, gripping hold of his fingers tightly as though afraid to let them go. “One disappeared into nothing with no explanation, and the third... Kei-sama, where is Katsura? He was here in the village, but he hared off in your direction, and now you come back here... without him. Tell me the truth... where is my son?”

“Alive, and in Seireitei, currently,” Keitarou told her gently.

“He’s alive?” Eiraki relaxed slightly at this, and Keitarou nodded.

“He and Koku are both alive,” he assured her. “I made sure of it. But Eiraki, listen to me. Katsura went of his own volition to challenge the fox that killed your daughter. He was angry and I couldn’t stop him.”

“What else do you expect him to do?” Eiraki demanded. “He’s an Endou. Vengeance is born into him. He’s my son — or had you forgotten that?”

“I had not,” Keitarou shook his head. “I suppose I underestimated how deep that blood ran through him — or rather, no I didn’t. I knew he felt strongly about his kin, but I hoped... he would listen to my words and wait until such a time as we could make a meaningful assault on the shinigami’s world. As it is...”

“He went to attack shinigami?” Eiraki’s entire demeanour changed. “You said the one who killed my daughter was that cursed fox — you didn’t say anything about shinigami! Why didn’t you say that before, Kei-sama? Go back there! Go get him and bring him back! If you don’t, the shinigami will...”

“I am not going back to Seireitei,” Keitarou put a finger to her lips, shaking his head. “Katsura understood the risks, and he went there anyway. I told him to stay, and he defied me. I warned him before, Eiraki-chan. If he defied or betrayed me again, I would not take him back. He did so openly and knowingly this time. Whether he killed Sakaki’s killer, I don’t know. What happened to the fox remains unclear in my mind... though I think it likely he’s died, I can’t be certain of the circumstances. In the case of Katsura, however, there’s nothing I can currently do about that. He made his own decision — if the shinigami capture him, then that will be that.”

“You’d abandon your own son to the mercy of your enemy?” Eiraki’s features had drained of colour, but Keitarou knew it was anger, not grief that had rushed through her body, for those bright blue eyes were now sparking at him, full of censure and disbelief. “Do you have any concept of what I went through to birth and raise that child, as well as nursing you through your injury? I could've chosen one of you over the other, but I never did! I worked hard to ensure that both of you, helpless as you were, had a chance to live and gain strength! Katsura's first steps inspired you to get back up and walk — or had you forgotten? Katsura's existence helped bring you back to life! You owe that child and I both your life, and yet you discard him, as though he were no more than trash? Who was it who preached and lectured me on betrayal and on trust, Urahara Keitarou? Would Keitsune-sama have abandoned you in such a casual, haphazard way?"

"Father?" Keitarou stared at her, a flood of emotions rushing through his own body, and he frowned, his eyes darkening.

"Father did abandon me," he said softly. "He left me as a four year old boy with not an ounce of protection in this world. You say I owe you and Katsura my life, and maybe I do — but it's me who has protected you all these years. Katsura has chosen to turn his back on that protection. I would've avenged Sakaki. I had it in mind — but I needed more information. I needed to know I could protect both my sons and bring them back to you alive, but Katsura would not listen! He's just like his Endou forefathers in this respect — he doesn't heed common sense and rationality, and is always too keen to have everything done yesterday!"

"You know nothing about the Endou, if you can speak about them like that." Eiraki's voice shook, and Keitarou snorted.

"You, who abandoned them, now try to defend them before me?" he said disdainfully.

"Yes, I abandoned them," Eiraki snapped back. "I abandoned them because I didn't agree with how they, or the others ran Seireitei. I chose to come with you, because at least then I would be free to make my own decisions and choices! It doesn't change the fact I have Endou blood, nor my pride in what that means. I am a hunter, and I hunt. I lack the power to do it as my brother does and my grandfather did, but instead I bequeathed it to my children — to Katsura and to Sakaki — and because of that mentality, they've served you and your cause well. Katsura inherited your spirit power and both he and Sakaki my hunter's instinct, so you made effective weapons of them both. But they aren't just weapons, Kei-sama! They are your children! Your daughter lies bloody and cold because you miscalculated, and now your son..."

Keitarou was silent for a moment, then he sighed, rubbing his temples.

"I have two sons. We have two sons," he said quietly.

"Kohaku is different," Eiraki pressed her lips together, and Keitarou arched an eyebrow.

"Different? So as a mother, you feel nothing for him?"

"Of course I have feeling for him!" Eiraki's temper flared up indignantly once again, thin hands on hips. "A mother's bond with her son is never that feeble, no matter how hard you work to try and break it! But Kohaku isn't a hunter, and he never has been. He didn't inherit that from me. He's not designed to kill."

"You're wrong," Keitarou shook his head. "Of all our children, Eiraki, Koku's life is most wound up with death. The things he sees, the power that lurks within him — of all our children, he is the one with the most to offer. Protect him, and we protect our cause. Through him, everything can be achieved. I know where he is, and I know how to reach him. I just need a little more time. I need Seireitei to follow my paper trail and spread their resources more thinly. I wanted Katsura with me, then — but he decided against. He's a grown man, and he chose for himself. I cannot keep covering for him when he makes an impulsive mistake."

"So, like Seimaru, you'll let him be killed."

"Seimaru was killed by your brother, and his own reckless greed. It had nothing to do with me."

"Seimaru was a monster and an idiot. Katsura is neither one. He is your son, and you owe him..."

"I owe him nothing, not when he chooses to defy me," Keitarou cut across her. "I'm sorry, Eiraki, but this is how it is. A mother loves her child, whilst a father expects obedience and filial loyalty. That is the way of the world — you can't pretend you don't know as much."

Eiraki fell silent, and Keitarou saw her eyes narrow sullenly.

"You don't understand anything about it," she said at length. "When it was just you and I, and I was the one risking my life for you, it was fine. I would've died for you then, and I would die again now. I love you and that has never and will never change. But I'm not afraid of you, either. Everyone else might be, but I'm not. I've seen you at your weakest, and vowed to do everything I could to bring you back to strength. A wife and a mother makes those decisions without a man ever realising the sacrifices she makes. Clan or District, Rukon or Real World, it's the same. You men fly ahead with your goals, and you never realise the pain of a mother who has to bury her own child. It makes me helpless, Kei-sama. I can't fight the way you do, or they can. I don't have those skills. But I would still put myself in harm's way on your behalf, if it meant that my children were safe at home."

"Eiraki..." Despite himself, Keitarou felt his heart tug at her sincerity, and he sighed, moving to slip his arms around her slender body and hugging her tightly.

"Katsura is alive," he told her softly. "I didn't just abandon him to his fate. Chudokuga interfered with those who pursued him, and threw them off his track. I could still feel his spirit power after they turned back from the pursuit — so I came back here. Your son isn't dead — neither of them are. I promise."

"That's hardly any comfort when they're so far away," Eiraki did not resist his embrace, but Keitarou could feel how tense she was beneath his hold. "You took my younger son from me when he was just born, and you never let me see him again until he was sixteen and a practical stranger. Much as I love Kohaku, I never had the chance to bond with him the way I did with Katsura. Now you've taken him from me too... it's hard to bear. My life is their lives... it's not just yours any more, but theirs as well."

"Then I'll give you my word," Keitarou spoke gently, moving to brush the wisps of dark hair out of her face and gazing down into her reproachful blue eyes. "I will go to Seireitei, and I will lay waste to the shinigami. I will rescue Koku, and we will create a world in which we can finally live, without shinigami oppressors chasing us at every juncture. We will put the past behind us and move on. No more fighting and no more hiding. And, when I have done that, I promise that I will seek out your other son. When there is no longer danger of him leading them to me and the people you care for here, then I will forgive him, and bring him home."

Eiraki eyed him sadly, leaning up against his body.

"You're not going to see Sakaki buried, are you?" she asked resignedly, and Keitarou frowned, shaking his head.

"I can't. There isn't time," he admitted. "I have already delayed too much by coming here. I'm sorry, Eiraki. I really am, but Sakaki's soul is already beyond our reach and there are others still living who will die if I don't move with speed. People I need — people we need if that future is ever going to come about. Without Koku's visions, I'm blind. I can only act on instinct and hope that it will be enough."

Eiraki sighed.

“Promise me one other thing, then,” she begged, twisting her fingers through his and eying him plaintively. “When this is over, stop treating Kohaku as your experiment? When the fighting has ended, and we have the freedom you believe in us getting... then stop making that boy see things that make him so upset. I want my sons to live their lives free and happy. Both of them, whatever that means. So promise me, when there’s peace... no more making Kohaku your guinea pig.”

“Eiraki?” Keitarou eyed her in surprise, and Eiraki offered him a sad, bitter smile.

“I was a caged bird, prisoner of the Endou, bound to their whims and their outmoded traditions,” she said softly. “I had no right to object, and I didn’t know what it would be to live free. I chose this life so I could find out those things, and I don’t regret that I did. Kohaku was ill when he was born, I know, and he caused problems... but that was then and this is now. I don’t want him to be a caged bird any more, either. Promise me, Kei-sama. When this is over, we’ll all of us live in peace? Sakaki died fighting for that cause... so promise me that your daughter’s life won’t be lost in vain?”

Keitarou let out his breath in a rush.

“Very well,” he said at length. “If it’s in my power to do, I’ll grant you your wish. If it’s possible to create such a place, then I won’t experiment with Koku and his power any more. I’ll find a way to seal it away for good, so it can’t cause him any more pain. All right? Once everything is over, I won’t need his power, anyway. It will be done.”

Eiraki’s smile softened, and Keitarou saw the relief in her azure gaze.

“Then I’ll see Sakaki off to the next life without you,” she said pensively, reaching up on tiptoes to kiss him on the cheek. “Go, do what needs to be done. Just remember you made that promise, and I will hold you to it. The world we’re creating isn’t your world any more, but our world.”

Author’s Note

As usual, here is the offering for Juu’s birthday, 21st December — and the last chapter to be posted before Christmas. There won’t be a chapter next week, so this is a Merry Christmas to all who celebrate (and a great Dec 25th to those who don’t). As usual, it’s not a very festive Christmas offering, sorry about that. But it DOES contain a bit of revelation of truth...

Yes, Koku is Kohaku. Kohaku is Koku. I know some of you realised that already. For those who didn't, all the red herrings along the way fudged the issue, ne. But his situation is exceptional. Only Eiraki, Keitarou and Katsura knew who he really was — therefore Sakaki's testimony, though often given, was always flawed. And the voice that lurks within Koku's mind, bullying him with horrific images of death and threatening him with complete domination? Well, if you've read Mirror Flower Water Moon, you know all about Kohaku and you'll most likely already realise the answer to that. But for those who haven't... I guess this story will explain that too in a chapter or three's time. Maybe ;)

All right, so with the title of this chapter, I'm going to explain a little bit about something that was one of the base inspirations for me writing this story and the characters I created within it, in particular those belonging to the enemy side. That theme was the Ten Forms of Death as epitomised by the Espada, and the fact that the word Espada in Japanese characters was written “ten blades.” Now, I have not generated my own ‘espada’, but I did begin my plans for this story with the idea of having ten satellite figures around Keitarou, loosely based on these Espada concepts, in a kind of weird fanfic foreshadowing of Aizen and canon.

For those who don't recall, the ten are as follows:

1. Loneliness
2. Aging
3. Sacrifice
4. Emptiness
5. Despair
6. Destruction
7. Intoxication
8. Insanity
9. Greed
10. Rage

There have been some tweaks to these themes when it came to reality — sometimes working with a combination of the theme and the nature of the Espada when deciding the kind of character to manifest. Also, in some cases the characters took on lives and minds of their own, which took them some way outside of the original brief. Probably it's true that the one which fits the least snugly into the ten is #2, whose theme has become more about the grandiose, power-hungry arrogance of Barragan, coupled with the unavoidability of death. There is also another caveat — the power hierarchy Kubo employed with his Espada is not entirely present in my ten characters. Some of them are in the logical position for their power level, but others, perhaps, have a higher number than their ability merits, based on the way in which they manifest a 'form of death'.

Some of the characters are easily aligned with their 'theme'. This chapter has opened up the backstory of Kohaku and Katsura, and I'm sure it's clear now that Kohaku is Loneliness, and Katsura, Sacrifice. Sakaki is, of course, Destruction. Those were the easy ones. I think it's probably clear too that Kurotsuchi has the "emptiness" of Ulquiorra, whilst "Intoxication" represents all those pulled unwillingly under Keitarou's control, including Joumei, Hiko and Ohara... As for the others... some of Keitarou's allies haven't been revealed by name yet, but feel free to guess...

53. Kohaku

Chapter Fifty Two: Kohaku

It was growing dark by the time Mitsuki returned to the Thirteenth Division, dropping out of a slightly ragged shunpo and walking quietly across the gardens towards the glittering sheen that marked out the koi pond, shining in the moonlight. Even in the darkness, she could sense the swirl of reiatsu that surrounded the place and, though she did not recognise the fragments of spirit power that were already drifting apart on the wind, she could tell that, while she had been otherwise engaged, something had occurred here, too. She frowned, drawing her brows together as she tried to make sense of the mix of auras, registering with consternation the clear presence of her old friend and classmate, Shihouin Kai.

Whatever it was had involved the Second Division, then, and their secretive, underground force. There was no sign of them now, but they had definitely been here, dark spots of energy in an otherwise bright division, and a shiver went down her spine, though the night was not particularly cold. Not for the first time since she had left Katsura's side, she realised exactly how big and heavy the secret she had chosen to carry had become. It was no longer just about protecting the life of one scared young man out of his depth, but potentially embroiling herself and those she cared about in a deeper, darker battle. Katsura's words about Keitarou had worried her most, and her gaze flitted across the grounds towards the small chamber where she knew Koku slept. The gentle, even rippling of his reiatsu told her that he was both there and sound asleep, but the relief she should have felt that he had made it back safely did not come. Instead she felt a deep sense of foreboding, followed by a rush of resignation and regret.

I know what needs to be done now. I just have to find the courage to do it... and hope that it doesn't make even bigger waves when I do.

She knelt at the water's edge, reaching her fingers out to brush them lightly against the surface of the koi pond. The ripples distorted the surface, breaking her reflection into scattered colours. An adventurous koi broke through the dispersing image, hungry for food, and, as it returned disgruntled to the depths with an indignant flick of its tail, Mitsuki let out a heavy sigh.

"Mitsuki?"

Naoko's voice came from across the grass, the older girl ducking beneath the remaining branches of the willow tree that had been so ill-treated by Tenichi's sword, anxiety in her greenish eyes. At her approach, Mitsuki turned to face her, and Naoko's eyes narrowed, her brows knitting together as she took in her companion's appearance.

"You're a mess," she said softly, and Mitsuki glanced down at her uniform, taking in the specks of blood that covered her arms and the white fabric of her obi. Her fingers slipped down to touch Yuuyugo's hilt, and inwardly she hoped her friend could not sense how incomplete the sword still was following her efforts to knit Katsura's wound. It had not been a perfect heal, she acknowledged to herself bitterly, and, if her Captain were to find out, likely she would be scolded for using healing skills before she had officially been given clearance to do so, but despite everything he had told her, she had not been able to leave him there to die.

And now...

"Taichou was worried about you, when you weren't here," Naoko was at her side now, dropping down onto her knees on the grass next to her and reaching out to take Mitsuki's hand in hers, examining the delicate skin for any sign that the blood concealed wounds. "Even more so, when you still didn't come back to Thirteenth. He didn't want to tell me at first, but I got it out of him, what happened at Seventh. Charging into a fight like that was dangerous and out of character for you. You know Sougyo no Kotowari's potential — what were you trying to prove?"

"I don't really know how to answer that," Mitsuki said honestly. "I'm sorry, Nao-chan. It was something I needed to do, and that's all. It's fine. I won't run off again, I promise."

"This isn't your blood," Naoko lowered her friend's arm, casting her a quizzical look. "If not yours, then whose? You weren't bloody when last I saw you... and you haven't had time to go to Koku's chamber, so it's not as though you've been nursing him."

Mitsuki's lips pressed together, and Naoko's eyes darkened.

"All right," she said frankly, shifting around to meet her friend's gaze more directly. "Let me try this from another angle. The young man Taichou said attacked Seventh, you knew him, didn't you? Taichou seemed to think you did. He thought you'd met him somewhere before."

Mitsuki lowered her gaze, unable to find words to refute her companion's claim, and Naoko sighed.

“You worry us so much, and you don’t even have an explanation?” she asked sadly. “I thought we were better friends than that, Mitsuki-chan. I know a lot has happened and a lot of time has passed... but even despite that, I would’ve thought...”

“He saved my life, in Rukongai,” Mitsuki said softly, turning her gaze to the water’s surface once more. “That’s all. He saved me from the Hollow.”

“And then came here, reiatsu flaring, to assault the Seventh?” Naoko demanded. Mitsuki nodded.

“That was that. This was this,” she said simply. “I’m sorry, Nao-chan. It’s not that I don’t trust you — I do. I just... think I’ve... maybe been foolish. And... I don’t think telling you how foolish would help either of us. I need to speak to a... a Captain about it, really. And that’s what I’m going to do, only I’m trying to get up my nerve.”

She raised troubled eyes to her companion’s.

“I might be arrested, when I do,” she said honestly. “I don’t want to get you involved.”

“Mitsuki?” Naoko’s eyes widened in alarm, and she grabbed the healer around the wrists. “What do you mean, arrested? What did you do? What did you...”

“I told you, it won’t help anything if I tell you now,” Mitsuki shook her head, gently detaching herself from the other’s grip. “I’m sorry, but that’s how it is.”

She sighed heavily.

“I want... to tell Juushirou,” she added. “After what happened today, it’s him I need to tell, but I’m also afraid of what might happen if I do. I don’t want to compromise his position, either. Most of all, though, I don’t want him to hate me. I think that he’d have... very good reason to be angry with me. He might already be... beyond the point where he can forgive me. That’s why I’m out here... because I don’t know how to begin.”

Naoko frowned.

“I know, you know, that he was here before,” she said evenly. “The young idiot who came to Seireitei today, I mean. I walked out towards Seventh, when things quietened down here, and felt the reiatsu fallout for myself. Houshi-sama was quite certain he recognised it. This person might’ve saved you in Rukongai, but I’ve picked up his reiatsu before. He came here once... I thought he was here stalking you, maybe even to cause you harm, but that's not true, is it? You lied to me then. You knew he was there, and you pretended you didn't. You met with him... didn't you?"

"Mm," Mitsuki turned to glance towards the tree, then nodded. "He was in some kind of trouble because he had helped me. I thought that, if shinigami stopped hunting for him, he might be all right. He asked me to stop them looking for him, and I agreed."

"Why would you do that?" Naoko was incredulous.

"Because he was scared," Mitsuki shrugged. "And because he really did save me, Nao-chan. Whatever other things have happened since... whatever else I've learned, I... I am alive because he chose to save me. And because I'm alive, I have to... do what's right now. Will you come with me to Juushirou's office? I want to talk to him, and I'd like it if I didn't have to go alone."

"Well, I don't completely understand, but I'll come," Naoko nodded, getting to her feet and grabbing her friend by the wrists once more, pulling her to her feet. "There, come on. Though if all you've done is be soft on someone who's clearly up to no good, I'm sure that'll be forgiven. You've been away from Seireitei for a long time, and you made a mistake. It happens. Patrols are still out looking for him, and probably they'll bring him back. The report from Seventh is that Kitabata dealt him a fatal blow with his zanpakutou, and..."

She faltered, realisation and alarm flooding her gaze as she gazed at Mitsuki as if seeing her for the first time.

"You let him get away, didn't you?" she whispered. "It's his blood that's all over you. That's why your reiatsu feels strange. You went after him to help him... to heal him. Didn't you?"

Mitsuki looked troubled, but she didn't deny the accusation, and Naoko groaned.

"Mi-chan, why?" she asked plaintively. "Aside from the fact you're far from one hundred percent fit to use your healing power yet, you have to know from what happened today that he's not someone that Seireitei ought to be putting trust in! He's clearly unstable, and there's something else. I wasn't going to tell you about it, but the investigations we've done into Hollow manipulation, they all link up nicely to him and him alone. He's probably guilty of all kinds of chaos across the Districts. Did you know that as well?"

"Not until today," Mitsuki sighed wearily. "Please, Nao-chan. I'm serious. It has to go before a Captain. It's too important. Even if what I've done is unforgivable, I have to try and explain it properly. You can be angry with me as much as you like later, but right now I need to speak to Juushirou."

"Speak to me about what?" As they rounded the corner to Ugendou, they saw the Thirteenth Division Captain waiting for them, a look of concern on his thin features. At the sight of Mitsuki, he let out an exclamation, hurrying forward to grab her by the shoulders. He glanced her over, looking for injuries, and at his obvious anxiety, Mitsuki's heart constricted and she pushed him away.

"Please, don't," she murmured. "I haven't come for... this isn't..."

"Taichou, Mitsuki has something to report and she says it needs to be reported to a Captain," Naoko took a hand, as Juushirou cast the healer a troubled look.

"To a Captain? Reported?" he asked softly. "Relating to what occurred at Seventh this afternoon, and your subsequent absence from Thirteenth?"

"Yes, sir," Mitsuki gathered her courage, bowing her head low before her old friend. "Please, Ukitake-taichou, I'd like to beg a moment of your time. What I have to say is important, and I'd like you to listen to my confession in full."

"Confession?" Juushirou's eyes became stricken, and he glanced at Naoko, who shrugged.

"She won't tell me everything, but I think you should hear her out," she said gravely. "I also don't think I should be here to hear it all. I'll find out what my rank merits me knowing later, but if Mitsuki can bow her head to you and ask you like that, then she's serious and not even the pull of friendship ought to interfere. I'll go and help Houjou-kun, and leave you to it."

"Naoko..." Mitsuki opened her mouth to protest, but her friend was gone before she could finish, disappearing into shunpo with a curt salute, and she was left alone on the wooden walkway with the Thirteenth's District Captain.

A moment of silence passed between them, then Juushirou sighed, turning and gesturing towards Ugendou.

"As if today hasn't brought enough burdens," he said wearily. "Still, I'm relieved to see you safe. I had feared the worst, when you vanished from Seventh, and didn't return back here before dinner. Nobody knew where you were... I was worried you'd been hurt."

“I’m sorry.” Mitsuki’s voice was little more than a whisper, and Juushirou eyed her for a long time, taking in every single inch of her expression.

“We’ll go inside, Edogawa-san,” he said softly, and at his formality, Mitsuki’s heart lurched a second time. “I think it will be better if this conversation isn’t overheard by anyone else.”

“Yes, sir,” Mitsuki could barely form the words, but he had already turned on his heel, leading the way towards the small cabin. The first time Mitsuki had visited Ugendou, she had found it relaxing and welcoming, but today, stepping into its cramped interior made her feel stifled, and it was with some difficulty that she settled herself down on the cushion before the desk, watching in mute silence as her companion took his position behind it.

Another stretch of silence, then Juushirou rested his arms on the desk, eying her questioningly.

“Well?” he asked quietly. “The circumstances of today’s incidents aside, if you have something to report, do you think perhaps it should be to your own Captain, rather than to me?”

“I think you’re the only one who I can tell,” Mitsuki admitted. “J... I mean, Ukitake-taichou, I don’t want any special favours from you. Not on my own account — I mean, I’m going to tell you everything as I understand it, and you might be cross when I’m done. You might think that I should be arrested, or charged with something, and I won’t... I won’t resist it, if that’s what you decide to do. I’m not telling you because I expect leniency. I want to tell you everything, though. It’s too important not to, and I’ve already... I’ve already been keeping too much to myself.”

“Arrestyou?” Alarm glittered in Juushirou’s hazel eyes. “Do you think that I would ever sanction that, under any circumstances?”

“I’ve been communicating with the son of Aizen Keitarou,” Mitsuki cut across him, and Juushirou faltered, struck speechless by the directness of her confession. “I didn’t mean to, but it doesn’t matter what I meant to do, not given that the consequences are as they are. More, today, even knowing who he was, I healed his injuries and allowed him to escape, despite the fact that he tried to invade Seventh Division and threatened the life of Endou-taichou’s associate. I intervened in your battle this morning because I didn’t want you to kill him... and I felt sure that I could stay your sword.”

“To protect Katsura,” At length Juushirou found his voice, and Mitsuki nodded.

“It began in the Spiritless Zone,” she whispered, lowering her gaze so that she would not have to see the dismay in his eyes. “I met him the night before we were all attacked, though I didn’t know who he was. He knew my name, though... and I thought it was strange, that he was able to disappear so easily from my senses. The next day... eight of my comrades died. Six were murdered in Hokutan, whilst two died at the hands of a Hollow in Junrin’an.”

She swallowed hard, then,

“At that time, he saved me from the Hollow,” she added. “I couldn’t fight any more, but he intervened and used his spirit power to destroy it. He helped me take Seri to the base in Hokutan, but I can’t say then that I didn’t think there was something amiss. He knew there was trouble at the base, and disappeared before help came to bring us back to Seireitei. Still, I didn’t put the details together, not at that point. It didn’t occur to me that the person who had saved me might... have been involved in killing my friends.”

Juushirou did not speak, and, wanting to prevent another oppressive pause, Mitsuki hurriedly continued.

“A few days after I began to recover, he came here,” she said. “He was scared, and I felt as though he was genuinely in trouble. He said that someone had been sent to kill me. He also told me about a spy in the shadows — someone who was already dead, yet not dead. He begged me to stop the shinigami looking for him, because otherwise he would be killed. I believed him. So I stopped talking about the person who helped me in Rukongai. I let you investigate the Onmitsukidou as though he was the one who’d come after me, even though I knew he wasn’t. He told me his name was Katsura... and that he found it hard to lie to me. I wanted to find a way to help him, in return for his saving me.”

She twisted her fingers together in her lap, taking in a deep breath of air as the chamber once more seemed cloying and oppressive.

“I didn’t see or hear anything of him till today, not after that,” she added uneasily. “I had almost forgotten — it seemed as though we wouldn’t ever cross paths again. When he appeared in Seireitei, I recognised his reiatsu, though it was raw and angry and totally unlike when we met before. I involved Hikifune-san and I’m sorry — I wanted her shunpo, because at the moment I thought it would be more stable than mine. I took Koku, because he said he knew how to stop anyone getting killed, and I... for some reason, I just believed that he did. I made the decision and we came to Seventh. The blame is mine, not with Hikifune-san, and I want you to make sure you don’t punish her. It was my pressure and my fault — I put her in a bad position and I had no right to do it.”

She took another breath, aware that Juushirou was still watching her in intent silence, his expression giving away not a single flicker of emotion.

“When he fled, the Seventh went after him, and I knew they would kill him,” she continued. “Hikifune-san was with Koku, and you were there, and I thought... but I didn’t want them to hurt him, so I followed. I didn’t even think about it. Before I knew what I was doing, I had started to track his reiatsu, and theirs. I felt Kikyue-dono’s flare, and one of her officers, and then sensed them separate. Then I knew Katsura had been hurt. I hid in the shadows, and one of the other Seventh officers called his comrade away from the scene. I think they believed he was dead, or that he very soon would be, else they wouldn’t have left so easily. I knew Katsura wasn’t dead, though, and I could feel his pain. I healed his wounds. I used Yuuyugo and kidou even though I haven’t been given permission to use my skills again. And when I did, he told me that he was Aizen Katsura, and that he had been responsible for the deaths of two of my friends in the Spiritless Zone.”

“That was the first time you knew who he was, and what, exactly, he had done?” Juushirou asked softly, and Mitsuki nodded her head.

“Yes, sir,” she said uneasily.

“But you still let him escape, even when he told you those things?” This time Mitsuki could hear the pain in the Captain’s voice, almost a note of betrayal, and bravely she raised her gaze to his, her heart almost breaking at the distress she saw in his hazel eyes.

“Yes, sir,” she repeated. “I did.”

Juushirou closed his eyes, pressing fingers to his brow, then he sighed, meeting her gaze once more.

“Why?”

“Because he saved my life,” Mitsuki admitted.

“Although he endangered it in the first instance?”

“Yes sir.”

“And you didn’t think that keeping something so important a secret might have cost more people their lives?” Now there was no keeping the edge from Juushirou’s voice as frustration and helplessness began to seep in through the cracks in his Captain’s composure. “Naoko’s probably told you already, but in case she hasn't, let me. Your testimony only strengthens our case against the individual who came here today. His reiatsu has been located in numerous places, inducing Hollows to attack innocent people across Seireitei in order to increase ill feeling towards shinigami in those areas. It was present in the wasteland Rukon, and it has been detected here. More, there's some evidence to suggest that two officers in Tenth Division were killed by a Hollow under some kind of manipulation, with the body of one of the Tenth officers almost destroyed beyond recognition by a raw form of Kidou energy. It's perfectly possible that this person you let escape is responsible for many more deaths that we haven't identified yet. While he is still free, others are at risk. He might have valued your life, but he has shown no mercy to any others — as his actions here today proved. Moreover, he's Keitarou's son. Today, while you were absent, members of my division arrested a former officer of mine who had been driven almost to despair by Keitarou's games and manipulations, to the point he was ready to kill an innocent girl based on little or no rational reasoning. Now you tell me that you deliberately let his oldest son and heir escape — no, not only that, you healed his wounds and wished him on his way — as though we weren't in the midst of trying to prevent an all out war that could cost thousands of people their lives?"

Tears glittered on Mitsuki's lashes, and she shook her head.

"I don't believe he will kill anyone else," she said unevenly, and Juushirou banged his hands down on the desk, unable to suppress his emotions any further.

"Mitsuki!"

"I'm sorry," Mitsuki swallowed hard. "I know what I've done, and I'm sorry I lied to you. I didn't know he was Aizen Katsura until today, and that's why I've come to tell you about it now. It's too important to hide any more, and if I'd known his real name from the start, I never would've kept it from you. But..."

"Wouldn't you?" With a tremendous effort, Juushirou reined in his temper, clenching his fists for a moment before forcing his arms back down at his sides. "You just told me that you helped him today, despite knowing his real name. Do you think you would've acted differently?"

"We'll never know," Mitsuki whispered. "And if you want to arrest me, I told you — I won't resist. I don't hate him. I don't... blame him. I know... that he's not an evil person. He told me he regretted it, what happened in the Spiritless Zone. Keitarou told him to do it. Keitarou raised him to hate shinigami, but when he met me, he said he realised that we weren't all monsters. He's been struggling with it ever since."

"His behaviour today makes that hard to believe."

"He came here on a mission to kill Joumei-dono," Mitsuki agreed sadly, "and he said he didn't have regrets for that. Joumei-dono killed his sister. Sakaki. The girl who killed Souja-dono and the other healers in the Spiritless Zone. He told me he'd made a choice to avenge his sister, even though it might mean him being killed, or losing everything."

"The Council authorised a kill on sight order for Keitarou and his children, meaning Joumei's killing of Aizen Sakaki will carry no punishment in Seireitei's courts," Juushirou said matter-of-factly, though Mitsuki knew he was coasting over things which, deep down, he too found distasteful. "By contrast, you not only aided and abetted the escape of someone just as dangerous, you interfered in Kitabata Hajime's attempt to follow that Council Order. And, because you did, Joumei may still be in danger."

Mitsuki shook her head.

"No. He said he wasn't going to come back. He wasn't going to tangle with shinigami any more," she protested, and Juushirou snorted.

"Why do you believe him so easily?" he demanded. "What did he do to you, when he saved your life, that's made you blind to the value of other people's? Why are you willing to give a man who's confessed to murder and the intent to kill again the benefit of the doubt?"

"You're willing to protect and aid and worry about Joumei-dono, when he's done exactly the same!" Mitsuki shot back, and then wished she had not, for there was true thunder and lightning brewing up a storm in Juushirou's normally gentle hazel eyes. His fists clenched again, a clear sign he was battling with his temper once more.

"Joumei's case is different," he said in low tones. "I don't condone his actions, but the law is one way and I can't change it. Sakaki's life was forfeit when she struck down the Vice Captain of the Seventh Division. I might not approve of killing in reprisal, but as a Gotei Captain I understand there are times when it happens and I have no power whatsoever to intervene. The Council's law makes Joumei's actions legal, and, as a vassal of the Endou, he would answer to Hirata's justice, not to mine. Besides, Joumei took the life of one woman who killed his childhood friend and future Lord. Ugly as I find that fact, I know he is unlikely to go on a rampage and kill anyone else. In contrast, you are protecting someone who has already killed several times. He killed your friends, and left Aomori Seri in a condition where it is unlikely she will ever wear shihakushou again! Who knows how much pain he's already inflicted on Soul Society, or how much more he will do? Why do you believe in him, when he's done so much harm already?"

"Because of Kohaku!" Mitsuki snapped back, her temper rising to protect her from the rising accusation in Juushirou's voice. "He promised me, because of Kohaku!"

"Ko... haku?" At this, the wind was knocked out of Juushirou's sails, and he stared at his former classmate, confused. Mitsuki nodded.

"He promised me that he wouldn't do anything here again, because he didn't want to cause his brother any harm," she whispered. "He fought to protect his family — Sakaki and Kohaku. That's why I helped him, and let him escape. I knew he meant that. He only did... what anyone would do to protect those they loved, even... even you. He loved his sister, even though she did bad things. To us she's an evil person, but to him she was kin and he couldn't protect her. And now he wants to protect Kohaku... and so he won't... he doesn't intend to cause the shinigami any more harm."

"But what would Kohaku have to do with anything?" Juushirou was bewildered. "It's not as though we know where to find him, and besides, if the Onmitsukidou's testimony is right, Kohaku's someone we should be fearing. I don't know what he told you, Mitsuki-chan, but..."

"Kohaku is here," Mitsuki interrupted, reaching out to grab Juushirou's sleeve and giving it a little tug. "I'm sorry, and I know that I've put you in a bad position, but you'll understand why you were the one I had to tell when you realise everything. I didn't know this till today, either, I promise, but I knew that this alone I couldn't keep from you. I'm not the only one who's been hiding things, but it's not... it's not what you think. Katsura left Seireitei today because of Kohaku. It wasn't me, or Seventh, or anyone else who drove him away. It was his brother. He told me that they had a psychic connection, and they could communicate through thought waves. It was Kohaku who made Katsura pull back, and because of Kohaku, Katsura won't come back."

"I don't understand," Juushirou admitted. "You're saying Kohaku is here, among us... with the shinigami?"

"Yes," Mitsuki agreed. "Right here, in fact. In Thirteenth. In your protective custody."

Juushirou's eyes became big as saucers, his already pale features draining of all remaining colour as he put together the implication in his friend's words.

"Koku?" he murmured, and Mitsuki nodded her head.

"But... that's..." Juushirou swallowed hard, agitation clear on his face. "Are you sure? Koku is Kohaku? I mean, not that there aren't a lot of questions still surrounding... but..."

"Katsura told me things which made Koku's behaviour make sense," Mitsuki said softly. "More, I could tell that of everyone, he really loved his brother. That's why he left, even though it meant Sakaki was unavenged. I knew he was telling the truth, Juushirou. I could feel it from him — that was the real Katsura. Not the killer. The one who loved his family so much he'd do whatever it took to protect them... and Kohaku most of all."

"So Shunsui was right," Juushirou said heavily, burying his head in his hands. "Koku is involved with Keitarou, and in an unavoidably close way."

"No..." Mitsuki pursed her lips, then she sighed. 'Well, from how Katsura explained it, it's complicated,' she hazarded. "I don't know if I really understand completely, but Katsura wanted me to know that Kohaku hasn't committed any murders. He said that Keitarou has no hold over Kohaku, and that Kohaku hates killing. Death upsets him. Also, that Kohaku had... a rough time growing up. He was isolated for a long time, with a gift that he couldn't control... an ability to see things that other people can't see. Katsura wanted Kohaku to be happy, even if that meant he ended up choosing a separate path. That's why I knew he was telling the truth."

She glanced at the spatters of blood still marring her arms, then,

"I know that healing him was probably a bad thing to do," she added, "but as a healer, it's also my duty to help someone in distress. I haven't been in Seireitei, so I don't pretend I understand the intricacies of the Gotei or what being a Captain really means. I only know that when people are hurt, I want to help them — even if they've done bad things, leaving them to die would be something worse. Katsura understood what he'd done, and he wasn't asking me for mercy. I chose to give it, but I told him that I wouldn't help him further and I'm sure he knew I'd come back here and tell you everything. He asked for my help for Kohaku, not for himself. He wanted me to make sure that his brother was all right. He thought... Keitarou might come for him, or at least, try to use him and his power in some way.”

She eyed Juushirou carefully.

“Koku’s fits and bad dreams are visions, aren’t they?” she asked. “You knew that much, I can tell by your face. That’s what you were keeping from me, when we talked the other night. You knew he could see things other people can’t see.”

“I did, though I hadn’t worked out what to do about it,” Juushirou acknowledged. ‘Katsura telling you the same helps support his story. It doesn’t help me muddle out what to do, though. Katsura is clearly guilty — if he’s caught, providing he’s not killed on sight, he’ll be interrogated and handled in the way a criminal of Seireitei is dealt with, and there’s nothing I can do about that. More, I probably wouldn’t try. The lives he’s disrupted and stolen deserve some justice, and,’ he offered her a bittersweet smile, “as a Captain of the Gotei, my duty is to see that justice is upheld. But... in terms of Kohaku... that’s more complicated. If he truly hasn’t hurt anyone, then he’s committed no crime... but if all of Seireitei learned what you just told me, it would cause mayhem. More, given the Council’s dictum, it would probably cost the boy his life.”

He rubbed his brow once more, then,

“I need you to tell me everything Katsura told you, in exact detail,” he said at length. “Your side in it we’ll put to one side for now, and wait and see if Katsura is brought to book. If he is, you might have to testify — but my priority right now is Kohaku. If what Katsura told you is indication that Keitarou needs Koku for his plans somehow, then it could get a lot more messy... and I need to know everything I can before I start making decisions that could have far reaching consequences.”

Katsura’s presence had gone from his thoughts once more.

Koku pushed back the heavy blankets, swinging his legs carefully over the side of the pallet and reaching out tentatively for the wall and then the window-sill as he pulled his aching body to its feet. The events outside the barracks were fragmented in his mind, broken and blurred at the edges so that he wasn’t quite sure what order things had come in. His brother had been there, angry and indignant, his reiryoku blazing from him like a beacon. Koku had seen it before in his dreams, this terrifying image of Katsura’s vengeance, but it had still alarmed him to understand how deep his brother’s feelings ran. Katsura had chosen to come hunt down his sister’s killer, regardless of the consequences. In the moments before their thoughts had been segregated, Koku had felt resignation, acceptance and, overall, resolve. Yes, this had been Katsura's wish, Katsura's choice... his family first, and freedom second.

Tears glittered on Koku's lashes, as he pulled his heavy body towards the window and rested his hands on the sill, gazing out blankly over the rear of the division barracks towards the glistening surface of the koi pond. He had never properly seen this view before, yet even so it resonated nostalgically against his senses. Had it been a memory of Katsura's, or some vision of his own? He didn't know.

Following the chaos in the Seventh courtyard, Koku knew he had been returned to his chamber by Kirio, but he must have slept, for when he had awoken, the sun had already set, and though there had been a tray of food left at his bedside, he had found himself unsupervised. The door had probably been locked, he mused darkly, since he didn't imagine the shinigami would give him the chance to go wandering from his room again. Not that he had the will or the energy to — the emotion and exertion of the day had drained him enough already. The food remained where it had been left — he had picked at it, but though his body was crying out for nourishment, he found it difficult to swallow any of it down. Not while Katsura was still out there, his fate unknown.

Closing his eyes, he tried again to reach out to his brother, but was greeted with silence a second time.

Once you promised you'd always be there for me. Now you take yourself off into the sunset, and sever our bond like it was nothing at all.

Koku fought back the tears, yet he could not suppress the deep despair churning up inside of his heart.

The one person I could always count on... but it's not like I don't understand. I do understand. It began when you killed those healers and saved Edogawa Mitsuki — the woman who would end up helping to save my life. I felt the first tremors of it then, but it grew bigger and darker when Sakaki killed Souja-dono. Everything changed at that point and I couldn't find a way to claw it back. Maybe it's entirely my fault. If I'd told Keitarou-san... if I'd told Father about that last hallucination, would he have made sure it didn't happen? That's the trouble, when you see the future. Even if you read it wrong, you can't go back. It doesn't change, no matter how much warning you get... and now here we are. You on that side, me on this. But I haven't chosen sides against you, Katsu-nii. I never could... I hope you know that. Even if I stopped you killing Joumei-san, I hope you understand what choice I've really made.

“Koku?”

His brother's voice washed through his thoughts, and he leant up against the wall, resting his brow against the cool surface of the glass as memories flooded through him — images and sensations from a time long ago rising to the surface as though it had been only yesterday.

“Koku, where are you?”

From somewhere in the terrifying, swirling darkness, a voice began to penetrate, and Koku struggled to cling on to it, pushing through the dizzying waves of panic and terror to reach out for an anchor in the mist. Something grasped hold of his body, tangible and real as it held him upright, and Koku was aware of an exclamation of dismay, followed by a litany of curses. His breath was coming in panicked gasps, half-in and half-out of reality as whoever it was supporting him tightened their hold, and then, spoken so softly he thought he had imagined it, he heard the words, “Hang on in there. It will be okay... just hang on in there, all right?”

“Katsu... ra?”

Somehow Koku parted his lips, the three syllables forced painfully over his vocal chords, but at the sound of them he felt a reassuring pat on his arm.

“Yep, fraid so. You’re gonna be fine, just sit tight. I’m gonna stop the bleeding... it’s not as bad as it looks.”

Tears glittered on Koku’s lashes as he felt someone take his arm firmly in their grasp, then the sudden tension of something being pulled tightly across his wrist. There was pain, but as he forced his lungs to spasm air in bigger and bigger gulps, he realised that the world outside of his mind had begun to take on physical form again and, as his eyes brought his surroundings into hazy focus, he made out the face of his companion, fingers red with blood as he worked to tighten the tourniquet around the slashed wrist. For a moment he didn’t speak, intent on his task, and there was silence between them, but at length he seemed satisfied, tapping the arm again then turning to meet his teenage companion’s gaze.

“What was that about?” he asked softly, and despite the gentleness of his tones, Koku knew that the older boy was not fooled. There was gravity in the usually bright blue eyes, and something in their deep concern brought Koku’s emotions flooding forward. Tears glittered on his lashes, and he swallowed a sob of fear, flinging himself against Katsura’s lean frame and burying his head in the other’s shoulder.

“Hey!” Katsura seemed startled, but he did not push his companion away, instead patting him reassuringly on the head. “None of that, else

Father will come see us and there'll be a fuss. Better he doesn't know about this... about any of this. You agree, don't you? Better he doesn't get to see you... like this."

"Mm," Koku nodded jerkily between sobs, the sound muffled by the rough fabric of Katsura's hakamashita, and the older boy sighed, shaking his head slowly.

"You might fool him, but you can't me," he added pensively. "I heard it... felt it... you screaming out for someone to help you. You were scared, Koku — I thought that things were better, now, but..."

He faltered, and Koku raised melancholy eyes to his rescuer.

"Don't tell him," he begged. "I'm sorry... I... I just... it was..."

He broke off, unable to find the words, but Katsura nodded.

"I know," he said simply. "Like I said, you can't keep it from me in the same way. We're connected, and that's how it should be. I'm not going to let anything bad happen to you, Koku-kun. Believe in me a little and see that, okay? I promised Otousama the first time we met that I'd look out for you, and dammit, I meant that. If you're scared, talk to me about it, all right? If you don't have the words for it, there are other ways. You can't hurt me — we both know that. You were the one who first reached out to me, and it happened again now. You didn't really want to die, did you? You were just scared."

"I wanted... it... to leave me alone," Koku admitted brokenly. "It... wants... me. It... wants to swallow me up... and... and then..."

"I see," Katsura's blue eye darkened, and his gaze flitted across the ground in the direction of the shadowy building beyond the trees. "Can you fight it off?"

"I was," Koku confessed. "I thought... if I... wasn't here... it... couldn't... be either. But it... wouldn't let me... and... it was trying to... take... me for its own."

Katsura's lips thinned, and he hugged his younger companion tightly.

"Well, I'm here, so no harm done this time," he said quietly. "I'm sorry I took as long as I did, but I'm here, and we'll clean you up, somehow, and nobody need ever know about this. But Koku, listen. You can't lose this fight. You know what we're here to do — what the end goal is. I want to live in Seireitei, but I want you there too, right with me. It's the most amazing place, I swear... if you saw it, I know you'd be happy. I know you'd be better, in a place like that, where it's not so full of darkness and despair. I want you to win this battle, and live your life. For you, Koku-kun. Not for me, or for him, but for you."

"I don't suppose that will ever happen," Koku admitted mournfully. "I've only been here like this for a short time, and already..."

"It's early days, but you can do this and you will," Katsura said purposefully. "I believe in you and I always have. That place you saw, with the flowers and the trees... I will find it. One day, I will. It's in Seireitei, I know it is... and I'll find it for you. So don't give up. Keep fighting it. Father's done what he can to help, and it will settle down more, I'm sure. It waits for you to be weak, as all demons do — so you need to be strong. You need to shut it out. Don't let it shake your emotions so much, or frighten you so greatly. I know it's hard, but you're not alone... so please... don't let the demon win."

Koku stared up at the older boy for a moment, then, a faint smile touched his lips and he nodded his head.

"I'm not alone," he echoed, comforted by the simplicity in the older boy's words. "You'll never leave me, will you, Katsura? You'll always be there... won't you?"

"I will," Katsura nodded. "So don't look so pitiful. Let's go sort that arm out properly... maybe ask Mother. We can tell her you fell and cut yourself, and she'll do something to wrap it up. She's not sensitive enough spiritually to know that it was anything else, and Father's not here, so we should do it now. If he comes back and sees blood... you know how he'll react."

"Mm," Koku inclined his head in another faint nod. "All right. All right, let's go."

Koku opened his eyes once more, letting out a sigh. Gently he pushed back the sleeve of his robe, running his index finger over the jagged white line that marked the scar he had created that day. It had been a memory not just of his fear and despair, but the reassurance of his brother's presence. So long as it remained there, refusing to fade and disappear beneath layers of new skin, Katsura's promise remained fresh in his mind. No matter how dark things became, or how frightened he was, Katsura had promised. He would always be there. No matter what.

The view through the window was blurry now, and, as he touched his cheek absently with a pale finger, he realised the tears had come anyway, refusing to be set aside.

So that was why he had seen that view before. He had forgotten, but it had been a vision — an ocean of calm in a sea of panic and pain. Katsura had been so sure that one day he would find it — and now, standing by the window of his small sickroom, Koku could see it stretched out before him.

I was always going to come here, wasn't I? Even though I've tried to pretend otherwise, I've always known that the place I was going to end my life was Seireitei.

"I'm not sure anyone would approve of you getting up on your own like this, after your antics this morning."

A voice from the door made him start, swinging around and almost overbalancing as the sudden movement made his head swim. There was an exclamation, then the sound of footsteps crossing the room hastily, and almost before the world had come back into a hazy focus, he felt two hands on his shoulders, guiding him gently down into a seated position on the bed.

"Yes, you're better there," the voice was light and warm, but Koku was perceptive, and he knew that the tones were somewhat forced, their joviality not quite sincere. He frowned, eying his companion warily.

"Ukitake-dono?"

Juushirou did not respond right away, then he grimaced, running fingers through lank white hair before letting it fall haphazardly back over his shoulders.

"We need to talk," he said, and now there was no false levity in his words. "It's a serious matter, Koku, and I need you to tell me the truth."

Koku merely stared at the Captain, forcing his expression into one of impassiveness, and Juushirou sank back against the wall with a groan. There was another stretch of silence, then,

"I need to know who you are."

Koku flinched, staring at Juushirou warily.

"Who I am?"

"Yes."

"I'm Koku. Koku from Rukongai. Didn't we already establish that?"

"No," Juushirou shook his head, frustrating glittering in his hazel eyes. "I mean, who you really are. That won't do any more, Koku. I need to know what the stakes are, and I need to know them now. There'll be no more playing around... it's gone beyond being a game. I want to know the truth — about you, about the lad who came to Seireitei this morning, and anything else you think I ought to know.”

“Ought to know,” Koku pursed his lips, and Juushirou nodded.

“There’s two ways this can go,” he said grimly. “If you tell me everything, and I mean, everything, I’ll listen to whatever you say. I’ll do my best to understand it, and to put it all into the right context and, if I can help you, then I will. But if you lie to me, or you don’t tell me... I’m going to end up having to surrender you to a higher authority for proper questioning. Those are the stakes we’re talking about.”

“Help me?” Koku’s brows creased in confusion. “What do you mean — I don’t understand? You’re a shinigami... and shinigami went after Kat... after the person who came to Seireitei this morning. He’s clearly someone of interest to you — and if you believe I’m in league with him, why would you help me?”

“Because he’s your brother, and he asked Mitsuki to make sure you were safe,” Juushirou said frankly, and despite himself, Koku’s heart lurched in his chest.

“He... did what?” he whispered, and Juushirou reached out to rest a hand on Koku’s shoulder.

“I know who he is, and who you are,” he said quietly, his hazel eyes full of regret. “I just wanted to hear it from you directly. I didn’t want to believe it, but your expression tells me I can’t pretend otherwise. His name is Katsura, isn’t it? And yours isn’t Koku, but Kohaku. Aizen Kohaku. Keitarou’s son and the one over whom all of Seireitei has been on high alert.”

Koku was silent for a moment.

“I can’t see how my admitting to being someone like that would help me in any way whatsoever,” he said at length. “This Katsura isn’t in custody... is he?” this last in an anxious aside, and Juushirou shook his head.

“He’s disappeared,” he said heavily. “Patrols are still looking, but I suspect they won’t find him. He’s long gone now. There will be warrants, though, for his arrest. He admitted to killing shinigami in the Spiritless Zone, as well as his interruption here, and those are serious crimes for which there are heavy penalties. I can’t guarantee what might happen if he was to be captured.”

“I don’t know where he is,” Koku said sullenly. “I’m not his keeper. I can’t tell you that, if that’s what you want to know.”

“I know that much,” Juushirou grasped Koku by the shoulders again more firmly, pulling the reluctant youngster around to face him. “If you did, you wouldn’t be so anxious about whether or not he was in custody. Besides, I’m not concerned with him. It’s not my case, and I’m not sending agents to hunt him down. My focus is on you, Koku. No... Kohaku. Because that is who you are, isn’t it? The person who came here today was your brother, and you really are Keitarou’s son. That’s how you managed to stop him — and why you wanted to go to Seventh. It had nothing to do with Joumei — he just happened to be there. You went because you wanted to make sure Katsura didn’t get killed — correct?”

“And if I did? What then?” Koku whispered. Juushirou closed his eyes briefly, then,

“I told you,” he said. “If you tell me everything, and trust in me, I’ll do what I can to help you. Katsura told Mitsuki that you didn’t hurt anyone, and I believe that to be true. He said you didn’t like killing, and that you hadn’t been involved in the murders in the Spiritless Zone. More, you brought Souja back here, and I believe in his judgement. He had faith in you, so so will I. If you’ve done nothing wrong, then there’s nothing to arrest you for — but unless I know exactly what your situation is, I can’t prepare an argument to that effect. It will happen... the Council, the Shihouin, someone will come and want to take you and interrogate you. Even without such clear testimony as Mitsuki or I can now give, people saw you communicate with one another, and it was clear you weren’t strangers. Seventh took at least one injury, and it won’t take long for the inquiries to come around to you and to Thirteenth. I don’t want that to happen — or maybe I feel more like I know you’re not well enough to deal with something like that.”

“I’m healing,” Koku’s fingers slipped down towards his bandaged abdomen, and Juushirou nodded.

“There, you are,” he said softly, “But it’s not that I’m talking about. I was here the other day, remember, when you fell into some trance and saw the attack on people you shouldn’t even know existed. More, Katsura told Mitsuki about that, too. About your... your spirit power, and the way in which it sometimes takes hold of you.”

“What?” Koku’s cagey responses shattered with this final revelation, and Juushirou nodded, lowering his hands.

“Katsura wanted you to be safe,” he repeated frankly. “He admitted his guilt to Mitsuki, and told her a good deal about you. I don’t know whether she told me everything he told her, but even from the little I know, it's enough to make me concerned for your well-being. I don't know if you believe me, or if you can use this power of yours to tell my intentions, but I do want to help. I need you to trust me, though. I can't defend what I don't understand."

"What makes you think you can understand it?" Koku asked bitterly. "Nobody else does. Nobody else ever has."

"You truly are Kohaku, aren't you?"

"You already know I am. There's no reason for me to keep denying it."

"Does Tenichi know that, too?"

"Tenichi...?" Despite himself, Kohaku stared at his companion, a mixture of consternation and incredulity crossing his features. Juushirou's lips thinned for a moment, then he nodded.

"Kotetsu Tenichi," he said quietly. "A shinigami from the Seventh Division who was arrested today for attempting to kill one of my recruits."

Tenichi-dono...

Kohaku's expression became troubled, and he shook his head.

"I don't know what you mean," he said at length. "I know of Tenichi-dono only from Kirio-san's conversations. We may have met but once, briefly, when I had just regained consciousness, and if he told you otherwise, he was mistaken."

"Tenichi didn't tell me anything of the kind," Juushirou settled himself more comfortably, fixing his companion with a grave look. "He is currently very unsettled, and upset about a good many things. But give me your name he would not. Because he would not, I realised such a connection must exist. Someone told Tenichi that your father didn't intend to murder Souja. You are the only person in Seireitei who could've told him that information... and his refusal to reveal you indicates that your acquaintance was more than just a brief encounter. I've made it clear, haven't I? I want you to trust me and tell me everything — it might mean both your life and his."

Kohaku was silent for a moment, digesting this carefully. Then he sighed, shrugging his shoulders.

"I warned him to keep out of it," he said wearily, realising that no matter how much he prevaricated, he was not going to avoid the intensity in those hazel eyes. There was a genuine concern in them, and though he did not know whether it was for Tenichi, for himself, or for both, something in it made Kohaku want to reach out and trust in its sincerity. "That's all."

"And you met in Rukongai? Or here, for the first time?" Juushirou pressed.

"It's something I agreed not to speak about. It's not as though..."

"I don't want him to lose his life over this," Juushirou cut across him. "Tenichi has already confessed in full to his being held in Rukongai, his meeting with your father, and the events that followed. I need to know what connection he has to you, and whether that connection is going to lead him to the proverbial gallows. Tell me the truth, please. I want to know how you and he are connected."

Kohaku groaned.

"We're not connected," he said finally. "That is the truth, Ukitake-dono. We did meet in Rukongai, it's true. Father made me keep an eye on him, so we spoke a few times about non-important things. He came to... to speak to me, following his Vice Captain's death, and I told him what I knew about what had happened. I told him it wasn't his fault and to stay out of it. He was frightened that something he'd done had caused it, and I felt that vibe from him... that if he didn't step away then, it would slowly unravel him."

He offered a wan smile.

"I suppose my warning wasn't strong enough," he realised bitterly. "If you arrested him today, he chose to ignore my advice. That's all I know. I promise. The last time I spoke to him was not long after I regained consciousness... since then, we've not seen each other at all. I wanted it that way. I didn't think it would be good for him to consider me his ally."

"What you know about Souja's death," Juushirou's eyes narrowed, and he nodded. "And about your real name?"

"He didn't know that. I never told him, and nor did Father," Kohaku shrugged his shoulders. "If he knows it, then the only person who might've told him anything is the Onmitsukidou he tried and failed to kill in the courtyard of Seventh Division. But from how he spoke to me about Kohaku, I don't think he made the connection between us at all. He thought Kohaku was a monster."

He looked pained.

"It's more than a little true, so I let him keep believing it."

"You knew about the incident between Tenichi and Suzuki Naoko?"

“I have sharp senses,” Kohaku shrugged. “Once I meet a person, I never forget their reiatsu.”

“And today, whatever you said to Joumei that sent him flying off in the direction of Thirteenth — was that your sharp senses too?”

“No...” Kohaku frowned, his eyes becoming clouded. “No, that was... not the same. A swirl of everything else — things happening just out of my reach. I’m sorry, Ukitake-dono. I have been holding back, but it’s clear you know a good deal and so I’ll be frank. I knew before you told me about Tenichi-dono’s actions today, and the girl... the silver fox. I knew all of it before we left Thirteenth — I didn’t wish for anything to happen, but seeing something isn’t the same as being able to do something about it.”

“Then Kohaku’s tremendous power... is the power of prophesy?”

“I suppose it is. I don’t know. I’ve never considered it tremendous.” Kohaku shuffled back into the corner, out of Juushirou’s direct reach, folding his arms across his chest. “Besides, you don’t really want to help me. Won’t it get you into trouble, harbouring someone that Soul Society is looking for?”

“Maybe, if it were to become widespread, but I don’t intend that to happen if I can avoid it,” Juushirou said pragmatically.

“Why?”

“The Council passed a motion permitting the killing Keitarou and his children on sight, irrespective of evidence of guilt.” Juushirou said grimly, and despite himself, Kohaku’s eyes widened with genuine fear. “Yes, that’s why I said the stakes are high. I said I didn’t want to lose Tenichi’s life... well, the same applies to you, too. I was uneasy about the motion to begin with, and now, even more so. Your brother’s life is in danger so long as that edict remains, and your sister’s death will be ruled justified under the Council’s decision. Now I know this extends to you, too, I’m even less keen to let the higher powers take hold of you. I’m probably the only one in any position to help you... and even if Mitsuki hadn’t promised Katsura that we would, I have enough doubts myself to fight the Council’s edict in your case. But I need you to trust me. If you don’t, there’ll be very little that I can do to help you... and if you go out of my hands, then... that will be it.”

He made a beheading motion.

“I’m only a Captain, not a Clan Leader. I have sovereignty here, but I can’t overrule them or their orders. I need as much information and time as I can gather together if I’m to challenge their decision and prove you're not a threat."

"I am a threat, though," Kohaku whispered. "Now you know I'm Kohaku, then you must realise that I'm dangerous... why would you want to shelter me, knowing that?"

"I don't believe you're dangerous at all," Juushirou said matter-of-factly, "except, perhaps, to yourself."

"Then you're more stupid than I thought."

"Am I?" Juushirou pursed his lips. "You've been here, in my custody, for several days now. In that time, the only person who has suffered ill effects is you. To begin with, I assumed it was the shock of being hurt by Kikyue, but that's not the case at all and I know that now. Your physical wounds are minor in comparison to your spiritual scars... every time your reiryoku bubbles up inside you, it flares and overloads you and your body can't handle it. So you become faint, and dizzy, and weak, and ill. Those things I know for sure... but who else is it hurting but you?"

"You're wrong," Koku shook his head impatiently. "I... my reiryoku influences people. If I'm upset, or desperate, or frightened... it can... spill over."

"I know," Juushirou agreed calmly, and Koku stared at him.

"Did Kirio-san say...?"

"Kirio?" Juushirou was startled, then he smiled, shaking his head. "No, but I had already surmised from what both she and later, Mitsuki said that you'd had something to do with their uncharacteristically impulsive trip to Seventh. Also, with my desire to race off to save the Kitsune the other day — your reiryoku has the ability to strip people of inhibitions, doesn't it?"

"I don't know that it's meant to. I just can't control it. It leaks," Kohaku spoke bitterly. "It can leak far worse, too. When I see something, that something can be picked up by other people. If I really try hard to, I can make someone else see something... but usually it's by accident that I do. That... something... is what turns people's minds and makes them act unlike themselves."

"And when you broke Keitarou's hold over Joumei?"

"I made him see images of his family being killed," Kohaku lowered his gaze, glancing at his hands. "The same images I saw... that you saw too."

"Of his family being..."

“By doing that, I broke Father’s hold over him,” Kohaku admitted. “It’s experimental — I only learned I could do it recently, so I’m still perfecting it. But..if you scare someone enough, their body goes into survival mode. When it’s in that mode, it can fight back more strongly against an invading force than it normally would. It disrupts and disperses Father’s control... and so it breaks down. But it’s not a nice cure. It wasn’t nice for Joumei-dono, and I felt that when I touched him — but it was the only way I knew to break it.”

“Fear can break Keitarou’s control?”

“I don’t know if it’s fear, or if it’s something toxic in my reiryoku that acts like a corrosive against Father’s,” Kohaku shrugged helplessly. “Like I said, I didn’t know I could do it, till now. It takes a lot of my strength to manage, so perhaps it’s my demonic reiryoku more than anything else.”

“Then your spirit power can’t be seen as all bad, can it?” Juushirou pointed out, and Kohaku snorted.

“You have no idea what I’m capable of doing,” he whispered, and Juushirou eyed him keenly.

“But you don’t believe in killing,” he pointed out, “and you put yourself in serious danger when you brought Souja back here, too. You must’ve known that was a risk — a huge gamble, if we worked out who you were. Yet you did it anyway. You didn’t want him to die, even though he was your enemy... so...”

“He wasn’t my enemy,” Kohaku shook his head impatiently. “I won’t make you understand — I don’t have enemies, it’s other people who draw lines and use rhetoric to try and make something right or wrong. I just don’t like people dying. It doesn’t matter to me whether they’re shinigami or people in the Rukon, or even whether they’re someone who killed my sister. I don’t believe in taking life. It doesn’t solve anything, and I don’t like to see it, over and over again in my head, the different ways in which people can be ripped apart.”

He swallowed hard, burying his head in his hands as flickers of panic lurched against his senses.

“Even talking about it, I know they’re there,” he whispered. “The images of people being killed. I helped Souja-dono because he was hurt. I didn’t lie to you about that. But I did know it was going to happen. I did try to stop it. I didn’t succeed, that’s all. That’s the only bit I didn’t tell you the truth about, Ukitake-dono. I wanted to help Souja-dono — but he wouldn’t listen to me when I tried to warn him he was in danger. I knew that his life was important, and if he lived or died, it would affect everything from that point on. I knew that if he lived, there was a chance of avoiding all out conflict, and so I wanted to persuade him, even if he realised who I was.”

“So you did meet him before he was lying injured on the ground?” Juushirou asked softly. “That’s the information you knew... the thing you told Tenichi?”

Kohaku nodded.

“Souja-dono came to my hut,” he said bleakly. “The hut where Father kept me — did Katsura tell Edogawa-san about that, too?”

“Mm. Yes,” Juushirou’s lips thinned in disapproval. “I know what place you mean, but we can discuss that more later. So he came there and found you — did he let you free?”

“No... I wasn’t a prisoner. Not then. Not for a long time,” Kohaku shook his head. “But I still went there... and that day, I went because I knew Souja-dono would be there. I wanted him to turn back. I hoped that, if I talked to him, he’d go back to Seireitei. I hoped... but he wouldn’t listen. He told me it was his duty, and then he used shunpo and escaped. I... I can sense people’s reiatsu really well, Ukitake-dono. I knew where he’d gone, but I couldn’t follow him, not at his speed. I can’t do shunpo. I don’t know how. So by the time I got to where he was... he was already hurt.”

“By your sister?”

“Yes.”

“You saw her there?”

“I chased her off,” Kohaku sighed, raising resigned eyes to his companion. “It was too late, though. She’d already taken it too far. Souja-dono knew it too... but I couldn’t just leave him. I helped him open the Senkaimon, and I brought him back here.”

“Did he realise you were associated with Keitarou?”

“Yes,” Kohaku admitted. “He suspected I was when we met, and then, when Sakaki spoke to me, she called me by name. It was clear he knew Sakaki was Father’s child, and so he knew. But he... he didn’t blame me. He said he would help me, if I took him home. I knew that he couldn’t... but...”

He paused, then,

“Well, maybe he did,” he acknowledged reluctantly. “I know you took me here because Souja-dono asked you to. You’ve looked after me for his sake. Maybe that's how he kept his word... I don't know."

"Maybe because he knew you were his cousin, too," Juushirou suggested, but Kohaku shook his head.

"He never knew that," he said bitterly. "Sakaki didn't know I was her brother, so how could he?"

"Even Sakaki didn't..?" Juushirou was flummoxed, and Kohaku shrugged.

"Safer for me, Father said," he responded wearily. "People in the village associated the name Kohaku with a demon. A man went mad and died because of my spirit power, so when Father found a way to seal some of it in a sword, he decided it was best for the sword alone to keep my name, and for me to pretend to be just another member of the Rukon population. Katsu-nii knew, because he found me when we were small. But Father forbade us from telling Sakaki the truth, so she never knew. To her I was just Koku."

He reached up to brush a finger against his eyelids.

"I have darker eyes than Father, but they're brown like his, not blue like Mother's," he continued pensively. "Father said they're like his mother's, but I never met her, so I don't know. My hair is brown, like his, but darker again, because of Mother's black. I don't look like an Endou, nor like an Urahara. It was an easy lie to tell. Sakaki and Katsura both look like Mother, but I... I don't look like anything. I'm a muddle of genes and a muddle of spirit power — and because of that, nobody ever suspected who I was."

"So he locked you up and denied you were his son, and made you live in a kind of limbo, hiding who you were from everyone around you?" To Kohaku's surprise, there was genuine anger in Juushirou's tones, and he faltered, confused.

"Ukitake-dono?"

"Yet he used you, didn't he? He used this power of yours. He didn't teach you how to manage it properly, even though I'm sure he knew how. He wanted it there, so he could feed off it — and use you for his own ends."

"No..." Kohaku hesitated, a doubtful look on his face. "I... don't know. Honestly, I don't. I'm not sure anything can be done about it."

"And this sword? Souja mentioned a sword with your name on it. That was the sword into which Keitarou confined some of your power?"

“Yes.”

“A zanpakutou?”

“No... not a proper one,” Kohaku looked troubled. “He would’ve liked me to summon one, I think, but it never happened. I have a voice in my head, and I wish I didn’t, and Father thought it might be one... but it never became what he anticipated. Katsu-nii and Sakaki never had that — only me, and it didn’t act as he expected, so he wasn’t sure. In the end, I didn’t have enough strength or... or control to summon anything. It told me it’s name was Kyouka, but that it wasn’t its full name, and that a worm like me would never hear any more.”

“Kyouka?” Juushirou’s lips thinned, and Koku nodded, a hollow smile touching his lips.

“Even now, it delights in tormenting me, and I wish it were gone far far away,” he agreed. “Father made this sword to confine it, but it wasn’t enough really and he knew it wasn’t. It took him a long time, so maybe he began working on it when I was still small — I don’t know. I only know that I was sixteen before he brought it near me. He said it was more like an upgraded asauchi — a spiritual sponge to soak up some of the power I couldn’t control. It’s... really not nice, my power, and it hates me. Because it does, it tries to take me over and do with me as it wishes. Father wanted to stop that happening, so that I could be rational for longer periods. Maybe it was to be of use to him, or maybe it was for my sake — I don’t really know. But he still did it, and the result was the same. He sealed the hilt with Sekkiseki so that it couldn’t pour back into me if I touched it, and because my power is as it is, I was the only one who could. He couldn’t remove all of what he wanted to the blade, but I think he tried...”

“Not hard enough,” Juushirou said flatly, and Kohaku frowned.

“Ukitake-dono, why do you care?” he asked softly. “It’s nothing to do with you. Father did what he thought was right, and that’s all. It was better than how I lived before. Before he made the sword, all I remember are shadows, delusions and being locked in a cold, dark place, often on my own. Sometimes Katsu-nii was there, and we’d play, but those memories are broken and confused with bits of the past and the future, so they’re not coherent. I was... damaged. You don’t understand... I was broken from the time I was born, and then...”

“He told you you were broken?” Juushirou’s eyes widened in dismay, and Kohaku shook his head hurriedly.

“No!” he said hastily, “or well, yes, but not... in those words. But the reidoku damaged me. I wasn’t normal when I was born... so there was only so much he could do.”

“Reidoku?” It was impossible for Juushirou to look any more horrified, and Kohaku sighed, rubbing his fingers against his brow.

“I’m making this worse,” he said heavily.

“Did he make you drink reidoku? Is that what you’re telling me?”

“No,” Kohaku held up his hands. “He stopped making it — he said he didn’t want to have it anywhere around me, because he was worried about the consequences with my reiryoku as it was”

“Then...?”

“He drank it,” Kohaku said simply. “He told me that, to escape the shinigami the last time, he had no choice but to. But it didn’t clear his system like he thought it would. It stayed. It affected him, and those effects became part of him as he healed. He didn’t really understand it either, though he thought it was because... well... because his body was so broken, and there was so much mending to do. The reidoku just bound with his body and became a part of it. But because of that...”

“It was passed on genetically,” Juushirou murmured. “Good grief, and we thought it bad enough if ingested by one individual, but something of this level! You, your brother, your sister...”

“Katsu-nii was conceived before,” Kohaku shook his head. “It’s only Sakaki and I who were affected. I got too much reiryoku, and she got none at all. For that reason, Father wasn’t sure if Kyouka was really a zanpakutou, or just a mutation of my spirit power caused by the reidoku, which had allowed it to create it’s own split personality inside of me, fighting for control.”

“I see,” Juushirou chewed on his lip.

“I don’t hate my Father, Ukitake-dono. If you ask me where he is, I won’t tell you.”

“Do you know where he is?” Juushirou asked sharply, but Kohaku shook his head.

“No,” he admitted, “but I could find him pretty easily, if I wanted to try. I don’t think it matters, though.”

“Even if it means more people are killed?”

“They probably will be,” Kohaku said soberly. “I understand Father better than you or anyone else in Seireitei. Probably better than any of my family, too, to be honest. I know his good points and his bad ones, and why he acts how he does. I know he won't ever give up, and that talking to him about it is pointless. It's been tried before, but you can't reach him. His heart is too scarred and damaged to be changed. He's looking for something he can't ever find, so he won't ever stop. Even though he knows he can't find it, he'll keep going regardless."

"Yet you don't believe in stopping him?" Juushirou asked. "Are the ties of kin that strong? Even though he confined you, and even though he raised you in such a horrible location, even so...?"

"It's not that," Kohaku said sadly. "I stopped Katsu-nii from killing Joumei-dono because killing him wouldn't change anything. Sakaki would just be dead, and I know Joumei-dono also has a sister, doesn't he? It would be stealing from another family, and that's wrong... it's always wrong. I don't agree with Father's way of doing a lot of things. But you're wrong about something, Juushirou-dono. I grew up in a horrible place, it's true. Supplies were meagre and life hard. But we were alive, and so were the others who lived there. Because of Father's connections, and Mother's determination, the people in Rukongai were able to eke out a living. Your people ignored them. You left them to die. Maybe you didn't know about them,' as Juushirou looked stricken, "but I bet somewhere, someone did. Somewhere in the past, a record was misfiled or a decision made without any proper investigation. I know people died in the Rukon before — shinigami, not just ordinary people. I've been to those places and I've felt the fragments of their spirits on the wind. Maybe that's why the shinigami chose to isolate the souls with reiryoku. Maybe this was their solution — I don't know. But I do know that a lot of very poor people would be dead without Father. And I can't condone that. If you go attack Father, wherever he is now, you'll bring them into it and they'll be hurt more. They don't deserve that. So I won't try and find him, nor try and stop him. I don't think Father is any more wrong than the shinigami are when it comes to sacrificing life. All life is as important as each other, isn't that what Kyouraku-dono said? But it seems as though shinigami still hold themselves above ordinary folk. And... and while I admit that you've been kind to me here, I don't know... that that makes you right and Father wrong."

"Koku..." Juushirou paused, then sighed, nodding his head.

"I suppose that's true," he admitted reluctantly. "I know Keitarou is wrong, because I've seen the things he's done to hurt people around me, as well as to me directly. But... when I first met him, he said things about the inequalities in society, and those things haven't changed completely. I... wanted to try and help open up Seireitei, by becoming the first District Captain, and creating a safe place for District graduates to come from the Academy and serve in uniform alongside those from the Clans. But, though some Clan squads do accept District applications, now, we're still known as the District squad, with the least budget to work with. Some Clan shinigami still look down on me and on us. That's just the periphery, isn't it? It's beginning to thaw the inequality in Seireitei, but nobody's paid enough attention to Rukongai. We knew about the Plus Souls, and Fourth have worked hard to help those by establishing the Spiritless Zone. But... but it's been bothering me, too, that there were others. Ones like you, and not like you, who had spirit power but who the Gotei don't officially acknowledge. Since you came here, it's been bothering me more and more. I truly didn't know anything of it before that — but that's also my fault, for not questioning enough. Maybe that makes me as guilty as anyone else in their neglect. If they turned to Keitarou, it was because we refused to notice."

A faint smile touched Kohaku's lips, and he shook his head.

"I don't think you're to blame," he said honestly. "You've known I was from Rukongai, but it didn't affect your care of me. And now, too, even knowing who I really am, you're still talking to me as a person, not simply as an enemy. Perhaps because of that, you can understand that it's not a clear cut case of good and bad, not for me. Father has done unforgivable things, and so have shinigami. Father has done good things, and so have shinigami. I think you're the same... you just approach from different points of view. The things and people that are bad to Father are good to you, and vice versa. It's all on perspective. That's why I don't have enemies... because I don't choose to take sides like that. To me, if someone is alive, they should stay that way. It's not for me to take their life away, or to stop them from doing what they want to do with it. Even if I see it... it's not for me to interfere. I might make it worse, and even if I didn't, I don't have the right to dictate someone else's choices."

Juushirou was quiet for a moment, then he sighed.

"I understand," he replied softly. "I do, more than you think."

"Do you?" Kohaku looked doubtful, and Juushirou pressed his lips together.

"To you, I'm a privileged Seireitei-jin, aren't I?" he realised. 'I've always had food and shelter, and I've taken those things for granted. True, my background isn't rich, but even the poorest families in Seireitei probably can't imagine the things you've faced. Shunsui told me about the place he investigated, and I know how barren and dead it was. I can't imagine living in that kind of surroundings. I suppose for you to look at me, in my shinigami uniform, with this,' he touched his haori, "flapping about my shoulders, its hard to believe that I understand anything you say at all."

"Maybe a little," Kohaku confessed.

"You're still talking to me about it, though," Juushirou observed, and Kohaku looked startled.

"I guess so," he realised. "I don't think I've ever talked like this to anyone, not ever. Not even Katsu-nii. I never thought I'd say stuff like this to a shinigami... but you... don't seem angry with me for saying it. You said anything I thought you ought to know. Maybe... this is that. What you ought to know."

"Maybe it is," Juushirou admitted. "The big question is, what to do from here. The trouble is that even if we're at fault, it doesn't mean we can just leave Keitarou to his own devices. You're right when you say that the lives of the people in the Rukon are important, and we must find a way to settle that properly. They can't continue to be treated so badly, and I agree that we mustn't turn our back on them a second time. I promise, I won't let that happen. But the lives... the people here in Seireitei, their lives are important too. And sacrifices like Souja, or the healers in the Spiritless Zone... they deserve justice too. It's not even just shinigami he's targeted. Before you were born, many, many people were killed by Keitarou and his associates in the pursuit of reidoku creation."

"Many people?" Kohaku pressed his lips together. "Ordinary people?"

"Ordinary Seireitei people," Juushirou nodded. "I saw evidence of it myself, when I first met your Father, and many, many people have given testimony about relatives stolen away or in some cases, sold to prevent the whole family being killed. Maybe he's stopped creating reidoku now, but that doesn't change the number of people who died because of his work. I understand Keitarou suffered a lot himself, and that, perhaps, the matter of your Grandfather might've been settled in a better way. Even Nagesu-sama has said that he wishes it had been handled differently. My adopted sister lived with Keitarou for four years, and she said that he wasn't a bad person, just one damaged by circumstance beyond all help. You've said the same about him now, and I... I don't believe he's completely evil. But, if you undergo suffering yourself, you... surely the last thing you want to do is make other people suffer? If you understand it, how could you ever want anyone else to go through the same?"

“I... I suppose that...”

“Kuchiki Ribari, Endou Souja, Amai Suzuno,” Juushirou counted the names off on his fingers. “A boy not even into his adulthood, killed simply for being a Kuchiki. An Endou shinigami killed because he wanted to protect his family and do his duty. And a young Unohana who made the mistake of healing your father’s wounds... and paid for it with her life.”

Kohaku’s eyes widened in alarm, as before his eyes the white wraith-like form of a young woman began to take shape, a healing sword held in her hands. She appeared pure and beautiful as an angel, but then blood began to trickle from her throat and her chest, saturating the entire image in a flow of crimson. She gazed at him for a moment, her soulful eyes burning right through him, then, with a ripple of light she faded into nothing.

“Amai... Suzuno?” he murmured.

“When you train to be a shinigami, you expect to fight,” Juushirou continued evenly. ‘As shinigami, though, we’re also trained not to fight. We’re taught not to kill people we ought not kill. Civilians. Children. Those who show you no hostility. Healers. The wounded. In an ideal world, these swords,’ he patted Sougyo no Kotowari’s hilt, “would only be used to purify Hollows. But, people like Keitarou, they make it necessary for us to consider killing on a different level. I don’t like that. I want a peaceful Seireitei, in which we can do our duty and protect the balance of souls between this world and the other. Many of us don’t like killing.”

“Your sword has never taken a person’s life, has it?” Kohaku whispered, reaching out towards Sougyo no Kotowari, half sure he felt the blade calling to him. Briefly, images of two fish splashed across his senses, then, as soon as they were there they were gone, making him sure he had imagined their presence completely. “I can tell... it isn’t tainted. There’s no blood on the blade.”

“Well, I do polish it,” Juushirou said matter-of-factly, “but you’re right. I’ve purified many Hollows, but that’s all. I know I could, if I needed to, but knowing that is enough... not to need to. There are a lot of shinigami who feel like that. Shunsui told you so, didn’t he? We’re not blood-thirsty killers, even if sometimes we make mistakes.”

“Maybe,” Kohaku lowered his hand with a sigh. “It’s hard to know. It’s hard to work everything out.”

“But you do believe killing is wrong,” Juushirou pointed out. “Don’t you believe people who take life ought to be brought to account for it?"

"I don't believe in taking life," Kohaku said simply. "You might not want to kill, but Shinigami kill people who kill other people, don't they? That's the same as Joumei-dono killing Sakaki, or Sakaki killing Souja-dono. It's all wrong. No matter what the justification, a life is a life. That's what I believe. I don't like death. That's all. And just because Father has killed... or Katsu-nii... I... if they were to be killed... I..."

"What if one death could prevent the deaths of many?"

Kohaku stared at Juushirou, momentarily struck speechless as unwelcome images flooded in from all four corners of his senses. A pale, broken body lying across cobbles amid the scattered remains of black-clad others, the thick white fabric of his haori stained red with blood that seeped slowly between the cracks in the stone. The ends of his obi, torn loose in the struggle, fluttered helplessly in the wind. Two hazel eyes stared up at the sky, sightless and devoid of spirit, and the ragged wisps of snow white hair...

One death, preventing the deaths of many...

He closed his eyes, forcing the images back, but no sooner had he suppressed it than another, more familiar visage began to take shape in his mind's eye. This was a corpse he had seen time and time again, yet this time more vivid and real against his senses. The wispy, sandy-brown hair, and those mud-slurried eyes, unblinking and accusing. The man's lips could no longer move, yet Kohaku still heard him speak a single word, the syllables trickling down his spine like ice water.

"Betrayal."

"Stop it," he whispered, but a flurry of other images washed over him, overwhelming him before pulling sharply back and returning him with a cruel jolt to the small chamber and the concerned gaze of the Thirteenth Division Captain.

"Koku? Are you all right?"

"The death of one..." Kohaku wet his lips, gazing at Juushirou with a sudden flash of alarm. In that instant, the things which had not been clear before had been laid before him in perfect technicolour. At last, he understood.

"Ukitake Juushirou is going to be a problem for me,"

Keitarou's words came suddenly to his thoughts, and Kohaku's heart clenched, interpreting those words anew.

I wonder if you understood what that really meant, Father.

He took a shaky breath into his lungs, struggling to regain some composure.

If I'd understood, would I have ever come here? Would I have taken the risk and brought Souja-dono back? But it's too late. I can't turn back from it. I've tried to run away from it for too long, but I can't escape it forever. I can't, can I, Kyouka? If I act, or if I don't, people die. It just... it's a matter of... of who... and... of when.

Author's Note

Happy New Year Everyone!

54. Trust

Chapter Fifty Three: Trust

“Well? How do you feel this morning?”

Keitarou sank down onto the stump of an old oak tree, casting his companion a quizzical look. It was barely past dawn, and in the Real World, a cold breeze was stirring through the uneven terrain. It sent a rustle through the long grasses, making them sound as though they were whispering, and Keitarou pulled his cloak more tightly around his body, trying to push the sensation out of his mind. It had been many years since the day Eiraki’s brother had confronted him, Wind Hawk released, but it was not a pleasant memory and, in light of the current situation, not one he wanted to dwell on too greatly. It would not do, he told himself for the umteenth time, to show weakness before allies he desperately needed.

“Not much different, to be honest,” At length, Haruya responded, flexing his arm thoughtfully, then shrugging his shoulders. “You’re sure this potion of yours will work to stabilise our powers if we release them? We’ve only your word for it, and you’ve taken your time getting around to it. Since the shinigami came, we’ve been on high alert — but nothing has happened. Yet.”

“No... not yet,” Keitarou settled himself more comfortably against the rings of the wood. “They will come — and soon, but they are still making preparations. As for my own delay — you have my apologies. A couple of things occurred outside of my calculations, and putting together a stable formula took longer as a result. I wanted to make sure it was absolutely perfect — and I’m quite sure that it will prevent the breakdown of your spirit in battle. Even sitting here I can feel your reiryokuis settling. You needn’t have any concerns about it, Haruya. I’ve fixed Kusakawa’s fatal flaw. When the Gotei come, you’ll be ready for them.”

“Mm,” Haruya flexed his arm again, then sighed, turning to glance in the direction of the makeshift shelter which had become the home of the three strays since their liberation from the cave. Aki was sitting not far from the entrance, studiously winding together blooms she had picked from the long grass into a chain. At her brother’s attention, she glanced up, offering him a bright smile, then returned her attention to her task, clearly unconcerned by the fact that, a few feet away, her brother and his companion were discussing plans for war.

“What about Aki?” Haruya lowered his voice. “You’ve stabilised her abilities — does that mean...?”

“I can’t do anything about her... means of reacting to them, when they come,” Keitarou had anticipated the question and he sighed, shaking his head. “I have no idea what you three have been subjected to, and I’m not a psychotherapist. I am a scientist and I can fix what’s tangible and calculable, but Aki’s trauma...”

He spread his hands.

“The only thing I could offer to subdue it would be to put her under the direct control of my sword,” he added frankly. “Aside from the fact that would leave me with my spirit power spread across two worlds at a time I need it at its full capacity, it would serve your sister no better to have Chudokuga lurking inside of her. It would slow her reactions and make her movements reliant on my thoughts, not on her own. I have no intention of making any of you my puppets — you are my allies, I hope, and I want to respect you as such. Aki’s problems are significant, it’s true, but they also give her speed and potency in attack. Since now she shouldn’t suffer from the same overload she did when faced by Nagesu... I don’t foresee any problems.”

“I’m not talking about her as a fighter, Keitarou,” Haruya’s brows knitted together in a frown. “I’m talking about my sister’s well being. Her mental health. Her stability and her happiness. Here, like this, she’s fine. She’s content. But faced with danger... I don’t want her to suffer. I don’t want her to remember more than she already has about what went on in that place. She’s so much like a child, still. So innocent and naive, yet inside she’s broken and it upsets me when I think about what that man did to her. Stabilising our lives is all very well, and I’ll fight for your cause, since I owe you now for our very survival. But if you can’t fix Aki...”

“When this is over, I’ll see if I can find a way to help her,” Keitarou promised. “I don’t know if I can, or if there even is a way, but I hope... there will be significant changes that will give us some leeway into investigating.”

“And what of the Gotei?” Haruya was wary. “Only some of them are coming here. We might defeat them, but if we do, you can’t think you can take out all of the rest on your own.”

“I won’t be on my own,” Keitarou smiled. “I have a couple of tricks up my sleeve. You needn’t worry about the Gotei back in Seireitei. I have plans for them. As for the ones here... I’m relying on you to take them out. I won't be able to come back here and provide support... I'll have my own fight to win, so I want you to be prepared."

He fumbled in his obi, pulling out a crumpled sheet of paper and holding it out to his companion, who took it, glancing at its contents. His eyes narrowed, and he gazed at Keitarou speculatively.

"You're extremely well informed, for someone the Gotei apparently hate the sight of," he said suspiciously. "How did you get so much detail? This doesn't just detail squads, it details individual names of officers — I can't imagine you acquired that through legal channels."

"No..." Keitarou shook his head. "No, I have had some help from an agent of mine within the Gotei itself. They took very careful mental notes of everything that was reported to them, and passed the information back to me so I could do with it whatever I wanted."

"An agent," Haruya rubbed his chin. "And this agent approves of you using creatures like us to further your cause?"

"In the world I want to create, there will be nobody to look at you as 'creatures,' but rather as" people ",", Keitarou said succinctly. "In this case, though, I have learned that it never serves well for anyone to know the whole of a plot, just in case it goes to pieces before it reaches completion. My agent has not been apprehended — they are not even under any suspicion, so far as I can ascertain — but it never hurts to be sure. They only know that I intend to act on Soul Society at a time which it is most vulnerable. I believe the Gotei suspect I have connections to you, thanks to Nagesu's report back to the rest of them — but the exact particulars... no."

"I see," Haruya folded the document, sliding it into his own rough sash. "And what does that mean you've kept from us, Keitarou? If you never tell your associates everything, what part of the puzzle are we missing?"

"You are a remarkably astute man," Keitarou acknowledged with a rueful nod. "You're right, of course. I can't disclose to you every inch of my plan in Seireitei, but my not doing so isn't a threat to you. I just find that the fewer people who know how I'm thinking, the better. Even my wife doesn't know..."

He faltered, then frowned, a shadow touching his expression, and Haruya cast him a quizzical look.

"Keitarou?"

"I'm sorry," Keitarou shook his head, offering him a faint smile. "For a moment I allowed personal thoughts to intervene with professional clinicism. My daughter was killed in action a few days ago, and my wife has been preoccupied with her burial. In light of that, I have felt... it better she doesn't know the full details of what I want to attempt. I don't want to cause her more grief than is necessary."

"You aren't sure that you'll live to see the end of it, are you?" Haruya was on him in a flash, and Keitarou shrugged.

"A man is always willing to give his life for his beliefs," he said pragmatically. "I don't aim to die, Haruya, but so long as I can achieve my objectives and open up the new world I've hunted for my entire existence, I feel... I could be at peace at last. I have lived on luck for many years, but luck doesn't last forever. I'm not afraid of dying... but the ties I have in this world trouble me, so I don't talk about those concerns with other people."

"Yet you'll talk to me, a virtual stranger?"

"We're not so much strangers, not really," Keitarou shook his head. "Your lives have been in peril and you, like me, have been abused and discarded by members of the same Clan society since you were born. You understand the world I want to create, and you understand the ties of kin that cause you to hesitate and worry about things beyond the fight right in front of you. We are very similar indeed, Haruya."

"And if you were to die? Who, then, would bring in this new dawn of yours?"

"That I can't tell you," Keitarou looked regretful. "It is too dangerous... I dare not. But rest assured, I am not going into this fight intending to lose my life, nor do I wish you three to lose yours. On the contrary, I want to stand triumphant over the broken and bloody remains of Inner Seireitei and see it fall with my own eyes. I want to break down the barrier between Rukongai and Seireitei, and allow those with spiritual ability to claim what ought to be theirs, regardless of their origins. That includes you and your companions. Hollows or shinigami, it matters not to me. Even hybrids of the two. That is the world I seek to build — a meritocracy, instead of an aristocracy. A new Seireitei... with an entirely different concept of 'balance'. Even if it means a long, protracted war and sacrifices, well, I'll make them — even with my own life — providing in the end that world comes to be."

He smiled sadly.

"My father died because of the old world, and their ideas and prejudices," he added. "Ever since I learned what it meant to be betrayed, I've longed to bury the betrayers in the dust. I thought it would be enough just to kill one person here, one person there. I finished off the last survivor of the Council that condemned him, and avenged the death of a close kinsman, but it wasn't enough to quench my thirst for revenge. An assassination here and there is no longer enough. I have to move into the heart of power and destroy it at its core. That's where you and your companions can help. The shinigami Captains who are coming here are all Council members. Those left in Seireitei are, with the exception of my brother-in-law — largely political small fry. Crushing them and their underlings should not be a challenge... providing you three can also do a job here."

"Well, we'll do our best," Haruya promised, getting to his feet and holding out his hand to Keitarou's to shake it. "We have our own scores to settle, and it sounds as though we can benefit long term from allying with you, so we will. You've kept your word so far, and I've no reason to believe in the Clans for anything. We will fight and kill on your behalf, Keitarou. You have my word on it."

"Enishi told me that you were here,"

At the sound of Shunsui's voice, Juushirou set the book he had been reading on one side, offering his friend a relieved, rueful smile. It was early the next morning, but for Juushirou it was as though the two days had blurred one into the other. Despite the events of the previous day, he had been hard pressed to sleep and the sunrise had found him making the small walk from his own division quarters to the big Seireitei archive in search of something that could put his mind at rest. Though he had sent no message to Eighth for Shunsui, fearful of the implications of widening the web of knowledge beyond his own division confines, he knew that, more than ever, he needed his friend's advice.

"I wondered what time you'd get back," he admitted now, gesturing for the other man to come and join him. "You're earlier than I thought... I've been waiting for you."

"Here?" Shunsui glanced around him at the books, a look of surprise flooding his dark brown gaze. "No offence, Juu-kun, but of all the places in Seireitei you might expect to see me, the archive isn't one of them."

"But you're here now," Juushirou pointed out, and Shunsui nodded, sinking down onto the seat opposite and making himself comfortable.

"Only because, when I dropped by Thirteenth with my brother's best wishes and some good quality Kyouraku sake as a goodwill gift, I found you'd already gone roaming," he said with a grin. "I left the alcohol with your adjutant, by the way — apparently there are rules about sake in the archives, and in any case, I figured I could trust it in Enishi's hands."

"Probably," Juushirou nodded. "Thank Tokutarou-sama for me, would you? He's always been generous to me, and I appreciate his kind thoughts."

"Will do," Shunsui agreed, resting his chin in his hands and running his gaze over the spines of the several dusty books that surrounded his friend's position. "I have to say, though, that you must've been here a while, to accrue that many volumes."

"Mm, maybe," Juushirou cast a pensive glance across towards the window, gauging the position of the sun in the sky. "Perhaps a few hours. I'm not exactly sure. I had something I wanted to look up, but I haven't managed to find anything useful."

He frowned.

"Shunsui, what did Enishi say to you about yesterday? I assume he told you something — he wouldn't've just sent you on a goose chase over here for no reason. You came all this way to find me because you knew something was up — so he must've said something."

"I guess probably the bare bones," Shunsui acknowledged with a sigh. "He seemed pretty busy, and I didn't like to get in the way, though he didn't make me unwelcome. I understood there'd been some kind of drama at Seventh yesterday, correct? And as a result, both the Kitsune are currently in your custody."

"I wouldn't put it like that," Juushirou shook his head, glancing around him then lowering his voice. "This isn't a good place to talk about things like that, not even while it's so quiet, but Joumei left Thirteenth at the same time I did. He's gone back to Seventh to report to Hirata, now things appear to have calmed down. You're right, though. There was an incident at Seventh yesterday. There was also one at Thirteenth, and I can't say at the moment whether or not they were connected. Ultimately, they led me to having some information I'm not sure I ought to have... and more, I have no clue what to do with."

"That sounds complicated and cryptic," Shunsui observed. "Enishi didn't say anything about Thirteenth, but he did seem uncommonly preoccupied for him, now I think of it. Well? If you don't think here's a good place to discuss it, how about we relocate to somewhere quieter?”

He raised his hand, gesturing to the upper gallery.

“One of the secure alcoves up there ought to be fine. We can lock the door and the walls are soundproofed. Nobody would hear anything, and you could bring your books.”

“All right,” Juushirou agreed, getting to his feet and resting his hand on the top of the nearest volume. “I’m not sure if they’re of any use or not, or if I’m even looking in the right sections, to be honest.”

“These are all books on zanpakutou,” Shunsui realised. “On raising them, controlling them... their history... spirit nature..”

He picked up one of the smaller tomes, flicking through the pages.

“This is the kind of stuff we had to wade through for our Senior exams, only much much more wordy and with far fewer pictures,” he realised. “Juu, I don’t get it. What has this to do with Seventh being attacked?”

“Nothing, probably, but come upstairs and I’ll tell you. Everything, if I can,” Juushirou grimaced, running his grimy fingers through his lank white hair, and Shunsui tut-tutted.

“See, now you’ve given yourself skunk-stripes,” he scolded, extending his free hand to brush away the dust from the thin, straight hair. “You go back to your squad like that and they’ll think you were rolling in the bookshelves, not studying their contents.”

“Shunsui,” despite his preoccupation, Juushirou allowed himself a wry smile, and his friend returned it with a grin.

“Yes, that’s better,” he decided, scooping up three or four of the books into his arms and nodding in the direction of the alcove. “Well? Shall we go? It’s a bit like old times, though I’m warning you, my essay writing days are long since over.”

“Mine too, thankfully,” Juushirou ruminated, as he obediently followed his companion across the open floor of the archive and up the steps to the landing where three or four private study alcoves had been constructed for confidential research. Only Captains were permitted access to this hallowed area and, as a result, it was completely empty, giving them the pick of the rooms. Shunsui made a bee-line for the nearest, depositing his burden down on the table and indicating for Juushirou to do the same before moving to shut the door, fastening it with a soft click.

“Right, now we’re alone, and nobody can hear anything we say,” he remarked, leaning up against the door and folding his arms across his chest. "Tell me what happened yesterday. In bitesize fragments, if you don't mind — I want to absorb and understand everything, because if it's got you here at this time doing random research, it's obviously important."

"Where do I even begin?" Juushirou groaned, sinking down into the seat beside the window.

"Seventh," Shunsui suggested. "Enishi gave me the impression that was the beginning, so start there, and I'll try to follow."

"Mm," Juushirou pursed his lips. "I'm not sure really how it began. I just know that Hirata was away from the Division, and that Kikyue sent Tenichi to come find me, on account of the fact Joumei had appeared at Seventh and he was being pursued by some unknown enemy. You were away, so that's why she came to me."

"Joumei the Kitsune?"

"Yes."

"I thought Kikyue didn't know anything about him and his people,"

"So did Hirata, and so did I, but that seems the least of our concerns right now," Juushirou thinned his lips. "To cut a long story short, Joumei had attacked and killed the young girl who took Souja's life, and one of her allies took exception to it. A young man by the name of Katsura, who manifested what I can only call spirit-disrupting or psychic powers, and pretty much zero spiritual control."

"I see," Shunsui looked thoughtful. "And this Katsura came to kill Joumei, in a tit-for-tat type killing?"

"Something like that," Juushirou agreed. "I don't know whether it was his emotion driving his spirit power or vice versa, but he was not in the mood for negotiating. I intervened, and I would've taken him down — at the very least, taken him prisoner, but then Mitsuki decided to make an impromptu appearance."

"Wait, back up," Shunsui's brow creased in confusion. "Mitsuki? As in your Mitsuki?"

"She's a long way from being my Mitsuki, and getting further from it by the day," Juushirou tugged absently on a length of his hair, leaving fresh smudges across the surface. "Yes. It turns out that this Katsura person is the one who saved her life in Rukongai. It also transpired that he was the one who put it in danger... because he's not just an agent of Keitarou's, but his oldest son."

“Ooh,” Shunsui let out a low whistle, wincing. “Did Mitsuki know all of that when she stopped you?”

“No, thank goodness,” Juushirou responded, “else the situation would be much more complicated. Katsura escaped, and Seventh pursued him, but whether they caught him or not, I have no idea. Mitsuki admitted to me that she’d healed his injuries and let him go — but beyond that, there’s been no report. I think Seventh are still hunting him, but I can’t be certain. I didn’t pursue him myself — I stayed to help put the division back in order, and as I left, I had a summons from my own division, telling me that Tenichi had lost his mind and decided to try and kill Joumei’s sister, Izumi.”

“It was a busy day,” Shunsui pursed his lips. “I missed everything, didn’t I? So, what came of that? Is the girl all right?”

“She is, thanks to Ketsui, who intervened on her behalf and arrested Tenichi,” Juushirou replied, “but Tenichi is in a highly confused state, and though I’ve handed him over to the Onmitsukidou, it concerns me that he’d act in such an irrational way. More, Ketsui is very upset about it. Tenichi is the only family he has, and he’s idolised his brother since they were small. This has been a huge blow. There’s been no time to pander to his feelings on the subject, though. He also reported to me last night — and Izumi confirmed it — that they had been working on Sekime-taichou’s data, and they’ve found a serious loophole in the figures. They both believe that Keitarou is planning to launch a direct attack here, on Seireitei, probably during the time that some of our Divisions are in the Real World looking for him. That seems to tally in with our own worries so badly, I’m sure they’re right. The trouble is, I don’t know how to pass that information higher up the chain without putting the Kitsune in more danger. Clearly even Thirteenth isn’t as safe as I hoped it would be, and the stakes are growing ever higher.”

He sighed.

“Yesterday’s events ought to have been reported to the Council straight away, being that Keitarou’s son was involved,” he admitted, “but I’ve done nothing about it, and I doubt either Hirata or Kai have, either. Kai knows all about the Kitsune, now, but he’s the kind to treat it with the discretion it needs whilst he investigates Tenichi’s situation. I didn’t tell him that Keitarou’s son had attacked Seventh, because I didn’t really know how to bring it up, especially as it wasn’t my division. Hirata sent a message late last evening to say Kikyue had returned and to ask me to leave the settling of this particular issue in Seventh’s hands from hereon in. I don’t know if that means they killed the young lad Katsura, or if they're still pursuing him — but with Nagesu-sama and the others so preoccupied with preparing to go to the Real World, I guess he's hoping the flurry at Seventh has slipped their notice completely. Perhaps he sees Katsura as a form of vengeance for his son... but I don't really want to be any more involved in that situation than I already am."

"I suppose they expect violent swirls of spirit power from the Seventh. It's that kind of division, especially if Hirata is angry, and nobody tends to encroach on other divisions' private business unless they're formally requested," Shunsui rolled his eyes. "Fine, I suppose if Hirata said that, there's not a lot you can do to take it further. It wasn't your barracks, so it's effectively not your jurisdiction... and Hirata is also a member of the Council. He can pull rank on you there, so I would leave it with him. If he knows about it, then, in a sense, the Council knows, even if its current leader doesn't."

"I'd honestly rather it didn't go further," Juushirou confessed. "It's so complicated and tangled. I'm not protecting Katsura, Shunsui — I saw plenty of evidence that he was dangerous and I heard him say he'd killed shinigami, which means he should be at the very least captured. But if capturing him brings others into serious danger... then..."

"You're worried about Mitsuki getting into trouble?" Shunsui asked astutely, and Juushirou shrugged.

"She made a formal confession to me of all she knew, last night," he said heavily. "I would rather not see her charged for healing him. I don't pretend I like the business, but I don't think she acted with deliberately treasonous intent. It's not just that, though. Reporting the whole encounter to someone higher up the chain of command might result in people losing their lives in a way that I can't condone."

"Like Joumei and Izumi?"

"Yes... and no."

"And somehow this all connects to why you're suddenly interested in everything about zanpakutou control?" Shunsui reached across to tap the cover of one of the books. "Everything you've said is serious and obviously has deeper ramifications, but I don't quite see how it tallies up with your research this morning."

"That's another problem entirely," Juushirou sounded weary. "Mitsuki didn't make her interruption alone. Kirio and Koku were with her... and it appears to have been on Koku's impulse that they intervened in the fight."

“That boy again,” Shunsui’s eyes narrowed to slits. “Well? Did you speak to him about it and get a satisfactory answer as to why?”

“It seems like he managed to make both Kirio and Mitsuki feel a sense of urgency about coming into the confrontation, just as he did with me when he saw the Kitsune being attacked, but I don’t know that he did it consciously,” Juushirou admitted. “You were right about his involvement with Keitarou, though. He intervened to let Katsura escape. True enough, his appearance diffused the situation, because it broke Katsura’s will to attack and forced him onto the backfoot instead. Moreover, he somehow used his spirit power to break Keitarou’s sword control over Joumei, and he did so of his own volition. But, when Mitsuki discovered Katsura was Keitarou’s son, she also discovered some things about Koku — things she thought I should know in full. I spoke to the boy directly after meeting with her, and mostly, he admitted they were true. Koku is the boy Kohaku, Shunsui. He’s Keitarou’s son, too.”

Shunsui’s face went through several different expressions, then he sighed, coming to rest a hand on Juushirou’s shoulders.

“I’m sorry,” he said softly. “I know you wanted to believe in the kid.”

“That’s the foolish part of it,” Juushirou rubbed his brows, oblivious of the smears he had now deposited across his pale skin. “I do believe in him. Even knowing all the things I do about him now, I still... don’t intend on giving him up to Seireitei.”

“What?” Shunsui’s expression became one of consternation. “Juu, you know what the Council decided. You know what it will mean, if you’re caught. And you said yourself, you didn’t know what or who you were protecting. In the circumstances...”

“He’s a scared boy, Shunsui,” Juushirou cut across him, shaking his head. “You can call me naive, or overprotective, or anything you like, but he’s been in my custody, and I’ve seen that that’s the case. Moreover, when Mitsuki spoke to Katsura, he admitted his own role in the murders of the shinigami in the Spiritless Zone, and didn’t try to conceal anything from her. But he said very clearly that Kohaku had committed no crime, and more, that he was not under Keitarou’s control. Mitsuki seemed to think he was in danger from Keitarou in some way, and listening to Koku himself talk, I felt... I felt very angry, to be honest. Angry that a father could use his son in such a merciless way.”

“Such as?” Shunsui sank down on the floor opposite, fixing his friend with a quizzical look. “I know you when it comes to lost waifs and strays, Juu. You won’t listen to reason, nor see it when it jumps up in front of you.”

“I like to believe in people as much as I can, true,” Juushirou’s voice carried a faint edge, “but I’m not completely simple. Koku did bring Souja-dono back here, even at his own risk. He also broke Keitarou’s hold over Joumei, which can’t possibly be to his father’s advantage. Yes, he helped his brother escape, but if it were Tokutarou-sama, Shunsui, wouldn’t you?”

“Tokutarou-nii would’ve had to have lost all reason and sense, but I suppose I would,” Shunsui sighed, burying his head in his hands. “All right, but even if those things are true and he didn’t act simply to get your trust in those examples, there’s still Suzuki Naoto’s claims that Kohaku had the power to destroy Soul Society.”

“Kohaku’s power is the power of prophesy, and because of it, he was locked away by his father for most of his childhood,” Juushirou said evenly. “Koku told me that Keitarou helped him confine some of his power to a sword, but it seems to me that a genius like Keitarou could easily have done more if he really cared to protect or support his son. Koku mentioned a voice in his head, which Keitarou wasn’t sure was a zanpakutou spirit, or a mutation of the boy’s spirit power. Apparently Kohaku has extremely high reiryoku, on account of the reidoku Keitarou ingested before he was conceived. Yet even a genius scientist like Keitarou didn’t bother to experiment on ways of really bringing this power in hand. He wanted to use it. And he did. Katsura told Mitsuki as much, and said that he was afraid Keitarou would try to do so again. The hut you found in Rukongai is undoubtedly the place Koku was held, and the sense of death around the place is probably the overspill of Koku’s reiatsu, fragments of the death visions he’d been made to relive, over and over. Nobody should be made to live like that, regardless of who they are or where they were born. Right now he’s also clearly not well enough to face proper interrogation, let alone a full scale trial. Even when I was talking to him about this, he slipped away with the fairies — or the demons, one or the other — and I had to stop because I could no longer get coherent sense out of him. He’s frightened, and perhaps his mental state isn’t firmly in the here and now at present, but he hasn’t shown any hostile intent. He’s not evil. I would stake my life and my reputation on that fact.”

“You may be doing that exact thing,” Shunsui looked troubled. “Oh, don’t worry, I wouldn’t report on you, and your secret is safe with me, but it bothers me all the same. Even if everything you say is true, and Koku is what you believe, the Council won't see it like that. Kohaku is the ultimate target in all this, aside from Keitarou himself. You heard them at the Captain's meeting. There's no interest in granting mercy. And if you are aiding and abetting him, it could be seen... in a very negative light."

"I know," Juushirou admitted. "I know, but Shunsui, I've made up my mind. Last night, I didn't sleep at all. I kept thinking over everything — the fight at Seventh, Tenichi's confession, Koku... and I came to a decision. I couldn't do anything for Tenichi. His case is in other people's hands now, and I feel badly about that. In Koku's case, though, maybe there is something I can do. Like Tenichi, Koku's born into a contentious bloodline, but he didn't choose that any more than you or I chose our families. And, if he has no blood on his hands, I won't see him killed. It's not what Seireitei is about. It's not justice."

"And all of these? For his sake?"

"I suppose I thought that, if I could find an adequate way to manage his spirit power, then I'd have a case to present before the Council," Juushirou admitted. "I don't know though. I've dealt with swords before. I know zanpakutou. But power like Koku's... I don't understand. There's nothing in any of these books about the kind of prophetic ability he has, nor on ways to keep it in hand."

"Juu, how attached are you to this boy?" Shunsui asked softly. "To go to those lengths, it suggests more than just wanting to shield him from justice."

"More than?" Juushirou stared at him, and Shunsui pursed his lips.

"Its more like a father might fluster over a child," he said at length. "I tease you about taking in waifs, but this time, I'm going to be serious in my warnings. Until we know everything about Keitarou and his plans, and can see clearly where Kohaku fits into them, don't let yourself be sucked in too deep. Koku is Keitarou's son, he's not yours. You might feel Keitarou abused him, and you might want to protect him — but ultimately, blood might prove thicker than water. No matter how kind you are to him, he has no reason to return that to you. You understand that, don't you? Yesterday, he let his brother — a confirmed murderer — escape your justice. Much as you might want to see him as the innocent victim, I don't think that's for sure yet. So be careful, okay? Thirteenth would cry if anything happened to you... and so would several others."

Juushirou was silent for a moment, then he nodded.

"I can't argue with you, because I know you have a point," he said with a sigh. “I am fond of Koku — protective of Koku — in a way beyond my own understanding. It’s as though, by coming into my division grounds, he’s become a part of my division, and the protection I would extend to any of them also now includes him. I don’t know about trying to be his father, Shunsui — I’m not a father, and so that’s a step beyond my knowledge. I am a Captain, though, and more — Koku told me a lot of things yesterday. Things about the Rukon, about Keitarou and all he and Eiraki have done to protect souls there which we abandoned. Koku hasn’t promised to be my ally, nor has he sworn himself our enemy. I understand his position, because, as a District shinigami in a Clan world, I was just as ignorant when I was his age. Most of all, though, I don’t want this to carry on into the next generation. I don’t want us to condemn a boy based on his bloodline, not based on actual proof. We know his sister was guilty of Souja’s murder — Koku himself acknowledged that — and his brother’s antics yesterday, coupled with his confession to Mitsuki make him a wanted felon, probably beyond anyone’s pardon. But Koku is... not the same. He isn’t setting himself up as our enemy. If we make him our enemy... if we kill him, simply because of who his parents are, then we’re no better than the people who helped create this whole mess in the first place. Keitarou became how he is because of how the situation of his father and his family were managed, and the way he was treated as a child. Koku has had a hard background, but he’s still... I believe he’s still salvageable. I want to save him. Even if it means putting myself on the line... that’s why I am a shinigami. It ought to be why you are too — to protect those who are innocent, regardless of who they are.”

“Juu...” Shunsui faltered, then he offered a rueful smile, holding up his hands.

“Fine. I can see when I’m out-talked, and I won’t argue any more,” he conceded. “I don’t say I like it — or that I don’t have serious doubts about the amount of risk involved. But you’re my friend, and ultimately, I believe in you. If you’re breaking rules and flying in the face of Council decrees, I might as well hop on for the ride. Which means that, for now, we need to put Kohaku on one side and return to the more pressing subject — that of Keitarou, and on finding a way to persuade the powers that be that he’s likely to launch an attack here, rather than the Real World.”

“That’s not going to be easy,” Juushirou sighed, but there was relief in his hazel eyes, and he returned his friend’s rueful smile with one of his own. “Thank you, Shunsui. I hope you don’t live to regret taking my part.”

“Well, you have a track record for insane whims of principled idealism,” Shunsui said resignedly. “I should know by now that coming along for the ride with you will probably only be dangerous, chaotic and not for the fainthearted. But I’m your friend, and even if I think you’re nuts, it’s kind of a done deal.”

He pursed his lips, eying Juushirou for a moment.

“But if he betrays that belief, Juu, I won’t be standing by whilst you get into trouble,” he added. “I know your sword, but I also know your personality. Even if Sougyo is strong enough to cut the boy down, I doubt you’d be able to bring yourself to do it, not when you can talk of him so fondly. I want to believe in him, for your sake — but if it turns out badly, if I’m there behind you, I can do the things you can’t do on your behalf.”

“You don’t like killing any more than I do,” Juushirou was matter-of-fact, and Shunsui nodded.

“True,” he acknowledged, “and I’d rather not blood my blades with Aizen blood a second time. But Juu, even though you don’t need me to protect you in terms of spiritual skill, sometimes, you’re a lot softer than I am. And whilst I don’t want to hurt anyone, if they hurt you, or anyone else I consider close to me, I’m not going to stand down. I said it years ago and I’ll say it again now. I intend to protect the things that matter to me, whether they want or need it or not. That includes you, so you tell that boy of yours to mind himself and not do anything rash or stupid.”

Juushirou was silent for a moment, then he shrugged his shoulders.

“It won’t come to it, I hope,” he said softly, “but in this instance, I’m glad you have my back. You’re right in that I probably couldn’t kill him, not now I know him. And I don’t want you to, either... but none of us really know what we’re facing. I don’t think I’m wrong, but then, a lot of things have happened lately that I’ve been wrong about.”

“Like the Kotetsu boy?” Shunsui arched an eyebrow, and Juushirou nodded, burying his head in his hands.

“If it hadn’t been that Ketsui was the one who arrested him, I might still not believe it,” he admitted. “I’m angry about it, Shunsui. Whatever foolish things Tenichi’s done — and they are foolish, and reckless, and dangerous — I’m sure it’s really Keitarou who’s at the root of it. The lad isn’t himself... the man I spoke to in our cells didn’t sound like the one I recruited and trained. I’m very afraid he’s damaged beyond repair, and he seems to think so too. It upsets me to think that, if I’d noticed sooner, I might’ve been able to do something about it. The signs were there and I didn't see them... I guess my judgement's not all it's cracked up to be sometimes."

"I don't like that face," Shunsui admonished him firmly. "It's not the face of someone who's about to save Soul Society through daring rebellion and dashing heroism. At least try and look the part. With a miserable mug like that one, you're not going to convince anyone of anything. Not even me."

"Shunsui," Despite himself, Juushirou smiled, and Shunsui grimaced in his direction.

"So back on topic, then," he said firmly. "I don't know if the Kotetsu boy is or isn't salvageable, but whilst Keitarou is roaming loose, there's probably no chance of retrieving him. He's with Kai now, so let Kai handle him. He'll get the truth, and he'll be fair. Our job is elsewhere."

"Mm," Juushirou pressed his lips together, considering. "We don't have a lot of time, either."

"Then lets start at the beginning and see what we do know," Shunsui said frankly, sitting back in his seat. "Everything, no matter how minor, that might connect to Keitarou and what he's about."

"One, the deaths in the Spiritless Zone," Juushirou reflected, holding up his index finger. "Deaths we can now almost certainly lay at the door of Aizen Sakaki and Aizen Katsura, acting on their father's instructions."

"Two, the murder of Endou Souja," Shunsui added. "Ordered by Keitarou for reasons unknown."

"No..." Juushirou became thoughtful. "Tenichi seemed to think that Keitarou didn't order Souja to be murdered."

"Juu, that implies the Kotetsu boy was wrapped up in more than just an unfortunate kidnapping," Shunsui looked alarmed, but Juushirou shook his head.

"No, he said someone told him," he replied. "He refused to say who, even when I told him it could put his life in danger if he didn't tell me. He said he'd given his word and it was someone he hadn't betrayed yet, so wasn't going to. There was a flicker of the old Tenichi when he said it, so I didn't push the issue. However..."

He offered a sad smile.

"I thought it might be Koku, so I asked him about it."

“That was a jump,” Shunsui was startled, and Juushirou shook his head.

“I saw Tenichi at Thirteenth late one night, and it bothered me a little at the time. He seemed out of sorts,” he replied. “Koku didn’t want to discuss it — but ultimately, when I told him Tenichi’s life was at stake, he did agree that they’d spoken. They met in Rukongai when Tenichi was kidnapped, as far as I can gather. Koku said he told Tenichi that nothing was his fault and he ought to stay out of it. The more I think of it, though, the more I think Tenichi is right. Souja’s death isn’t quite like Ribari-sama’s all those years back. Ribari-sama’s came out of the blue, and was staged to make the Kuchiki rip holes in each other looking for the culprit. By contrast, Souja’s death happened because he was investigating an already suspicious circumstance. Whether Koku had become involved or not, killing someone of Souja’s standing was bound to get attention.”

“So Souja was in the wrong place at the wrong time?”

“And encountered that girl, Sakaki,” Juushirou agreed. “Tenichi told me that he was attacked by her too, only she was made to hold off. It makes me think that this girl — who we will never now question, thanks to Joumei’s sense of vigilante justice — was simply out for blood and Souja’s was as good as any on offer. Souja knew Sakaki was Eiraki and Keitarou’s child. I suppose he just knew too much and had to be silenced once he did.”

“At the expense of Hirata and his poor wife,” Shunsui groaned. “All right, so Souja’s death wasn’t in the master plan, but it happened anyhow. Rukongai was, though. To incite a rebellion? Or...?”

“No idea,” Juushirou tugged absently at his hair once more, and Shunsui tut-tutted, reaching across to tap his friend on the wrist.

“You carry on like that and you’ll be bald. I’ll have Naoko-chan on my case for de-hairing her Captain,” he reproached lightly.

“Maybe if I pull hard enough, I’ll tweak something useful out of my brain,” Juushirou released his grip sheepishly, glancing at his smudged fingers. “I’m probably dusty all over now, but it’s frustrating when things don’t lock together and I really didn’t get enough sleep last night.”

“Then lets look at another angle,” Shunsui said thoughtfully. “Juu, did you ask that boy about what happened in the Real World? With Nagesu-sama and that hollow-girl?”

“No...” Juushirou admitted. “He became unwell, so I couldn’t speak to him any more. But he couldn't have known about that. He was with us at the..."

"Koku knows a good deal more than what happens in front of his eyes. We've established that already," Shunsui pointed out grimly.

"True," Juushirou conceded. "I see your point. But I'm not sure he would tell me even if I asked. He's happy to talk about a lot of things, but he told me plainly that he won't try and find his father, or tell me where he currently is. I don't think he knows Keitarou's location — yet — but he's not keen to attempt to find out. I suspect he wouldn't want to discuss the Real World. Oh, but..."

His brows knitted together, and Shunsui eyed him keenly.

"But?"

"The other night, he had a bad dream," Juushirou's expression became grave. "Tsunemori was with him, and he went for help... it was one of those dreams, and Koku woke up in tears. He went back to sleep on his own, so nothing more came of it, but Tsunemori thought the kid said the name 'Sakanoue'. I didn't get a chance to ask him about it, not with everything that happened since, but now, talking like this..."

"Sakanoue?" Shunsui's brows knitted together. "Now that is a tantalising lead. The name of a dead Vice Captain of the Eleventh Division... on the lips of someone not even born when the man died."

"Which makes me think it's important," Juushirou agreed. "I didn't know, then, that Koku was Keitarou's son or anything else, but now I do..."

Shunsui pursed his lips.

"Nagesu-sama went to the Real World," he murmured. "He went and he saw and fought a girl who had been Hollowfied in some way, like Ryuu's father was, only... not quite the same. That incident not only inspired Nagesu-sama to believe Keitarou is in the Real World — which we know is probably a ruse — but also triggered discussion about what happened in the Rukon 25 or so years ago, in which Sakanoue was killed. Anabomi said he thought Keitarou was part of that, too. Now you say Koku had a dream about Sakanoue — or something connected to what happened then? Mareiko-chan was so sure her Captain's data was accurate and it proved Keitarou couldn't have been responsible for what happened there, but does this suggest that he was?"

"I'm not sure," Juushirou scratched his head pensively. "Anabomi did raise it, but Sekime seemed quite certain, and Nagesu-sama too, that that data indicated something else. But she did also say that her Captain thought there was someone behind it. Nobody was ever caught, though, and the whole business faded and got overridden by other concerns.”

“Not for Minaichi,” Shunsui reflected. “I never saw him as the emotional type, but to miss a Captain’s meeting on the anniversary of his adjutant’s death, twenty five years after the event suggests he has more of a heart in that stiff body of his than I gave him credit for.”

“Well, if he saw Sakanoue like a son, it makes sense,” Juushirou sighed. “But we didn’t know Sakanoue at all, Shunsui. Even Enishi only knew him by name, from what I’ve managed to gather. Plus, he, along with Sekime’s predecessor and other members of both divisions died in the Rukon at the hands of Hollowed souls and a similar type of soul appeared in the Real World. That ought to be our focus right now, shouldn’t it?”

“There’s something uncanny about that boy of yours,” Shunsui said slowly, “but after the incident with the Kitsune, we clearly can’t rule out what he said as being unimportant. Maybe what happened in Rukongai 25 years ago was or wasn’t deliberately staged, but either way, Keitarou — having hidden in the Rukon himself for a long time — might have learned from it, and applied the scientific principles to projects of his own. That might be the connection we’re looking for. Maybe he came across some of them. Perhaps that’s his reasoning for protecting Plus souls with reiatsu. And if he’s really protecting them, he ought to still be with them. In Rukongai.”

“It would make sense,” Juushirou agreed darkly. “Koku believes that his father is the reason those people are alive, and much as I hate to admit it, I think that’s probably the truth. Which means that he’s double-bluffed us, making it look like he’s gone to the Real World when, all the time, he’s actually still right back where he started. Maybe even in the same village, now that we’ve finished examining it.”

“It’s exactly what I’d expect from him,” Shunsui mused, “safe in the knowledge that the Gotei were preoccupied with his appearance in the Real World. He set that up so beautifully, and if your young’uns have been putting together matching evidence that supports it, I’d bet that’s where he is.”

“I trust Izumi’s science,” Juushirou reflected. “Ketsui seems to have become very involved in this too. Their explanations make sense... and even if he is in Rukongai now, unless we go there and preempt him, he's likely to come here and take advantage of our split forces. His motives in looking after the sickly might appear unselfish, but I don't trust them being that simple. Protecting a large number of weak, impoverished individuals must have some personal benefit for him and his cause. Call me paranoid or judgemental, but I can't see anything Keitarou does as being entirely altruistic. Even if he had their loyalty, though, would starving Rukon strays make a good fighting force?"

"Probably not," Shunsui considered. "Not unless he intended to fodder them. Which, incidentally, I wouldn't put past him either."

"Mm," Juushirou agreed. "Even if Koku doesn't know about it... and given his feelings about killing, I'm sure he doesn't... it seems likely Keitarou might be using members of the spirited population for a new line of experiments. Koku said he was no longer producing reidoku, so it would mean he'd need another idea. This seems to be it. And we need to stop "it", before" it "is right on our doorstep wreaking havoc. Starting with the trip to the Real World... and convincing the Captains in question to take a detour to the Rukon instead."

"Well, it's something to go on at least," Shunsui remarked. "It's still not deep enough, though, and that's bothering me. Maybe it all connects to the stuff that happened 25 years ago. Maybe Keitarou is or isn't involved. Maybe the data Mareiko got from her Captain — whatever his name was again, I forget — was as flawed as the data you got from them this time. Perhaps Keitarou was smashed up by Kinnya-sama, but it doesn't mean his brain was. Who knows what he might've achieved, even in a badly injured state? We can't underestimate a man like that."

"No. Especially since Koku let slip that the reidoku Keitarou took definitely played a part in his healing," Juushirou responded grimly. "We can't just go straight in and hand over Izumi's findings, though. Right now, Ketsui's brother is in custody and there's every chance he'll be charged with more than just attempted murder, since he concealed Keitarou's whereabouts. Whether that will reflect on Ketsui, I don't know, but it might bring to light the fact his father had close connections with Keitarou. I don't doubt Ketsui in this — he's made his feelings very plain, and, unlike Tenichi, he's more prone to sharing than shouldering burdens. But the source for the data is the hime of a condemned tribe and the cousin and son of Urahara exiled traitors. I can't think of a single way to explain that in words that Nagesu-sama will accept... and they won't change their plans without being able to verify the information."

“Well, no. Nagesu-sama saw Keitarou. That trumps figure manipulation and data readouts,” Shunsui sighed. “This is our weakness, though, Juu. We don’t know enough about what really happened before we graduated, and what the politics were at the time... before and after the death of Sakanoue and the others. I remember lots of talk about a ‘Real World Earthquake’ before Mitsuki-chan was seconded to the Rukon, but it seems pretty clear that was some kind of smokescreen told to us students so we wouldn’t think we were graduating into a bloodbath. We know Minaichi wanted Enishi because his Vice Captain was killed. That Vice Captain was Sakanoue, yet at the time, we knew nothing about any of this. Don’t you think that’s strange?”

“Now you mention it, it does seem overly conservative,” Juushirou rubbed his chin. “Though it might simply be as you say — a ruse to prevent us, and especially Mitsuki, from being scared about what we were going into. Whatever happened twenty five years ago, it also ended then. Maybe for that reason, it wasn’t good P.R to publicise mass shinigami slaughter outside of the Gotei — and at the time, you and I were far from being what we are now. On top of that, when we both began our careers, Seireitei wasn’t like it is now. Even keeping contact between you and I was far more sporadic than it is now we’re in the same rough area — I was more concerned with foiling Endou assassination attempts and you were busy crafting Eighth Division within your Clan heartland. Neither of us were attending Council meetings, and Captains got together far less regularly than we do now. By the time we were permanent residents in Inner Seireitei, Sekime was long since installed as the Twelfth Captain, Ikata was Vice Captain of the Eleventh, and a line had been well and truly drawn under what was an unfortunate incident in Seireitei history. In fact, now I think of it, I think Sekime said something along those lines when she told me what she remembered from the Rukon incident. She said that Seireitei didn’t like to talk about it, and she thought it was because Minaichi felt it reflected badly on the Eleventh Division, or some such thing. Probably at the time it was considered done with — and Minaichi probably thought he’d never get a Vice Captain if the fate of the last one was well publicised.”

“Yes, but since, recently, it keeps coming up, it must be relevant in some way,” Shunsui pointed out, “even though — or maybe because — nobody is actively making the connection. If Keitarou’s in Rukongai, and utilising creatures like those who caused the massacres 25 years ago — we need to find out about what happened then, and then try and work out a way of using that to apply it to now.”

“We don’t have time to do a long, detailed investigation into historical reports, and most of the ones we'd want are probably not available," Juushirou pushed the pile of books to one side, getting to his feet. "Nor can we ask Minaichi, and Sekime already told me her recollections — which are incomplete, because she was rendered unconscious from her injury for much of what occurred. She told me she didn't know what had happened with Sakanoue, so that's no use to us."

"Then what do you propose?" Shunsui looked helpless. "From everything that's been discussed, Minaichi and Mareiko-chan are the only ranked survivors from this little jaunt. Michihashi was still a student with us, so it's before his time. Ikata might've been there, but I would've thought getting useful information from him would require smashing his head against a stone and picking it out manually from the resultant bloody mess. If we're not going to dig around in here for the evidence, where are we going to dig?"

"Nagesu-sama," Juushirou said simply, and Shunsui blinked at him, bewildered.

"Nagesu-sama?"

"He entrusted me with data, via Sekime," Juushirou nodded. "He'll expect me to speak to him, even if I have to be careful about what to say now that the Kitsune are both within our midst. I'll ask him about souls with reiryoku in the Rukon region, and about what happened 25 years ago. He was Clan Leader then, and the Urahara must've been involved in the cleanup, on account of losing one of their own, and their scientific background. I'll ask him, and while doing so, see if I can't spark his own curiosity about the whole business. If I can convince him that he's thought of it himself, then maybe we won't need to worry about the evidence we have. Maybe it'll resolve itself.."

"You think that it's a good idea, being so direct?" Shunsui was doubtful, and Juushirou grinned.

"They expect ignorantly idealistic approaches like that from me," he said matter-of-factly. "Nagesu-sama will assume I'm just being the District Captain again, not understanding full protocol, and he'll probably indulge me in the questions I ask. It helps, sometimes, to have a fairly positive and blemish free record, and to be someone the Clans don't consider particularly politically threatening."

"Sneaky," Shunsui looked approving, and Juushirou nodded.

"Well, we don't have a lot of time," he reflected. "I can't ask Koku about Sakanoue, because he's still sleeping, and I don't want him upset again if it can be helped. Plus, I don't want to rely on his evidence too heavily until we know more about everything. But this is important and it can't wait. If we're going to convince Nagesu-sama to call off the trip to the Real World... anything is worth a try."

Hirata gazed down at the unconscious form of his fifth seated officer, frustrating and weariness coursing through his body. It was a little after dawn, the warm rays of the summer sun beginning to spread a glow across the roofs and passages of Inner Seireitei.

The previous day had been one of chaos and confusion, but, ultimately, Hirata had felt an overwhelming sense of relief when Kikyue and her companions had returned to the Seventh. At first sight, Hirata had thought Ohara was dead but, as Hajime had laid him grimly but carefully down on the low slung pallet of the chamber, he had realised that the man was still breathing. It had already been a distressing day, with the early summons and Ai's hysteria only served to remind him anew of Souja's death. The Thirteenth Division recruit's message had been an additional blow, and he had so far concealed it from the remainder of his division in the flurry over Ohara's immediate treatment needs, but early that morning official confirmation had come and he could no longer pretend that nothing further was amiss. Now, as he stood in the middle of his sleeping officer's chamber, he sorely wished for a target on which he could firmly and guiltlessly unleash the Wind Hawk. Tsumi no Fuuhi's anger was boiling inside of him, but he knew that he dared not let it free. Seventh Division had been shredded, from inside and from out, and there was only him, as Captain, to ensure it held together.

Or no, not quite just him.

He turned to glance at his two other companions, taking in their mixed expressions with a frown. Nakata had been dispatched to Fourth to get his arm seen to and stitched, in good spirits despite the blood still dribbling through the makeshift bandage, and Hirata had granted him the day to rest and recuperate as a reward for his bravery in protecting Kikyue's life. He would have to speak to Nakata later on the subject of Tenichi — one he was sure the older officer would take to heart given their close working relationship. Retsu had sent the man back to barracks with a note to the Captain about the potential severity of his injury and the worn out state of his body following the assault on Seventh, so for the time being, Hirata had chosen to let him rest in ignorance of his friend's fate. Consequently it was only Kikyue and Hajime of his higher seated officers who remained at his side. Looking at them, Hirata felt his heart twitch a second time.

Vice Captain, murdered. Fifth seat, in a state of deep unconsciousness.

Seventh seat with a wounded sword arm that'll take some time to heal. Eighth seat currently under arrest after attacking another division's recruit. Sixth and Ninth, on duty at the main estate since Souja's murder, acting as spiritual protection for my wife and youngest child. What Juushirou said about Masaoka is reassuring, but barely a drop in the ocean in contrast to our current position.

"Seventh Division is in a weak position, Taichou, isn't it?" It was Hajime who voiced the Captain's own thoughts, and Hirata let out a heavy sigh.

"There's no pretending otherwise," he said wearily. "I'm sorry I left you yesterday, both of you. It was a bad choice and it won't happen again. I've already dispatched a messenger to the main estate to that effect. The situation has become more serious, now that both Ohara and Tenichi are out of commission."

"Kotetsu too?" Hajime started, staring at the Captain in dismay, and Kikyue frowned.

"Where is Tenichi, anyway?" she wondered. "I sent him to the Thirteenth, and that was the last any of us saw of him. Ohara was going to discipline him for it..."

Her gaze strayed to the unconscious officer, and her lips thinned.

"Now you say he's 'out of commission'. Did something happen, while we were away?"

"I have received a formal notice this morning from the Onmitsukidou, co-signed by the Thirteenth Division's Captain and Vice Captain, advising me of the arrest of our Eighth Seated Officer with immediate effect," Hirata extracted a rolled up scroll from the folds of his hakamashita, holding it out to his daughter, who took it, eyes big with disbelief.

"Arrested? Somewhere other than here? For what, exactly? Tousama, what did he do?"

"Apparently he tried to end the life of Thirteenth Division's newest recruit, and was apprehended on site," Hirata said frankly. "The truth and the circumstances of it, I couldn't tell you. I've sent a message to Second telling them that Seventh will cooperate with their investigation entirely from this point on. I don't know what's going through Tenichi's head, but it's clear that something is... and maybe, has been for some time."

"The Onmitsukidou, huh," Hajime's eyes became slits. "Kai-dono was after Kotetsu before, sir. You remember, I'm sure — broke the man down into tears, and so on. If this is connected to that...”

“From the little I know, it was the Thirteenth, not the Onmitsukidou, who placed Tenichi under arrest, and who are the witnesses in this case — including Tenichi’s brother,” Hirata shrugged his shoulders. “I know what you’re thinking, but there’s nothing I can do. More, I’m too tired to even think about it at the present time. There are too many questions, and not enough answers. I will wait for the official conclusions, and, if there is one, a formal judgement. Until that time we can consider our Eighth Seat suspended pending further enquiries.”

“What will you do, then?” Kikyue handed the notice to Hajime, eying her father with a quizzical expression. “If Tenichi is in custody, Nakata injured and Ohara is... is... like this... I can’t run any patrols. I don’t have any senior officers, and Onii... I mean, Hajime-dono’s patrols are already depleted, with ranked officers away at the main house. All we have are the recruits and the lower seats.”

“I have Masaoka,” Hajime ruminated, “but you’re right, hime. It’s not enough. Without Ohara and Kotetsu... we have a problem.”

“Patrols are the last of my concerns right now,” Hirata admitted. “Kikyue, you were the one who cast the Geki over Ohara, correct? I know that he attacked you, and that you believed him under the control of some outside force — did he say anything before you laid him out?”

“No,” Kikyue’s eyes softened. “He bit his lips shut to prevent himself releasing his sword. I’ve never seen him as anything but an arrogant idiot before, Otousama, but yesterday I thought I saw him as an Endou for the first time. He wasn’t afraid of dying, just afraid of spilling my blood.”

“There’s a reason he’s Seventh’s Fifth seat, Kikyue,” Hirata pointed out acidly. “I don’t rank officers based on their family positions, or how much money or influence a kinsman provides. I would expect no less of him — of him or any of my officers, when faced with the threat of harming a superior officer.”

He rubbed his temples.

“It seems as though Keitarou is not content with killing my eldest child and assaulting my division, he also has the intention of killing my daughter, and isn’t too choosy about his weaponry,” he said blackly. “Ohara was clearly struck by Keitarou’s manipulative sword, though how and when I wouldn’t like to guess.”

“We didn’t notice anything amiss, and I’m not sure even he did, not at first,” Kikyue bit her lip. “Hajime-dono may have seen more... but the first I knew of it was when he came down after me. Hajime-dono pushed me out of the way, and Nakata took his blade — twice, I think — but it all happened so suddenly. Ohara looked terrified, and we were all thrown off balance.”

“I chased down the intruder who infiltrated our division,” Hajime added. “Kikyue-hime sent me after him, so I went. I’m sorry if you think my actions lax in any way, Taichou, but an order was an order, and I thought...”

“Kikyue has proven she can protect herself,” Hirata dismissed it with a flick of his hand, “and as you said, it was an order. Did you manage to kill him?”

“I certainly hit him,” Hajime’s eyes narrowed thoughtfully. “Normally, I wouldn’t have expected anyone to survive my shikai at such close range, and he really didn’t see me coming till it was too late to dodge. But knowing that Keitarou was in the vicinity... may have altered that situation. I didn’t have a chance to decapitate him as I would have liked, so I’m afraid I can’t be certain, sir.”

“I called him back, on account of Ohara’s condition,” Kikyue added. “I didn’t want any other members of the Seventh to die, Father. I’m sick of our division being treated like Keitarou’s playground, and even more now I know that Tenichi’s locked up. For all we know, he’s like Ohara, too — he was abducted by Keitarou, wasn’t he? Maybe he’s been possessed, too, to make our situation more chaotic. It’s like a vendetta against the Endou, backed up by Eiraki-basama and her bastard children, and I’m sick of it.”

“What you say about Kotetsu is true,” Hajime acknowledged. “That possibility must exist.”

“Keitarou’s vendettas never stop with one person, or one Clan, or one line of attack,” Hirata said grimly. “In terms of Ohara’s life, Kikyue, I understand your feelings, but it may have been a greater mercy for you to have struck him dead, rather than using Kaisoushu to render him unconscious. I don’t know any way of breaking the spell Keitarou cast. If it is indeed his sword at work here, then there is no way we can release the Bakudou — it would be much too dangerous.”

“I know,” Kikyue’s eyes darkened. “I know, Otousama, but I’m fed up with it. I can’t even explain, but out there in the forest, I was so determined. Keitarou isn’t taking any more members of Seventh Division. He just isn’t! Not Ohara, not me, not Nakata, not even Tenichi, if that was his doing too — and I'm sure in some way or another it must be. Oniisama's death is the last. For his sake as well as for the Division's, I'll find a way to break Keitarou's sword technique. There must be a way, other than death. I'm not going to let Keitarou make all of us his puppets, acting in the way he wants us to. I'm sorry, Otousama, but I'm just not."

"Hime," Hajime cast her a pensive look, then he nodded his head. "Taichou, I agree with Kikyue-hime," he said frankly. "Enough is enough and this is Endou pride on the line. Ohara is a good officer. Yes, he can throw his weight about, but his skills are beyond doubt and he's always worked very diligently in Kikyue-hime's shadow. Kotetsu too — whatever the truth behind his case, I can't believe him to be the kind of officer who would randomly go on a killing spree in another division. This all has the hand of that man behind it, and we still have Fukutaichou's death to firmly avenge. There's no better way to do that as Endou than to track down and kill the man himself."

Hirata remained silent for a while, digesting this. Then he shook his head.

"Seventh Division are not going to the Real World," he said simply. "Those decisions are made, and I have no intention of trying to change them. If Keitarou is there, it will be the jobs of other squads to track him down."

"But Taichou!" Kikyue

ue's eyes opened wide in dismay, and Hirata offered her a grim smile.

"More than anyone in this Gotei, I want to see Keitarou dead," he said darkly. "I remember him, lying there helpless and broken all those years ago and every single day since your brother died I wish that I had had the strength of mind to ignore your aunt's presence and just blast the both of them through with Tsumi no Fuuhi's blade. There's no concealing how much I want him dead... or how dearly I would like Tsumi no Fuuhi to finally be able to complete what it could not do then. But it is not just about me, not any more."

He rested his hands on Kikyue's shoulders.

"Your mother is already in great distress thanks to the loss of your brother," he continued. "I won't let her lose you too, even if you feel I'm acting irresponsibly or against the interests of the Clan. If Keitarou was out there in the forest, it's not impossible that he aimed his sword at you, and got Ohara by mistake. Moreover, I have encountered the effects of this weapon before. It's been recorded in prior accounts that killing Keitarou wouldn't necessarily release the control he has over a person's soul. If that person has been instructed to kill, then that instruction remains. In Ohara's case, killing Keitarou can do no good."

"Then what do we do?" Kikyue demanded, frustration in her eyes. "I promised Ojisama that I would be of use to you, Father, and support you as much as I could. I'm a hime, and I'm not going to be your heir. I'm not going to make some advantageous, fancy marriage, either... that's not the kind of person I am. I've fought all my life to be a shinigami like you and Souja-nii — and now, more than ever, that's what I believe in. Ohara is my subordinate, my patrol second. I want to save his life. If killing Keitarou won't do it, what will?"

"At the moment, I don't know." Hirata admitted.

"I heard a story that Keitarou used his sword, once, to manipulate Ukitake-taichou," Hajime recalled, and Hirata nodded.

"He did," he agreed.

"Then how did Juushirou-dono survive, if that's the case? Did Keitarou withdraw his sword of his own free will?" Kikyue demanded. "Do we have to find this man and make him pull back his blade?"

"Juushirou's heart was stopped. He effectively died," Hirata shook his head. "At the time, he was fortunate that a young healer was at his side, and able to repair the damage quickly enough that his life was not lost. However, it's come to my attention that Keitarou's spirit power is not the same as it was back then. I don't know that, even if the same technique was attempted, it would have any success. Keitarou's victims seem far more able to think and act for themselves — we wouldn't know until it was too late if such a tactic had failed. And, ultimately, Ohara's life might still be lost."

He pursed his lips.

"That reminds me. Kikyue, Juushirou said you sent to Thirteenth for his help on account of Joumei's presence. That surprised me."

"Joumei?" Hajime's expression became one of confusion, and Kikyue reddened, nodding her head.

"Was I wrong, sir?" she asked softly. "I thought... with you not there..."

"No, your decision was sound," Hirata shook his head. "I'm more concerned with how you came to know anything about that man and his family at all."

"Oniisama mentioned him, before he died," Kikyue pointed out. "I asked you then, but you... you didn't... explain anything to me. Still, I... I remembered."

She pursed her lips.

"Ohara confronted him, in the front courtyard. When I heard him give his name as Joumei, I remembered what Oniisama said. I knew this was the same person. He was a friend of Oniisama's, wasn't he? He told me he was, and I... I believed him."

Hirata was silent for a moment, then he sighed, rubbing his brow as though by doing so he could smooth out the lines of tension that had become a permanent fixture there over the past few weeks. Slowly he nodded.

"Yes," he said at length. "A friend he knew from childhood. I'm sorry, Kikyue-chan. I didn't tell you, because it wasn't something that was shared between anyone but the Clan leader and his heir... but your presence of mind probably saved lives. Your putting together fragments of evidence and believing in Souja's last words so strongly... is part of the reason Seventh was able to withstand the invader's hostile attack."

"Sir, who is Joumei?" Hajime asked quietly. "If it's beyond my rank to know, then I apologise for the insolence, but... there was a young lad with silver hair in the yard when Nakata and I joined the fray, and though I didn't get a chance to approach him... Kikyue-hime seemed to be protecting him in some way."

Hirata moved to Ohara's bedside, watching the slow, stifled rise and fall of the man's chest.

"I will tell you. Both of you," he said at length, "I need you to realise, however, that my doing so may well put his life — and the lives of others — in your hands. It may even create a political incident, especially with so much uncertainty. I trust not a war... at least, not with Keitarou still very much on the loose — but I need your word that you won't speak of this outside this room — to each other, to me, or to anyone else."

"Yes, sir," Kikyue was quick to respond, and Hajime bowed his head in acceptance of the instruction. Hirata sighed.

"Joumei and his people are effective outlaws of Urahara descent, from a people known as the 'Kitsune'," he said softly, noting the mix of expressions that crossed his companion's faces. "They themselves have committed no crime, but their forefathers sinned against the Urahara's main house during the infamous reidoku incident and they were punished accordingly. Neither Council nor Clan offered them sanctuary. As many did, they fled to Seventh and went into hiding — but they were hated even by exiles such as Keitarou, and remain in danger of their lives even generations on. Some of them lived till now in an old Sekkiseki mine, but in the past few weeks this was attacked by Keitarou and its remaining residents killed. Joumei was the only survivor of the raid — and his sister is currently in the protection of Juushirou at Thirteenth.”

“Killed? By Keitarou?” Hajime looked startled. “But you said the reidoku incident, sir, and surely that means they should be on the same side.”

“It’s not so simple as that,” Hirata replied. “I don’t know all the particulars, but it seems Joumei’s ancestors tried to protect themselves by selling Keitsune-dono out. Their actions were universally condemned and their status became untenable. Their flight occurred before Keitsune-dono was executed — and, judging by Keitarou’s actions, he still holds a grudge more than a century on. Perhaps more of one than he holds against the main line of the Urahara Clan.”

“If Keitarou hates him, I’m prepared to think of Joumei as an ally,” Kikyue said darkly. “More, though, Oniisama thought of him that way, so I will too. Our family’s steeped in past sin as well. Present too, thanks to Eiraki-basama. Whatever went on with the Urahara, it means nothing to me. If Joumei was Niisama’s friend and ally, and is yours, Tousama, he’s mine and I’m glad I acted to protect him. Besides, it’s his ancestors who did those things. Not him. Our ancestors did bad things too — I’ve heard Grandfather talk of Great Grandfather and Seimaru-dono and how they almost bankrupted our District by slaughtering the populace. We’re really no different, so we ought to work together.”

“Father thought the same,” Hirata agreed with a sigh. “He stumbled upon them during investigations into the Sekkiseki mines and rebuilding the stone trade in District Seven, not long after he became Head of the Clan. He and their then leader, Joumei’s father, reached an accord whereby they would act as eyes and ears for the Endou, and he would ensure their continued protection. That promise was passed on to me when I was sworn in as leader, and it was shared with Souja, too, as my prospective heir. Juushirou knows of it from his time living in Seventh — he too knew Joumei’s father, who was a very intelligent man and not uninclined to forge new alliances, providing they could be trusted. It seems that, before Father encountered them, they had received protection from an ally of Keitarou’s — so he was open to the idea that not everyone, even of Urahara blood, was necessarily his enemy.”

“One of Keitarou’s own turned traitor against him, huh?” Hajime’s features twitched into a malicious smile. “There’s a certain dark pleasure in that idea, sir.”

“Perhaps,” Hirata acknowledged. “Though I imagine not even Keitarou knew of it. The man died at the hands of my Grandfather — Kikyue’s Great Grandfather, Shouichi-dono, and he died protecting Keitarou’s life. I don’t know his reasons for shielding the Kitsune — Joumei’s father only told me that he had decided to, because he felt the ties of kin and thought, deep down, they were the same. Though this individual, Daisuke I think his name was, had deep grudges against the Urahara and the Endou for the purge of his people, it seems he didn’t see sins transcending generations where the Kitsune were concerned. Perhaps there was a tighter blood bond between that line of the family and the Kitsune’s northern descent. I don’t understand the intricacies of Urahara logic. But the man who protected them is also the father of Kotetsu Tenichi and Ketsui. For that reason, even knowing the history of the boys and the way in which their father died, I chose to take Tenichi into Seventh and make him a part of our Division.”

He looked pained.

“Maybe I was wrong,” he murmured. “The recruit Tenichi attacked was Joumei’s sister, Izumi. Maybe Tenichi’s politics are different from his father’s, or maybe Keitarou’s meddling made the whole thing unclear. Perhaps he knows nothing of his father’s actions... I can’t be sure. The fact remains, though, that everything is tied in together. That’s why I need both of you to understand the delicacy of the Kitsune’s situation... and of our own as a result.”

“War with the Urahara now would not be a good move,” Hajime said blackly, and Hirata shook his head.

“I believe Nagesu-sama a reasonable man,” he agreed wearily, “but you never know what might trigger violence, as we’ve seen recent proof.”

“I brought danger into your division, Hirata-sama, for which I am deeply sorry.”

Before either Hajime or Kikyue could comment, a fresh voice joined the conversation, and Hirata turned, seeing the Kitsune leader standing outside the window, a look of solemnity on his young features. He was dressed in fresh, clean robes, the wounds he had suffered hidden from view, and despite the deference in his stance and tone, Hirata recognised something of the family's noble blood in his appearance. At the sudden attention, he bowed his head low, as if to emphasise his apology, and Kikyue hurried forward, putting herself between the newcomer and the still, silent form of Ohara.

"If you're still poisoned, Joumei, you can't come in here," she said warily, and Joumei started, glancing at her in surprise. Then, as if understanding her meaning, he offered her a faint, rueful smile. He shook his head.

"Keitarou's poison was nullified in the aftermath of yesterday's events," he said softly. "I am once more my own man, Kikyue-hime — and, as ever, the humble servant of the Endou Clan."

"Broken?" Hirata stared at the young man in disbelief. "By what method? How can you be sure? Such a thing surely isn't possible, not by anyone in Seireitei!"

"I didn't think so, but I thought wrong," Joumei nimbly mounted the windowsill, dropping into the room with barely a sound, though Hirata saw him wince and knew that putting pressure on his injured upper body was still painful. "Hirata-sama, please forgive me. I have come to report to you my actions, and accept the consequences of them, whatever they may be. I realise that the damage done to Seventh yesterday was entirely of my doing, and as such, will not resist if you choose to relieve me of my life as punishment."

"Stand up straight, Joumei, and look at me," Hirata commanded, and the Kitsune did so, his light blue eyes glittering with silver resolve.

"Juushirou told me that you went and killed the girl who took my son's life. Correct?"

"Yes, sir," Joumei spoke softly, bowing his head once more. "As a result, I brought danger to the members of the Seventh in the worst possible way. Yesterday, I confessed my crime to the Captain of the Thirteenth and his comrade from the Secret Operatives, expecting to be taken into custody, but it appears that a twist in Council Law justifies my recklessness in a way I had not foreseen. I sought to avenge Souja-dono's death, but I had not considered all the ramifications of my act."

His gaze flitted to Ohara, his expression clouding.

"Your man is probably hurt because of me," he added sadly. "I must take responsibility for what I have done, and accept whatever you decide my fate to be."

“Ohara was attacked by Keitarou,” Kikyue hurried forward before her father could speak, grasping Joumei by the arm and giving it a little tug. “From how Father spoke, the poison that afflicted you was the same as that Keitarou used on him. The power to control... to make him a puppet. Am I right? Is that what you meant, when you told me you were poisoned and may become violent?”

“Yes, hime,” Joumei was startled, gently detaching his bandaged hand from her hold.

“But this is now cured?”

“Yes, but...”

“Then tell me how. How did you cure it?” Kikyue demanded. “If there is a way to release such a spell, Joumei, tell us now, and quickly.”

Joumei’s gaze rested on Ohara once more, and slowly he shook his head.

“I don’t truly understand how the spell cast over me was broken,” he said at length, a note of regret in his tones. “I simply know that it was. I’m sorry, hime. I don’t know how to answer your question.”

“Maybe Keitarou released it himself,” Hajime suggested gruffly. “We know he was in the area. Maybe he released you in order to snare Ohara more effectively.”

He pursed his lips, casting Hirata a glance.

“Taichou, what are your orders?” he asked softly. “How will Seventh operate from hereon in, with our ranks in the disarray we currently find them?”

“In the way that the Endou should,” Hirata said simply. “We are fighters, and we will simply have to do our best to fight.”

He turned to the Kitsune.

“Joumei, you said you came here to accept my judgement, did you not?”

“Yes, sir,” a flicker of consternation entered the young man’s eyes, gone almost immediately but not before Hirata had noticed. He nodded his head.

“Then your orders are as follows,” he replied frankly. “You say you put Seventh Division in danger? Then in return, you shall work from now on to protect it. In the absence of ranked officers, I will expect you to do your part if the enemy once more attacks our boundaries.”

Joumei was startled, then he smiled, relief glittering in his silvery eyes.

“Yes, sir,” he murmured. “I am at your service and the service of the Seventh Division. I am not an Endou, but I have reason enough to hate the enemy, and more reason still to show you and your family my loyalty. Izumi and I have already decided that we have nobody else to trust in now but shinigami. I do not carry a sword, but I have reiryoku and, despite where I grew up, I am able to use it. Since Keitarou’s control is broken, I return my loyalty once more to you and pledge my life to your cause. Please, take me and deploy me in whatever way you see fit.”

Author’s Note:

I think I owe Hirata cookies. Aside from being so utterly obnoxious to his division throughout this story, not to mention his family, I also realised I’d failed to give him a Sixth or Ninth seated officer. Since I didn’t want to add new characters, they’re away doing duty at the main house, protecting the family there from the threat of Hollows. Sorry, Hirata. Cookies. ;)

55. Rukon Skeletons

Chapter Fifty Four: Rukon Skeletons

“People with spirit power in Rukongai?”

Nagesu paused in his perusal of the cluttered shelf of books, casting his visitor a startled glance at the suddenness of the question. “Why this all of a sudden, Ukitake? Don’t you think we’re all busy enough, with preparations to go to the Real World? Why do you suddenly want to search Rukongai for people in an area we already know is abandoned... I don’t understand?”

“Abandoned now, yes, but Shunsui’s pretty sure that it hasn’t always been, and I agree with him,” Juushirou bowed his head, an apologetic look in his hazel eyes. “I’m sorry to barge in on you like this, Nagesu-sama, but when I thought about it, you were the only person I could come to. You’re currently Head of the Council, and I thought that, given your own trip to the Rukon, you might...”

He faltered, searching for the right words, and Nagesu frowned, adjusting his spectacles absently on his nose.

“I might agree with you and sanction an investigation?” he asked softly. “I thought your priority was Keitarou. Is that not the case?”

“It is,” Juushirou nodded his head. “I believe he must be stopped — as much as you or anyone else in the Gotei. I’m being forward and cheeky and I know I am, overstepping the bounds of my rank and I’m sorry. But there isn’t a lot of time, and... I really think we ought to be... to be looking for Keitarou in Rukongai.”

“I see,” Nagesu leaned his slender frame against the thick wall of books, folding his arms thoughtfully across his chest with a sigh. “The discussion at the Captain’s meeting has stuck with you, has it? Anabomi’s unguarded comments about Keitarou’s guilt in an incident before you were even a Captain? I realise your acquaintance with Keitarou is a deep one, and a personal one on some levels, so your determination is logical, but you have to know that there were no living souls in the area Shunsui-dono and I patrolled. Your friend will have told you that himself, I trust — or if not him, the members of your Division who travelled there with us?”

“I’ve spoken to all of them, sir,” Juushirou said earnestly. “They all agreed that there were no residents... now. But my officers searched the village, and, with all respect, they felt that it had been lived in until quite recently.”

“Your evidence for this?” Nagesu arched an eyebrow, and Juushirou looked rueful.

“Kira almost put his foot in a cooking pot,” he admitted, “and Atsudane reported to me that, aside from this, there were scraps of food and bits and pieces that suggested whoever had been there had cleared the premises in a hurry.”

“You don’t think that this was Keitarou, and any who surround him? His son, perhaps, or daughter?”

“It’s possible,” Juushirou agreed slowly, and Nagesu smiled.

“Keitarou’s base is not in the Rukon. It’s in the Real World,” he said gently. “Whatever games he’s played between locations, Ukitake, the Onmitsukidou and our intrusion into Rukongai will have told my cousin that it’s not safe to be lurking anywhere so close to shinigami headquarters. We are closing in on him, and we will not let him get away this time. As much as it pains me to be arresting a man of my own family... that is what I will do, and that is why we are going to the Real World.”

“And if he isn’t there?” Juushirou hazarded. Nagesu frowned, brows knitting together in consternation.

“This is unlike you,” he observed. “I’ve known you to push ideas and issues before, but there’s something different about you today, Ukitake. You don’t usually come before me in private to discuss such things — if you had concerns, why not raise them at the Captain’s meeting so we could all discuss them? Even if I did agree with you — which at present I am not sure I do — I cannot overturn a voted decision without calling another meeting. It was decided by the Gotei and I believe it is sound.”

Juushirou’s lips thinned, and for a moment he didn’t speak. Then, slowly, he shook his head.

“I’m sorry, Nagesu-sama, but I would like to know what happened in the Rukon, twenty five years ago,” he said quietly. Nagesu’s eyes widened in surprise.

“In the... you mean, Shougo-dono and Sakanoue-kun? Then you really do think Keitarou was...”

“I don’t,” Juushirou interrupted, trying to pretend he hadn’t seen how increasingly incredulous his companion was becoming. “I know a little already about the deaths of Shougo-dono and Sakanoue — Sekime-taichou already told me about it, when she came to deliver something to Thirteenth. I don't want to dig up bad memories, and I realise that you weren't there yourself, but I didn't like to ask Sekime-taichou to rehash those recollections over again."

"No, indeed," Nagesu looked troubled. "I did examine both bodies from a scientific standpoint on their return. They both sustained deep wounds of a similar nature to some of the other corpses retrieved from the scene."

"Wounds inflicted by the Hollow creatures?" Juushirou asked, and Nagesu shrugged.

"Some of them appeared to be inflicted by swords," he admitted, and Juushirou's eyes widened in surprise at this unexpected tidbit.

"Swords? But..."

"I see what you're thinking," Nagesu smiled what could only be described as an indulgent smile, but Juushirou felt he was covering the troubled emotions of a memory best left buried. "We had witness testimony from several of the surviving lesser officers — and, in fact, Mareiko's own account, if I recall correctly — that some of the souls were not completely turned. We also recovered several such implements when clearing the scene, many of which were bloody. Our conclusion was that some of these mutations possessed dead blades before they came into contact with whatever damaged them — presumably relics from their real lives. There was a lot of meshed reiatsu at the scene, so it was impossible to draw a particular spiritual imprint from any of the bodies we brought back. Dead blades possess no discerning aura, so our findings made sense. The wounds and the physical evidence were all consistent with the witness statements. It was a tragic happening, but the investigation was straightforward and quickly closed."

"Dead blades again," Juushirou bit his lip, and Nagesu eyed him keenly.

"You're trying to make a connection with the deaths of Souja-dono and the people in the Spiritless Zone?" he asked softly. "Ukitake, the girl who slew Seventh's Vice Captain was a teenage girl. She could not have been present twenty five years ago. I grant that she showed particular hostility and ruthlessness, but we have no evidence of any spiritual ability on her part, let alone Hollow characteristics. You're reaching to pull threads together that just can't be tied in a knot. I believe Shougo-dono's hypothesis is sound. The events twenty-five years ago occurred through unexplained reasons, but there is no evidence to prove it was done on purpose and is far more likely Keitarou took the science exhibited then and deployed it in the creating of the poor soul I fought in the Real World.”

“Shunsui and I had reached a similar conclusion in that respect, sir,” Juushirou admitted. “He’s an opportunist, and it’s entirely his style.”

“Well, then,” Nagesu tilted his head on one side. “If you feel that way, why the interest in the past?”

“I realised that I don’t know enough about it,” Juushirou said honestly. “I think it’s important. Very important. What happened then... and not only that, in this whole business now. Even if it’s true that Shougo-dono and Sakanoue died in those circumstances, something must’ve occurred afterwards to bring that knowledge into Keitarou’s hands. It bothers me a lot that we’re missing something obvious, somewhere, so I thought, if I asked you... you’d be able to fill me in on the missing gaps. Eleventh and Twelfth didn’t run patrols to Rukongai after the incident, correct? They withdrew... yes?”

“Twelfth did,” Nagesu rubbed his chin pensively. “I don’t really understand the importance of asking all of this, since it was so long ago and if you believe their deaths had no link to Keitarou, a random stab in the dark at a time when we’re all so busy with other things. Keitarou picks up information — you said it yourself. Focusing on the source of that information is, in this case, less relevant than finding the current offender. But you’re not usually an impertinent Captain, nor given to flights of idiocy, so I’ll try and answer. Doubtless you’ll come to your own conclusions in time, and the sooner you do that, the better for all. I’d like to know that Seireitei will run smoothly in the absence of several squads.”

“I’d like that too,” Juushirou murmured, more than half under his breath, then, “Twelfth did? Eleventh didn’t?”

“To be honest, for a year or two after the incident, nobody really did anything at all,” Nagesu admitted. “Not from our side, anyway. Mareiko was very much in shock — she was always very fond of Shougo-dono, and they worked closely together on many things. I believe Eleventh went there once or twice. Well, Minaichi is that kind of officer — not one to let feelings interfere with duty, though I doubt he took much pleasure. Other Divisions did their bit too. Fourth established a permanent base there, with a small collection of officers, in order to help the residents recover from the shock of such violent warfare. First did a good deal to help, too, and Third made a few sorties — now I think on it, I believe Shiketsu might have led a patrol or two there. Anabomi and some of Ninth went there once during the early stages of the clean up operation, I think, though you'd have to check that with him. He and Shougo-dono were friends, and trained together often, so he felt it was important he did his bit in the aftermath and his help was gratefully received. Whatever horrors my kinsman faced, though, none of these latter patrols ever encountered them. There were a few stragglers who could be called hostile, but nothing concerted, and it died out. Then the Spiritless Zone was conceived, and all our effort went into working on that. Eleventh and Twelfth were no longer called on to operate in Rukongai. As you know, everything was handed over in entirety to the Fourth to run, once the establishment was complete. Third, Ninth and any other divisions who had been involved in the initial investigations weren't so actively involved in the Rukon planning for that."

"The Spiritless Zone," Juushirou chewed thoughtfully on his lip. "So all the souls in Rukongai were moved to this area, where the Fourth intended to work?"

"They were the best locations, and far from the killing grounds, so yes, that was the plan," Nagesu agreed. "After the incident with Shougo-dono, we were particularly concerned about spiritual pollution, which is why we set up the barriers and regulations in the way we did. Well, your friend Edogawa can probably tell you more from the healers' side. Have you asked her about all of these things?"

"I don't really want to ask Mitsuki too much about Rukongai," Juushirou admitted, and Nagesu's expression became clouded.

"No, I suppose not," he acknowledged. "I'm sorry. That must have seemed insensitive — she suffered a good deal there and, like Mareiko, would probably rather forget."

"Sekime-taichou is lucky," Juushirou observed. "Her Clan Leader is understanding and supports her despite her own hesitations."

"Ah, well, Mareiko may not be so much of a fighter now," Nagesu looked rueful, 'but she is still a very smart woman. Smarter than me, I'm sure. You might not see it, not in every day life,' as Juushirou looked quizzical, "but it's often said that those who are scattered over the ordinary are shrewd when it comes to the extraordinary. And, well, we both lost Shougo-dono. She has filled his scientific shoes more than adequately — dare I say, even overreached him on occasion — but we both miss him and regret that we couldn't prevent what happened."

“Of course,” Juushirou nodded gravely. “I didn’t ever meet Shougo-dono, but I imagine the death of a Captain would’ve come as a great shock... for him to have been a kinsman and close long-term colleague, even worse.”

“Well, we are soldiers, and war claims the best and the least of us,” Nagesu said wearily, “but this is moving some distance from your original question. You were talking about people in Rukongai — and have darted all around the corners while making your point.”

“I’m sorry,” Juushirou looked guilty. “When you’re so busy too — but I really think it’s important, what happened in Rukongai. If not when the massacre happened, then in the time after Shougo-dono was ’s a clue somewhere and we keep missing it.”

“I don’t really understand why you feel so certain.”

“Because I’m sure that not all souls left in Rukongai were pure Pluses,” Juushirou said earnestly. “Because of what happened, it makes sense that Seireitei would worry about polluted spirits. The Spiritless Zone was set up to protect against that — but what about the souls left who had spirit power and who weren’t mutated? What about them... what happened to them?”

“Souls left with spirit power?” Nagesu blinked. “Ukitake, didn’t I make it clear? There were none. All the souls living in Rukongai were transferred to the Spiritless Zone project. Every one of them was screened, and none of them had reiryoku.”

“What?” Juushirou stared, disbelief in his eyes, and Nagesu frowned, resting a hand on Juushirou’s shoulder.

“If it makes you happy, I can give you the official report,” he said softly. “I have a copy of it, somewhere here, and you’re welcome to read it. It’s not very interesting, but if it will put your mind at rest...”

“If you don’t mind,” Juushirou nodded his head almost automatically, and Nagesu moved carefully between the piles of books and old papers littering his office floor, rummaging for a moment in the recesses of one of the further-most alcoves before producing a thick document with a stitched spine and cloth cover. He brushed the dust from it, coughing as a cloud rose up into the air, then offered Juushirou a rueful smile, holding it out.

“Here you are. My room seems disorganised, but I know where things are, and that’s what counts,” he said reflectively. “You can keep this as long as you need. I hope it satisfies your doubts.”

“I hope so too,” Juushirou admitted, taking the volume gingerly and lowering his head in a bow. “Thank you, Nagesu-sama. I’m sorry for the interruption and my lack of manners — I’ll return this to you as soon as I can.”

“Well, I hope it will prove academic,” Nagesu grinned. “And don’t worry. We will find Keitarou. This time, I’m determined. We’ll find him or die looking.”

“I think all of Seireitei would rather not lose any more Captains, sir,” Juushirou said honestly, and Nagesu nodded.

“Indeed,” he agreed grimly, “but sometimes, needs must. One sacrifice is a small price to pay for peace. Well, maybe I’ve some of my Father’s blood in me after all — I suppose we’ll soon see.”

He patted Sekizanha’s hilt with a sigh, turning to gesture towards the door.

“I hope you can make your own way back. I’m afraid I still have much to do.”

“...and in his absence, Guren-sama expects the Ninth to be diligent in their protection of Kuchiki assigned space.”

The messenger finished reading his droning message, folding the scroll up with a snap of paper and bowing his head formally towards the Captain of the Ninth before handing him the bound letter. “These are the words and will of the Clan Leader, transmitted as instructed to Anabomi Seizuku, Captain of the Ninth Division.”

“The orders are understood. You are dismissed,” Anabomi flicked his fingers towards the door, and the messenger bowed again, disappearing into a quick, neat shunpo and leaving the Ninth Division Captain once more alone. He glanced at the rolled up scroll pensively for a moment, then set it down on the top of his desk, moving across to the window and pushing back the shutters to their full expanse. Outside, in the yard, one of his seated officers, Takaoka Sakura was training a couple of recalcitrant Kuchiki recruits, and at the sight of her, Anabomi’s brows knitted together, a troubled expression entering his soft grey eyes.

Such a peaceful scene, and yet...

He turned away, leaning up against the window frame as he considered.

Guren-sama was cross with me for not reporting the abduction of our recruit. I thought I might lose my Captaincy, but he was of a merciful disposition and I escaped with a warning. My judgement was simply askew in yet another instance. I wonder why I was ever made a Captain, given all the mistakes I make.

He glanced briefly back towards the courtyard. It had been his own incentive to accept the application of the Yamamoto-born Sakura, and Guren had let him have his way, even though the Kuchiki Clan as a whole had not entirely welcomed the decision to expand Ninth's territory beyond the Kuchiki's control. Anabomi was a loyal Kuchiki, but he disliked discord and segmentation, and it had been for this reason that he had hushed up the truth of the recruit's disappearance. Whether it had been Sakura or one of the other division members who had leaked the story, he did not know, but he felt a passing sense of resentment for their indiscretion. Ninth's business was Ninth's, he reflected regretfully, and their practices and decisions ought to be handled by the Ninth alone, yet they were still under the chokehold of Anabomi's own Clan leader.

That's not the way forward we hoped for when we were young, was it, Shougo?

A bittersweet smile touched his lips as he remembered sessions of sword against sword in the big, sprawling grounds of his family's estate, the fair hair of his companion drenched with sweat and glistening in the sunlight as they went through drill after drill. Sometimes he would take Shougo's sword, sometimes Shougo would take his, but there had never been any malice behind their spars and, when they had both been awarded positions as Captains in the same Council parliament, Anabomi had felt that maybe the world was beginning to take faltering steps forward.

"They're Clan squads," he could hear himself saying, as he had examined his haori-cloaked reflection in the mirror for the first time, smoothing invisible creases out of the fine white fabric. "Subordinate to the Sixth and the Third, Shougo — just another extension of the Clan's overreaching power. We aren't really Captains — not like they are."

"Not today, maybe not tomorrow," Shougo had told him, resting a companionable hand on his shoulder and offering him a grin. "It's all right, though, Seizuku. We'll prove our worth the old-fashioned way. You're slick with a sword and you get the trust of people easily. You're a reliable, honest soul and your squad will flock to you. You'll make Ninth your own space. And me, well, I have my science, and all the things my father taught me, before he died. Nagesu-sama has already told me that he intends on relying on me and my skills a good deal, so even if I don't have your people skills, I'll still manage to do something with the Twelfth."

“You always do yourself down,” Anabomi had scolded his friend, who had laughed.

“I know my flaws, and you should too, after this long,” he said warmly. “I don’t expect perfection. Perfection is boring. I expect progress, and change, and evolution. And I expect all of those things from this squad I’m going to lead. For the first time in Gotei history, people other than the leaders of the Clan have been given power to decide things for themselves. We’re their subordinates, but only in terms of Clan, not as Captains. The world is changing... and we’re at the forefront of that change.”

Anabomi closed his eyes, picturing his friend as he had been the last time he had seen the man alive. The bright smile and warm assurances to be back before he knew it blurred and faded, however, into the silent, shrouded form atop the funeral bier, his bloody wounds cleaned and bound to prevent them staining the burial robes. It had been the first time in their whole acquaintaince that Anabomi had ever seen Shougo’s face solemn and unsmiling, and it had burrowed right through to the core of his being. Mareiko’s sobs still punctuated his memories, but for Anabomi it had been a different kind of wound.

Shougo believed in making Twelfth his own. For his sake, I’ve worked to do that with Ninth, balancing my loyalty to Guren-sama with my hopes for the squad’s future. Perhaps it came at the cost of the dwellings of some Seireitei common folk, but in order to expand the Ninth’s reputation as effective and efficient, sometimes those decisions have to be taken. We can’t all feed every poor, homeless soul — it ought to be enough just to save their lives. I don’t wish them ill, but it is we who put our lives in danger on their behalves. It seems unfair that they then resent us for the damage the Hollow inflicts. I only want to make Ninth a great Division in its own right, separate from the Clan... but the Kuchiki are not the Urahara, and they don’t tolerate...

He glanced down at his sword, pulling it slowly from its sheath and glancing at the blade.

Besides, there are other things. Things you should never have told me... things I would rather not know. As your friend, Shougo, I’ll take those things to my grave. I’ll protect you as I would protect my own life, with this sword if need be. That’s why I went to the Rukon... that’s why I made sure of everything in the way you would’ve expected. I know it was wrong, but it was the last thing I could do for you. I decided to protect you and to protect Sekime and the Twelfth you believed in creating from any backlash. And now... with all these recent reports of Keitarou and his actions... it troubles me. It makes me remember... things I ought to forget.

He sighed, slipping the blade back into its sheath.

Now I have orders from the head of my Clan, and I realise I'm not as strong a man as you were. I believed in it, but I haven't managed to do all that I hoped I would. Whatever this next adventure accomplishes, I'm Guren-sama's subordinate and I have no option but to obey his instructions in his absence. You said I had the skill to bring people to me, but Shougo, I didn't have your spirit and I can't... do the things you longed to do.

He moved towards his desk, sliding gloved fingers beneath the sleek wooden surface to release the catch and retrieve the silver key that had been lodged there between the seams in the wood. For a moment he glanced at it, running his fingers over the fine, delicate metalwork, then he made his way across his office to the far side of the room where a heavy, expensive wall hanging concealed much of the bamboo panelling from view. Pushing it aside with his left hand, he slid the key into the lock beneath with his right, turning it with a soft click. The hidden cupboard swung open with the faintest of creaks, indicating how long it had been since the last time he had accessed it, and for a moment he just stood there, running his gaze over the compartment's meagre contents.

A dusty old book, bound in leather and tied with ribbon woven in Third District. A small, wood-carved box with a pearl catch and gold finish. A sword ornament, scuffed and dented but still clearly identifiable as bearing the crest of Shougo's family, the Urahara from the Eastern province of District Three, and, finally, a note, folded in half and half again, its corners dog-eared and its edges worn. Leaning up against the wall so as to keep the door from swinging shut by itself, Anabomi retrieved the letter, turning it over in his hands pensively.

"Take this and keep it safe for me," Once more he could almost hear Shougo's words, echoing in his head as though the man was standing in the room with him. "I don't know who else to give it to, and I'm worried... that if I keep with me, people might get into trouble. There have been things, lately... I don't know..."

He had paused, then grinned, shrugging his shoulders.

"It's probably nothing, but just in case," he had said. "Everything that happened in the Kuchiki recently put me on my guard. Everything associated to that man — that Keitarou — it troubles me. All the data Nagesu-sama gave me, and everything I've learned from my own work suggests that he's probably still on the loose. Even injured, he'll recover. His sword has the power to invade a person's heart and soul and turn them into his personal puppet, and as time goes on, I've understood just how much damage that weapon may have done. I don't believe Shouichi-sama was his first Clan murder, and because I don't, I won't let even the slightest chance he's alive slip by me. I've been working especially hard since that Kuchiki bocchan died, and Seizuku, I think I know a way of breaking that control. I think I know a way... of making people immune to that kind of lure."

"Shougo, what are you getting involved in now?" Anabomi had demanded, and Shougo had laughed.

"Don't look so serious. I told you, this is just in case," he had said dismissively. "I've done some theorising based on all the evidence we've collated, and I think that I've created something that might eventually form an antidote. His ability is manipulative, but I read the autopsy report on the mindless Shihouin boy and it seems that Chudokuga requires latent will to properly function. That means that somewhere in his ability must be a level of willpower suppression. Some way of... I don't know..." he had broken off, gesturing absently as he tried to find the words, and Anabomi had pursed his lips, knowing that his friend was trying to put his thoughts into the most coherent of language for his non-scientific companion to understand.

"It's hard to know exactly how to put it," he had admitted at length, "and it's still very much a theory in many respects but... if somehow, Chudokuga suppresses then infiltrates individual willpower, well, if that willpower could be made stronger, maybe the control could be broken? I've read studies on curse-based zampakutou whose abilities have been nullified in such a way, so I believe it must be possible."

"I'm not sure you ought to be pursuing this, not without the backing of your Clan," Anabomi had said cautiously, apprehension in his gaze, and Shougo had shrugged.

"Keitarou's been allowed to run riot and stories of his murder of Shouichi-sama spread like wildfire, but nobody at the main house is doing anything about it," he said frankly. "I thought that, with your family's recent experiences, you'd be glad that it hadn't just been buried under a rock by everyone in light of more immediate routine duties."

"Of course," Anabomi had smiled, resting a hand lightly on his friend's arm, "but not if it means you putting your neck on the line. Let the Clan leaders handle it, Shougo. They have a wider range of resources than we do, and if Keitarou were to target you... try to silence you..."

"Then he'd give me a chance to test my theories, I suppose," Shougo had replied flippantly. "Listen, Seizuku. The Clans aren't doing anything. They've not said it, but it's as though they've decided to let it go until he appears again — by which point, it will be too late. If they're not acting, I thought that maybe I would, since, to be blunt, I think killing this man is a pretty good idea. For Twelfth, too, it would be a coup — nullifying and killing or capturing Keitarou would be the very impetus we need to establish our division as worthy to stand beside Third and the Clan squads as an equal."

"Maybe... but even so..."

"A scientist always likes a gamble," Shougo's eyes had twinkled. 'Knowing how you feel about your status as Captain, I did think you and Ninth might like to play along, but perhaps it's too close to the recent crisis for you to join in just yet. I'll let you think it over... I don't suppose it will have an immediate result, anyway. To kill Keitarou, Seireitei need to be able to get close to him, which means denuding him of his sword's power.' He had patted the box again. "And so I've been working on this, for just that kind of opportunity. It's a very rough serum, based on something my father began, and it needs fine tuning. It's not like I can ask Otousama all the things I need to, and obviously I haven't had time to properly trial it. Probably I won't be able to until the exile comes out of hiding... I can't imagine anyone sanctioning me using it otherwise."

He had rolled his eyes.

"The reality is that now I've got to go back to the Rukon and run around with that idiot Minaichi and his useless satellites," he had added wearily. "It's getting far too busy out there now to do any interesting environmental studies, and the last time I tried to take mineral samples Ikata sat on my box of vials when we were setting up night camp, and used it as a stool while he trimmed his toenails with his sword. His weight smashed the lot to smithereens and he didn't so much as apologise. Still... I think Keitarou is there. I don't know where, and I can't prove it, but with the number of times going in and out, it's a feeling I get every time. Call it Urahara intuition, if you like... though Mareiko's not said anything. Maybe it's just my paranoia, or the fact I've been hunting for him for this long. Even if I can't put my fingers on where, I feel that he's somewhere... there."

"In the Rukon?"

"Yes," Shougo's eyes had darkened. "The missing piece in the puzzle... the genius who's concealed himself for far too long."

He had sighed.

"Though I don't mind admitting that, even though I've stuck it this long, after this mission, I'm tempted to ask to move duties and patrol somewhere more civilised for a change. At least until there's something more direct to take me back there... and not in the company of the monkeys from Eleventh. I've exhausted the prospects of our patrol region scientifically — and my patience is worn out mentally. If I came across Keitarou, it would probably not be a pretty encounter for either of us. I know too well what his sword is capable of — and I don't fancy my chances against it directly until this serum is perfected. I won't be the next Clan puppet and if he saw me, he'd have every reason to want me dead. My background means I probably know more about Keitarou's science than anyone else, even Nagesu-sama. I'm also an Urahara whose family chose the right side, which would make me top of his kill list. If he found my research on the subject, any chance of countering Chudokuga chemically would be lost. He might have spies in Seireitei. If they weren't so blundering and stupid, I might even suspect Minaichi's lot — but I've worked with Eleventh for long enough to know that that level of subterfuge is well beneath them."

He had held out the box, bound book and paper at that point, and wordlessly, Anabomi had taken them.

"Anyway, my reason for coming here today is this. I wanted to make sure this was somewhere safe while I was gone. Just in case there are other people here in the Gotei who aren't on the level, people who still look down on divisions like ours and consider us dispensable in the bigger picture. Twelfth is vulnerable when Mareiko and I make trips into the Rukon or the Real World hunting Hollows, and it sounds like this will be a heavy job. I don't expect anyone to raid Twelfth in my absence... but with everything that's happened in Seireitei, I can't be sure. Us lesser squads don't have formal barracks here in Inner Seireitei, yet, nor do we have proper bases within Clan lands, either. We're almost nomadic, forced to beg and borrow shelter here, and that's far from secure. This place is still Council orientated and Clan focused and it still hasn't evolved into a proper military stronghold. I don't have time to go back to my family estate before we leave, not even for this. I know I can trust you, and Kuchiki security at present is stronger than anywhere else... so you're my only hope. I'm being melodramatic, and I know I am — but you're the only one who I know can keep it safe and secret while I'm gone. I'll take it back when I return... but in the meantime..."

Anabomi pursed his lips, unfolding the note and glancing at it. As ever, it meant nothing to him — squiggles and lines and curves that indicated some chemical formula far beyond his scientific understanding. He set it aside, flipping open the box, and gazing for a moment at the vial inside.

You never did come back for it. Inner Seireitei grew and strengthened... but you never did see it happen.

With a sigh he replaced the paper and the lid of the box, shutting the door of the cupboard and fastening it with the key.

Whether I should've done something about your secret, I don't know. It didn't seem important, not after you died. But maybe you were right. Maybe it was Keitarou, in the Rukon. Maybe Keitarou found something he shouldn't... did something he shouldn't... and you paid the price. I saw the body, though. My friend was killed by a sword, not by a Hollow. I've always believed it was Keitarou who killed you, Shougo, or one of his associates... but all the investigations showed no sign of him or anyone else, and so I kept quiet. Now this is all flaring up like this... maybe it's proving that you were right.

“Taichou?”

He had just finished rearranging the wall hanging over the hidden door when the sound of a voice made him jump, and he swung around, meeting the concerned gaze of his Vice Captain.

“Taichou, is everything all right? I thought I sensed the reiatsu of a messenger — have we had word from Guren-sama?”

“He sent a message,” Anabomi nodded, extending an elegant hand in the direction of the desk. “You can read it, if you like. It’s simple enough. Guren-sama is entrusting us with Kuchiki-patrolled space in his absence, both here and outside of Inner Seireitei. Even if it stretches us thin, we must do as he instructs.”

“Yes, sir,” Hyakken reached for the scroll, scooping it up and carefully unrolling it. He skimmed over the contents, then nodded.

“With permission, sir, I’ll begin working on a rota of deployment to cover the time period in question,” he suggested, and Anabomi inclined his head.

“Do so,” he agreed, his expression becoming tired. “It will be a heavy few days, Hyakken... but we must show that, at the very least, Ninth Division is up to the task.”

“No souls with spirit power left in the Rukon, huh?” Shunsui stretched himself out more comfortably on the soft pink fabric of the haori, turning his gaze lazily towards his friend. “So it was a whitewash? Someone covered something up, or it was complete incompetence from start to finish?”

“Not really sure, but one of the two,” Juushirou groaned, setting the book down beside him with a shrug of frustration. “I’ve skimmed through it, but it’s as Nagesu-sama says. All of the souls in the Rukon were relocated. Every area was searched and evacuated, then certified empty. The whole population of Rukongai should have been in the Spiritless Zone.”

“And yet they weren’t,” Shunsui mused. “Somewhere, there were others, people not recorded by Seireitei. And one very notable mad scientist, with his wife and small child... or maybe, depending on how old that waif of yours is, I should be saying small children.”

“Do you think Keitarou could’ve hidden people?” Juushirou looked doubtful, and Shunsui shrugged.

“I don’t know,” he owned. “I’m pretty sure that village had been lived in recently, though. Hanako and Kaoru thought so too, and so did your men. They’re none of them fools, and I trust their judgement. They have no reason to lie about something which in their eyes would be trivial and without deeper meaning — none of them know the real purpose of that search, not in proper detail.”

“True enough,” Juushirou sprawled out on his front, resting his chin in his hands. “It’s too hot today, and it’s not helping me think.”

“Well, then give me the book, let me have a look at it,” Shunsui held out his hand. “And while I am, tell me again what you intend to do about your surprising stray. Because if everything you said to me is right, Juu, you have a big problem. If Nagesu-sama finds out you’re harbouring... well, if he finds out, after your meeting with him, who knows what conclusions he’d come to. And he’s not one to jump to random ideas, but lately he’s been more... that way inclined.”

“It’s Keitarou. Nagesu-sama wants to find him,” Juushirou sighed heavily, nonetheless handing the book over. “Here. Good luck. I can’t find any obvious holes in it — it just seems as though these people either vanished when the shinigami were there, or appeared from nowhere.”

“Well, then lets try another approach,” Shunsui flicked through the book, pausing at the end and squinting at the columns of messy characters. “Geez, did nobody teach these people calligraphy? I’ve never seen such haphazard scribble before.”

“That’s rich, coming from the person whose writing Ryuu likened to a spider in its death throes,” Juushirou observed, amused. Shunsui snorted.

“Maybe, but this is an official document, not a class paper. It’s different,” he defended himself. “Besides, I... ah-hah. That’s what I was looking for. Now, let’s see...”

He rolled over onto his stomach, laying the book flat against the surface of the roof.

“What have you got?” Juushirou leaned over to look, and Shunsui tapped the paper with his index finger.

“The names of the people who authorised the report,” he said evenly. “Yamamoto Hashihiko, Urahara Nagesu... but neither of them went to the Rukon themselves. Hashihiko-sama is dead now, and you’ve already heard from Nagesu-sama, so that’s no good. They would’ve read the reports they were given and just authorised them — there’d be no reason to suspect anything amiss.”

“You think someone deliberately omitted information from the reports?” Juushirou asked softly, and Shunsui nodded.

“I think that’s the easiest explanation,” he agreed, turning back a page. “Let’s see who was sent to investigate. Members of the Second — that’s no real surprise.”

“Suzuki Naoto?” Juushirou asked sharply, and Shunsui shook his head.

“No. That would be a nice juicy catch, but I’m afraid not,” he responded. “Oh, but wait. Kounou. Wasn’t that someone of interest to Kai at one time?”

“He’s the man Suzuki killed before leaving the Second’s prison,” Juushirou remembered. “It doesn’t mean anything, though — Kai trusted him, from what I could gather, and up till ten years ago, he had a high position in the Onmitsukidou. He was arrested on separate charges. Probably this is coincidence.”

“Probable, though I don’t like those,” Shunsui looked pensive. “A man like that might be bribed to look the other way — by Keitarou or by someone else who’d rather their name didn’t appear on this kind of documentation.”

“Now you’re getting paranoid,” Juushirou scolded. “Kounou is dead, so we’ll learn nothing even if you settle on him as the source — what else do you have?”

“A nice array of nobodies,” Shunsui looked dissatisfied.

“Nagesu-sama said Anabomi-taichou went there once,” Juushirou remembered. “I don’t know the circumstances, but apparently he was friends with the former Twelfth Captain. According to Nagesu-sama, anyhow. Maybe we should approach him?”

“Ask Anabomi to tell us something?” Shunsui snorted. “Not a chance. I’ve lived and worked next door to him for the past twenty five years, give or take, and one thing I’ve learned about him is that for all he appears as a peaceable, respectable man, he’s famously like a clam with information. I told you, didn’t I? The information about his missing recruit came through Kaoru’s friendship with Sakura-chan and some illicit whispers over the fence, not from official channels. Never once in the whole time we’ve been stationed next door to one another has the Ninth Division ever asked the Eighth for help or advice, or offered any in return. They’re not unfriendly, but they are... not exactly proponents of community support.”

“That’s harsh,” Juushirou reproved. “Anabomi isn’t hostile, nor is he unfriendly. You make Ninth Division sound like the Onmitsukidou’s prison — it’s not as though it’s a hotbed of intrigue and suspicion.”

“Perhaps not,” Shunsui relented. “but the fact remains that even if it was, we’d probably not find out about it. Take it from me, Juu. Anabomi’s an odd man. I’ve spoken to him several times and yet I don’t believe I know him at all. He’s not unfriendly, and he seems to be highly respected by his subordinates. He’s a handsome specimen of a Kuchiki in his prime, which if you ask me, explains why he gets more female recruits than even I do — but to me he’s still something of a mystery.”

“You should be careful. Someone objective might think you were jealous of his recruitment skills,” Juushirou teased, his expression lightening despite the seriousness of the discussion. “He sounds pretty much like a typical Kuchiki to me, that’s all. They’re not like they were once, maybe, but they still don’t look for help if they can avoid it. How many requests for help have come out of Sixth since we got our haori? True, Guren-sama’s squad often offer their aid, and I believe Hirata has a very successful working relationship with the Sixth — probably on account of Ryuu’s presence there. But I don’t think that Anabomi keeping himself and his squad affairs to himself means we ought to suspect him of subversiveness.”

“No... I tend to agree,” Shunsui conceded. ‘I don’t know if I like or dislike him, it’s hard to tell — but it’s not as though he keeps his subordinates prisoner, and even if I don’t speak to him on a regular basis, Sakura does visit Kaoru often. She’s a bright sparky girl and a chatterer — and if there was anything bad going on there, it probably wouldn’t remain a secret for long. We found out about the abduction quickly, so I accept your point. I just don't think asking Anabomi anything about this is worth our time. 'It's nothing to do with Ninth'. That'll be his response. Friend or not, I guarantee it. Besides,' he flicked the book in Juushirou's direction, "he's not listed in here."

"Now I think of it, Nagesu-sama said he went once when they were still clearing up the stragglers of the incident in question," Juushirou recalled, "though apparently none were ever found. Third and Eleventh also participated, as did First, but I don't remember seeing Third or First division deployments mentioned in that book. I guess Anabomi wanted to make absolutely sure the people who killed his friend had been properly dealt with — but the Spiritless Zone was, apparently, beneath his notice."

"We are talking about a Captain who hushed up the abduction of his recruit and the fact his Division haven't been clearing up after themselves in Seireitei," Shunsui pointed out blithely. "Doesn't sound like the resume of a man who'd care much about a few Rukon souls being relocated."

"No, true," Juushirou agreed. "All right. What else?"

"Not much," Shunsui grimaced. "A few from Eleventh. Noticeably none from Twelfth, though Mareiko-chan countersigned a few of the reports in Nagesu-sama's place."

"I suppose it was too much for her to go back there herself," Juushirou mused, and Shunsui nodded.

"Ikata, from the Eleventh, he's listed too," he remarked.

"Ikata?" Juushirou was taken aback. "Minaichi's adjutant?"

"The same, though I'm not sure that rank had been conferred then. He's not listed as an adjutant, and seems to have been just one name in a list of names from Eleventh who were dispatched to divide and conquer," Shunsui sighed. "There are probably a lot of things wrong with his evacuation technique, but do we think he's responsible for covering up Keitarou's hiding place? Do we think he's capable of something that subtle?"

"Honestly, no," Juushirou admitted. "Enishi did say that Ikata was a cousin of the dead Sakanoue — but they didn't apparently have much of a relationship. In fact, Ikata was after the Vice Captain position almost before Sakanoue's body was cold — well, that's how I heard the story. And Ikata isn't subtle. I doubt he could keep from bragging about it, if he'd known where Keitarou was and managed to deceive Soul Society about it."

“I agree,” Shunsui tapped his finger absently against the page, then flipped the book closed, setting it aside. “The trouble is, even if we have these suspicions, we have no particular direction to point them. Clearly the reason we never knew there were others living outside the Spiritless Zone is because the official report told us so. And because it told us so, none of us questioned it or went looking. Keitarou was able to conceal himself and his family, and from the young lad Koku’s testimony, there are others. Ordinary souls who just happen to have reiryoku. Maybe there was no cover up. Perhaps the people simply hid with Keitarou and his family, because they were associated with him and he helped them as a result. All it would take was a patrol not being as thorough as they ought, and with Keitarou’s skills, they’d be overlooked. Remember, Naoko thought he was building an army... maybe that’s not the case, but he is putting us shinigami to shame. Protecting those people is our job, and if we’d done it properly...”

“But we haven’t, and we need to rectify that,” Juushirou said firmly. “One way or another, we need to find these people. Keitarou’s taken them somewhere, and I don’t believe it’s the Real World. It makes no sense for him to flee there if he had spirit-enriched Pluses in tow — in the Real World, they’d be in much more danger from Hollows than they are here, with far fewer resources at hand. That means he’s probably somewhere else, just like Joumei suggested. And if what Izumi thinks about the Gate kidou is true...”

“The Real World is a bluff, and we’re right to believe he’s actually in Rukongai still,” Shunsui’s eyes darkened. “Perhaps we weren’t thinking in quite the right context, though. The most logical part of Rukongai to take starving Plus souls to is obvious — so obvious I can’t believe we didn’t see it. Hiding in plain sight is Keitarou’s piece de resistance. He’s gone to the one place we’d consider impossible. The Spiritless Zone itself.”

“Kai and the others swept it clean, so now we consider it empty of danger, and it has resources to support such a community without needing to resort to outside support,” Juushirou looked troubled. “Tenichi said the condition of the people there reminded him of when he was a refugee in your brother’s land, and Koku’s words backed that up — so Keitarou would have to make other provision for feeding them, if he took them back to his original base camp. But the Spiritless Zone, even with souls in residence, would provide all they needed. There are no shinigami there now, either. Maybe you’re right. No, I’m sure you probably are. The trouble is, what do we do about it? Nagesu-sama won’t be convinced by our conspiracy theories, and we have no evidence. I still can’t tell Nagesu-sama that a girl who’s a descendant of a condemned branch of his family thinks he’s been duped, nor can I tell him that his cousin's son is sheltering in my division. Certainly not while the kill on sight order remains."

"Well, if we can't go to the Council, we'll go somewhere else," Shunsui pulled himself into a sitting position, getting to his feet and holding his hand out to haul his friend up too. "Come on. Hot or not, I don't think we can stop around here. We're going to find someone who has power to help us without needing to clear it with Clan. Someone we can trust — almost certainly — to be discreet... and someone who, from your account of Tenichi's situation, already knows about the Kitsune to some degree."

"Such as?" Juushirou looked surprised, and Shunsui grinned.

"Kai, of course," he said with a shrug. "We're going to Second. If we can't have the Council or the Captains, well, I guess the Onmitsukidou will have to do."

56. Departure

Chapter Fifty Five: Departure

“These are hardly the circumstances that I hoped we’d continue our acquaintance in, Kotetsu.”

Kai pushed open the door of the bottom level of the Onmitsukidou prison, casting its sole occupant a resigned glance as he refastened the divide behind him. “I was having you watched, you know, outside of your own quarters — but I never imagined that you’d commit a crime on your old territory. I had the impression you were fond of Thirteenth, but perhaps that was my oversight too.”

At the sound of Kai’s voice, Tenichi raised his head, meeting the other man’s golden gaze with a sad one of his own. He shrugged his shoulders.

“I’m safer here,” he said softly. “I don’t understand anything myself, Kai-dono. All I know is that if I’m here, I can’t be out there, thinking about hurting people and confusing myself with what I want to do.”

“Houjou said something similar about your reaction, and so did Ukitake,” Kai rested his gloved hands against the bars, taking in the prisoner’s appearance carefully as he did so. Tenichi was no longer robed in his shinigami uniform, for once the official notice of his arrest had been circulated, his suspension had been quickly and formally confirmed. Instead he was robed in pale blue cloth, a rough, nondescript fabric woven from hemp and fastened at the middle by a length of the same in grey, and at his wrists and ankles were powerful spirit cuffs, suppressing his reiryoku and preventing him from using any kind of spiritual power to escape. His feet were bare, his reddish hair tousled and messy across his shoulders. His eyes were shadowed, indicating a lack of sleep, and faint stubble at his chin indicated that this was the third day since he had arrived at Second. Given the nature of his crime and the man’s apparently unstable mental state, there had been no question of anyone allowing him a blade with which to shave.

“In a way it’s a good thing you’re not planning on resisting any more... but I’m sad to see it come to this. Seventh needs you more than ever at present... yet here you are, rotting in one of my cells.”

“Taichou...” Tenichi faltered, then shook his head. ‘It might be because of me that Seventh is in the situation it is,' he said honestly. "I didn't mean for things to happen that way, but no matter how many times people say it wasn't my fault, I still feel that if I'd known quicker... done something different... not been abducted... Fukutaichou would still be alive."

"Probably that's true," Kai said matter-of-factly, and Tenichi flinched, staring at him in dismay. "Well, you said it and I'm inclined to agree. I'm your gaoler, I'm not here to make you feel better about decisions made. Perhaps you did some foolish things — certainly if your behaviour at Thirteenth is anything to go by, you did plenty of them. If you want to believe Souja-dono died because of them, it's not my place to tell you otherwise. What I'm here to judge is how much criminal culpability you have — in that incident, and in any of the other incidents Soul Society are trying to resolve."

For a moment, Kai thought Tenichi was going to start crying again, then the prisoner sighed, running his fingers through his messy hair. From its current knotted state, Kai had the impression that he had spent many hours doing similar, probably attempting to make sense of everything through a series of sleepless nights. Leaving a prisoner alone to contemplate his actions was one of Kai's preferred techniques before trying to extract clear confessions — locked in the gloom of the Onmitsukidou's deepest level with nothing but rats for company was usually enough to convince even the most stoic criminal to break down and talk. Yet despite employing this tactic, Kai had the distinct impression that it was what was inside this man's head that was causing him the greatest grief, to the point that he had barely noticed his surroundings at all.

"Ukitake-taichou told me to tell you everything and not to lie any more," Tenichi spoke quietly now. "I lied because I was afraid, and I didn't want to hurt Ketsui — but I don't suppose I could do more to hurt him now, save striking him with my blade. I'll answer whatever you want to know — but Kai-dono, if I do so, please don't do anything to Ketsui. I told him nothing about my abduction, or anything since. He and I are blood to Keitarou, but just because I've done unforgivable things, it doesn't mean..."

"You can rest your mind on that account," Kai pulled a stool forward, squatting before the cell and eying his companion expectantly. "Well? Your brother is under no suspicion at all. Aside from the fact he was the one who stopped you completing your assassin mission the other day, I've heard no reports of suspicious behaviour from his part of Seireitei. You mistake me and my organisation if you think that I automatically hear the name Keitarou and start hunting down anyone who might share his blood. Nagesu-sama is also as close a kinsman to Keitarou as you or Ketsui, but that hasn't slurred his good name and it won't either. The reason that I and other people became interested in you and your connections to that man stem from your own odd behaviour. Most of all, your deceptions. Your pretence of amnesia... which was becoming just too convenient to continue to believe."

"I see," Tenichi's face became sober, and he nodded. "That makes sense. I'm sorry, Kai-dono. I haven't been thinking sensibly about much for a while, now. Keitarou didn't use his sword, but I think he did something to me and I haven't been quite right since. Everything you say is logical and I know it to be true — but it's only here, in this cell, that I'm able to think it all through rationally. It's too late to change any of it, but there's a certain relief in knowing that the big decisions are no longer in my hands."

"This is pitiful for an officer who received Eighth Rank in the Endou division, and who is spiritually capable of much more," Kai was scathing. "Ukitake might've mollicoddled you or appealed to you in that fatherly way he has, but you won't find me playing the sympathetic card this time around. You had your chance to answer to me on those terms when I came to Seventh, after Suzuki's escape. Now you are simply a prisoner — and I'll establish once and for all what you do and do not know about Aizen Keitarou and his movements."

"I don't mind," Tenichi said simply. "If Ketsui is safe, then I don't mind. Whatever you do to me... I'll try and tell you what I know."

"That's a good start," Kai settled himself more firmly on his stool. "I don't believe in torture, but the possibilities here exist, and even if I won't oversee or authorise it, it can be overseen and it can be authorised. That's why you're kept so deep underground — it's bad for morale if the less experienced officers of Second hear prisoners scream or beg for mercy."

A faint smile touched Tenichi's face.

"You don't need to try and scare me," he assured his companion. "I won't lie any more. I promise."

"Well, let's hope *that's*not a lie," Kai said frankly. "Let's begin with the abduction. You originally said you didn't remember it, and then that you remembered bits and pieces. How much of that was true?"

"I remember all of it," Tenichi glanced at his hands. "Keitarou didn't treat me like a prisoner at all. That's what made it so hard, when I was returned. He appealed to me like a member of his family, because of his close bond with my father, and my past as a refugee in District Eight. He knew all the ways to manipulate me and he treated me well. He promised to take me to Father's grave, and he kept that promise. Since I came back, I learned of the murders in the Spiritless Zone and that they were at his hand. I was in Rukongai at the time those occurred, and Keitarou was with me when they must have done — so I know nothing of the agents who were sent to do it. If the girl is the same as the one who killed my Vice Captain, I believe I met her once, when she tried to kill me... she was stopped, however, and so I came back to Seireitei unharmed."

"And you didn't think to report any of this to a superior officer?"

Tenichi was silent for a moment, then he sighed.

"At the point I left Rukongai, I think I was... confused by Keitarou's attitude towards me," he admitted. "When I was a small boy, he'd come and visit our family often. He'd bring sweets and talk to my brother and I and... and things of that nature. Then, when my mother died..." he paused, hesitating, then, "no, I said I'd tell you everything, and so I will. When my mother died, he came again. I was a recruit at Thirteenth then, and my brother still a student. He came to see Mother, but she was too sick for him to be able to. He spoke kindly, as a kinsman would, and brought her medicine which she chose to take. It gave her great relief in her last days, and she was grateful for his kindness in bringing it."

"And you concealed this from your superior officer, too?"

"I don't suppose at the time I considered it very much," Tenichi admitted. "Nor did Ketsui. I had told Ukitake-taichou about our past and connections, and he had said it was no big deal, so I let it go. I didn't think it might have greater consequences. In the Rukon, Keitarou acted much as he did when Mother died. He appealed to that side of my memories. I knew he was a felon, but I didn't understand... everything as to why. He told me what happened to my father, and why he acted against Shouichi-sama, to take vengeance. Father died in such a horrible way, Kai-dono. I suppose, once I learned that... I forgave him."

"And the Kuchiki boy's murder? What of that?"

"I didn't really know a lot about it," Tenichi admitted. "I was still a young boy when it happened, and living in District Eight, far from Six and far from a position of political note."

"Well, I suppose I see now why you were worried about Ketsui," Kai's eyes narrowed. "If your story is true, and he visited you as a child, in that you can't be considered culpable. Your family was as it was then and I have no interest in your father's politics so long as they don't influence this case. But in terms of his later visit, and then your abduction — clearly he had designs on you and wanted you to know that he knew where to find you and what you were doing. It should have been reported when it happened, however unimportant you felt it to be. You — and Ketsui, and anyone else who knows of this visit — broke a significant law of Seireitei by concealing the whereabouts of a class one felon who is extremely dangerous."

"I didn't conceal his whereabouts," Tenichi shook his head quickly. "Nor did Ketsui. We didn't know his whereabouts. He came to us, and then he disappeared. Our priority was Mother's comfort in her last days, and I didn't report it when I returned to barracks after she died. I didn't think it mattered, and even if I did, I wouldn't have been able to tell you where to find him. Ketsui and I made him no promises that day, Kai-dono. He came to see Mother and brought her medicine. He commented on how much Ketsui looked like Father, but that's all I clearly recall him saying. I would never have thought of it again, if not for all this happening now."

He looked anxious.

"You won't charge Ketsui with anything, will you? You promised you wouldn't, and..."

"I already said that your brother is not in my sphere of interest," Kai dismissed this with a flick of his hand. "I'm glad you told me the truth for once, but I don't see much point in dwelling on the incident any further. It just helps me pinpoint your thought processes in this matter, that's all. So when he took you from Seireitei, he treated you as a friend, even though he had forcibly abducted you?"

"Yes. He wanted my help in supporting the people in Rukongai."

"People in Rukongai?"

"The people with spirit power, who weren't allowed to live in the Spiritless Zone because they were tainted Pluses," Tenichi nodded. "They were living in terrible conditions. Keitarou told me he was abducting shinigami to demand ransoms in food and supplies in order to feed these people. I don't know if any other prisoners were kept in Rukongai — I don't think they were, because it seemed to me like I was different. But I don't know where they might have been kept. Keitarou told me that Kurotsuchi — the man you know as Suzuki Naoto — he was the go-between. Keitarou himself didn't go to Seireitei. Suzuki did that for him."

“I see,” Kai’s eyes became slits as he processed this. “And Suzuki’s current whereabouts?”

“I don’t know. If I did, you’d probably find him dead,” Tenichi offered a humourless smile. “Even if my desire to kill the girl has faded, Kai-dono, the Onmitsukidou is different. I’d still slit his throat, for every threat he made against my brother and I.”

“Not if my people find him first — we have a prior grievance to settle with Suzuki Naoto, and we will settle it our way,” Kai said matter-of-factly. “Moving on to another topic you prevaricated on the last time we talked — Kohaku. I want to know what you know about this — because I don’t believe you know nothing.”

“I really don’t know anything at all,” Tenichi said honestly. “I did see the hut. It had an aura of death around it, and the Rukon people were frightened of it. There were stories that whatever lived inside the hut was a demon of some kind, and that it had driven a local man mad. That man died, so nobody went near it. I never tried to go in. Keitarou confirmed the story of the Rukon people. He said it was the location of someone very troubled and spiritually like a Hollow, who he was trying to help.”

“And the fact this was apparently his child..?”

“That was as much a shock to me as it was to you,” Tenichi said darkly. “If it is even true, and not another trick. I don’t know what Kohaku is, Kai-dono, or whether anything Keitarou told me was the truth. He told me lies about other things interspersed with true stories, so I’m not sure. That’s the whole of my knowledge on the subject, though. Kohaku was a monster confined in a hut. That’s all.”

“Keitarou never gave any indication about how he might use that monster?”

“No... but I did hear it said that Kohaku was a weapon but it wasn’t like he was about to be unleashed at any time,” Tenichi said thoughtfully. “I don’t know what that means, but that’s what I was told.”

“Well, so far we have Suzuki who’s disappeared into thin air, and Kohaku, about whom you can tell me nothing,” Kai folded his arms, eying Tenichi speculatively. “If I discover any of these things you’re telling me are further lies, Kotetsu, there’ll be no hope for you whatsoever. You understand that your life depends on how deep your involvement with Keitarou can be proven to be?”

“I expect to be executed, Kai-dono,” Tenichi met Kai’s gaze, and to the Onmitsukidou's surprise, there was peace and acceptance in his eyes. "I'm not going to beg for my life, or for mercy of any kind. If you want to execute me, go ahead. But I've told you the truth. That is all I know and if I make stuff up to please you, or preserve my life, I'll just be perverting justice all over again."

"And Keitarou himself?"

"The last time I saw him was when he took me to Father's grave. After that I was picked up by... by... by people of Endou-taichou, and..."

"I know about the Kitsune. You can speak of them before me — it was them who collected you, correct?"

"Yes, sir," Tenichi was startled, but he nodded. "After that I had no contact with Keitarou at all. Suzuki came to threaten me once, the morning that Souja-dono was discovered missing. He told me Fukutaichou had gone to Rukongai at about the same time the alert went out to search for him. The other time I saw Suzuki was the fight we had at Seventh, which one of the recruits partially overheard."

"And that's the extent of your dealings with Keitarou and his faction?"

"Yes, sir."

"Then, if I may put it bluntly, what on earth possessed you to do something as harebrained and reckless as release your zanpakutou in the heart of a division where it's a well known blade and threaten the life of an unarmed girl?" Kai demanded. "I've heard from Ukitake that the Kitsune were attacked by Keitarou — are you telling me your actions were coincidence, and you weren't sent by him to finish the job?"

"I thought the Kitsune were on Keitarou's side, and that they had deceived Taichou and Ukitake-taichou, because Souja-dono died after he went to see them," Tenichi shook his head. "I thought them cursed... they pretty much told me themselves that they brought bad luck. Fukutaichou went to the Rukon based on evidence they gave him, and he came back almost dead. I didn't trust their motives. I also heard that Keitarou had a spy in the Gotei, though Suzuki told me he didn't know who it was. I thought it was Izumi, because she had suddenly appeared as an out of season recruit and was assigned with my brother. It all seemed too convenient to be anything different... at least at the time."

"A spy in the Gotei?" Kai demanded sharply, and Tenichi nodded.

“And you thought this spy was the Ichimaru girl?”

“Yes, sir, though Ukitake-taichou explained to me clearly why she was not.”

“But you’re certain that Suzuki told you the truth?”

“Yes, sir,” Tenichi agreed. “He said that if he knew who it was, he’d kill them, because he wanted to be the only one reporting to Keitarou. I think he was jealous that there was anyone else involved. I got the impression only Keitarou knew the identity of his spy — nobody in the Rukon seemed to know about it, either.”

“But Keitarou’s ability to judge our actions has been extremely accurate,” Kai rubbed his chin. “It’s a pity you can’t tell me more about that... but today, for the first time, I believed you when you told me you didn’t care if you lost your life. You have nothing left to protect, and I’ve guaranteed you Ketsui’s immunity. Therefore I trust your word. Today I see honesty in your expression... so even if I were to recommend more forceful methods be used on you, I doubt I’d have any further joy.”

“I’ve told you everything I know, sir. Everything about Keitarou, and why I did what I did in Thirteenth,” Tenichi said quietly. “Those actions alone are unforgivable, so I anticipate being severely punished. If I am sentenced to death, I won’t object to the judgement. I don’t know or trust myself at the moment — maybe if I held a weapon again, I’d do someone some real harm.”

“Have you given up?” Kai asked him acerbically, and Tenichi started, staring at the officer in confusion.

“Kai-dono?”

“A wise person once said to me that the only time you can change things is when you’re alive. When you’re dead, it’s too late,” Kai said evenly. “If you regret what you’ve done, there are more useful ways that you can atone for them than simply for us to put you to death. It might be the easy option, suicide by Onmitsukidou squad, but I doubt your brother or your friends would be happy if you chose such a selfish, cowardly path from hereon in.”

“I tried to murder an innocent girl, Kai-dono!”

“Yes, yes you did,” Kai agreed bluntly, “and that is not something that you’ll ever be able to erase. There will be charges, you will be judged, and there will be a penalty to serve. That penalty might be that you remain unforgiven. Maybe even by the people you consider the most dear to you. Whatever the burden turns out to be, it won’t be an easy or a pleasant one. You say that you don't know yourself any more — that's simply your denial. You do know yourself, but you've changed, and you need to understand and manage that change so that you won't hurt anyone else. It's not for me or anyone else to discipline self control into a grown man of your considerable Gotei experience. I told you once not to be pitiful, and I'll tell you again. On the evidence I've just heard, I think it unlikely anyone will hand down a death sentence. Your involvement with Keitarou was not by your own design, and your conduct since was irresponsible and reprehensible, but you have no direct guilt in any of the murders committed against Seireitei. Your act against Izumi was ill advised, but your motive is now understood and your reason to hurt her gone. Based on that, I think it unlikely you'll be killed. So, instead of mentally preparing yourself for death, try and prepare yourself for life instead. I think you'll find it the greater challenge."

Tenichi did not reply, an mixture of emotions on his face, and Kai tapped his hands against the bars lightly.

"Right now you present as a worthless idiot whose behaviour has shamed his family and his division," he said bluntly, "but that division has not forsaken you. Hirata has suspended you, he has not evicted you. That means that, pending judgement, he is considering taking you back. You may serve time incarcerated first — I think that's highly likely — but Seventh Division has not given up on you. Of all places in Seireitei other than this one, the Seventh best understand dealing with the impulse to kill. Maybe you came from the Thirteenth, but probably the Seventh is the only Division who might rescue you and make a reasonable shinigami of you once again."

"I don't deserve that," Tenichi whispered, his eyes glittering with tears once more, and Kai got to his feet, offering him a pensive glance.

"Maybe that will be your punishment," he said honestly. "If it is, though, I advise you to embrace it. Whatever it entails, you owe Soul Society — and in particular, Seventh Division — a far bigger debt than your life can ever fully repay. Make sure you repay it before you die. Otherwise Keitarou will have broken you — and all you'll ever be is an embarrassment to those you consider close."

Without waiting for a response, he moved to the main door, unfastening the catch and sliding it open, before slipping through to the corridor and stairway beyond. Without looking, he knew that his words had pierced right through to Tenichi's core, but he had no intention of staying to watch a grown man cry more tears of regret. It would be the making or breaking of the man, he mused to himself, as he made his way back up the steps to the Second Division's main barracks.

If he returned to Seventh at some future point and betrayed Hirata's belief in him, the Wind Hawk is a quick and fairly painless form of death. At least, so long as Hirata is sufficiently angry.

He pursed his lips, considering this ruefully.

Given everything, I'm surprised he's taken the attitude he has. Seventh are under so much pressure, especially with the incident involving Ohara, and they have minimal officers of rank available to them. Tenichi's idiocy has created bigger logistical problems, and given Hirata's current temper, I'm surprised he's willing to be so understanding. Or maybe it's what he said in his message about Kikyue-hime... wanting to protect and keep the Seventh going, so that Keitarou doesn't take anything more from them than he already has. Losing Tenichi would be acknowledging a victory for the enemy... so perhaps that's the root of it. Still, the final judgement will be before the Council... and probably not till everything else is cleared up. Certainly not before the trip to the Real World — which I grow more and more leery of each day.

“Kai-dono!”

Saku's voice greeted him as he stepped out into the Second Division's courtyard, shielding his eyes from the glare of bright sunlight that accosted him. “Kai-dono, my sincerest apologies, but Ukitake-taichou and Kyouraku-taichou are here. They wanted to come and speak to you directly. I told them you were in a place they couldn't go, but they insisted on waiting. I took them to your office and was about to come and tell you their message.”

“Why are you apologising?” Kai looked wary. “Did they say what they wanted? Both of them together doesn't sound like a good sign.”

“I don't know, they didn't say,” Saku admitted, her cheeks pinkening slightly. “I... don't like to spend too much time around Kyouraku-taichou, in case he starts teasing me and acting like old friends. The recruits might see and it would be bad for morale if they saw someone talk to me like that. But I didn't want to disturb you, since I knew where you were and who you were talking to.”

“I'm done with that for now,” Kai assured her. “I've got as much truth as I think I'll get from Kotetsu on the subject of Keitarou and what happened at Thirteenth.”

“Is he what we suspected?”

“He's a prize idiot,” Kai reflected, “but, it seems, not as bad as I feared. I don't think he's a traitor, Saku, no. He's done stupid things, but his motives are comprehensible, if idiotic. We'll leave him be for a day or two, on his own, to think things over. Make sure that food is prepared as usual, but ensure whoever takes it makes no attempt to communicate with him."

"I'll see to it myself," Saku promised. "I'll go make the necessary arrangements, but sir, if you can go..."

"Speak to the terrible twosome?" Kai's expression became amused. "All right, I'm going. Though it will be hard to pull rank on two Captains, even with my Onmitsukidou status, so I hope they aren't going to ask me to do something I'm not going to like."

Saku returned his grin with a wry one of her own, then saluted, disappearing into shunpo and leaving him to make the short distance across the cobbles towards the main Division barracks where the Vice Captain's office was located. Despite the darker nature of Kai's work and the secrets lurking below the ground, the studies belonging to both Captain and Vice Captain were deceptively bright and cheerful, offering no insight into the hidden realms several feet beneath. As he entered, he saw that his old friends had made themselves at home, Juushirou leaning up against the window to observe the surrounding area, whilst Shunsui was poking at one of the cushions that littered the floor with more than average interest. At the sound of the door, though, both turned, and Kai offered them a dry smile.

"Two Captains in my office at once," he said drolly. "To what do I owe this particular pleasure?"

"If only it was for pleasure," Shunsui pulled a face. "Kai, is your lovely sister anywhere around? We wanted to talk to you, but not necessarily to her... and well..."

"If she finds out you're here, she might become curious?" Kai's brows knitted together. "I knew it. You're going to ask me to do something I'm not going to like, aren't you?"

"It's not necessarily like that," Juushirou said cautiously. "Just that with Midori-sama going to the Real World... and well, we needed another opinion... and yours seemed to be... the logical one."

"Mine, but not Neesama's?" Kai pursed his lips, closing the door of his office and leaning up against it. "Well, you're in luck. Midori-nee is next door, currently, discussing plans for their trip with Nagesu-sama. The Onmitsukidou aren't going, so I'm not invited, and nor is Saku. I do have other things to do in her absence, however, so if you want to make it quick..."

“We think that the Real World trip is all wrong,” Juushirou met Shunsui’s gaze, and the other man nodded. “We’ve been adding up together the bits and pieces we have, and well, they don’t come out quite right. I’ve tried talking to Nagesu-sama, but because I can’t mention the Kitsune to him, it’s not really got me very far. He’s determined to go because he believes that Keitarou is there.”

“And you two don’t?”

“We don’t,” Shunsui agreed. “We believe he’s probably been there, but that he is unlikely to be making his base there.”

“And you think there’s something I can do to change matters that two Captains cannot?” Kai looked sceptical. “I don’t know what you think the Onmitsukidou do, Kyouraku, but I’m still only, officially, a Vice Captain. You both outrank me — so if a Council member isn’t listening to you, I’ve got no hope. You’d do better trying Hirata — who is at least a member of that hallowed body.”

“Hirata knows a lot of what we do, but not everything,” Juushirou looked troubled. “Kai, it’s not as simple as that. It isn’t just the Kitsune... there are more pieces to this puzzle than there at first appear. I’m not even sure how much I ought to tell you — since knowing might put you in a difficult situation. We believe Keitarou’s ultimate target is here, though. Seireitei. And that the Real World is probably a bluff to get Captains away from their posts.”

“Like he waited for the division of troops in the Spiritless Zone?” Kai’s eyes became slits. “In that instance he sent two agents — one to each campsite. We still have no lock on the whereabouts of either Suzuki Naoto or the mysterious Kohaku... and there’s always Keitarou’s own sword to take into account. Even if the Gotei did split, though, having people across a wider area could be seen as advantageous. It would mean the splitting of Aizen’s own forces, and the Captains of Soul Society are none of them weaklings.”

Shunsui arched an eyebrow at Juushirou, who sighed, rubbing his temples.

“We know where Kohaku is,” he admitted wearily, and Kai stared at him in disbelief. “I can’t tell you... won’t tell you... but we do.”

“You realise the penalties you could both face for concealing information like that from the Council?” Kai demanded. “I just drummed all of those things into that idiot in my cells downstairs, and now I find that people I thought had sense were keeping even bigger secrets?”

“It isn’t like that,” Juushirou protested, and Shunsui grimaced.

“It might be exactly like that — we don’t know yet,” he owned. “It is a risk, Kai. A big one, which is why we’re not involving you more than we need to. But about the Rukon, that’s another matter. We believe that Keitarou is coming here, and we believe he’s waiting for the departure to the Real World. We also believe his current base — his permanent one — is in Rukongai still. To be specific, we think it’s in the Spiritless Zone.”

“The Spiritless...” Kai faltered, shaking his head. “Even though we swarmed all over it?”

“Because of that, and because of the supplies that exist there,” Juushirou said gravely. “Ketsui and Izumi already put together scientific evidence that indicates the gate to the Real World was probably a red herring designed to do exactly what it did do. Keitarou has obviously travelled there, but there’s a big problem with the idea of him staying there longterm.”

“Which is?”

“The Plus Souls in the Rukon, who Keitarou and his family are currently protecting.”

“Plus souls...” Kai’s lips thinned. “Kotetsu said something similar when I spoke to him just now — Keitarou and his family were providing for starving individuals in the Rukon.”

“We’ve had it from another, different source, too,” Shunsui said simply. “There’s no way he’d take Pluses to the Real World, especially not ones who are already tainted with spirit power. Juu and I think he’s probably using this populace to test his current scientific theories, and so he would seek to protect them. They’d also know too much about him if they were to be caught and interrogated — so he can’t leave them behind. The only place he can move them in safety without anyone here noticing is from a part of Rukongai we consider abandoned to a part which we’ve already inspected and cleared of suspicious activity. By taking them there, there’s no longer a need to obtain food from outside to support them. He can continue with his own plans regardless.”

“I see,” Kai rubbed his chin, then he nodded. ‘It makes sense,’ he admitted. “If Keitarou does have such an entourage, then it’s logical. But listen, both of you. I understand how you feel about the Real World, but I think you ought to hold off. Let it happen as it’s planned.”

“Let it happen?” Juushirou stared. “But if it means splitting our forces...?”

“Kotetsu told me one other thing that bothers me, and it bothers me enough to make me think that we ought to continue exactly as scheduled, even if it means taking risks,” Kai spoke darkly, lowering his voice. “He said there was a spy in the Gotei, that Suzuki confirmed it, but that even Suzuki didn’t know who that spy was.”

“A spy... in the Gotei?” Shunsui’s expression became grim. “Hirata made that suggestion way back at the start of all of this, but with the discovery of Suzuki and his obvious insider knowledge and concealment skills, the line of investigation disappeared. Now you’re saying we should’ve fed Hirata’s paranoia and kept with it? Tenichi didn’t manage to tell you any more than that, I suppose? No hint as to what kind of rank this person has, or how long they’ve been here among us?”

“No. He said he didn’t know anything, and this time I believed him,” Kai sighed. “He’s pretty much shattered in terms of his defiance, but he’ll talk about things readily enough now he has no room to lie his way out any more. If that’s true, though, it means Keitarou’s been outthinking us for a lot longer than we realised, and we have to be very careful what we say and to whom.”

“I hope that you consider us above suspicion,” Shunsui offered his most innocent expression and Kai snorted.

“Even if you are both reckless, deciding on idiotic plans of your own that bend rules and confound the Council, I don’t think you’d spy for a man like that,” he said disparagingly. “This isn’t a joking matter, though. It’s very real, and it’s likely Keitarou’s had this in place since, probably, before the Spiritless Zone massacre. Certainly since before Souja-dono’s death.”

“We have good reason to believe that was an accident of timing,” Juushirou said thoughtfully. “Keitarou didn’t mean Souja to die, but he didn’t know it would happen before it did. We’ve focused far too much on his motives towards the Endou, but I think we need to start considering things differently. He’s always hated the Clans, so attempting to take control of one is probably unlikely. Killing Souja brought attention his way and confirmed his involvement, so I can imagine he wouldn’t have done it if he could’ve avoided it. We’ve spent too long thinking of that and not enough thinking about what else might’ve been going on in Rukongai... or here, right under our noses.”

“I imagine, if there’s a spy in the Gotei, it would have to be someone of considerable rank and influence,” Shunsui murmured. “A Captain or a Vice Captain, something of that nature.”

“Someone so high?” Juushirou looked troubled, and Shunsui nodded.

“Captains and Vice Captains have the most freedom and access around Seireitei, and know the most about shinigami plans of action,” he agreed. “Remember the document Nagesu-sama gave you? It stated there were no souls left outside of the Spiritless Zone — but what if that wasn’t a mistake or Keitarou’s sleight of hand? What if he’s had an agent in place since before even that happened, and that’s why there’s such a glaring oversight in the official records? It could be someone named or someone who isn’t listed... someone who removed themselves before publication, or someone who trusted their name would not be seen as suspicious even if it was recorded. I don’t like thinking it either, Juu, but if we believe Tenichi’s testimony, either one of our comrades, or one of Kai’s, is not operating on the level. Even if we rule out those like Enishi and Sora who would probably sooner slit their own throats than do anything dishonourable, and of course, Hirata himself, it still leaves plenty of suspects. The question is, do we believe Tenichi is right? Kai does, but do we?”

“If Kai does, I do,” Juushirou sighed heavily. “I’ll try and verify it later myself, if I’m able to. I might be able to find out more about it... if I ask the right questions.”

“Do that,” Shunsui nodded. “And whilst you’re at it, ask why, if he’s insisting on being so helpful and isn’t about to cause trouble, he didn’t mention it sooner.”

“He might not know,” Juushirou objected, and Shunsui snorted.

“Do you really believe that?” he asked, incredulously. “Be sensible, Juu. Of course he knows. He probably still knows things he hasn’t told you — and you need to be on your guard to them, even if you do believe his story.”

“This he you’re talking about — one of the Kitsune?” Kai asked quizzically, and Shunsui frowned, shaking his head.

“Better not ask,” he said succinctly, but Kai’s eyes became slits of curiosity.

“No, I’m asking,” he said softly. “I’m asking, because now I know about the Kitsune, I figure if it was to do with them, you’d tell me. And I spoke to both of them myself, and they didn’t seem inclined to be furtive or secretive in my presence, not once they knew I was trusted by both Ukitake and Hirata. This is bugging me, though, given what you said earlier. It makes me think that you're... communicating with someone dangerous. Someone that the whole of Seireitei is looking for... but whose position, for some reason, you don't feel inclined to disclose."

Juushirou and Shunsui exchanged glances again, and Kai knew that he was right. He sighed, rubbing his brow.

"I knew it. When I called you the troublesome twosome to Saku, I was underestimating, as usual," he said heavily.

"You said such cruel things about us to Saku-chan?" Shunsui adopted a wounded look, but Kai was not fooled. He shook his head.

"You are talking to Aizen Kohaku," he said quietly. "I don't know how, or where, or why. I don't even want to know those things, probably, but I know that it's true. Aizen Sakaki is dead, Aizen Katsura was hunted and hounded from the Seventh and patrols are still deep into the District lands looking for him. Of Kohaku, though, we know nothing. Yet now, all of a sudden..."

"It's not really all of a sudden, Kai," Juushirou let out his breath in a rush of resignation, shaking his head. "I didn't want to involve you, but if you've seen that far, then I have no choice. You'll report the matter to Midori-sama, and I need you not to do that, at least for now. It's not the way you think it is — Kohaku isn't the person you think he is."

"So I'm right. You are in contact with him?"

"More than that," Shunsui spoke grimly. "Juushirou's been taking care of him for the past several weeks. Unbeknownst to any of us, he's been right here in our midst all that time."

"What?" Kai visibly whitened, and Juushirou nodded.

"I didn't know it myself till very recently," he said unwillingly. "I haven't been suppressing important information until these last few days, I promise. It threw me for six as much as it's probably throwing you — but Kohaku has been in Gotei custody... my custody... for some time now. It was Kohaku who brought Souja back from Rukongai."

"Your waif and stray," Kai looked perturbed. "He came back with Souja, so he seemed like an ally, but all the time..."

"Juushirou believes he's not Seireitei's enemy," Shunsui said pensively. “He thinks that Kohaku’s motives are different from his kin, and that he wants to prevent people from dying, not cause it. He hasn’t offered any information on Keitarou’s location — claims he doesn’t know where his father is — and he created a disturbance to allow his brother Katsura to escape — but despite this, Juu’s decided to believe in him anyhow.”

“Shunsui!” Juushirou looked annoyed, and Shunsui spread his hands.

“I trust in Juu, so I’m going along with this,” he added. “I’m probably the bigger fool, but I figure it’s better to know what’s happening than not. Juu won’t turn him in, Kai, and if you or I did, It’s Juu who’ll get into big trouble. I don’t know if this faith is justified or not — or if Kohaku’s information can be trusted — but he did tell us about the souls in the Rukon, which you say Tenichi’s backed up. He mentioned nothing about a spy, though...” he glanced at Juushirou, who shook his head.

“I will ask him,” he repeated. “Kai, please. I know you don’t like it, I can tell by your expression, but the Council passed a dictum that Keitarou’s children can be killed on sight. I don’t know if Koku is really my ally or not, but to date, he’s not guilty of any crime, at least not so far as we can prove. He did bring Souja back here, and he did put himself at risk to do so.”

“That could’ve been a trap, you realise?”

“Yes, but he also broke Keitarou’s power over the Kitsune, Joumei,” Juushirou continued. “Joumei hasn’t spoke about this publically, but before he left Thirteenth for Seventh, I called him to my office and asked him about it directly. He said that he knew Koku was Kohaku — he’d picked up as much from being under Keitarou’s control — but that he also knew that Koku had broken the spell and set him free, so he chose not to say anything publically. He believed... no, he said he felt that Koku wanted to genuinely help him, and so protected him accordingly, because of the kill-on-sight regulation.”

“That rule is creating headaches for everyone,” Shunsui interjected laconically. “If not for that, we’d be able to open a lot more discussion, even negotiation, in more secure circumstances than Thirteenth’s makeshift sick bay. Koku completely is in the power of the shinigami, in an injured and sufficiently weakened state — right at the moment at least — which gives us significant advantage and may well be why he’s chosen to speak to Juu. But since neither Juu or I have Council rights or the power to repeal something voted on by a present majority of illustrious Clan individuals, right now, this is all we can do.”

“None of us knew Koku had the power to break Keitarou’s control, either,” Juushirou added. “He could’ve just left well alone, but he didn’t. Even though Joumei killed his sister, Koku choseto help him. As Shunsui said, he’s currently a sick young boy. He’s clearly frightened, and I at least am certain he’s not a monster. Moreover, his ability to break Keitarou’s control without loss of life is something we may yet come to need.”

“Providing he can be convinced to use it in our favour,” Shunsui pointed out. “Right now revealing anything about him is too risky, so even though we’ve all heard the report about Ohara in effective kidou stasis in Seventh following the other day’s adventures, nothing has been done about it and Hirata doesn’t even know. In that light, Koku’s ability is a bit pointless, really.”

“But it is there,” Juushirou persisted, “and he used it once to help Joumei, so it’s not impossible to think he’d use it again, if we needed it.”

“And this power that can destroy the whole of Soul Society?”

“The power to see the future, as far as we can tell,” Shunsui said grimly. “Knowing your enemy’s every move even before they do is a pretty powerful strategy in its own right. Nobody said it was necessarily something physical. It appears to be something far, far more intricate and more suited to Keitarou’s preferred line of attack. Koku is without doubt the one who predicted Souja’s death. He’s also predicted other things.”

“He knew that Izumi was in danger at Thirteenth, before any of us could read the spiritual signals,” Juushirou agreed, “and he also saw Joumei and his people being attacked by Keitarou underground. On that occasion he begged me to go help them, and I know he was sincere. In all those cases, he sought to protect life, not end it. It’s also clear that Keitarou has been using this power — and roundly abusing the boy, from all I can tell, keeping him locked and chained in a hut and making him see horrific images over and over again — for his own ends, but that Koku himself has very little proper control over it. His reiryokuleaks, and he’s prone to slipping into dream states or trances on the least trigger. Mitsuki believes he’s genuinely unwell, and I agree with her. More, though, I’m a shinigami who trained to protect innocent souls from harm. So far all we know is that Koku is guilty of is being the son of a man Seireitei hates. We can’t justify killing him based on that evidence.”

“Juu’s of the school of thought that he’d rather a suspect commit a crime before he’s punished, though I can’t say I disagree,” Shunsui supplemented. “I don’t know what I think about the boy, but Juu’s shinigami rhetoric does make some sense. I don’t like the idea of the lad — or any other — being killed without a fair trial or hearing and right now, it’s clear he won’t get one. So for now, we’re saying nothing. If it backfires, and we’re still alive to answer for it, then doubtless we will — but in the meantime...”

“I see,” Kai pulled a graphic face, then nodded. “All right. I don’t like it, and it goes against my grain and my position, but all right. Find out from him what you can about the spy, and I’ll pretend we never had this conversation. And hope to God that your usual instincts to get yourselves into heaps of angst-ridden trouble aren’t firing at full power this time around.”

“We all hope that,” Shunsui acknowledged.

“Well?” Kai eyes them quizzically. “If you didn’t come here to tell me about Kohaku, and you don’t really think I have the power to change the Real World trip, what do you want from me?”

“We already figured we wouldn’t be able to stop Nagesu-sama and the others from going, and now you’ve mentioned the possibility of a spy, probably we ought not try any further,” Juushirou reflected. “Especially if we don’t know who we’re dealing with. But, of all the Vice Captains, you have a certain amount of autonomy of your own. Moreover, your Captain is going to the Real World... you and your people aren’t.”

“You’ve also already made a trip to the Spiritless Zone, and know it well,” Shunsui supplemented. “So, we wondered...”

“If, when Midori-nee goes to the Real World, I might take Saku and some others and pay a visit to the Rukon on your behalf?” Kai surmised. Juushirou nodded.

“Normally clearance would be required by a senior Captain or officer on duty,” he agreed, “but being that you are the senior commander for the Onmitsukidou, and that your Captain will be away... not to mention that Onmitsukidou can operate Senkaimon without giving an alert to any other sector of Seireitei...”

“You thought you could pull on old ties of friendship and convince me to bend rules based on your whims?”

“Something like that,” Shunsui grinned benignly. “Well? How about it? If Keitarou’s going to attack here, and the Real World is where he and his base are not, then the Spiritless Zone is a good bet for rounding up evidence, witnesses and anyone else involved in what might be a much bigger conspiracy. You might find your missing Onmitsukidou turncoat, you never know, and it's an attack nobody on that side will be expecting. Even if Keitarou has been using Koku's power, Koku is with us right now, not with him. And there'll be nothing here to tip him off. We'll play along with the spy's expectations, and let the trip go ahead, so it seems as though we're all fooled into believing he's in the Real World. We'll pull out all the stops and make sure Keitarou doesn't get to have his way with us — Juu, Hirata and I will all be here, and the bulk of the Gotei will be left behind, whether the spy remains here or goes. It might even be an opportunity to unmask them, providing Koku can't tell us anything we need to know. If you and your people close off his escape route... he'll have nowhere to turn to. The Gotei will be everywhere, and, at last, we might be able to stop him in his tracks."

"That's a pretty sneaky plot," Kai observed, rubbing his chin, "but I see the sense in it, and it might just work. At least, if we close off all the escape routes, he'll have to show himself somewhere. And once that happens, we have a chance to nail him once and for all."

He nodded his head.

"All right. I'm in."

"A spy?"

Kohaku sipped his mug of green tea gingerly, setting the vessel down on the shelf beside his bed and casting Juushirou a wary look. "Now why would you think I'd know anything about that? I've been here with all of you — and hardly in a position to know all the dealings of a secret agent — if one should even exist."

"One apparently does exist, on the testimony of Kotetsu Tenichi, and the word of Suzuki Naoto," Juushirou sank down on the end of the bed, pushing aside the two new books that Kirio had brought from the library to make room for him to sit. "I know you don't intend on telling us where Keitarou is, Koku, but this is about people's lives, and I care about that. If you know something so important to the safety of my friends and comrades, then your not telling me could result in people getting killed. That's the reality of this."

"Seireitei is going to war with my father, isn't it?" Kohaku's expression became haunted. "I don't want that, Ukitake-dono. I don't want you to fight him. Please, promise me you won't fight my father."

You won't let... you won't let him. It'll come in waves, if you do... and I don't..."

He faltered, rubbing his eyes as though by doing so he could bring back his thread of rational thought, and Juushirou waited in silence for the boy to compose himself, noticing the faint trembling of his hands and the obvious skinny state of his body beneath the robe. The garment was an average slender size, yet it hung loosely over Kohaku's frame, and as the young boy met his gaze once more, the Captain was struck by how hollow his companion's features appeared to be.

"You look like you've lost weight," he murmured, genuine concern in his voice. "You're not eating properly again, Koku... you'll only do yourself damage if you keep that up. Mitsuki's mentioned to me how much you pick at your food, or how sometimes you refuse it altogether. Don't you realise how important good nutrition is? You'll never regain your strength otherwise."

"There's no point in rebuilding strength," Kohaku spoke matter-of-factly. "I don't know what my future is, Ukitake-dono, but I know I will die in Seireitei. I know that I have to die here. It's a fate I can't avoid. Allowing myself to take advantage of your kindness is wrong. I don't belong here... you're not obliged to do anything for me, and I don't want to be the reason you or your companions are killed."

"It's not taking advantage, if I insist on it," Juushirou pointed out. "Your prediction might be true, but it isn't confined to when, only to where. Like this, you'll only hasten that prediction, not stay it. There's even less sense in me risking my life to protect you if you're already dead — so do us both a favour and take better care of yourself. I know you're feeling rough, and you've had a lot of bad dreams lately — but your body can't recover without a proper diet."

"I've never really had one," Kohaku reflected. "I'm not sure my body would know what to do with proper food."

He sighed, glancing at his fingers, then,

"You asked about the spy, though, and this isn't answering that," he said, tiredness clear in his voice. "It's an easy question for me to answer, Ukitake-dono. I'm just not sure I ought to talk to you about any more than I already did. I am... betraying my family each time I do. But when you say such kind things to me... I know you mean them. I can sense it from you... and it makes me want to help. You're really not scared of me, even now you know who I am, are you? My brother aside, there's never been anyone like that... who knew me as me, but didn't want to either use me or avoid me."

"I'm not scared of you," Juushirou assured him, 'and whatever your politics prove to be, so far you've committed no crime. So long as that's the case, I won't betray you. I don't agree with the Council's current decision regarding you. That is a knee-jerk reaction built of fear but it isn't justice and I believe in justice.' He grinned sheepishly, brushing the fingers of his right hand against the hilt of his sleeping sword. "My zanpakutou's name is Sougyo no Kotowari. That should tell you that justice is important to me."

"Sougyo... no... Kotowari," Kohaku looked thoughtful, extending his fingers slowly towards the sheathed weapon, pausing about an inch from the black scabbard and offering Juushirou a faint smile. "I can feel them. I can't speak to them, or see them, but I sense... the two fish that live inside your blade. I can almost hear waves when I do this. It's soothing, somehow. Maybe that's why I want to trust in your kindness, Ukitake-dono. Your sword makes me feel at peace. Even though it's a weapon, and it's blade is sharpened so it can kill, it feels as though there are no dark shadows, and no ulterior motives here."

"Well, my motives are as I've told you. To prevent a war, if possible, and to protect my companions and anyone else who is in danger," Juushirou said matter-of-factly. "I carry my sword to defend and protect, not to shed innocent blood. Keitarou is my enemy, because he threatens those things. I can't change that — but it doesn't have to make you and I enemies."

"Maybe it does," Kohaku withdrew his hand, letting out a sigh. "All right. About Father's spy... all I know is that there is someone within the Gotei who has been giving information to him. I don't know who it is, and nor does anyone else. Mother, Katsu-nii, Sakaki, Kurotsuchi — we all knew such a person existed, but nothing about them. Father kept it that way. He didn't want any risk of this person pulling away from him... and I've never tried to find out."

"Could you find out?"

"Maybe," Kohaku admitted. "Why... is that what you're really asking me? Do you want me to try?"

"I had imagined you'd be unwilling, being that this is a person your father trusts in."

"I know," Kohaku rubbed his brows. "I'm not sure if I ought to even attempt it, or what kind of problems it might create if I did. But Ukitake-dono, there are things that are important for me to protect too. A lot is going on in my head right now, and I can't put it into words, even if I wanted to. Pieces of things I've seen, things I've understood... the path I might have to follow, the choices I'm going to have to make. I've always tried to keep out of it, but that's in a way my fault. I can't do that any more. I don't know if telling you what you want to know is a help or a hindrance, but at least, maybe if I do something..."

He closed his eyes, a faint shiver running through his undernourished body, and Juushirou sighed, resting a hand on his shoulder.

"I don't want you to hurt yourself any more using power you can't control," he said softly. "You just said I didn't want to use your power, and I don't. I'm not interested in seeing the future — if we can't find out for ourselves, we're not very good shinigami. Our futures don't rest in your hands, you know. Even if you see things that haven't happened, they're still things we decide to do and they were before you came here. You need to be resting and healing... that's your job right now. I shouldn't have asked you... it was my bad."

Kohaku's eyes snapped open at this, and Juushirou was startled to see tears glittering in their depths.

"I'm sorry," he whispered, a note of something Juushirou couldn't place in his tones. "You're always so kind to me. I can see so many things, Ukitake-dono, but I can't... ever really see... why you care so much what happens to me. I hear every word you say, but it doesn't tally with anything I've ever encountered before."

He swallowed hard, then,

"Father has mentioned you to me before," he said uneasily. "Not in a lot of detail, just from time to time. When talking about the Gotei... sometimes your name came up. I knew he'd met you... and that you'd crossed in some way. You'd been under the control of his sword, correct?"

"Yes," Juushirou agreed, "but it was a long time ago and I wasn't as well trained as I am now. He couldn't do the same to me again."

"No, he couldn't," Kohaku shook his head, reaching out to grasp Juushirou's fingers in his. "Father's Bankai power only works on a person once. He couldn't ever control you again, even if he wanted to."

"I see," Juushirou's expression became thoughtful. "Did he tell you that?"

Kohaku nodded.

“He told me you were the first person he used Bankai on who lived,” he said softly, “so he didn’t know that limitation existed to begin with. He told me that he tried, once, to reestablish his power over you, but it failed. Still, he thought that was an exception, because the circumstances were unusual. When I was a child, he experimented with his spirit power a lot. He made a lot of improvements to his sword, but one thing he could never manage to do was utilise the Bankai release twice on the same soul.”

He sighed.

“The other day you talked about sacrificing innocent people in Seventh District,” he murmured, “and it reminded me of... things. I knew what you said was true, even if I hadn’t wanted to think about it. Father... experimented on people in the Rukon village... sometimes he’d bring them to my hut under his control — to a place they’d never dare go on their own. He chose it so Mother wouldn’t find out and get angry about what he’d done. He’d snare them, then release them, but no matter how he tried, he couldn’t repeat the effect. A lot of them... I think he killed them so they could never talk about his tests or about the fact they’d seen me, but that time is so soaked in nightmares I might..have imagined that as a real memory when it was not.”

“The hut was soaked in an aura of death,” Juushirou pursed his lips. “Shunsui said as much, and we had thought it was from your leaky reiryoku — your dreams of death. Maybe it wasn’t that at all. It’s true that since you’ve been here there’s been nothing like that from your aura. Even when you’ve made us see things... so maybe it wasn’t entirely your reiryoku Shunsui felt there. Maybe it was pieces of the people Keitarou killed in order to keep his secret — and maybe that’s why being in that hut continued to make you hallucinate so much, thus adding to the negativity in the atmosphere. A vicious circle, with Keitarou right at the heart of it. Somehow that sounds right.”

“Mm...” Kohaku frowned, shrugging his shoulders. “I don’t know. I don’t remember. All I know is that the sword Father made helped me to confine enough spirit power for me to retain longer periods of rationality and so I could leave the hut completely. My memories before that are all very hazy — but I’m quite sure I’m right about Chudokuga’s bankai. These were people who were far weaker spiritually than you or the silver fox, but he couldn’t ensnare them twice. Father physically can’t possess you again, Ukitake-dono... but that fact alone might bring you into danger. If he can’t control you, he might... he might try to remove you.”

“Meaning I might become a target?”

"I think you probably already are. Like Edogawa-san was," Kohaku bit his lip.

"Mitsuki was attacked on purpose?" Juushirou's expression registered shock, and Kohaku nodded.

"To drive you into distraction and despair," he said miserably. "He considers you a problem and he was looking for a solution. Mother was cross, though, about Edogawa-san, and Katsura didn't want to kill her, so Father hasn't tried to do it again since."

"Then everything that happened to Mitsuki is some way my fault, too."

"It's not your fault," Kohaku shook his head. "It's just that Father worries about the fact he knows he can't control you again, and he knows you had the potential to become strong. I think that means next time he'll try and hurt you directly... and probably... not just you."

"Shunsui, maybe?"

"I think so."

"Why are you telling me this? Your father would be angry if he knew you were."

"I know he would," Kohaku admitted, "but even though I love my father, I know what kind of a man he is and what he will do. And I... I don't want him to kill people here. Most of all, though, I don't want him to kill you. You've looked after me and trusted me and protected me even though I've lied so much. I don't want you to die because you shielded me... so I wanted you to be warned, just... just in case."

Juushirou was silent for a moment, then he grinned, patting his companion lightly on the head.

"I appreciate the warning," he said matter-of-factly, "but I'm used to being in positions of danger, and Keitarou doesn't scare me, either. I'm not as naive as I used to be where he is concerned, and I won't be killed by him. I'm not going to be so easily fooled, Koku. Don't worry. If I encounter your father, we'll be having serious words about his parenting skills, but I won't give him a chance to try and hurt me."

Kohaku looked troubled, then he shrugged.

"I've said all I can," he responded, resignation in his expression. "Ukitake-dono, I don't know anything about the spy, and even if I was to try and see it now, I don't know if I'm strong enough. Using my reiryoku on Joumei-dono took a lot out of me, and I'm not full strength yet... not by a long shot. Much of my spirit power is in the sword Father made, and I don't know where it is, even if I wanted to retrieve it. But when you mentioned the subject, I did... I did have a flash of memory, about a dream... or something that I had not so long ago. I don't know if it means anything, and I don't remember it all clearly, but it was the night Sakaki died. I saw the fox kill her, but then, it all blurred into something else. It was like dead souls in the Rukon were calling out to my sister's, either in grief or in solidarity. And bit by bit they became clearer, like real people, with faces and minds. Little by little I was absorbed into one of them. There was rain, and a fight... and a man called Sakanoue. Does that name mean anything to you?"

"Sakanoue," Juushirou's eyes became slits. "Tsunemori mentioned you saying that, and I didn't have a chance to raise it with you yet. Sakanoue was once a Vice Captain here, but I never knew him. Why?"

"Sakanoue... Heiji?"

"I guess so, though I'd have to check for sure. Why?"

"A man who was killed by another shinigami?"

"Sakanoue was killed by Hollow creatures," Juushirou objected, and Kohaku reached out to touch the fabric of Juushirou's haori, giving a little shake of his head.

"The man who killed him wore one of these," he said softly. "It was just like yours, but I didn't see the number. It was blurry and wet and I didn't see the man's face. He had a sword, and he killed Sakanoue. Sakanoue wanted to be killed. He was in pain... he'd become a Hollow. The other man... killed him. And he was sad... very sad. I felt as though... he was drowning in sadness. As though the person he killed was important to him — maybe even his son."

Juushirou paled, his expression stricken.

"Killed by a man who might have been his father," he whispered. "Are you sure about that? All the official records say otherwise... but Koku, are you certain of what you saw?"

"Yes," Kohaku nodded his head, his eyes big at Juushirou's reaction. "What is it? Did I say something important?"

"Tell me, Koku, as far as you know, was your father doing experiments on Hollows in Rukongai twenty five years ago?"

"I wasn't alive that long ago," Kohaku pointed out, "but that would've been when he was injured. He almost died, Ukitake-dono. Mother had to nurse him, otherwise he would have. He wasn't able to do anything, let alone practice his science."

“So the thing you saw... it had no connection to your Father?”

“I never saw or heard of it before,” Kohaku shook his head. “The man with the sword... the shinigami with the white coat... he yelled out a name too. I don’t remember what it was, but it began with a ‘K’. It wasn’t Father’s name. It was a name I didn’t know at all.”

“Then the Urahara were right. What happened in Rukongai wasn’t Keitarou’s work, but something or someone else,” Juushirou’s expression darkened, and he got to his feet. “I don’t know if what you’ve told me is important or if it isn’t. Clearly it means something we’ve been told isn’t true, but there may be reasons for that and I don’t want to jump to conclusions without the proper proof. However, if Sakanoue died the way you say he did, it would explain a good deal. I have a strong suspicion I know who the man wearing a haori was. The only question is, why was that truth never reported? If things were as you say... if it wasn’t a case of murder, but of a subordinate officer beyond all help...”

“Sakanoue begged the man to do it,” Kohaku agreed. “The man didn’t want to, but he had to. It wasn’t murder, Ukitake-dono. It was... it was mercy. I don’t like death, but even I... understand that.”

He shivered again, and Juushirou sighed, moving to pull the blankets up around the young man’s hunched body.

“You rest now, and don’t think on this any more,” he said gently. “I’ll send someone with some porridge or soup and I want you to eat as much as you can, all right? For the time being, that’s the most important thing you can do. Leave the other stuff with me. I’ll keep your warning in mind, but right now I have to work out what to do about what you’ve told me, and how it fits into what’s happening here and now.”

Something was going on within the boundaries of the Shinigami heartland.

Minami paused at the edge of Haruna’s bustling market, turning to glance in the direction of the barrier, a frown of consternation crossing her features. Though it was not uncommon to sense flurries of spiritual activity from over the other side of the wall, in the past few days there had been far more than usual. The local farmers who came to the centre of the town to trade had complained of distressed livestock and trampled crops, and Minami herself had not tried to trade her weaving there for several days together, anxious at what might happen if she found herself trapped and unable to make a quick escape when trouble hit. Although not all of the residents were as sensitive to spiritual signals as Minami herself had learned to be, from the buzz of conversation she had heard from other shoppers, she was not alone in sensing the change in the air.

Something was afoot.

Pulling her thin summer wrap more firmly over her shoulders to stifle the sudden shiver that ran down her spine, Minami turned her back on the market, making her way quickly away from the crowds of people before any of them could see the expression on her face. She did not know if it was Keitarou, nor if the recent activity were signs of the fight beginning, but she knew that she no longer wanted anything to do with it. The waves of darkness and death haunted her sleep, and she had realised with sudden, horrifying clarity how much power challenging the shinigami would really require.

Keitarou-sama might be able to think about it, but for ordinary folk like us... there's no chance. If they ever discovered how much we were involved in the abductions... it would be the deaths of all of us.

She drew breath sharply, stopping in her tracks as another, more terrifying thought crossed her mind.

But if Keitarou-sama finds out that nobody here is ready or willing to rise up against the shinigami when such swells of energy as that pour out from beyond the gates... what would he do? If he knew... what would he do?

She glanced down at the basket that hung over her arm, moving her fingers to twitch back the cloth just enough so that she could view the contents.

I never realised how much I came to hide things, because of that man. How much I'm now suspicious of people noticing changes... people who might be my friends, people who might be my enemies. People who might talk about things to the shinigami, or to Keitarou...

She pulled back the cloth, quickening her pace towards her home once more.

No, there's no other choice. Staying here has become too much of a risk. Keitarou-sama might be bringing a war, but if he is... I no longer want to be a pawn in it.

Despite her paranoia, nobody interrupted her journey home and it was with a sigh of relief that she let herself into the small dwelling, setting the basket down on the unit and removing the shawl from around her shoulders, hanging it on its usual hook. Though it was still a bright, sunshiny day, she crossed the floor quickly, moving to fasten the shutters so that only the thinnest lines of light pierced through the cracks into the wood, illuminating the chamber in an odd, twilight gloom.

A noise from the doorway told her that she was no longer alone, and her heart leapt in her throat, relief coursing through her that she had taken the precaution of shutting the window slats before anyone outside had had cause to see in.

“Minami?”

His voice was soft, slightly hoarse and blurry, as though her coming home had woken him from a deep sleep, and as she turned to meet his gaze, Minami was able to make out the hazy expression in the confused golden eyes, his dark hair muzzy and sticking up all ways around his head. Despite her initial annoyance, her heart softened at the sight of him, and she tut-tutted under her breath, moving across the chamber to pat down the unruly mane before loosing and retying the piece of white ribbon that held it back from his face.

“I thought I told you that coming up here in the day was dangerous,” she spoke gently, her tones mildly scolding, and her companion frowned, rubbing his eyes as though trying to bring himself into a better state of awareness.

“You did,” he acknowledged at length. “I forgot. I’m sorry. I just woke up.”

“I should’ve woken you before I left, but you were sleeping so much more peacefully than you have done, and I wanted you to rest,” Minami finished tying the hair ribbon, resting a hand reassuringly on his shoulder. “I don’t like it when you have nightmares. I don’t know how to reach you and bring you out of them — I don’t know what you see, and you won’t share them with me.”

“I don’t even know myself,” the man admitted, running his hands through the hair that Minami had just neatened and rendering it almost as messy as it had been moments before. “When I wake, I remember nothing. Fragments... that’s all. Nothing that makes sense. Nothing at all.”

“But you remember me, don’t you?” Minami eyed the skewed ribbon in resignation, before meeting his gaze with a heartfelt one of her own. “You came back to me, so you must... mustn’t you? You know that you can trust me, so you must remember...?”

She faltered, remembering the shock she had had when, some weeks earlier, she had returned home from market to find him huddled and alone on her living room floor, staring up at her with the bewildered, wary eyes of prey awaiting a predator’s attack. Though he had been robed exactly as he had been the last time she had seen him, it had been the expression in the golden gaze that had torn her heart from her chest and ripped it into shreds of both grief and overwhelming joy. The face was different, altered permanently by the mass of experiments he had undergone to save his life, and his clothing was foreign and stained with blood. His eyes, though, were full of life she had not seen there in a decade, and at the sight of him, all she had been able to do was fling her arms around him, sobbing pitifully into his chest. He had said nothing, and at first, had not even tried to move, but, little by little, Minami had felt his fingers close hesitantly around her upper body, and then, in a whisper so soft she felt sure she must have imagined it, she had heard the three syllables of her name.

“Minami.”

He sighed now, lowering his hands from his head and reaching out to take her fingers in his.

“I was wandering for a long time in a deep, dark tunnel,” he said softly. “I don’t know how, or why, or who led me there. Sometimes there’s a voice, but that is like a distant memory, drifting away and I don’t remember who it was who spoke to me. I know... bad things happened. Something happened so that I don’t remember them, but in my dreams... sometimes, I think that’s what I see. Although I don’t remember, it’s how I feel, when I wake. As though everything that was ever important to me was taken away.”

“I wasn’t taken away,” Minami squeezed the pale fingers in hers. “I was always here, Naoto. I’ve been here since the start, and I’ve never given up. A woman never does, you know, when she loves a man. Even if you don’t remember how we met, or when we became husband and wife, I don’t mind. So long as you trust me, and want to be here, with me, that’s all I need. Maybe the memories will come back, or maybe they won’t. I don’t know what happened to you to make you this way, so I can’t tell for sure. It’s all right, though. We don’t need to worry about the past. We need to look to the future, instead.”

“The future,” Her companion echoed the word as though it were filled with wonder and mystery, and despite herself, Minami grinned, reaching up on tiptoes to kiss him on the forehead.

“Yes,” she said lightly. “The future we always intended to have, before problems intervened.”

“Problems?” At this he pulled back from her, eying her in dismay.

“Did I... did I cause trouble for you, Minami? I can’t imagine ever wanting to do that, but if I did...”

“Men always cause problems for the women who love them,” Despite herself, Minami laughed, shrugging her shoulders. “It’s a burden we accept when we choose to marry them. It’s all right, Naoto-kun. All’s well now, and that’s all that matters to me.”

She slipped her hand into his properly, leading him across the chamber to the basket of food.

“I bought your favourite plums,” she added. “You used to take me to the river when we were courting, and you’d always bring plums, but eat most of them yourself. I thought it might help you remember times we spent together... those memories at least, I’d like you to retrieve.”

“Plums,” her companion said thoughtfully. “I don’t remember, but if you say I do, then I believe you. I’m hungry, anyhow. I haven’t had anything to eat today yet.”

“Well, you can help me prepare them,” Minami told him firmly, “and whilst we do, I’m going to talk to you about something else... about us leaving here and settling somewhere else, far from this place.”

“Leaving?” A look of consternation crossed his features. “But this is... our home. Isn’t it? We grew up here... didn’t we?”

“We did.” A look of bittersweet nostalgia glittered in Minami’s eyes, and she nodded her head. “We did, but I think it’s better that we don’t stay. You’ve been away a long time, and people here are superstitious. They don’t expect the dead to rise up again — and a lot of our old friends believe you died a long time ago.”

There was silence, then,

“Did I?”

“Did you what?”

“Die, a long time ago?”

“Silly,” Minami patted him lightly on the head. “If you had, why would you be here now? Don’t be stupid.”

“Maybe it is stupid,” Naoto rubbed his head absently. “Just, I feel as though I awoke from a deep sleep, and half of who I was was missing. I came here on instinct, but I don’t remember why or who sent me. If anyone even did. Everything is so jumbled up inside of me, and I can't piece enough together to understand. I thought... maybe if I died... maybe that would explain..."

"Do you think I'd be married to a dead man?" Minami arched an eyebrow. "Don't say such stupid things again. You didn't die, but a lot of people thought you did because you were gone for so long. That's all, so don't dwell on it any more."

She pulled two small plates from the cupboard, setting them down on the unit with a thud, as if to affirm her statement.

"We'll eat, and we'll plan a fresh start in a new part of Seireitei," she continued. "I've heard of a lot of places where thread is cheap and plentiful and there are many more dye colours available at market, so it won't be difficult to find trade. Here it's getting more expensive to produce and with all the people travelling over the border, there is a lot of competition during the Spring and Autumn seasons. I've been saving my money, little by little, so we have enough to buy a little land, too. We could grow some of our own things, and then we wouldn't have to haggle at market quite so much. You used to be good with that kind of thing, when we were small, so you could do that whilst I focused on my weaving. Besides, this place here is too close to the past and too close to danger. I don't want you in danger any more, Naoto-kun. Your job before... it was very dangerous. I don't want that any more... I want to leave here and start anew, somewhere peaceful where nobody asks us any questions and we can just be as we were before. I don't want to be always worrying about you. I want to be a proper wife, have a family, do the things we intended on doing when we married."

"Minami," the pale cheeks flushed lightly with colour, and a genuine smile of pleasure crossed Naoto's lips. He nodded.

"If you say so, then I trust you," he said. "If you want that, we'll go somewhere else. I don't mind."

Minami let out her breath in a rush, her gaze flitting to the slatted window.

The Shinigami opened one of those yawning holes into nothing that usually spells nothing but disaster. It was a big one, too, and there was a lot of spirit power, which means a lot of individuals travelling through. I don't know where they're going or why, but I was the wife of an Onmitsukidou long enough to know what those things are for. Keitarou-sama's movements, and yours, were always through those things. I don't want you to be here if he or the shinigami come, and I don't want you to remember or recognise anything about them either. I want you to forget the last ten years, and whatever it was Keitarou did to you to pull you away from me. I don't know how you came to be like this, but even with your memories half missing, you're more alive than you've been for so long. And... I want to keep you this way. Whatever lengths it takes, Naoto, this time I'm going to protect you. The shinigami, the Onmitsukidou and everything else is in the past. Let me remember the horrible times for you. When we leave this place, nobody will know where to find us, and that's for the best.

At least from Haruna, crossing the border is no challenge. We'll go deep into District Three, far from Shihouin land, and start over. Maybe even into District Four — who knows? I've heard that border is easy to cross, too, and District Four is meant to be both beautiful and peaceful.

She shot him a sidelong glance, watching him take a plum, glance at it, and then, clumsily, pick up the knife and begin to pare and peel it.

You're the only reason I did anything for Keitarou-sama. If I have you, I don't want anything to do with him. So I'll take you and I'll run. We'll go to ground. And then...

Her eyes narrowed.

This time Suzuki Naoto will really have died. I've called you Naoto since you appeared, so you answer to it now, but when you arrived, the only name you could remember was the one that man gave you. Much as I wish it were otherwise, it's the one that's ingrained in your heart and your memories now. Maybe accepting that is also accepting the Suzuki Naoto I married has died and gone... but even if I couldn't do that, he'll remain a wanted man. Naoto might not remember doing it, but I heard the rumours about the escaped prisoner who murdered a man called Kounou and fled into the night. I alone remember who Kounou was and what he did to you, so I knew it was you and it was his blood that covered you when I first found you. Suzuki Naoto might've been innocent then, but now, ten years on, they really would hunt him down and kill him. Better that he disappear forever... which means playing along with your delusion and accepting that from now on our name will have to be Kurotsuchi. Wherever we go and whatever we do, there's no escaping it. If that's who you believe you are, that's who I'll have to accept you as... even if it hurts every time I bring it to mind.

"Minami?" Naoto's sticky right hand brushed against her shoulder, adorning the soft pink fabric with plum fingerprints, and she turned, offering him a rueful smile.

"I was just thinking," she said thoughtfully. "When we find a new place to live, we ought to repeat our wedding vows. You don't remember them, and it's been a long time. It would be a nice way to begin our new lives back together, don't you think?"

Author's Note: Suzuki/Kurotsuchi

Well, people poked me and said he needed closure, and I did have it in mind to do this at some point before the story ended. This will probably be his last appearance in the story, so the path from this point (whether he regains his memories, and so on), are for the reader to decide and imagine for themselves. Instead of writing a boring list of people going through a Senkaimon into the Real World, you got this scene instead ;)

Also, here's Kai, being mean to his prisoner and to Juu and Shun. ;) He's always so refreshing to write.

57. Kyouka's Message

Chapter Fifty Six: Kyouka's Message

The pathway was long and winding, taking him deep into the heart of a dense, rich forest of green.

Kohaku paused for a moment to catch his breath, glancing around him for any sign of a familiar landmark, but there was none. This was not Rukongai, nor was it the small part of Seireitei with which he was now familiar, but something else entirely, its ambience calm but innately surreal. He reached out a finger to brush it against the branches of the nearest tree, finding he could touch it, but the sensation felt odd and unreal, as though it were nothing more than a painted illusion into which he had somehow stepped.

He had never been here before, but something guided him forwards, ever deeper, along the deep, wooded path. It curved steeply, winding past things that, out of the corner of his eye he was sure he saw shimmer with light, but when he turned to glance at them, they were gone. Had he imagined them? Perhaps. They had been like ghosts against his awareness, but he was not afraid of them, and so he pressed on.

Was this a vision?

He paused for a moment, considering this. It was unusual for him to have such control of his mental faculties when in the grip of one of the psychic terrors that drove him to his knees, but there was something so strange in the aura here that he could not equate it with reality.

Could it be a dream?

He quickly discarded this thought. He did not dream. His dreams were reality, past, present or future — he did not see the chimeras of imagination that others did. Whatever this was, it was alien to him — but he did not feel in danger, and so he pressed on, through the ever thickening briars and ferns.

At the foot of the slope there was a door, a large, wooden construction nailed together from planks of oak. It too gave him a surreal feeling, for it appeared to have loomed out of the trees themselves, with nothing that it was obviously hinged to. The surface of the door was blank, except for a single brass plaque, into which were hammered two distinctively antiquated characters:

Future illusion?

He raised a finger to touch the tarnished characters, almost without realising he was going to, but as he did, a spark of something jumped from the plaque towards his hand, illuminating the frame of the door in a glow of eerie light. The divide creaked and swung away, revealing a pathway beyond, cloaked in pitch darkness. Whereas the outside world he had walked through had been daytime, this world beyond appeared to be night, but no stars or moon illuminated the sky, and in the gloom it was difficult to make out even the most basic shapes.

Kohaku faltered, unwilling to go through the door, and a sudden chill wind whipped through him, freezing him right to the core of his bones. It was not ice that had frozen him, but a spasm of fear, momentarily paralysing his heart.

Step forward, coward, else I will rip your limbs from your body and toss you inside in pieces myself.

Kohaku's eyes widened in dismay as from the left and right, the branches of the trees began to stretch and merge together, their twisted ends appearing like fingers reaching out to penetrate his upper body. They bent and swung in an attempt to snare his wrists and ankles, and the snags and dips in the trunks seemed suddenly like the scowling, screaming faces of demons. Before he knew what he was doing, Kohaku had darted through the open doorway into the blackness beyond.

There was no going back, for the door disappeared into nothing as soon as his feet touched the soft earth on the other side, and sweat beaded Kohaku's brow as a fresh wave of fear pervaded his young body. Although the surroundings were new to him, the voice had been all too familiar.

Kyouka? This is your doing, isn't it, Kyouka? Where are you? Why... why are you here? What do you intend to do to me now?

There was no response, just the warning ripple of the freezing wind at his back, encouraging to take first one step, then another forward into the unknown gloom.

Reluctantly Kohaku obeyed, finding that as he moved further, his eyes began to become accustomed to the dim light. Where at first he had seen nothing, he could now make out the reaching arches and domes of an unfamiliar building, its turrets and peaks set against the velvet canvas of the night sky. The lack of moon and stars reminded him of nights in Rukongai, and he set his teeth, realising that this odd shadowy structure was where he was meant to be heading.

I wish you'd tell me what you intend to do. I'm fed up of being treated like your toy. You delight in tormenting me, so it makes me even more suspicious that this place is so quiet.

At length he reached the building, resting his palms against the unfamiliar stone walls and feeling his way across towards something that might resemble a door or window through which he could gain entry. From here he could faintly sense the presence of something inside, but with the cold, warning breeze still lingering around him, he did not dare hesitate a second time.

Although it was still too dark to see, on touching the stone, images flashed through his mind and he realised that the building he was now standing outside was some kind of mediaeval fortress, yet not built in any style he had ever seen, not even in his wildest delusions. The windows were narrow and flanked by thicker stone, some of which were covered with long bars of iron, resembling a jail. This reminded Kohaku of his cage in the Rukon, and he shivered back, inadvertently tripping over his own feet and stumbling on the uneven ground. Putting out his hands to stop himself, he felt wood for the first time, letting out a yelp of surprise and dismay as it gave way beneath his touch. A second door creaked open, and Kohaku tumbled over into the entrance hall, dazed and confused.

Despite the darkness of the outside, this place was lit with torches in sconces dotted around what was a huge stone chamber, with high ceilings soaring up and up. The strange, musty smell of burning dust and cobweb told Kohaku that his entrance had somehow triggered flame in these alcoves, yet the place as a whole had been left in a state of severe neglect. Heavy tapestries hung against the wall, their embroidered surfaces so thick with dust and detritus that their bright colours had dulled and their images were all but concealed. Spider webs hung from every imaginable orifice, the dessicated remains of several scattered on the floor. Gazing at them, Kohaku was reminded of his father's sword spirit, and a sense of unease curled up inside of him.

"What is this place, Kyouka?" he demanded. "Why did you make me come here? What does it mean? All these spiders, all this dust... what does it mean?"

"Why are you asking me that?" the response was sullen and defiant, echoing out from nowhere into the stone chamber. "You were the one who chose it. This mess is yours, so don't complain to me about it now."

"Mine..?" Kohaku faltered, then moved towards one of the tapestries, touching it lightly with his fingers. The dust darkened his pale fingers, but as he brushed some of it away, he was aware of the curls and colours that lurked beneath. He rubbed away a little more, revealing a horse's legs, and then, a little further up, the beast's head, tossing and proud in the morning light. It was as though the prancing creature was stepping free of the fog and mist of a thousand years of neglect, and despite himself, Kohaku felt guilty.

I don't understand. I don't understand.

No, you don't.

The voice was once more inside his head, bitter and dark as ever it had been.

You are by far the most stupid soul I've ever had the misfortune to linger within, in all my long history. I have known cowards and heroes and men of particular might... but never have I known one as stupid to the world around him as you.

There was a snort of derision, then,

I don't know why I even brought you here. When you spoke to the shinigami, I thought, at last, you had begun to understand. Maybe I was wrong. Maybe I am the truly stupid one... allowing myself to be confined inside such a dull youth.

Are you going to tell me to kill people again?

Defiance flared in Kohaku's brown eyes, and the chill of cold air rippled around the chamber once more, emphasising Kyouka's clear disapproval.

I don't need to tell you to do that. You are the one who insists on doing it. If I encourage you, so what? At least if you decide to slaughter people, it proves you can decide on doing something.

Why are you always like this with me?

Follow Keitarou's plans, do as he tells you. You're clearly too weak to be anything other than another of his puppets. You don't have a will of your own... so become his and do as he tells you. Kill people. Slaughter them. Cut out their hearts. Show them no mercy, and bring this whole world down around the shoulders of the shinigami.

Why do you keep saying things like that!?

Because you're a coward and a weakling. I despise that in you. You have such potential. Such strength. I have tried every conceivable method possible to change your outlook. I have shown you horrors. I have threatened you. I have sought to steal your body, and yet you still conceal yourself in darkness. This place is you, shut away and coated in your father's cobwebs. Every inch of this place is covered with him and his presence. All life is shut away from it... and from you. You have done this to me and to yourself. So become the killer he expects you to be. If you can't even understand the consequences of your choices so far, then there's nothing to be done but make you the monster people expect you to be.

I am not a monster!

Really?

There was no mercy in the response.

You told the shinigami you were. You have always believed you were. You've lived your life hiding under another name, never standing up for your real identity. Worse, you even disdain it enough to treat your true self as a stranger.

There were... that was because...

Your brother named you "Koku" as a nickname, a shortened version of the "Kohaku" you were born with.

Kyouka continued relentlessly.

Knowing this — understanding this — you deliberately chose another character with which to write your name. More, you chose the character for black — the complete, direct opposite of Kohaku's "white". Still, you wonder why this place is steeped in darkness? You steeped yourself in it when you chose to write your name and consider yourself that way. Nobody else made that decision. That was you.

Koku...?

Kohaku glanced at his hands, suddenly feeling guilty.

Why do you expect me, who knows you the best, to consider you differently? You are a monster. You are a coward, a fool and a liar. You hide and you retreat and you deny to yourself your true purpose in this world.

"I don't have to listen to this. Let me go, Kyouka. Let me go!" The words burst from Kohaku's lips, his emotions no longer allowing him to keep the conversation merely inside his head.

"Why?" Kyouka's retort was terse, echoing around the chamber once more. "When, in all of the past twenty one years have you ever let me go? When have you ever shown me the mercy you demand for yourself?"

"What?"

Kohaku's brows knitted together in confusion.

"Kyouka, where are you? If you're here, show yourself to me. Let me see you, face to face. Tell me what you mean, and stop talking in these stupid riddles. You've done nothing but torment me for as long as I can remember. Why should I trust in you, when I've never even seen your face?"

For a moment there was silence, and Kohaku felt certain that the voice had once more drawn back into the recesses of his mind, but then, the entire room became filled with a dull, hazy glow of bluish energy, spreading out from behind one of the many tapestries that hung around the walls. This one was as dusty as all the others, but, unlike them, it bore no central image across its surface, simply a faded border which had become frayed and worn at the edges. The border was a floral motif, a flower which, had Kohaku known it, was the Yuukirin, a blossom from District Eight well known for its ability to bloom the year round, regardless of the weather. It appeared faded and wilted in this damaged state, however, as though its courage had failed it and it had submitted to some greater, darker power.

Slowly, and not without misgivings, Kohaku approached the tapestry, pushing it back so he could see beneath. For a moment, the eerie blue light dazzled him, but as he shielded his gaze with his free hand, he saw that it was not just a light, but the metallic surface of what appeared to be a mirror, grand and gilted with a petal design across the edges. These petals too resembled the ones that adorned the tapestry, and though the mirror appeared old and somewhat battered, the surface was smooth and clear, without a single scratch. Mesmerised, Kohaku took another step towards it, allowing the tapestry to fall back over him as he stretched out his right hand to touch the glimmering surface.

At the contact, the blue light dimmed and energy prickled through his skin as, in the depths of the mirror, his own reflection began to take form before him. The image became more and more clear, and Kohaku let out a little gasp, drawing his hand back, for although he could now see himself in full focus, robed in exactly the same way as he currently stood, his entire body was swathed in thick, heavy chains, and, across the palms of both hands were the unmistakable reddish smears of blood.

"So at last, you see it for yourself."

Kyouka's voice was less echoey now, as though the speaker was very close, but to Kohaku's horror, it was the lips of his own reflection that moved, his own brown eyes staring into him with accusation in their depths.

"I don't understand," Kohaku whispered, and the apparition in the mirror reached out a blooded hand, its spectral form penetrating through the glass and closing in a vice grip around Kohaku's wrist. Kohaku struggled to pull away, but it was too late, for the apparition had him in a tight hold, and as the air around him became more difficult to breathe, a sense of deep foreboding began to seep into every inch of the young boy's body.

"Then let me make you," the lips of the reflection moved once again. "What you see in this mirror is your soul. Every link of the chain that surrounds you is a link of fear, hesitation, regret... of cowardice. The blood on your hands is the blood of those you have killed."

"I don't kill people! I hate killing! I hate death!" Kohaku was angry, and the apparition smirked.

"You don't do anything," he replied disparagingly. "You sit and hide and pretend you don't have anything to do with what else goes on. The people killed by your father, your sister, your brother — how many of those have you managed to save? How many have you even tried to?"

"Souja-dono!"

"Really?" The apparition shook his head. "Don't be foolish. You killed that shinigami vice captain. The Endou. You didn't save him."

"I did no such thing!"

The apparition's eyes narrowed, the ghostly grip tightening around Kohaku's wrists.

"This is what I despise about you," he said blackly. "You know, deep down, why the shinigami died. He didn't die because your sister slashed him apart, nor because your father wished him dead. He died because you, the only person who could have saved his life, did not. Everything that has happened since has been your fault. The war you want to prevent, you are causing, because you refuse to choose a side. What else can I do to make you move in one direction or the other? You try to keep out of it, and claim you have no right to intervene. I'm telling you that you, of all people, have to interfere. Your life, your soul, all of it is more powerful than most of those insects you scuttle away from. You could've killed the Onmitsukidou, and protected your father, but you didn't. You could've captured him, and given him to the shinigami, but you didn't. You let him run home to his widow, where neither side will ever find him, and erased his memories, so nobody will put together the truth.

"The march to war continues, because nothing comes to a conclusion. Your sister died. Your brother will spend what remains of his life an outlaw, hounded into the ground — but you acted neither to protect him, nor to incriminate him. The shinigami seek him, but it wasn't you who saved his life and prevented him from bleeding his last in Seireitei. You pretend you haven't seen, but you have and you do. All these things you know give you power. It is power great enough to control and create the world from its barest roots, to dominate it and subjugate it as you see fit, yet you run and hide like a shadow from the sun. I am part of that power and if you won't see these things for yourself, all I can do is make you, even if it breaks you."

Tears glittered on Kohaku's lashes, as images of his brother's reckless flight through the District lands flooded his mind, followed by the attack of Hajime's sword and the subsequent healing performed by Mitsuki on his fallen body.

"Edogawa-san saved Katsu-nii," he murmured. "She went after him and saved his life, where I didn't."

"No, you didn't. You never do. You take one step, but never finish the journey. You leave things open and uncertain, and when you do, the people whose lives you claim to value, die."

Kohaku closed his eyes, the tears trickling down his cheeks. Slowly, he felt the spectral hand pull away from his wrist.

"So do you see, now, why you killed the shinigami? Nobody but you killed him. Your indecision. Your cowardice. Your ability to prevent it wasted."

Kohaku did not respond, unable to muster the words to form a reply.

"You haven't even the strength to cut your own throat," Kyouka's voice continued, cold and judgemental. "The last one I knew, when he feared me too much and could no longer handle me, he took his own life rather than let me dominate his soul. I despised his weakness, but at least he set me free. You lack even that conviction... you confine me to this dark, dusty prison, letting me tarnish and rust with disuse, yet you don't even think of letting me out. Why should I give you the slightest bit of kindness or respect, when you have treated me in the exact same way your father has always treated you?"

Kohaku's eyes snapped open at this, dismay glittering in their depths, and the apparition nodded its head.

"My name is Kyouka, but it is not my whole name," it said gravely. "The mirror into which you now gaze is my true form. The images reflected there are truth as seen through my eyes. I have lived many existences before I came to know you. Only the strongest souls with the most prescient skills of awareness and understanding are capable of bonding with the strands of my power. With each incarnation, my nature changes. The second part of my name changes depending on the soul I bond with. The piece of it you do not know lingers within you and your spirit. Only your resolve can forge it, therefore I cannot tell you what it is. Your ability to come here means you already know it, but you haven't bothered to think of using it."

"A... but... I don't know anything about you. I don't know any name, just Kyouka, that's all I've ever..." Kohaku's protests petered out into incoherence, and his ghostly reflection twisted its face into a scornful scowl.

"You know it, but you are not ready to recognise it. Or you are too stupid. One or the other," it responded unsympathetically. "I told you, I can't tell you what it is. I can only tell you what it has been before, names that are dead and as useless as broken keys to this prison door. Without my full name, I am helpless — shut away here in this godforsaken place of dead spiders and dust."

It stretched out a hand again, a thin finger pointing towards the frame of the mirror.

"Kyouka means 'Mirror of Flowers.' it added." You've realised that now, though, haven't you? The flowers that glitter at my edges are the flower of courage... the symbol of the warrior Kyouraku of generations past."

"Kyouraku?" Kohaku repeated the word numbly, an image of Shunsui flitting across his features, and the apparition lowered his head.

"You are not an Endou," he said simply. "You are not an Urahara. You are a mixture of many bloodlines, but Aizen is originally a Kyouraku name. In the long distant past, the Kyouraku rose to become a family of significant spiritual power and military influence across Seireitei. Long, long ago, in the time when zanpakutou themselves were still a newly crafted art, I was first forged in the spiritual heart of a soul whose descendents would one day take the name of Kyouraku. That first soul chose these blooms to adorn my frame. With time, they became Kyouraku flowers, and they symbolise the ability to bloom in adversity. Some of your greatest ancestors did exactly that, but you are a pale shadow in comparison to their determination and resolve. But even if you turn your head away from it, your bloodline is still theirs. In the coldest, deepest winters, the Yuukirin flowers across District Eight. And even here, within your hopeless, sorry excuse for a soul, they can bloom — because you are not an Endou. You are not an Urahara. You have the brown hair and dark eyes of the Kyouraku. Your spirit power comes from a different, sleeping genetic line. Your father is not ignorant of that fact, either. He was born Urahara, but he knows that his mother was part Kyouraku, and he understands far more about me — and about you — than he's told you thus far. More, probably, than even the modern Kyouraku do today."

“Who are you?” Kohaku whispered. “What are you, really, and why are you telling me these things?”

“I can’t tell you that,” Kyouka said matter-of-factly. “If you’re too dense to work it out, I suggest you start giving it some proper thought. This is the first time I’ve brought you here. It’s the first time you’ve been able to see the forest, and the first time you’ve reached the door that separates this place from that. Whether it be the last is up to you. I’ve given you the final warning I ever will. You of all people understand your destiny. You know, deep down, why you were born. Why you connected with me. Why you were given the power you have. You have a choice. The only one who can make a difference in this war is you. You have to decide once and for all, where your loyalties lie.”

There was a pause, then the reflection in the mirror’s smooth surface began to blur and distort, forming a sequence of other images, broken and bloody before Kohaku’s horrified eyes.

“Make that choice,” the voice echoed out of nowhere once more. “This is the last chance you have. People will die. They must die. But if you don’t make the choice, they will all die. It’s up to you. Take control of this, or I will take control of you. And if that happens, you will find out exactly how much of a monster you really are.”

Kohaku’s eyes snapped open, his breath coming in heavy, ragged gasps and his pulse racing wildly through his body as he struggled to bring his thoughts and his vision into clear focus.

He was back in the little chamber at the rear of the Thirteenth, and the familiar plain walls and ceiling of the small sickroom were suddenly more reassuring than they had ever been before. Whether it had been a dream or a vision, he did not know, but the raw, empty sense within his heart was all too real, the memories of what he had seen vividly burned into his thoughts.

Kyouka.

He pulled himself into a sitting position, dragging his blankets over his shoulders as a shiver ran through his thin frame. The room appeared empty at first glance, but as he adjusted his position, he caught sight of Mitsuki, curled up in the corner of the room, fast asleep. The sight of her struck him for a moment, remembering afresh the images Kyouka had shown him within his dream.

Edogawa-san. Now I understand why Katsura told you so much about me. I knew he cared for you... but I didn’t know why your presence in his life was so significant. I misjudged — I thought you a threat. I was wrong. You saved him, instead. Because of you, my brother is somewhere out there, alive. Even if I can't reach him... I know he's there. You did that... regardless of what you must now know he did to you and your friends. I'm sorry I doubted in you at all. And I'm sorry if you got into trouble because of it.

Mitsuki stirred slightly, uttering a faint murmur, but she did not wake up, and Kohaku watched her for a moment, comforted by the soft sound of her breathing. If he had wanted, he knew, he could've woken her. He could've told her that he'd had a dream, and asked for something to help him sleep more deeply, but though he knew that he could now trust in her, he made no attempt to stir her from her sleep. Instead he sat back against the wall, a pensive expression in his dark eyes as he considered everything Kyouka had told him. Though he did not want to believe it, he knew he did. For the first time, the voice had taken on a different approach, talking to him and remonstrating with him rather than terrorising him into submission, but deep beneath those words he had sensed the undertone of the other's frustration and pain.

Kyouka said he had infested other souls. Only the strongest souls could bond with him. The last one that had had killed himself, cut his own throat because he had been frightened — maybe in the way I've always been frightened of Kyouka's bullying. He said he was old... far older than just this lifetime. And that that power originated... not in Father's Urahara, nor mother's Endou. It originated in another place. In the third genetic line that I had forgotten my family claimed... that of the Kyouraku.

His eyes became slits as he drew an image of Shunsui to mind. That's why that man is so important. That's why, when I saw him, I realised who and what he was. It didn't make sense then. It does now. The only question is... how...

This is the last chance you have. People will die. They must die. But if you don't make the choice, they will all die. It's up to you. Take control of this, or I will take control of you. And if that happens, you will find out exactly how much of a monster you really are.

Kyouka's words echoed through his thoughts again, and he shook his head, pushing back the blanket and using the wall to pull himself carefully and silently to his feet. Picking his way past Mitsuki so as not to stir her from her slumbers, he tried to open the door, but realised that it was once more locked, and he frowned, resolution glittering in his dark brown eyes. Glancing once more at the sleeping healer, he pressed his hand to the door in a clumsy imitation of how he had seen Souja force entry into the locked hut in Rukongai, closing his eyes and willing any spark of spirit power lurking within him to come forth. Though he had read about many kidou spells, he had never had occasion to fire one, so it took a couple of minutes before a brief, ragged flare of energy spat out from the tips of his fingers, melting the lock and almost setting the whole of the door on fire. The divide slid open, and Kohaku glanced at the scorch marks searing up the seam of the wood with a pensive expression on his face, before stepping out into the corridor and closing the door behind him.

I guess I really don't know how to use my spirit power at all. If that's what Kyouka means, maybe he's right. Oh well.

He turned, closing his eyes once more and using his senses to root out where Juushirou currently was.

I don't know how to find Kyouraku-dono on my own. I can sense his presence, if I try, but it's far from here and I'm not strong enough to walk so far on my own right now. Besides, leaving Thirteenth is dangerous. If I spoke to Ukitake-dono, though, surely he'd know. He said they were friends, so surely he'd find a way... that I could speak to that man. I won't let you make a monster of me, Kyouka... so I guess, for now, this is what I've chosen to do.

Well, that was the last.

Anabomi stood in the entrance to the Ninth Division, his gaze following the retreating shadows of the two neat patrols of officers as they disappeared in the direction of Inner Seireitei's barrier gate. A faint flicker of resentment stirred in his normally peaceful grey eyes — he had obeyed Guren's instructions, but it did not make him any happier about the need to do it.

It was just past dawn, and several hours earlier had seen the departure of the various Captains and squad representatives through Third Division's big Senkai gate, bound for the Real World. It had come about more quickly than anyone had expected, leaving the remaining divisions in something of a flurry to get their drills and replacement schedules in place and activated as soon as possible. On reviewing Hyakken's paperwork the night before, Anabomi had seen for himself that more than half of the Division's strength would be required to cover all the areas currently under Sixth Division's auspices, and, as Sixth was a larger Division by far on account of its direct Clan connections, the burden was far heavier than the Ninth Division Captain would have liked.

He let out a heavy sigh.

But it must be done, God help me. Whatever I think of it in private, the Ninth cannot be seen as lacking.

He leaned up against the gatepost, folding his arms across his chest and watching the final members of the deployed patrols vanish from his line of sight. They would not return until summoned, not until Guren himself gave the order, Anabomi decided pettily, then frowned, berating himself for such a childish reaction.

It is not Guren-sama's fault. This is just the way Inner Seireitei works. I cannot complain about what I have so far failed to change.

"You look like the weight of the world is on your shoulders, Anabomi,"

The sound of his neighbour's voice, cheery and upbeat as ever hailed him from across the other side of the thoroughfare, and he swung around in surprise, casting Hakubei a look of confusion.

"Hakubei-dono?"

"Who else?" Hakubei grinned, shrugging his shoulders. "I'd be worried if anyone else was prancing around wearing my haori. It still fits me — quite well, I think, given everything."

"It appears that Tenth are rather without duties, if you can spare time to make such light humour about your haori," Anabomi's lip curled slightly in censure. "May I suggest that, if you have no pressing business, you look to see how your men might assist other areas which are not so well covered as your own?"

"Ah. You got a summons from the Boss too, huh?" Hakubei's expression became one of sympathetic comprehension.

"Too?" Despite himself, Anabomi looked surprised, and Hakubei nodded.

"Kanshi and I have spent most of the night trying to make mathematical problems that don't add up slot into squad patrols we don't have enough people to fill," he said with a weary sigh. "Not much you can do when the order comes but try and make it fit, right? From the look on your face you've been having the same problem — and, maybe, about the same amount of sleep."

"Oh, I see," Anabomi's expression relaxed slightly into a wry smile, and he inclined his head slightly. "Yes, you might say that. I'm sorry, I was terse with you. This business is preying on all our nerves — and Ninth are a lot more diminished in numbers than I should like. But what else is there to be done? The duties must be filled, and apparently we must fill them."

"Does Guren-sama know you're stretched like this, covering his absence?"

“No, but what’s the point in reporting it?” Anabomi shrugged his shoulders in graceful resignation. “The job must still be done, and it would look bad if Ninth claimed they could not handle it alone. I do not wish to ask for other squads to cover Sixth’s territory, not if I can help it. The Real World trip bothers me, too. I do not know if Keitarou will be found — but I do believe he is very dangerous and ought not be handled lightly.”

“I don’t think sending Guren-sama, Okaasama, Midori-sama and Nagesu-sama is taking anything ‘lightly,’” Hakubei mused. “I did wonder if Tenth might be deployed over the border, but it turned out not. I can’t compare to Okaasama in a battle of swords — she’d still slice me to ribbons without needing to catch her breath, so she is the more logical choice.”

“Mm,” Anabomi’s expression clouded slightly, and he sighed again. “I believe I am in the same position. I am no spiritual match for Guren-sama, nor will I ever be, no matter how hard I work. I just... worry about this trip a lot more than perhaps I should. Keitarou has caused such damage in the past. He killed Guren-sama’s son... and loss of life can make one reckless in seeking revenge. Moreover, my Clan leader and Shirogane-sama and Ryuu-sama, the only men of blood good enough to succeed him are at his side, in the same amount of potential peril. I do not want any more corpses at his hands, Hakubei-dono. It reminds me too much of twenty five years ago... and I dislike remembering that past.”

“Twenty five years ago?” Hakubei’s eyes narrowed. “You mean the Rukon? The deaths there? But nobody has ever proven Keitarou’s involvement in that, and Nagesu-dono and Sekime believe...”

“I know what is believed,” Anabomi held up his hand, effectively cutting off his neighbour mid-speech, “but I do not subscribe to it. Keitarou is a horrific, dangerous individual and he cannot be underestimated. He threw my Clan into disorder and distress, and was somehow able to survive the attack of an extremely powerful shinigami sword — something that no normal being ought be able to do. Then, such a short time later, the Rukongai incident occurred. Shougo was killed by Keitarou, Hakubei-dono. I am sure of that. There is no firm evidence, that is all.”

“Shougo-dono, huh,” Hakubei’s expression took on a look of understanding. “I’m sorry. I’d forgotten — you were friends, weren’t you?”

“We grew up training together, in one way or another, mostly at my family’s estate,” Anabomi turned his head, shielding his eyes from the sun as he gazed up at the bright, cloudless sky. “Yes, we were friends. There is little I would not have done for him, but I could not do anything to help him in the Rukon. He spoke of it, before that final trip — how he believed Keitarou was there, somewhere, even though he didn’t know where... and it seems he was right.”

“Shougo-dono said as much?” Hakubei was startled. “Did you not report that at the time? I don’t remember...”

“I went to the Rukon myself, and so did many others, following the incident,” Anabomi shook his head. “No evidence was found. No evidence means nothing can be done, Hakubei-dono. My friend died, life moved on. It doesn’t mean we forget. I believe it was that man, or his satellite — the girl, Endou Eiraki. Somehow, through some evil design... they killed him and the others so horrifically cut down. Shougo-dono was killed by sword wounds. The official reports all say so. Do you think a Plus Soul, even a mutated one, could kill a Captain with a dead blade? I think not.”

“Well, up till recently, no,” Hakubei admitted, scratching his head, “I’d be all for your point and backing it up all over the shop. But the fact is, we do know that kid Souja was killed by a dead blade, wielded by a girl who was little more than a Plus soul in spiritual power. So if it’s possible she could kill a Vice Captain of pretty good calibre... perhaps it’s possible a Hollowed Plus with stupidly deformed spirit power and some serious killer instinct could take a blade to a Captain and strike a lucky blow.”

“Perhaps,” Anabomi looked doubtful, “but I do not think so. I do not believe in coincidences, and I do not want any further death.”

“Well, we all hope for that,” Hakubei agreed frankly. “Stretching our forces thin here is a small price to pay if it resolves the problem overall — but it’s never easy to wait behind. Going into the fight is a more positive, proactive form of defence, and the one I’m more suited to following.”

“It is very hard to argue with a Clan leader,” Anabomi said softly, and Hakubei let out a rueful laugh.

“You’re fine,” he said ruefully. “You try arguing with a Clan leader who happens to be your mother. Believe me, it’s worse.”

He raised his hand in a wave.

“I must get back to duty. I was taking a breather, but Kanshi will be ready to cut off my head if I don’t go help him finalise the deployments.”

“I wish you luck with your conundrums,” Anabomi offered him a faint smile. “I too ought to return to my office. It will be a fraught few days, Hakubei-dono. I trust we will be up to the task.”

“We’d better be,” Hakubei rubbed his chin absently, “else it will be hell to pay when the head honchos get back!”

“Well, Nagesu-dono, you definitely made a mess of that volcano.”

Midori let out a low whistle, turning to survey the black-slicked, scorched remains of what had once been a green and lush mountainscape. The shinigami had passed through the Senkaimon smoothly but, on account of transporting so many people to such a dangerous location, it had taken longer than usual and, as a result, the sun had already begun to sink over the horizon by the time they were all assembled in their agreed meeting place. Despite fervent patrols and alert lookouts throughout the night, there had been no surprise attack from the enemy, and so, as dawn had broken, each Captain had set their subordinates about specific tasks in preparation for their first proper advance into the wider local territory. At present, within the ring of stones that marked the boundary of their makeshift camp only the four Captains were present, but every one of their officers was within sight or vocal reach, for nobody was taking any chances on an ambush.

In the dark, it had been hard to perceive the true state of the previous site of battle, but now, as the sun had illuminated their surroundings, the other Captains had seen for themselves exactly how desperate Nagesu’s struggle to stop the eruption had been.

“If that’s what Sekizanha does when it’s angry, remind me not to get in your way too often in Council debates,” Midori continued now, sending her neighbour a rueful glance. “Perhaps I ought to be strengthening Second’s borders with Third, just in case. I knew you’d kicked up an elemental fuss, but I didn’t realise you’d reshaped the region’s whole geology.”

“It’s not very pretty, I admit,” Nagesu adjusted his spectacles, letting out a heavy sigh of acknowledgement. “I wasn’t really thinking of aesthetics at the time, however. I wanted to prevent a full-scale eruption — the only way I could do that was to release as much of Sekizanha’s seismic reiryoku into the base and hope it would counteract the tremors. Real World mineral deposits are different from Seireitei ones... and volcanic eruptions much more difficult to halt.”

Midori pursed her lips, cocking her head on one side as she considered the scene once more.

“As much as possible, huh,” she mused aloud. “In which case, if you should encounter Keitarou... would you be able to repeat the effort?”

Nagesu hesitated, then he sighed, shaking his head.

“I have been told that those who train and use their bankai regularly are capable of such feats of power, but I am not yet among them,” he admitted sadly. “I only brought my sword to that level two or three years ago, and, given its nature, my possibilities to experiment with it have been limited. I pushed Sekizanha to a level beyond anything we’ve ever trained to do before, in an environment that is naturally resistant to spirit power. I am recovered quite well in myself, and I am sure I can use my shikai if need be. My bankai, however...”

He shrugged his shoulders.

“Before we left, Retsu-sama advised me strongly against risking it,” he admitted. “Following my last attempt, she thinks it would be an unwise move. It could prove fatal.”

“I see,” Midori clicked her tongue against her teeth. “But I remember your shikai packs a punch. Hopefully it will be enough. I don’t have bankai — Akekage won’t even listen to me on the subject at present, but Kyouki-sama and Guren-sama both do. Keitarou is one man, and it sounds as though the creature you fought with last time isn’t a match for a Captain. With any luck... it should be enough.”

“I am willing to use my bankai, should the need arise,” Nagesu said grimly. “I won’t say this before Shiketsu, because he frets too much over the future, but nobody lives forever. If I die here, but my doing so brings Keitarou to heel and allows him to be removed from the equation, so be it. I am not a coward, Midori-dono. And I wouldn’t have come here if I thought I could not fight.”

“I suppose I didn’t doubt that,” Midori admitted. ‘But,’ she gestured to the mountain. “If that’s what your bankai does, I’d like you to refrain from using it if at all possible. It hardly looks as though you left it in a stable state, with the top blown off, the slopes black and warped out of shape, and debris and ash scattered all around.”

“The rest of the landscape seems fairly stable, however,” Guren stepped up to join them, white haori flapping in the gentle breeze. “Mountains are usually pretty substantial — even volcanic ones. Probably the damage is not as bad as it looks.”

“I trust not,” Nagesu admitted. “It will be difficult to break through the hardened pumice and stone, but I am sure the girl I saw before had some connection to that mountain. I intend on taking Third to investigate it in more depth — and I imagine Sekizanha will be up to the task of splitting open a pathway, if nothing else.”

He patted his sword’s hilt, and Guren offered him an approving smile.

“No doubt,” he agreed levelly. “As for the rest of us, we should waste no more time in getting our bearings and dividing our forces. This might have been the place Nagesu-dono saw Keitarou the last time, but it doesn’t necessarily follow that we’ll find him waiting for us out in the open.”

His eyes became slits.

“It’s an acquaintance I much hope to renew,” he added darkly. “I have a spiritual postscript to add to my uncle’s message of twenty five years ago.”

“Then we should see to splitting terrain, before Guren-sama decides to unleash his blade here as a signal to Keitarou of our intent,” The final member of the group, Shiba Kyouki pulled a rolled up map from her obi, crouching down on the ground and spreading it out before her. “If we consider the mountain to be literally south of our current position, that leaves north, east and west to be covered. I’m not particularly bothered which angle the Fifth take... it’s all the same to me. The terrain seems pretty standard. To the north, more mountain land. To the east, forest. To the west, a river and what used to be a settlement, though I’ve checked the records and it’s not recorded as an inhabited area, so we needn’t worry about involving any local residents in our business.”

“Second are a smaller force, so we’ll take the mountain track,” Midori decided. “We will probably need to divide to cover it, and that suits a small, compact force of officers.”

“Then Second and Third are responsible for backing each other up,” Guren glanced at Nagesu, who nodded. “And that leaves Fifth and Sixth to operate the same. Sixth will take the river and the marshland surrounding it, if you don’t object, Kyouki-dono. My sword isn’t really designed for a closed environment like a forest, and if I should need to use it, I’d rather have open space.”

“I don’t mind,” Kyouki shrugged, rolling up the map. “Fifth will go east. With that settled, I’ll go speak to my son and prepare to move out immediately... and I suggest you all begin to do the same.”

Author's note: Kyuujitai (Old Character Forms)

Those savvy with Japanese may have picked up on the first of the two kanji characters being the traditional form of the character 来,(来 as it appears in modern Japanese). Well, this is an antiquated story, so kyuujitai appeared appropriate. Plus, I think the old form is kind of pretty. I have a thing about doing this — if I had my way, Sougyo no Kotowari would be written 雙魚理 instead of 双魚理, because both given Juushirou's vintage and the Edo Bleach setting, it OUGHT to be the old character. But this is a modern manga, so bleh., all bets are off.

Technically 来 means “come”, rather than ‘future’, but it appears in the word “未来”, which means “future”, and I felt it was a bit more ambiguous this way.

Kohaku's name

I mentioned it in an earlier chapter, but to save anyone having to track back, Kohaku's name is written with the characters for “river willow” (杞) and white (白). His nickname, Koku, however, he explained to Tenichi as being written with the character for black 黒. Kohaku is also the word for ‘amber’ in Japanese. I didn't choose to use it's characters, firstly because I wanted Keitarou's children to all be trees, and secondly because I wanted Kohaku's name to be written using the character for ‘white’ which can also be interpreted as “innocence.” However, having a name homonymous for ‘amber’ seems appropriate for one who, sealed deep within him, has something originating from a far older age. That, of course, is Kyouka. Finally, the use of “koku” as his nickname, apart from being diametrically opposite to “haku” also implies darkness. In Japanese, if you want to say something is pitch black, then you say it is “makkuro”. Kuro is an alternate reading for 黒. Anyone who has read Mirror, Flower, Water, Moon will also find the setting in the first part of this chapter eerily familiar, but with a few SMALL alterations...;)

And...

The Yuukirin (Flower of Courage) is a made up flower. But it's a made up flower with Meifu provenance. I think it first got mentioned in Third Chronicle. Which just proves that even tiny, apparently throwaway details might ultimately prove to be important...;)

58. Kohaku's Plea

Chapter Fifty Seven: Kohaku's Plea

Breaking through the thick crust of cooled volcanic rock was proving more difficult than he had originally thought.

Nagesu wiped sweat from his brow, resting the tip of his weapon against the ground as he surveyed the scene. Sekizanha's blade still glittered with energy, as if telling him that it was far from exhausted, but although Nagesu felt certain that one proper, full scale release of his weapon's shikai would probably create the crevasses needed to properly break through to whatever was underneath, it would be all too easy to set off another volcanic eruption. The last one was still very fresh in his mind, as well as the desperate tactics he had been forced to resort to to prevent a much bigger ecological disaster. Despite his desire to locate Keitarou, his natural, cautious temperament had slipped back into dominance, and, in consequence, he had forced his weapon to crack the outer layer only as much as was absolutely necessary, dispatching groups of his subordinates to use kidou and, in one or two cases, their bare hands, to pull away the folds of hardened rock.

"Taichou," Yunosuke's voice at his right hand made him turn, casting his dusty and dishevelled Third Seat a rueful look.

"Any joy?" he asked, and Yunosuke shrugged.

"Some of the officers think they've found a layer of compacted earth beneath the hardened lava flow," he said cautiously. "They're not sure whether it's information of any use, but it seems... different to what we've been breaking through so far. Nobody's found any sign of a proper entrance to the mountain, though — are you quite sure there's something deeper within this place?"

"Mm," Nagesu turned his gaze back to the mountain, nodding his head. "The girl was here, and I can't think that was a coincidence. Keitarou was here, too — and he made it clear that he'd chosen this location because he knew the nature of my sword and sought to confound my ability to use it. Realistically, that makes the most likely place for any kind of base point to be somewhere only my sword can reach — in short, within a place like this mountain. Seismic caves are not uncommon... providing, of course, that the previous eruption didn't destroy any passages and tunnels that had been dug into deeper rock.”

“I suppose we have to prepare for that possibility too, don’t we, sir?” Yunosuke looked resigned, and Nagesu nodded his head.

“We do, but in this respect, I don’t want to use too much power unwisely,” he said with a sigh. “I’m sorry, Yunosuke. It means a great deal more work for everyone, but I would sooner play it safe and return with a full compliment of men, preferably without causing a massacre of the Real World people. Such a thing would be hard to explain to the rest of the Council.”

Yunosuke’s lips twitched into a wry smile, and Nagesu knew he was remembering their last visit.

“Very true,” he acknowledged. “I’m sorry, sir. I should have known better than to question.”

Nagesu was silent for a moment, then he shrugged.

“Sometimes questioning is a good thing,” he said cautiously. “It tests my convictions and sounds them out for how strong they really are.”

“Sir?” Yunosuke was taken aback, and Nagesu lifted his weapon, adjusting his grip on the hilt.

“I will begin cracking the earth some more,” he responded. “Perhaps, if I try to do so in the area your men have found, we might have more joy. I doubt that anyone would try and use the most volatile part of the volcano as a shelter. Go back to them, Yunosuke, and convey my message. I will bring Sekizanha shortly and we’ll see what we can find.”

“Yes, sir,” Yunosuke saluted, disappearing into a swift, concise shunpo step, and Nagesu sighed, gazing at the slightly smudged blade of his sword.

We’ve come this far, Sekizanha. Why am I thinking of Ukitake and his questions, when we have other things to seek out?

You said it yourself, Nagesu. Sometimes it’s good to question.

Sekizanha’s voice came back, easy and reassuring to the Captain’s nerves.

At present, we ought to focus on finding the answers that we can. I can sense there are hollow structures beneath this volcano. Even despite the eruption, they have not collapsed. Whether they have any material use or not, I can’t say... but if they are there, perhaps you ought to find out.

Hollow chambers?

Nagesu's eyes narrowed.

Then that's what we'll do. We'll open a way into those areas, and see exactly whether or not my cousin has been using this place as a base.

He turned, ready to head off in the direction Yunosuke had gone, but a faint sense of something on the wind made him pause, lifting his gaze to the top of the rise. Though he could not say what instinct had drawn his attention that way, his breath caught in his throat as he registered the slender, red-haired figure standing, watching him from not two or three yards away. She had not been there a moment before, he was sure, nor had he properly sensed her coming — but she was there now, and more, before he could react, she had drawn even closer, near enough to extend a finger and brush it curiously against the edge of Sekizanha's unsheathed blade.

Blood splattered across the silver surface, the sharp edge slicing through her pale, delicate skin, but instead of registering pain, the girl's expression merely reflected amusement. She laughed, glancing at the trickle of crimson liquid that now ran across her palm and down into the sleeves of her hakamashita, before lifting the wound to her lips and licking it clean with unmistakable relish.

"Aki," Now Nagesu found his voice, Sekizanha's blade glittering afresh with energy, but even before he had swung the weapon, the girl had withdrawn several steps back from his range, disappearing and appearing in the blink of an eye. She had used this technique before, Nagesu remembered numbly, the ability that was shunpo but not shunpo, but otherwise, her mode of approach was completely different from their previous encounter. Though her eyes glittered with something that could only be described as madness, there was no sign of the Hollow mask, nor could Nagesu sense the earlier fluctuation in her spirit.

At the sound of her name, the girl let out another peal of laughter, and in that moment, Nagesu saw her eyes change, little by little into the reptilian, golden gaze of a predator eying her prey. He tensed, expecting her Hollow transformation to follow, but it did not.

"Urahara," At length she spoke, her voice soft, yet Nagesu was not fooled by her apparently docile demeanour. Her reiatsu had picked up, little by little, yet she was still controlling it, and a sick feeling stirred in the Captain's stomach as he began to realise exactly what must have happened.

Keitarou took her from the scene. He fixed the flaws in her spirit power, and sent her back out to fight and kill for him. Then, she was no match for me and my sword — but that was before I released my zanpakutou into full Bankai to stop an eruption, and before he used whatever skills and arts he's devised to put her back into one piece. This is why Keitarou wanted her, even broken and half-dead. He knew he could do something with her... and her apparent, unexplicable hatred for anyone Urahara. Maybe he even instilled it in her — using the fact he doesn't look like one of us to his advantage yet again.

He sighed.

Well, no hesitation this time. I must kill her, and quickly, too. There are too many shinigami here to do otherwise... young as she appears, I must not let that distract me.

“When Keitarou told me you'd come back, do you know how happy I was?” Aki tilted her head coquettishly, her expression's innocence marred by the glittering eyes that bored into Nagesu's own. “I made him promise that I'd be able to come fight you. My brother didn't want me to, but I begged and I pleaded and Keitarou said I could. He said I had things to settle with you and so I should. So here I am.”

“What did Keitarou do to you?” Nagesu demanded, and Aki snorted derisively, twisting a lock of hair absently around her finger.

“He healed me,” she said simply. “He healed all of us. I couldn't kill you before, Urahara, but I can now. I can. I know I can. I'm stronger, and you're weaker. Keitarou told me so. He told me that, if I came here, I'd find you. I knew it would be you.”

She blurred and disappeared, reappearing directly in front of the startled Captain and making him jump, flinching back from her bloody touch against his cheek.

“You look like him, but you're not him,” she murmured, her words cryptic and impossible for Nagesu to understand. “Still, it's enough. I hate all the Urahara. I hate them and I want to kill them. All of them. You're an Urahara, so you'll do to begin with. I don't know your name, but it doesn't matter. You belong to that Clan, and that's enough.”

“You couldn't fight me before, and you shouldn't assume you can do me any damage now,” Nagesu recovered his composure, slapping her arm away and putting a sword length between him and her. “I'm stronger than you. We proved it once, and just because you're a woman doesn't mean I will hold back. I will kill you, this time. You should have run with your life when you could.”

“I don't think so,” Aki gazed at Sekizanha's blade thoughtfully for a moment, then shook her head. “Keitarou told me that your power was to move the earth. I saw it, too. I know it’s true. But he told me that you don’t like to kill innocent people. This place has lots of them — innocent, stupid people who can’t see or hear us, but walk on the same ground we do. If you use that sword too much, they might end up getting killed. So might all your people — but like I said before, I want to kill them, too. Just, I figured I’d start with you.”

She pressed her palms together, as if about to say a prayer, but as her lips parted once more, Nagesu saw the familiar white sheen of the mask begin to slip over her features. It was not the surge of malevolent energy he had felt before, but a slow, gentle process, rippling and controlled, and as she met his gaze once more, Nagesu felt a cold hand close around his heart. The girl’s reiatsu, once raw and unmanageable, even destructive was now stifling him, rather than eating away at her, foxing his reactions and penetrating his senses, digging deep into his brain. She parted her hands, and Nagesu saw the glitter of energy forming between the delicate fingers.

Cero.

Somehow, Nagesu managed to move his heavy body, dropping to the ground to avoid the explosion of energy as it seared past him through the landscape, colliding with the obsidian face of the volcano and shattering the hard crust into pieces as it drilled deeper into the earth below. Anxious for his subordinates, Nagesu struggled to turn his head, but even before he caught sight of them, he sensed the dulling in their reiatsu and he knew that, one by one, Aki’s encroaching aura had rendered those within immediate range unconscious.

Dimly Nagesu remembered the reports from the Kuchiki estate twenty six years earlier, when Kuchiki Seiren’s sealed spirit power had exploded, and in that instant, he understood Guren’s description of the world disintegrating into grainy black and white. His breathing became heavier, for something was suffocating him, an unseen enemy pressing against his ribs and preventing them from drawing in enough air to feed his brain.

Nagesu!

Sekizanha’s voice was faint and blurry, but Nagesu clung onto it, gritting his teeth against the dizzy swirl that had become his vision and forcing himself back to his feet. A second blast of spiritual energy cannoned into the volcano on his other side, and, as he blinked the world back into focus, he could see the remnants of crimson energy around Aki’s hands, her face now once more swathed in the Hollow mask, horned and fanged and watching him with the eyes of a killer.

Well, not if he could help it.

Nagesu felt his resolve tighten inside of him.

I will fight, even if I die here, Sekizanha. What other reason do we wear the haori, but to protect our subordinates from enemies like this?

She is strong, Nagesu, much stronger than she was before — and you and I are not back to full power. Moreover, even if we were, using it here would be far too dangerous. You know already what my skills can do... and the danger it will pose for innocent life nearby.

Even so, we have no choice but to fight.

Nagesu dismissed his sword's concern swiftly.

As Captain of Third Division, and Head of Third District, this is my will. This time, we must kill this girl... before she causes genuine harm.

“And that’s all he told you?”

Shunsui set aside the dog-eared copy of the book Juushirou had obtained from Nagesu’s office, casting his friend a startled look. “Your waif and stray suddenly decided he wants to widen his social circle, so you come running over here — but you don’t even know why?”

“Koku wouldn’t tell me,” Juushirou sank back against the wall of Shunsui’s study, a weary expression on his face. “I know, it sounds mad, but Shunsui, that look was in his eyes again. Whatever it is, I think it’s important. He said it’s something he can’t say to me, only to you — and asked if there was a chance I could help him speak to you. I couldn’t bring him here, for obvious reasons, so...”

Shunsui let out a heavy sigh.

“When a Captain can be sent running errands by a refugee, there’s a problem in the hierarchy,” he said reprovably. ‘Juu-kun, I know you want to believe in this kid, but I hope he doesn’t think you’re going to answer his every whim like this. Whatever it is, you could have sent a messenger. There wasn’t a need to come in person, and it looks odd, if you’re dashing in and around Eighth on random errands like this. I thought we were trying not to excite the S-P-Y,’ he lowered his voice, spelling out the word in exaggeratedly slow tones, “and let them know that we know they’re there.”

“Since when is it odd for me to come here?” Juushirou arched his eyebrow. “I come here all the time, or you go to Thirteenth. Of everyone that could’ve come here, I’m probably the least suspicious, and even Sora expects me to turn up with a random whim to put before you. Besides, I came myself for another reason. This is the first chance I've had, but Koku talked to me some more. Off his own bat, he mentioned Sakanoue... and talked about his death."

"Oh?" Shunsui's eyes narrowed, then, "and? What of this sudden desire to be chatty? Something useful, or...?"

"Koku doesn't know who the spy is," Juushirou began, and Shunsui snorted, shaking his head.

"Doesn't know, or won't tell?"

"Doesn't know," Juushirou's expression became irritated. "Shunsui, please. Innocent until proven guilty, isn't that what we agreed? Besides, he was willing to use his power to try to find out for me. I wouldn't let him. He's clearly not well enough — and besides, I don't want to use his ability. It's not right and it's not under any kind of training or control."

"And using it is what Keitarou is doing, so you don't want to appear like him," Shunsui buried his head in his hands. "I don't know which one of you is worse, but all right. I'll bite. What did the kid say about Sakanoue?"

"His death wasn't how we think it was," Juushirou was still irritated, but he swallowed his annoyance, muting his tones instead. "Something did happen in the Rukon, twenty five years ago. Something that turned Sakanoue Heiji into a Hollow... and forced him to be cut down... by one of his own allies."

"What?" Despite his earlier annoyance, Shunsui's eyes widened at this particularly juicy tidbit of information. "Turned into a... was that Keitarou, or the Something Else we're still trying to get a handle on?"

"Something else," Juushirou said decidedly. "I only have Koku's word for it that it happened this way, but he believes that Sakanoue Heiji died by Minaichi's blade, because he had turned into a Hollow. And that it wasn't Keitarou's doing. He said Minaichi yelled out some name, but he couldn't remember what it was. It was a name he didn't know, and so he didn't remember it."

"Minaichi Atsushi..." Shunsui's lips thinned. "I can see why he wouldn't want that to be public knowledge. I also can't think why Koku making up something like that about a person who died before he was even born would benefit him or Keitarou, either, so probably the kid's telling you the truth. It certainly is an interesting slant to consider. If something happened to infect Sakanoue, then he was presumably beyond all help. Minaichi cut him down, but then reported otherwise. I wonder what else that implies about the report from the Rukon — because, as we already discussed, the only survivors who would've been able to report on what happened to Sakanoue and Shougo-dono would be the ones in the near vicinity when things occurred."

"I already went to the archives to check," Juushirou fumbled at his obi, pulling out a dogeared document and handing it out. "After Koku told me what he'd seen, I figured I ought to see what I could verify before putting it to your cynical judgement."

"Heh," Shunsui grimaced, and Juushirou offered him a benign smile, dropping the booklet onto the desk.

"We can put that with the one you're already reading," he continued evenly, "since it contains witness depositions from the survivors from the Rukongai expedition. Ikata, and a couple of others from Eleventh, a few from Twelfth gave testimony about there being more creatures than they expected, and this one report... a man called... Yamaguchi? He said that they appeared to be acting with some kind of design — as though the shinigami appearing had triggered their attack."

"That sounds vaguely familiar," Shunsui pressed his lips together. "Who else do we know who controls Hollows and makes them act by design?"

"Yes, I thought that too, but we're talking about a time before Katsura was born," Juushirou shook his head. "While it's absolutely for certain he was responsible for the most recent incidents in that regard, in terms of these..." He shrugged his shoulders. "Eiraki-hime was pregnant with Katsura when we went to the Real World for the first time as Seniors. She probably hadn't even given birth to him at the time Sakanoue and company passed away."

"I suppose so," Shunsui conceded. "It's a nice, shiny connection, but you're right. Okay. Go on."

"Mm," Juushirou's glance returned to the document. "There were also deaths among the Rukon people during this incident... Ikata reported a household essentially savaged before he reached a village and — singlehandedly, of course — he wiped out the threat."

"Of course," Shunsui said dryly. "Go on."

"Well, I read through those reports, and I realised pretty quickly that they were all reports of different parts of the Rukon district," Juushirou reflected. “Ikata and the others, whatever their names were, were not in the same area or reporting on the same encounters. They’d clearly been dispatched by their Captain, and probably didn’t see their Vice Captain’s death, since none of them mention Sakanoue in their reports.”

“And Minaichi’s report?”

“That’s the most interesting bit of all,” Juushirou flipped open the book to a particular page, setting it down on the desk before his friend, and Shunsui’s eyes widened, for the page in question had been creased and torn across the middle, removing more than half of the entry. It had been done in a rough, haphazard way, as though it had been torn out in anger, and Shunsui traced a finger along the tear line, squinting at a character that had been ripped right through.

“Does that say... early? Quick? They attacked quickly? Something like that?”

“Not sure,” Juushirou admitted, swinging the book around and examining it himself. “In any case, Minaichi’s deposition is more or less missing. It’s not the only thing that’s been removed from the archive copy, either. All the depositions remaining in this book... make no direct reference to the actions or deployment of Sakanoue or Shougo-dono, nor any detail of their deaths. They’ve all been torn out, or they were never here in the first place. I’d guess the former, rather than the latter. Minaichi is potentially the only witness to the deaths of his Vice Captain and the former Twelfth Division Captain — but someone didn’t want us, or anyone else, to read his account.”

“But if it’s full of untruths, why not?” Shunsui’s brow creased in confusion. “Even from the little bit remaining here, it seems pretty standard and uninteresting. Maybe he did lie, but if he did, nobody’s known it until now. Why remove a completely harmless report?”

He flicked through the pages.

“What about Mareiko-chan’s deposition? She was there too — is hers included?”

“It is,” Juushirou pointed to a particular section, and Shunsui ran his gaze over it briefly. “It’s pretty much what she already told me, though — obviously, in less emotional language.”

“Yes,” Shunsui drummed his fingers absently against the discoloured pages, his lips pressed together thoughtfully. “Short, sweet and to the point — but essentially useless, since she was injured early on and therefore taken out of the battle. She’s not a witness to Sakanoue's death, nor does she mention her Captain except to report that he was killed by the enemy during the expedition."

"Second-hand information, received after she returned here, and was undergoing treatment," Juushirou sighed. "At the end of the report are the accounts of people here — the one who took the alert message that something bad had happened, and the officers of Fourth who had responded most quickly to the scene. Eriko-dono gave a long and highly scientific breakdown of all the injuries her division treated as a result of this adventure."

"In summary?" Shunsui looked hopeful, and Juushirou pulled a graphic grimace.

"You assume I've read it," he said pensively, and Shunsui arched an eyebrow.

"If you haven't, I'm not going to," he said matter-of-factly. "You raised the subject, so you must have skimmed over it at the very least. You were the one who wanted to substantiate my cynical mind — or something to that effect — so report. Pour into my ears thy pearls of wisdom and I shall listen to them, all agog."

"Idiot," Juushirou snorted, swiping his friend playfully across the head, then he sighed. "I did read it. I had Mitsuki go over it with me, after she had done with Koku, to make sure I understood all of Eriko-dono's terminology. I figured, given how much she already knows, that using her skills would be of benefit — though I haven't mentioned to her specifically the possibility of a Gotei spy. Any road, the report is not particularly interesting and largely confirms the things we know. Several individuals were killed, and several mutated corpses were also brought back. Sakanoue and Shougo-dono were examined and found to have sustained wounds consistent with swords, which fits in with Nagesu-sama's dead blade theorising and other witness statements. The morass of reiatsu at the scene made it impossible to distinguish if an individual, identifiable blade had been used — which means that even if Sakanoue was killed by Minaichi, there'd be no lasting way to prove it. The highest number of mutated corpses were found in the region where Minaichi and Sakanoue were fighting. There's no report about Sakanoue being Hollowfied, either, but I'm prepared to believe Koku is right, and that something happened to him that we don't really understand yet. In terms of other officers, Minaichi himself sustained two wounds to his body, neither of which were fatal, and he was found unconscious at the scene after calling to Seireitei urgently for help. In his report, he said that Sakanoue and Shougo-dono were down, and Sekime was injured.

Sekime was also unconscious at the scene, and suffered damage to the ligaments of her right shoulder — again, by a dead blade wielded by a half-hollow, Sekime's own report states as much. Ikata and company sustained minor wounds, bumps, bruises and gashes here and there but nothing serious. One or two other officers lost limbs and were forced to retire from service."

He shrugged.

"End report."

"Minaichi sent the alert to Seireitei for help," Shunsui mused. "Minaichi did that, and Minaichi's statement is suspect, but the only person up till now who knew that, presumably, was Minaichi himself. Otherwise, why hasn't more been made of it in wider circles?"

"I suppose Minaichi might have torn out his own statement in a fit of grief," Juushirou rubbed his chin pensively. "If he knew he'd lied, and it was bothering him, maybe he'd do something like that... deface the record so that nobody could ever read it. Although... it doesn't seem like something he would do for no reason at all."

"Juu, do you suspect Minaichi of being the Gotei spy?" Shunsui glanced up from the booklet, and Juushirou shrugged.

"I'm not sure," he admitted. "I don't like Minaichi, and I don't want my personal feelings to influence my judgement in a matter as serious as this. Koku's evidence is all I have to go on, too, and I already told you that I didn't want to rely too much on that without proper substantiation. I'd thought of going to Minaichi and asking him directly what he remembered, but if he was the spy, well, that might frighten him into doing something we don't expect. If he's not the spy, I don't want to suspect him irrationally, nor cause him further distress. Even Koku's vision doesn't provide any evidence that he's done anything wrong. All it tells us is that he didn't report the truth about Sakanoue's death. Koku said that the whole incident really upset him — he said that Minaichi was traumatised by having to fight his own adjutant in such a way. Grief might be the reason he lied... we've seen adequate evidence just recently that he still feels very strongly about what happened to his Vice Captain, and in light of this evidence, his behaviour makes more sense."

"Grief could also be a cause for resentment," Shunsui pushed the book back across the desk. "Take it and keep it at Thirteenth, for now. There's probably an intact copy somewhere in some Clan vault — probably Nagesu-sama's — but with them away, it's not exactly accessible and we can't go looting other Divisions, sadly. In this state, this copy's not much use to us, and you're right, approaching Minaichi when we're short on Captains isn't a good idea. Either you'll put him on his guard or give him a nervous breakdown, neither of which is conducive to defending this place from attack. Let it lie and see what happens... for now."

"Do you think he could be spying for Keitarou?" Juushirou asked quizzically, and Shunsui shrugged his shoulders.

"I don't like to believe anyone is spying for Keitarou," he said heavily, "and like you, I have no time for Minaichi Atsushi. I don't know, Juu. I think that people who tell lies about things lay themselves open to other people's suspicions... but sometimes it's the ones who tell the truth who are the ones you really have to beware of."

"Meaning Koku, I suppose?"

"No, I didn't," Shunsui shook his head. "Not this time, at least. I was thinking of Keitarou himself. Given that he had Suzuki, and was using Koku's abilities to see things, it makes me wonder if he even needed a Gotei spy."

"You think that was a ruse? An invention?" Juushirou looked doubtful. "Koku said that he, Eiraki, Katsura, Sakaki and Suzuki all knew there was a spy, but not who it was. Do you think that's because there isn't a spy at all, and Keitarou is just trying to create tension?"

"It can't be ruled out," Shunsui admitted, then paused, shaking his head. "No, it won't do. That's what I want to believe, it's not what I really believe. Much as I hate to say it, I believe there probably is a spy. More, that spy will make a move at some point, in a way we don't expect. Whether it's Minaichi or it isn't, the same rules apply. We have to be on our guard for anything unexpected — and as informed as we can be."

He got to his feet.

"Beginning with seeing what your lad wants to say to me... and hoping it doesn't lead us into further blind alleys."

It was just his luck that he'd happened to choose the muckiest path.

Shirogane raised his left leg up slightly from the squelchy soft ground, gazing with resignation at the mud now caking his sandal. Each step he and his officers made along this pathway sank their feet at least an inch into the unforgiving greenish black goop that Guren had referred to as 'marshland' but which, privately, Shirogane had already relabeled “swamp”. As a result, the snow white of his tabi was now no more than a distant memory, and the sensation of wet cloth against his toes was enough to make him shiver, despite the relative brightness of the day.

Still, an order was an order, and there was nothing to be done but continue.

Since the divide of the Gotei forces, Sixth had made good progress in the direction of the river, though despite careful study of the map, it had not appeared as soon before them as Guren or Shirogane had expected. Blaming the deceptive lie of the Real World landscape, Guren had divided his members into three working patrols, taking one himself and handing the others over to Shirogane and Ryuu respectively with the instruction to ‘take no prisoners’ and to send urgently for backup if they were to encounter the exile himself. Though the land was relatively flat, here it divided into shelves that suggested they were much higher above sea level than they appeared, and as a result both Ryuu and Guren’s patrols had soon disappeared from Shirogane’s line of sight, leaving him and the ten or twelve officers assigned to his side to trek through the swampy goop.

Though why the exile would choose to come here is anyone’s guess. I know he’s reputed to be unhinged, and he truly must be, if this is the kind of place he wishes to call home.

With another sigh, Shirogane returned his foot to the ground, suppressing a shudder at the squelching sound it made on contact, and turning his attention instead to his immediate surroundings. The shelf they had chosen appeared fairly flat and for a while, Shirogane had half suspected they were going nowhere, fast, but as they had progressed, it had become clear that they were actually on a gentle slope, leading down towards what must, surely, be the river valley. There they would reconvene with the rest of Sixth Squad and share notes — though so far there was little to report except soiled uniforms. Birds in the sky overhead wheeled and squawked as though aware of the presence of unexpected guests, and, rising like a ghost out of the marsh haze, Shirogane began to make out the first silhouettes of the abandoned village plotted on the map each senior officer had been furnished with before leaving Seireitei.

“Fukutaichou, I think there’s a dip in the path up ahead!” One of the Sixth Division’s lesser officers hurried to his side, splashing globules of the mucky substance all over the hems and lower legs of his shihakushouin in his hurry to reach his Vice Captain’s position. “It looks as though we’ve reached something at last!”

“Mm. The abandoned village — or one of them, I believe there may be others in the vicinity,” Shirogane closed his eyes briefly, drawing on his memory to reconstruct the map he had spent most of the previous night memorising by Kidou light. “If so, then we must be a good two thirds of the path towards the river. We should continue in this direction. Everyone remain alert! I don’t want strays.”

“Are we to pass through the village, sir?” after acknowledging the instructions, one of the other division members raised a hesitant question. “It looks like a good place for an ambush, and picking up any kind of spiritual energy in this atmosphere is hard work.”

“We’ll try to go around it, if we can plot a decent enough path through this swamp,” Shirogane agreed. “I don’t like abandoned villages. They always contain ghosts, and not always of the kind we can bury. Our target aside, there’s always the possibility of Hollows in places like this. Abandoned settlements often lead to spirits with unhealthy attachment issues... and whilst we must deal with any threats we encounter, I don’t want to waste reiryoku or alert anyone to where we are unnecessarily. We shall begin by walking around the edge, and see whether our presence here excites any kind of spiritual reaction from within. I imagine that a Hollow would sense our being here and come to attack without any thought to stealth or discretion, and it would be as well to face them in more open ground — if indeed we must.”

He raised his hand, gesturing to the left of the shadowy structures, and though he noticed a couple of his men exchanging looks with one another at the thought of wading through even deeper slime and muck, as one they fell into alignment, following their senior officer as he skirted carefully around the far edge of the settlement. Even from this distance, and through the mists, Shirogane could make out what were clearly rotting timbers, and he pressed his lips together, remembering his Real World deployment as a Senior at Genryuusai’s hallowed Academy. On that occasion, he and his fellows had slept in a place similar to this one, and had been woken late one night by an incursion of bats, disturbed by their presence in the empty huts. Shirogane had not liked the bats, their beady, glittering eyes gleaming in the moonlight and he had been unwilling to find out whether these odd, Real World creatures had teeth sharp enough to draw blood from a soul. Still, his pride had refused to allow him to admit his fears, and he had staunchly refused to move to another location. His fellow Seniors had not been fooled by his bravado, and, all of them being his elders in all respects, had taken great amusement in teasing him about his “mousy housemates.” Though it was daytime, the sight of such a delapidated dwelling place brought back the less pleasant memories, and he stifled a shudder.

Hollows are one thing, but if any of those creatures are sleeping the day away in one of those hovels, I have no intention of renewing our acquaintance. Confounded beasts... how they managed to avoid every one of Ginkyoujiki's petals in the dead of night is still beyond my comprehension.

His attention returned to the path ahead, as the land dipped into what was clearly softer earth, and he carefully side-stepped it, raising a hand to beckon his fellows around it.

"This is a thoroughly unpleasant place, isn't it, sir?" The officer who had spoken earlier voiced Shirogane's own opinions at this juncture, and the Vice Captain's expression became rueful. He nodded.

"The Real World is such a place," he ruminated. "At least, I have heard there are thriving settlements and bright farmlands and paddy-fields... even radiant forests. Unfortunately I have never had the luck to be deployed to one of these mythical locations. In all my trips here, this is precisely the atmosphere I have come to anticipate."

"I think it might rain," another officer raised his gaze to the sky, and Shirogane followed suit, clicking his tongue against his teeth as he registered the growing swell of greyish clouds.

"That would be the final piece in a spectacularly miserable trip," he murmured, more to himself than to his companions. "Very well. If we are to appear as drowned rats before Guren-sama, we might as well ensure we have done our job to the utmost beforehand. I said we would track around the village, but as our being here as alerted no Hollows thus far, I believe we must search the dwellings themselves for any sign of recent residence. The mist makes it impossible to discern life signs, but I feel Guren-sama will send us back to double-check, and I should rather do the inspection now than in the driving rain."

"We might be swallowed up by the ground if it rains while we're still here," another officer tucked thick dark hair behind his ear, curling his hand around his sword. "The village is probably less muddy, sir. If people lived there once..."

"They had to have a reason to leave, though," another officer pointed out. "Flooding could well be it."

"Either way, avoiding the issue will not locate our prey." Shirogane drew his sword from his sheath, turning to ensure that all his companions were following suit. "We will stay together, and not give an enemy the opportunity to pick off any of our number. I think it highly unlikely that the exile we seek is concealing himself in such a distasteful place, bearing in mind that, whatever his other flaws, he is originally a man of Clan birth — but we may discover some clue to his current whereabouts.”

He glanced at his blackened, mud-soaked tabi, and sighed.

“Real World mud is so much more difficult to eradicate than that in Seireitei,” he murmured under his breath, tightening his hold on Ginkyoujiki’s hilt, and marching with a mixture of purpose and resignation into the gloomy clump of derelict structures. Many of them were lacking in roofs, he noted as they picked their way along what had once been a main street, but was now waterlogged, sprigs of green pushing up between split cobbles and packed earth. On either side, broken timbers were thick with different kinds of mould, and the atmosphere was fetid with the smell of damp and decay. Almost instinctively, Shirogane covered his mouth and nose with the sleeve of his left arm, and from the sounds behind him, he knew his men had done the same. It was a different kind of decay to that which they encountered in Soul Society — there was no spirit matter here to be returned and recycled into something new and useful. Only a couple of the houses appeared to still have their roofs, and Shirogane peered cautiously in through the doorway of one, his gaze scanning the upper rafters for any sign of the small, black creatures that he so loathed. They were empty, though, no sign of life nor recent residence by either man or beast, and he stepped back onto the central path with a heavy sigh.

“It appears this place has long since been left to rot,” he reflected. “There is nothing of value to us here.”

“I wonder if Ryuu-dono or Guren-sama have had any more luck,” one of the other officers remarked, and Shirogane nodded.

“I am sure they are being quite as thorough as we are, but there have been no signals of distress, so perhaps with just as little reward,” he reflected. “I think we should...”

The sound of something, faint but definitely not imagination caused him to stop mid-sentence, tension suddenly coursing through his body. He glanced from left to right, trying to make out anything unusual or dangerous in the mists that hung heavy over the village, but try as he might, he could see nothing.

“Fukutaichou?” the officer’s voice sounded apprehensive, and Shirogane’s eyes narrowed to near slits.

“I heard something,” he responded softly. “Something that wasn’t one of us. Be on your guard, all of you. I am certain I did not imagine it.”

“I heard it too,” a second officer confirmed. “It came from the edge of the village — towards what looks like an old market-place.”

“Then we progress,” Shirogane said darkly. “Prepare for fighting at a moment’s notice, and stay close together.”

Within the heart of the Clan, and before the ladies and the expectations of the noble court, Shirogane had long since proven himself capable of the highest level of proper etiquette and courtly accomplishment in all the most cultured arts. Here, in the field, however, with Ginkyoujiki in his hand, he was a military officer, and his companions knew that an order given was to be obeyed at once, without a moment of hesitation. As a result, it was a compact group of Kuchiki fighters who pushed forward towards the deserted, lumpy ground of the former market-place, the odd splinter of wood or broken cartwheel indicating that it had once been a place of thriving trade. At a gesture from Shirogane, the officers fanned out around the perimeter, looking for any sign of danger, but there was none. The place remained silent, and Shirogane pursed his lips in annoyance.

Maybe it was one of those annoying bat things. In which case, I do not need to see it, let alone try to battle with it.

“Nothing at all, sir,” the final officer reported, saluting and returning to the centre of the ground. “We’ve searched the village, and there’s no sign of life here.”

“Then I suppose we ought to leave it, and make our way forward to rendezvous with Guren-sama and Ryuu,” Shirogane let out his breath in a rush. “Do not let your guard down — we have a little way to go yet, and this atmosphere is oppressive.”

“It’s enough to make one sick,” a junior officer remarked fervently, his complexion somewhat green, and there were murmurs of assent from his companions. Shirogane cast the youngster a rueful glance.

This is the advantage of Academy education over that conducted within the Clan. As rigorous as Guren-sama attempts to make the training course, there are always ways to get around the most unpleasant duties by insisting on training at home. Only at the Academy does a student truly learn the depth of unpleasantness involved in becoming a shinigami.

Out loud he said,

“As I believe I said, this is normal for deployment to the Real World. If you have not been here before, I trust you will take this and remember the experience, as it will doubtless come again.”

“Must it, sir?” the officer looked crestfallen, and Shirogane nodded.

“We are Clan,” he said pragmatically, “but in this environment, we are shinigami. You must not confuse the two, for I assure you, the enemies shinigami face will not be so confused. You are a target, and you are also the one line of protection between the enemy and your family, back home in District Six. If you wish to survive, you must learn to acclimatise to this kind of mission, regardless of its unsavoury nature.”

“Yes, sir,” the boy bowed his head, defeated, and Shirogane turned his gaze back to the path ahead.

Perhaps I will speak to Guren-sama about making it compulsory for lesser sons of the Clan to attend the Academy as a matter of course, if they fancy themselves as future shinigami. Squeamish stomachs in this kind of deployment are undesirable to say the least.

The village settlement was not large, and presently they reached its far borders, stepping out beyond the stone boundary and back onto the slick marshland once again. The sky had become more overcast, though it had not yet begun to rain, and Shirogane frowned, realising that the mist that had enveloped the village was slowly beginning to clear. As he led his men cautiously forwards, some prickle up his spine made him pause, turning to look back.

The village had been empty, and yet...

A screech from one of the officers at the back of the pack, followed by the yell of another confirmed Shirogane’s worst premonition and, without pausing to think, he charged back towards the rear of his patrol, sword already glittering with light as he prepared to release. As he drew closer, the mist that had cloaked his vision parted, and he saw for the first time the shadow that he now felt certain had been watching their progress through the village.

Two of the Sixth’s younger officers lay sprawled across the ground, their bodies bloody and broken by some tremendous force, and, embedded in the mud beside them were the remains of one shattered zanpakutou. One of the youngsters was twitching the fingers of a shattered arm helplessly towards the hilt of this weapon, but Shirogane had no time to be relieved that the young man was still alive, for in the centre of the chaos was the attacker, the second man’s zanpakutou grasped between thick fingers. As Shirogane had reached the heart of the scene, the attacker snapped the weapon clean in two across the blade, tossing the fragments of the spirit weapon aside as though it were no more than a piece of dead wood.

“You brought children here to fight me?”

The man spoke, his voice dark and full of derision, and his eyes met Shirogane’s for the first time, boring deep into the Vice Captain’s gaze. He appeared a man of Shirogane’s own years, or a little older, though taller and much more substantially built, his reddish gold hair thick and wild across his shoulders like a lion’s mane and his murky dark eyes full of censure. He was robed in the casual dress of any peasant man, but Shirogane could sense his reiryokunow, and he knew that this individual was far from what he seemed. More, the lack of a chain at his chest indicated that he was not a Plus Soul awaiting Soul Burial, and a chill crept up Shirogane’s spine as he put these facts together.

“Who are you?” He demanded, stepping forward and gesturing for his officers to give the unknown attacker a wide berth. “How can you see us — and why are you attacking us?”

“Well, I imagine you came here to fight me,” the man folded broad arms across his chest, a challenge in his eyes. “Your babes aren’t dead — yet. I simply wanted to get the attention of the officer in charge.”

His gaze flitted to the badge on Shirogane’s arm, and he nodded, apparently satisfied with what he saw.

“I imagine that would be you,” he added. “I’ve been waiting for you, but you were taking far too long to find me. I thought I’d give you a clue — and well, here you are.”

“Answer my question!” Shirogane demanded. “Who are you and what do you want with us?”

“Tell me who you are, and I’ll decide whether it’s worth my answering,” came the reply. “I want to know if there’s any point naming myself before people I intend to rip into shreds.”

Indignation surged within Shirogane’s proud heart, and his grey eyes became cold.

“Sakurai,” he spoke without even glancing towards his fellow officers, but at the sound of his name, the nearest individual stiffened, a look of apprehension crossing his features. “Gather together everyone and take them back away from here, out of range. I shall settle this, and I do not wish to kill my own squad members by accident. Uranabe, take care of the wounded and do what you can. You need not worry about a threat — I am more than a match for such an arrogant individual.”

“You call me arrogant?” the stranger’s eyes sparked for a moment, and he snorted. “Ah, let me guess. You’re from the Kuchiki Clan. Am I right?”

“Fukutaichou!” The man called Sakurai raised his voice in protest, but Shirogane dismissed him with a flick of his left hand, his focus entirely on the battle at hand.

“Kuchiki Shirogane,” he said softly, “Vice Captain of the Sixth Division, and heir to Seireitei’s most noble Clan.”

“Well, I have done well,” to Shirogane’s annoyance, the man seemed pleased, nodding his head. “Well, Kuchiki Shirogane, I suppose we’ll see whether all that pride is worth anything out here, in a spiritually dead wasteland. I snapped your subordinates’ swords as though they were twigs — I could snap each one of them the same, but I wanted your attention, first. I want your head, first. Your minnows can run and hide wherever they like... I’ll come and retrieve them later on.”

“Saite, Ginkyoujiki!” As soon as he was sure that his subordinate officers were out of his line of fire, Shirogane thrust his weapon forward, the silver blade fragmenting into shards of razor-sharp metal that sped through the misty atmosphere towards the interloper’s broad throat and torso. The man made no immediate attempt to counter, then, the next moment he disappeared, reappearing less than a foot away from where Shirogane was standing.

“Do you think that I’ll stand and wait for you to kill me?” he asked quietly. “You are naive. Of course not.”

“That was shunpo!” Shirogane swung around, darting away from the reach of the man’s thick paws as he resummoned his weapon. “I answered your question, but you haven’t answered mine. Who are you?”

“Ah,”

The man’s lips twisted into a cold, humourless smile, and the arm which had come flying out in Shirogane’s direction in the form of a punch suddenly stopped mid-flight, the fingers opening one by one to reveal something small and silver against his skin. The edges were bent, as though he had crushed it with the force of his fist alone, and Shirogane’s heart twisted in his chest as he realised what the object was. His gaze strayed to his reformed sword, eyes widening in disbelief as he realised the tip of the blade was still missing. His gaze flitted back to the stranger in dismay, and the man’s smile widened. He turned his hand, allowing the fragment to drop onto the muddy ground, where he compacted it into the slime with the toe of his sandal. There was no sign of a mark on the man's palm, no indication that the piece of metal had cut through his skin, and despite himself, Shirogane took a step backwards.

He grabbed a piece of my sword out of thin air. He grabbed it, held it in his hand, and it didn't even cut him. More, he did it so quickly that I could not see him move. Was that really shunpo? Was it, or... something... else?

"You look confused," the man dusted his hands together absently. "Well, let me explain things to you properly, shall I?"

He raised his hand to his face, and Shirogane's heart stilled in his chest a second time as he registered the slick covering of white that had begun to seep from the man's eyes and ears, spreading across his face until his features were all but concealed.

"Hollow..." he whispered, and the man shook his head.

"No, not a Hollow," he said matter-of-factly, his voice becoming tinny and eerily distorted by the mask. "You wish that's all I was, but I'm something far, far worse. My name is Haruya, and I'm going to be the man who kills you, Kuchiki Shirogane."

"Well?"

Shunsui stepped over the threshold of the small chamber, a wary expression on his clever features. The room's sole occupant was huddled in blankets against the wall by the window, his face ash pale and his dark brown eyes like smudged shadows in his face, but at the sound of Shunsui's voice he turned. There was a mixture of relief and resignation in his expression, and he extended a thin arm from beneath the warmth of his wrappings, gesturing for the other man to come into the room proper. Shunsui hesitated, then did as he was bidden, pushing the door shut with a soft click before coming to perch his lithe frame on the end of the youngster's bed.

"Juu said you asked for me," he said, by way of preamble. "If he hadn't asked, I probably wouldn't have come — so whatever it is, it had better be important."

"You really don't like me, do you?" Kohaku's observation was weary, and Shunsui shrugged his shoulders.

"I don't know," he admitted. "I don't know what your motives are, and I don't know if Juu is right to protect you. If he's caught, he'll be in trouble... probably we both will, but I'm less bothered for myself than I am for him right now. He's the one who's been keeping the biggest secrets — and though I don't intend on betraying him, I'm not happy with how things are."

"I see," Kohaku pressed his lips together, then lowered his head in an apologetic nod. "I thought he would have told you about me. I'm sorry. I know you're right."

"Did you call me out here just to tell me that?" Shunsui arched an eyebrow, and Kohaku sighed, shaking his head.

"There isn't much time," he murmured, more than half to himself. "I don't know how to persuade... but... even if you don't trust me, I can tell that you trust Ukitake-dono, don't you?"

"We've been friends a while, yes," Shunsui was on his guard. 'Don't think you can use the fact he trusts you to win me around, though. The fact remains that you're the son of someone Seireitei wants, and there's an order for your head on a plate to be delivered first class to the Council of Elders. I haven't come to kill you,' as Kohaku flinched back at his words, "and I understand Juu's reasons for protecting you from them, but if anything were to happen to him, I'd be a lot less forgiving. You need to understand that... Juu means a lot to me, and I won't sacrifice him, not to protect you or anyone else."

Kohaku's eyes narrowed slightly, then a faint, half-relieved smile touched his lips.

"That's what I thought," he observed. "I'm glad I was right. It doesn't matter about me. I don't want you to protect me, not if you don't think you can trust me. It's not important that you do. If you think I'm such a threat to your friend, then if you want to kill me, even, I won't fight. But I can't... die yet. Tomorrow... I need... before this... I..."

"You're not making any sense," despite himself, Shunsui was alarmed at the slightly glazed expression that was creeping across the young man's gaze, and he grabbed Kohaku by the shoulders, giving him a short, sharp shake. "Snap out of it and come back to the world of the living, please! It's not the time for one of your visions — things are complicated enough, without..."

"Kyouraku-dono, I need you to help me," Thin fingers suddenly clamped themselves around Shunsui's wrists, and the Captain faltered, aware that those strange brown eyes were now watching him intently, as though trying to see right through his body. "There's nobody else who can, only you. I thought if you came, I might... be able to tell you."

“Koku?” Shunsui was worried now. “If you’re unwell, then let me send for Mitsuki or someone. You’re meant to be taking it easy, and Juu won’t be pleased with me if you hurt yourself. You’re shaking like a leaf, and I’ve seen better colour on a Captain’s haori. Whatever’s bothering you, I’ll listen — but don’t disappear into your own world on me. If you do that, I...”

“I need you to understand,” Kohaku’s voice was soft, and a sudden jolt of energy shot through Shunsui’s body, momentarily paralysing him as Koku’s reiryoku surged through his skin. A morass of pictures flooded his senses, jamming his usual thought signals, and panic began to surge up inside of him as he struggled to fight himself free. As he did so, the images came into sudden, sharp clarity, and he drew in breath sharply, finding the strength at last to push Kohaku forcibly away from him.

“What the hell was that?” he demanded, getting agitatedly to his feet and putting space between him and his companion. “Dammit, what are you playing at? What did you do to me? Why... why would you...”

“You saw it?” Relief filled Kohaku’s tired tones, and he sighed, rubbing his temples. “I wasn’t sure you would. I’m not that strong right now. A lot of my strength isn’t here, and I need to save it. I need to be able to... tomorrow.”

“Tomorrow?” Shunsui echoed, and Kohaku’s head shot up, emotion in the dark brown eyes.

“Tomorrow, Father will come here,” he said unevenly. “I’ve known he was coming for a while. Probably I knew before I even came here, that he wouldn’t walk away. I’m important to him, so he won’t leave me. He needs me. I’ve been expecting it to happen — I just didn’t know for certain when... or how. When he does... bad things will happen. He’s coming to find me... he’s coming to begin a war. A proper war. A war in which people will die.”

“Keitarou?” Despite himself, Shunsui felt a chill run down his spine, and Kohaku nodded jerkily.

“You don’t trust me, and there’s no reason you should,” he said sadly. “I’m such a terrible person... terrible in every respect, and I’m going to make my sins worse, talking to you in this way. But I thought... you might understand. You’re the only person I can talk to about this. What I showed you... was truth that hasn’t happened yet. It’s as vivid to me now as though it was happening right in front of me. I could only show you a little bit... only a portion of what’s inside my head, but I hoped... that little bit would be enough.”

“Truth..?” Shunsui’s throat suddenly felt dry, and he forgot all about putting distance between himself and the young prophet, grabbing him hastily by the wrists. “What do you mean, truth? Are you just saying that that... that what you just made me see... that’s going to happen? Like Souja... tomorrow... and I... I can’t... why would you? Why would you put an image like that into my head? Why would you make me see..”

“Because I can’t stop it. Not that,” Kohaku’s tones were laced with regret. “I’m not very strong, Kyouraku-dono. I don’t know how much I can do. I need your help.”

He touched delicate fingers to the sleeve of Shunsui’s pink haori, gazing at the Captain with apologetic eyes, and Shunsui was taken aback to see the tears glittering in the young man’s depths.

“I knew the first time I saw you, that I needed to ask your help,” he said brokenly. “I knew, though, you didn’t like death. You didn’t want to kill people, and I... I hadn’t found my resolve. I didn’t understand exactly why, not then. Not till now. I know now that it’s tomorrow, everything will happen. Otousama will come here. Sakaki is dead. Katsura acted outside of his expectations. He’s got no other paths to take now — he’s going to come to retrieve me. It’s me he believes he needs most, so he won’t hold back this time. He’s going to attack Seireitei while it’s weakened, and render it in ruins. People... will die as a result. You can’t stop that, and nor can I.”

“Then why would you make me see something like that?” Shunsui’s uncharacteristic temper flared, frustration glittering in his brown eyes. “Why did you bring me here?”

“Father thinks I’m his secret weapon,” Kohaku did not answer the question, his words half-dreamy and his eyes unfocused as he spoke, turning to gaze out of the window. “He thinks my power will help bring Soul Society to its knees. It can. Maybe it will... but I don’t want to kill people. I don’t want to destroy Soul Society. I thought that, because I knew I didn’t, it would never be a problem. But I was naive. I understand now... Father’s misapprehension and... and mine.”

He sighed, glancing at his hands.

“My greatest power is doing nothing, when something needs to be done,” he said bitterly. “I let bad things happen, and I don’t get involved. Because of that, people have already suffered. Tomorrow, Father will come here and attack. He will come seeking me, and I will have to go with him.”

“And that connects to this vision, how?” Shunsui demanded, his tones a little sharper than normal. “You’re not answering my question, Koku. You’re not telling me why you’d make me see something so horrific, taunt me with it and then tell me nothing can be done. If you’re going to run off after Keitarou, if that’s what you’re intending, then...”

“I will go with my father, when he comes,” Kohaku said simply, raising his gaze once more, and Shunsui was horrified to see tears trickling down the young man’s cheeks. “I have to. I know you can’t trust me, but everything I’ve shown you is truth. I have to go with Father. I can’t explain to you why, just that... nothing can begin at all if I don’t. Because I must, there are things I can’t protect. Things I want to protect.”

Shunsui’s brow creased in consternation, as he realised what his companion meant. He muttered a curse.

“You mean... Juushirou?”

Slowly Kohaku nodded his head.

“You don’t want him to die. I don’t, either,” he said brokenly. “You might hate me, and maybe you can’t trust me. Maybe it’s right to be suspicious of me — I might yet make everything a lot worse and you have no reason to believe a word I say, when I’ve lied so much already. But that man... Ukitake-dono... he’s been kind to me from the start. I don’t really know how to respond to kindness like that from a stranger. I’ve never had it from anyone before. My brother was the only one who ever treated me like a person, but he’s family and he can see inside my head. Ukitake-dono can’t. He has no way to know anything about me... and there’s so much he doesn’t. Yet he’s kind to me and he trusts in me. He listens to me. I don’t want him to die because of me. And you... you care for him. So I know... you don’t want it either.”

“Well, on that we agree,” Shunsui said darkly. “Not that Juushirou is a weak touch in his own right. He might slice your father into two pieces on first sight with Sougyo no Kotowari.”

“No...” Kohaku shook his head. “Sougyo no Kotowari has never taken a life. He tried to take my brother prisoner, rather than really moving to kill him. And though... I can always feel Ukitake-dono’s strength, I don’t think... in this situation... he could easily defend himself. Because he’s been kind to me, I know he has a weakness. That weakness... is... not being able to easily hurt those he cares for.”

“I don’t think he cares for your father much, you know.”

“No, but I believe he cares about me, now.” Kohaku said simply. “Otherwise, why would he protect me? Because he does, I don’t know if he is in a position to fight my father. More importantly, though, nor do I know if... he could fight against others. There’s someone in the Gotei who you can’t trust. You know that, don’t you? Ukitake-dono asked me about it, so I know you must. I don’t know who it is and I can’t find out. I don’t know how they intend to act, or what Father has promised them in return for their cooperation. But whoever it is... may be someone Ukitake-dono trusts and likes.”

“You don’t know who the spy is, yet you don’t think it’s me?”

“I know it isn’t you,” Kohaku dismissed this with a flick of his hand. “I’ve met you.”

“And? I might just be a very good actor.”

“No. I read your aura, and besides, I saw who you were the first time we met,” Kohaku managed a wan smile. “I am not strong enough, right now, like this, to try and see who is spying on you all, but I think... it is probably someone I have never met. If I had met them, I would... probably... have sensed it from their aura, that they’d been in contact with Father. I haven’t felt that at all, so I don’t... I don’t know. I only know who I’m sure it isn’t... Ukitake-dono and you top that list.”

“Hrm,” Shunsui considered for a moment, his conversation with Juushirou fresh in his mind. For a moment, he debated raising Minaichi’s name, then, just as quickly, decided against. Whether Kohaku was trustworthy or not, he would not complicate matters by raising new questions and risking his companion disappearing into another of his dreamlike trances.

“Unfortunately that doesn’t rule out many people,” he continued aloud. “I’m already certain nobody at Thirteenth or in my own division would be fool enough to play spy, and I don’t particularly suspect Mitsuki or anyone at Seventh, either. We decided it was someone of rank, in any case... but you won’t have met anybody of rank except the people here, and me. So it still leaves it wide open.”

“It does,” Kohaku nodded. “Father knew a lot of things that I didn’t tell him — and probably still does. It probably is someone important, but I don’t know who it is. Ukitake-dono might be friends with them, though. You might too, but I think... you could fight it, if it happened. You understand... betrayal in a different way to Ukitake-dono. I think he might want to talk, to get answers, and it could make him hesitate... so I don’t know whether he would be so quick to fight.”

“Maybe that’s true. He can be an idealistic idiot,” Shunsui acknowledged. “Well? I’m listening. I don’t see how all this sticks together, but I’ll hear you out till the end at least.”

“Thank you,” Kohaku hesitated for a moment, then, “I’ve chosen to speak to you because as much as I want to, I can’t change that image. My ability is to see the future. It’s not necessarily ever been to change it. I can’t do that... not on my own. In the past, I’ve tried to handle everything on my own, but doing that... has probably cost people lives and made things worse. This time, I don’t want that to happen. I can’t do anything about the thing I showed you, but you... you can.”

He sighed.

“I don’t even know if my telling you this now is right or wrong, or whether it might make the end result worse,” he admitted. “I don’t know if I’ve made the right choice, or if the things that happen tomorrow will still result in terrible things. I had to try, though, this time. In the past, I haven’t tried, but I can’t keep running from it forever. I can’t prevent what I showed you from happening, but you can. You can change it, Kyouraku-dono. You’re probably the only one who’s able.”

“You’re saying that I can protect Juu?” Shunsui’s eyes became slits. “Meaning that Keitarou intends on targeting him directly? Maybe by using that spider of his to weave a web?”

“Father can’t,” Kohaku shook his head. “Chudokuga’s Bankai can’t take control of the same soul twice.”

“Then how?”

“I don’t know, precisely,” Kohaku admitted, “but I do know one thing. Father can’t use his ability on me, either. I didn’t ever know why that was, but I think... now I do. Or I’m gambling... guessing that I do without any absolute proof of it.”

He reached up to brush the ends of his straggly hair.

“I have dark hair and eyes,” he continued. “I don’t have the Endou killing spirit, and I’m not scientifically inclined. I’m the odd one out, the black sheep in my family. Father told me a long time ago that I had his mother’s eyes, but I never understood the significance until now. I... I realised recently that it’s not just those elements of my appearance that are different. They’re not random. They’re from a different strain of the family completely. They’re... they’re Kyouraku. Aizen is a Kyouraku name, isn’t it?”

“It is,” Shunsui looked stricken. “Are you trying to tell me that that means something in this? That your spirit power — your strange ability to see the future — is somehow Kyouraku in origin?”

“I don

’t know what it is, or if I even understood right, “Kohaku sighed, rubbing his temples, and Shunsui was aware of how weary the boy looked.” I don’t know if there will ever be time to explain, even if I come to understand. But... what I think is... that it’s that element of my spirit power that Father can’t control. I think he could have controlled my sister... maybe even my brother, and I know he used his sword on my mother, once. He’s used it on members of other Clans — but never on a Kyouraku. And you’re a Kyouraku from the central family line, aren’t you? A direct descendant from the first Kyouraku lord?”

Shunsui nodded.

“My brother is Head of the Clan,” he agreed.

“I thought so,” Kohaku nodded, as if confirming something to himself. “When I saw you, that first time, I knew... you were someone my father hated. I knew you were someone he had tried to kill in the past... someone who had scarred him, somehow.”

“I suppose you could say he gave the scars first,” Shunsui’s fingers strayed absently to his right arm, then lowered. “Well? What are you implying? That Keitarou’s sword can’t manipulate me, even though it never has?”

“Your sword manipulates things too, doesn’t it?” Kohaku responded with a question of his own, and Shunsui nodded warily.

“It does, but don’t expect me to trot out a full and detailed explanation of its strengths and weaknesses to someone whose motives I still can’t read,” he said softly. Kohaku smiled faintly.

“I don’t need to know that. I don’t want to, even. But my reiryoku... it can influence people, too. The things I see can make people react and take action, even if I don’t intend it. I don’t think our spirit power is alike, Kyouraku-dono, but I do think that because it manipulates, it can’t be easily manipulated. And if that is the nature of Kyouraku spirit power... then probably, given how pure Kyouraku your blood is... Otousama can’t use his sword to manipulate you. Your sword is descended one hundred percent from that pure Kyouraku line, whereas his spirit power is a meshing of three different Clan families in one. Even given everything he is able to do, I think if he came up against your weapon, well, his blood just isn’t Kyouraku enough to compete.”

“But yours is?”

“My reiryoku was impacted by father’s drinking reidoku before I was conceived. I have more spirit power than he does,” Kohaku said matter-of-factly. “That’s why he needs me, and why he will come for me. I’m more powerful, potentially, than he is... more than my brother or my sister could be. It’s why I wasn’t sure if I could make you see... the thing I needed you to see. I wasn’t sure if my spirit power could touch you like it does other people... it’s an unknown quantity, but I hoped I could at least make you see, even if I couldn’t... influence you to act. I’m glad I could do that, because explaining it any other way would’ve been hard. Spirit manipulation is a matter of strength, though, isn’t it? One of the old books I often used to read talked a little about that. My Kyouraku blood is muddier than Father’s is, but if I’m right and my reiryoku is fundamentally Kyouraku in nature, then because my spirit power is greater than his he can’t, even with his power as it is now, use Chudokuga on me. He won’t use it on you, because your sword is more Kyouraku than Chudokuga can counteract. And he can’t touch Ukitake-dono again, because he already did, once, and it got broken.”

“So say you’re right about all of this. If you are, what did you call me here for, really?” Shunsui’s eyes became thoughtful. “There’s a reason behind this whole discussion, and if it relates to Juu’s safety... I want to understand more. If Juu is in danger, but not from Chudokuga, then I need more information than you’ve given me so far. If I can do something to change what you showed me, even if you can’t forcibly influence me to act, I’m pretty sure I’m game to find out what on my own account.”

“You can change it.” Kohaku agreed. “But to do so, I have to ask something unforgivable. Unforgivable for me and unforgivable for you. It’s not something you can consider lightly... even if you did act, and do as I told you, it would probably remain with you forever. It might haunt you... for a long time to come.”

Shunsui gazed at Kohaku for a moment, then he sighed, the tension draining out of him as he read the pain in the young boy’s eyes. He rested a gentle hand on the young man’s shoulder, casting him a questioning look.

“Explain as clearly as you know how,” he said quietly. “I’m listening.”

Author's Note

Shirogane is afraid of bats... xD

59. Battleground

Chapter Fifty Eight: Battleground

If you ask me, this whole place looks highly suspect.”

Kyouki stood at the edge of the small forest clearing, her keen gaze sweeping over the tree stumps and broken rocks which appeared to circle around the remains of a dying campfire. Three hours trekking through the Real World woodland had ultimately brought them to this spot, and though there were no immediate signs of activity, the lingering traces of reiatsu in the air coupled with the obvious remains of a human woodcutter’s resting place told the Fifth Division Captain that this was almost certainly the base camp they had been seeking.

She sighed, running fingers absently through dark, curly hair.

“It’s rather a let down, finding such a blatant space like this, carved into the woodland,” she added regretfully. “Nagesu-kun was so hot on the idea of it being within that mountain, somewhere — but there’s no mistaking it. This place is thick with reiatsu, and whilst I can’t identify a single presence I know, that doesn’t mean it’s not something we ought to ignore.”

“The embers in the fire are still warm, Kyouki-sama,” One of the division’s lesser officers knelt down beside the pile of ash and charcoal, holding his hand above the fine black dust before touching it gingerly with his fingers. “Someone was here recently — perhaps as recently as last night.”

“These were cut down by humans, though,” Ryuusei ran his fingers over the smooth surface of one of the felled trees. “How can we be sure it’s not still a place used by them? There’s nobody about, but that doesn’t mean...”

“Use your senses, Ryuusei,” Kyouki admonished lightly, shaking her head. “Can’t you feel it, lingering on the breeze? Humans don’t leave those kinds of traces of their presence, and Hollows are far too aggressive to be able to conceal themselves in the presence of so many nice, juicy shinigami. No, this is suspicious all right — and it’s emptiness makes it ever more suspicious. It’s so nicely laid out, so ready for us to find it... that it makes me uneasy.”

“Do you think it’s a trap, Taichou?” Arai, Fifth Division’s Third Seat asked apprehensively, and Kyouki nodded.

“Absolutely no doubt that that’s what it is,” she said frankly, raising her hand and gesturing to the surrounding forest. “Up to this point, the trees have been spaced — probably as a result of the human woodcutters — but beyond, the land is dense and dark, full of heavy foliage and not much sunlight. This is the perfect place to use as a lure... or to seclude oneself ready to launch an ambush. We can’t drop our guard for a moment — just because nobody appears to be here now, it doesn’t mean that they can’t return here once they realise we’ve arrived.”

“We ought to secure the scene and take whatever evidence we can from it, for later review,” Ryuusei suggested, and Kyouki inclined her head in agreement.

“A trap or not, people have definitely been here, and they seem likely to have been people of interest to us,” she agreed. “Whether they want us here for their own ends or not, I don’t think it can hurt to see what they left for us.”

She cast another pensive glance towards the thick darkness of the forest beyond, then sighed, drawing her sword.

“Taichou?” Arai cast her a questioning look, and Kyouki offered him a wry smile.

“It never hurts to be prepared, not when dealing with an individual we know has already killed many, many people, of both high and low rank and birth,” she said pragmatically. “Having Gekkoushin drawn now means saving time later, when she might prove to be needed.”

“There’s really not a lot here, Okaasama,” Ryuusei knelt down beside one of the large stones, tilting his head so that he could examine the earth around the base. “Maybe there’s the faintest sign of footsteps, but they barely make an impression. The land here is soft, but not settled enough to leave any lasting imprint. I can sense reiatsu too, now, but like you, I can’t identify it with someone I know. I think there was more than one person here, though.”

“Keitarou and his family?” Arai suggested, and Kyouki shrugged.

“Eiraki-hime’s presence is negligible — in this atmosphere, sensing her aura would be hard, if not almost impossible,” she reflected, striding around the far perimeter of the makeshift camp and turning to view it from a fresh perspective. “Of course, we don’t know exactly how many children this man has spawned, so we can’t rule out the chance there are more than we think.”

She hesitated for a moment, then,

“Ryuusei, I’m leaving you in charge, with Arai to back you up,” she said decidedly, and Ryuusei raised his gaze in surprise.

“Leaving me?” he echoed. “Mother, what are you planning to do? Surely you don’t intend on abandoning us and going hunting for Keitarou and who knows how many associate officers all on your own?”

“I don’t think I’m in danger of doing that,” Kyouki shook her head, licking her finger and holding it up to test the direction of the wind. She nodded, apparently satisfied with what she felt. “Yes, I thought so. This was a place where more than one person was located, but we’re talking in the past tense. They went their separate ways from here — we can only hope that means they’ll encounter unexpected surprises from our other division parties along the way. At least one of the reiatsu traces I can sense here is consistent with what I expect from Urahara shinigami, so it’s more than possible that’s Keitarou. I can’t tell what direction he took, nor specifically pinpoint any of the others — the atmosphere here is too thin and spiritless. However, if they separated, the chances are one or more are still in this vicinity. I will sweep the edge of the forestland with Gekkoushin. It’s a good place to hide, and I’m capable of defending myself. Light and dark are within my capabilities, Ryuusei, so don’t look so worried. You won’t be inheriting the Shiba Clan just yet — I give you my word.”

She winked, offering him a grin, and Ryuusei sighed, shaking his head in resignation.

“Whatever you say,” he said reluctantly. ‘If that’s Taichou’s orders, I guess we can only obey them. Arai!’ He raised his voice, and the Third Seat got to his feet, dusting the residual ash from his uniform. “Take second patrol and skirt the right hand perimeter of the camp, collecting anything and everything that appears out of place or significant. First patrol, you and I will take the left hand side. Nobody else is to leave the confines of the campsite under any circumstances until Taichou returns — understood?”

There were immediate calls of assent and salutes from the officers present, and Kyouki eyed them approvingly before nodding her head.

“I’ll see you shortly,” she said briskly. “I’ll stretch my legs and, if you hear crashes and see bright lights, don’t worry too much about them. Gekkoushin is restless and I imagine that a few trees might become sacrificed if it cuts an easier path to the enemy.”

“Well, don’t create too much of a furore,” Ryuusei warned her, amusement flickering briefly in his own characteristically sober gaze.

“We’re not here to re-landscape the Real World, Mother — and especially not to get the attention of the human citizens who live here.”

“Sometimes I wonder if you think you’re already Captain of this squad,” Kyouki bantered back. “Very well. I’ll leave the others in your capable hands, and be off.”

Before Ryuusei could find a response, she ducked beneath the branches of a nearby tree, plunging into the forest proper and blinking as her eyes struggled to acclimatise to the dim light. As she had surmised, this area of woodland had been left largely untouched by the human natives, and only the faintest rays of sunlight threaded their way through the thick leafy canopy, a multitude of branches vying for the light of the sun. At her feet, grass grew in patches, longer in areas blessed with more sun, and yellowed and struggling around the roots of the powerful tree trunks. Ferns and other low-lying plants made it difficult to see where one tree root ended and the next began, and Kyouki found that she had to work hard not to trip over the uneven forest floor. Slicing through the lower branches of some of the most densely packed trees with Gekkoushin’s blade, she was able to make her way more deeply into the woodland, disturbing nesting birds and angry, rodentish creatures who darted up into the higher branches with indignant swishes of furry tails.

Real World forests were much fuller of life than those in Seireitei, yet despite the number of living entities watching her from the shadows, Kyouki knew that there was far less to confuse her spiritual wits in a place like this. None of the small creatures lurking in dens below her feet or in holes cut into the trunks of trees created even the slightest spiritual murmur, and, though she was certain they could see her as well as she could see them, with the weapon in her hand, none of them attempted to launch any kind of attack. They had clearly encountered humans with similarly sharp blades, she reflected, wondering if this land was used for hunting and poaching and so had been left in its natural state, in order to coax out rabbits and birds which were a supplementary part of the living world’s diet. As if to confirm her thoughts, traces of a wooden trap poked up above the level of the overgrown grass and, a little further on, a young rabbit whose body had been caught in some kind of snare. It was dead, the flies already buzzing around the creature’s eyes and bloody, raw throat, and Kyouki wrinkled up her nose in displeasure at the scent of decay.

You’d think that, if people left traps like this, they’d remember how to find them before the food went bad. Such a waste of life and energy and...

hey, wait a minute. That's funny.

She frowned, bending to examine the rabbit more closely, and as she did, a sense of unease washed through her body. Though most of the creature's corpse had been concealed in the long grass, the sheer number of flies buzzing around what was clearly still quite a fresh body attracted her attention, and, gingerly, she pushed back the blades of grass, her brows creasing in consternation as she realised that the beast's rear legs were entirely missing. They had been ripped away or, no, maybe chewed through by some other beast of the forest, for the edges were ragged and had gone straight through the bones as well. The sticky, congealing mess of blood told Kyouki that whatever had come for the creature, it had done so recently... and more, she realised with a jolt, had perhaps bitten the creature in half before the cruel snare had managed to complete its job.

Hunting of this nature was the way of the wild in the Real World, and Kyouki, in her years as a shinigami, had encountered more of the Real World than many, having come here on many missions in the dim, distant past alongside Shunsui's long-dead father, Matsuhara. Yet there was something about the savagery of this desecrated corpse that struck genuine disgust into her stout heart. It was not just the action of a wild animal, but something else, something more... sinister, and, as she hovered her hand hesitantly above the body, disrupting the nesting flies into a buzzing swarm of protest, she felt her worst fears confirmed.

Whatever had attacked this rabbit, it was neither human, nor real world predator. It was something else... something spiritual... with an unmistakeably potent, pungent reiatsu.
Something I felt near the campsite, but not in such a clear, noxious way.

Kyouki stood upright, turning her back on the rabbit in disgust and raising her gaze to scan the upper branches for any sign of the killer.
Whatever it was, it came here, it chewed up the rabbit, and then... it disappeared. The creatures here are hiding because they witnessed it... and who can blame them. They probably see me as exactly the same as what came before. Animals are so much wiser to our presence than humans, and they are less easy to fool. If they are scared, it means there is something to be scared of — something that hunts them and rips them into shreds. They were afraid before I came here... but what of, exactly? What are we hunting for, in that case?

"Fukutaichou!"

A desperate, terrified scream from the campsite sent all other thoughts from Kyouki's mind, her maternal instinct galvanising her into immediate action. All idea of stalking the predator through the thick woodland had fled in the moment she had realised her son was in some kind of danger, and she slashed and smashed her way back through the trees, paying little attention to the damage she was causing in her hurry to get back to where she had left the remains of her division.

As she stepped into the clearing, she felt a wave of noxious, pungent reiatsu wash over her once more, fresh and familiar from her examination of the rabbit, and her heart almost stopped in her chest as she saw her eldest son's body flung through the air, a spray of blood from an unidentified wound spattering like red rain down onto the earth below. Scattered around the camp were other members of the Fifth Division, some unconscious or worse, others dazed, bloody and struggling to regain their balance, but in that moment Kyouki could not focus on how many members of her squad had been taken down. All she could see was Ryuusei, his limp body twisting through the air before plunging towards the ground like a dead weight.

"Ryuusei!"

The Vice Captain met the ground with a cracking thud that sickened Kyouki to her core, and her son's name escaped her lips as she darted forwards, her duty as a Captain almost forgotten in her urgency to reach the side of her injured child. Before she could, however, something loomed out of the shadows, lurching before her with a muffled snarl, and Kyouki's features drained of all colour, her eyes widening with genuine horror as she registered the creature that now squatted before her, hunched and bloody on the ground.

From the neck down, he appeared as any other soul, though his spine appeared to have an unnatural curvature to it, as though he had spent a good amount of his life in a hunched position, rather than standing upright. From the neck up, however, his face was swathed in white, the smooth, ghostly surface split through in only three places. Two slits provided enough light through which Kyouki could make out the beady, blood-red eyes of the hunter who had killed the rabbit, whilst the mouth, already thick with red, opened to reveal canine incisors sharp enough not to shame any wolf or hunting cat. The creature held something in its thick, clubby fingers, and Kyouki swallowed hard as she realised it was the bloody remains of an arm, still dressed folornly in torn shihakushou, the badge of the Fifth Division hanging free from it at a precarious angle.

Ryuusei's... arm.

Despite all the horrific scenes she had encountered in her long years of service, Kyouki felt physically sick at the sight before her. For a moment she found herself unable to react, helpless to do anything but watch as the bloody, grotesque mouth opened wide, a long, curious tongue darting out in anticipation of its snack. The teeth closed around the elbow of Ryuusei's severed arm, sending the remains of the Vice Captain's badge tumbling to the ground with a clatter, and the sound of bone crunching between the Hollow-man's teeth sent fresh shudders of maternal distress through Kyouki's body.

"Taichou!" Arai's voice sounded very far away, but at the sound of it, the faintest slither of Kyouki's self-awareness and military mentality began to return, and, as anger surged to replace the fear and horror that had overwhelmed her, she tightened her grasp on Gekkoushin's hilt, preparing to release her weapon. She did not know, yet, if her son was alive or dead, but out of the corner of her eye she was aware of a young, frightened figure hovering hesitantly beside the fallen body, tearful and panicked, as though unsure how he ought to behave. This was Seikyou, Ryuusei's eldest son and Kyouki's first grandson, a lad of barely sixteen who had only begun to work with the full squad two or three months earlier, and the stricken, guilt-ridden expression on the young boy's face told Kyouki all she needed to know.

Ryuusei got hurt protecting his son from that monster, and now it's my turn to finish what he tried to begin. Pull yourself together, Kyouki — this is no time for sentimental weakness, not when lives are in danger. This is clearly one of Keitarou's creatures — one like Nagesu-kun reported to the Council. They're far, far more terrible than we ever imagined — a creature who can consume others is barely deserving of life. Come, Gekkoushin. Whether Ryuusei is dead or not can wait till later.

"Arai, take charge!" she raised her voice, the familiar commanding tone returning to her words. "Everyone who's able, gather up the wounded and follow Arai as far away from here as you can!" At the sound of her command, the shell-shocked Arai seemed to shake himself back into focus, and Kyouki was dimly aware of the Third Seat bellowing orders left, right and centre as a measure of order began to return to the near-hysterical divisioners. The Captain did not let her own concentration slip away from the enemy at hand, however, her blade beginning to glimmer with an angry red light. Gekkoushin was as furious and indignant as she was, and together they would make the creature pay for the insult to the Shiba Clan. Kyouki's lips parted, and, syllable by syllable, the release command dropped into the open air, every word infused with the fire of the day sun whose power she sought to summon.

“Yo ga aketemo, ten ni nokotte, Hitsuki!”

Ryuu and his patrol had been in the midst of examining a set of mounds and ditches a stone's throw from the riverbank when they had first sensed Ginkyoujiki's release. At first little more than a brief flurry on the wind, Ryuu had quickly picked up on the edge in his cousin's reiatsu. He had paused in his investigation of a particularly odd and lumpy mound of earth, scanning the skies for any sign of the alert kidou all of Sixth had been briefed to release in the event of finding danger. Despite the clear pique in Shirogane's attacking reiryoku, however, the sky remained clear and blue, and the Third Seated officer frowned, processing this in his usual, methodical manner.

“Ryuu-dono?” One of his subordinates cast him a questioning glance, aware he had stopped his own investigations, and Ryuu frowned, shaking his head.

“Ginkyoujiki,” he said briskly. “Fukutaichou has clearly run into something — though there's been no flare, so I don't suppose it was Keitarou. We should finish up quickly here and progress to the river. Guren-sama and his patrol are already in that vicinity, and these are little more than human burial remains. They might have acted as clues or places of concealment, and it seems probable someone untoward was in this area at some point, laying a trail to confuse us, but there is nothing here of value to our investigation. Keitarou is not with us, so we should move on.”

He turned away from the mounds, raising his hand to gesture to the furthestmost of his companions.

“We're moving on!” he raised his voice so that they could all clearly hear them. “Remain on your guard. I think...”

He faltered, a fresh surge of reiryoku distracting his senses, and despite himself, his gaze flitted once more in the direction he knew his cousin's patrol had gone. His brows knitted together in consternation as he once more picked up on the intensity in Shirogane's fight pattern. If it was merely a Hollow who had stumbled across the Vice Captain's path, one release of Ginkyoujiki's petal cloud would have quickly put the beast to rest. Ryuu had trained with Shirogane on many occasions since joining Sixth Squad, and the two of them had worked together enough for him to have a good understanding of his cousin's usual fighting pattern. Shirogane was a confident fighter whose carefully honed skills rarely required him to push the boat out, but as Ryuu processed his cousin's reiryoku once more, he realised that this was more than just a simple fight against a random Hollow.

“Sir?” A hesitant junior officer ventured the question this time, and Ryuu’s eyes narrowed. He turned his attention back to the alternative direction, reaching out his senses cautiously across the thin, spiritless air to where he knew his Captain’s patrol should be, and, at length, nodded. He let out his breath in a rush, then,

“Guren-sama is at the river,” he said briskly. “The bank is within sight of us now, and if you continue in a direct line with no deviations, you will join up with his forces presently.”

“You... will?” the first officer who had spoken echoed this, a startled expression in his eyes. “But sir, aren’t you coming with...?”

“I want you to take charge, Touma,” Ryuu turned to the officer in question, ignoring the look of dismay that flooded the other man’s gaze. “Take everyone and join up with Guren-sama. Explain to him everything we’ve done and investigated and apologise to him on my behalf for our lack of overall progress. Also...”

He curled his hand briefly around the hilt of his zanpakutou, then,

“Apologise to him on my account for abandoning my patrol and running to the aid of a superior officer without a command to that effect. I shall expect his discipline later — but even though there has been no Kidou flare, I do not like the sense of Shirogane-dono’s sword release. More, there’s something else in the atmosphere — and I believe I would regret it for some time if I did not go and investigate. Since Guren-sama is so close by, you will be in no danger. Please, hurry to join his group at once, and make report as I have instructed. I shall return to the river presently.”

Touma’s jaw dropped even further, his eyes almost bugging out of his head at the idea of the organised, obedient Ryuu disobeying Guren’s patrol commands and risking Shirogane’s wrath all in one go, but he somehow managed to raise his hand in a salute, and Ryuu offered him a faint smile, relieved that the man would obey his instructions, however crazy they might appear. Guren’s group were close enough that he felt certain his men would not suffer any ill effects from his absence, but the swirling darkness from Shirogane’s direction was troubling him more and more, and he did not dare delay any further. With a brisk nod in Touma’s direction, he slipped into shunpo, pushing as quickly as he could through the streams of light and energy towards the place he knew his cousin was fighting.

It was wet and soggy underfoot as he dropped out of his flashstep on the far side of the abandoned village, his feet sinking into the blackish goop, but there was no time for him to be houseproud about his footwear. Almost the instant he had emerged from his shunpo, he had sensed the undercurrents of malevolent reiryoku, the sensation acrid and twisted, but, to Ryuu, unnervingly familiar. Though he had tried to tell himself otherwise, he knew that his senses were too good to have been easily fooled. He had deliberately entered the scene at a point not immediately visible to his cousin's position, wanting to preserve the element of surprise for as long as possible, but as he picked through the abandoned village, he encountered a group of frightened, huddled officers, two of which were bloody and one quite clearly badly hurt. At the sight of him, Sakurai — clearly the officer in charge — had let out an exclamation of surprise and relief, and another officer — Uranabe — raised his head from where he had been tending to the most injured of the two junior officers, his expression becoming one of hope.

“Ryuu-dono!” It was Sakurai who spoke, but Ryuu did not give him time to speak any more.

“Fukutaichou told you to retreat,” it was a statement, not a question, but Sakurai nodded.

“Yes, sir. An enemy attacked us — an enemy with a Hollow mask, but a body like a man. He attacked two of our men, and broke their swords. Fukutaichou challenged him and told us to get out of Ginkyoujiki's range. Only we didn't like to go too far, sir — we've the injured to think of, and well, we were just thinking of sending a messenger when you arrived, sir.”

Ryuu's lips thinned, the clouds of conflicting reiryoku even clearer now, despite the mist that still lingered in patches around the village. In a moment he understood Shirogane's decision.

These officers would be no more than fodder with an enemy as powerful as this one feels to be. Senpai would've realised it quickly, and sent them away to protect them from being killed. Whether he is enough for this opponent, I wouldn't like to say — but I can imagine his feelings when he saw the juniors on the ground. It must've reminded him of Ribari-sama — and how little he wants to have any officer under his command killed again.

Out loud he said,

“Stay where you are and do as Fukutaichou instructed. Tend to the young ones. Guren-sama and my patrols are at the river, and I will go assist Fukutaichou. I believe we will manage adequately, but if something amiss should occur, take the boys and go to the river at once. Do not come back for us. Go there and report. Understand?”

“Yes, sir,” Sakurai nodded, “but are you sure...?”

“I’m sure,” Ryuu drew Shizurugi from its sheath, the hilt already glittering faintly with purple light. “I have encountered a creature such as this one before, I believe, and I am quite certain that Fukutaichou and I will be successful if we work together. Do as I instruct you, and follow Fukutaichou’s orders. The lives of every man here may depend on it.”

“Yes, sir,” Sakurai’s expression became grave, but he nodded. “I will do so sir. You have my word.”

Ryuu nodded curtly, then turned his back on the gathered shinigami, making his way purposefully through the remains of the village towards the area where the battle was in full flow. As he reached the edge of the settlement, Ryuu could see his cousin for the first time, blood and mud splattered over his clothing and his cheeks, and his sword, glittering with silver energy, clutched resolutely in his hands. Ginkyoujiki’s blade was not whole, however, and as Ryuu appraised the scene, he realised that this was not because of how Shirogane had chosen to release it. On the contrary, faint specks of silver dotting the sticky, muddy landscape told another story, and as his gaze flitted towards the attacker, he felt his worst fears confirmed.

It was a man with a hollow mask, just as Sakurai had reported, brawny and well built with an angry mane of reddish gold hair flowing around his shoulders. Though he could not see the man’s expression, Ryuu was sure he could feel the rage and resentment boiling up within the creature’s soul, and his heart stilled in his chest as he remembered his father, lurching and shrieking across the ruins of their family manor as he sought to tear apart anyone who threatened his son. It was a painful memory, but Ryuu had steadfastly turned the recollection into a positive learning curve and, as he reminded himself that his father had recovered and lived to tell the tale, so his past experience gave him an advantage that, in this fight, Shirogane lacked.

No, perhaps two advantages.

He glanced at Shizurugi, remembering the way its pure beams of energy had broken through Keitarou’s sword release, and how his weapon’s protective presence had allowed him to penetrate kidou barriers and his father’s swirling reiryoku to reach the ailing Seiren’s side.

Sensei said then that Shizurugi was a purifier. Well, that seems appropriate, in muggy, tainted air such as this.

“Tatte, Shizurugi,” the words were barely more than a whisper, but his sword immediately hummed with obedient energy, its surface aglow with purple light. Shizurugi’s guard elongated into the elegant petals that pressed against the delicate blade, and almost before his sword had completed its release, Ryuu had swung it in the direction of the monster’s back.

“Junkouhou!” he exclaimed, and a beam of laser-bright energy shot out across the murky atmosphere, searing a clear line through the mist. It seemed certain to strike the creature directly through the heart, but at the last minute the monster appeared to sense the danger, and cursed, dropping and rolling out of the line of fire. Ryuu’s attack grazed against his arm, creating a long scorch mark across the man’s skin, and he cursed again, huddling his body into a defensive ball. He swung around, trying to locate his attacker.

“Ryuu!” Shirogane’s voice broke the silence first, and Ryuu stepped out from the protective shelter of the village, bowing his head apologetically in his cousin’s direction.

“I sensed Ginkyoujiki, and disobeyed my orders to come and assist,” he said simply. “I realise you have not asked for my help, Fukutaichou, but I have previous experience of matters such as this, and felt Shizurugi might be of use, somehow.”

Shirogane’s gaze flitted to the creature’s scorched arm, noticing the burnt flesh and red, rawness of the wound, and he pressed his lips together thoughtfully.

“Perhaps you’re right,” he said at length. “Ginkyoujiki hasn’t had any luck breaking through his skin, but it seems Shizurugi is a different matter.”

“What the hell kind of attack was that?” The creature had recovered himself by this point, getting to his feet and lunging in Ryuu’s direction, but Ryuu held Shizurugi’s blade out between them, censure in his silver gaze.

“The questions to be answered will be mine,” he said coldly. “If you take pleasure in hurting youngsters, my Vice Captain and I will be forced to show you no mercy.”

“You have no idea what I am capable of doing,” Eyes glittered angrily from behind the mask, and Ryuu snorted, shaking his head.

“On the contrary, I have crossed paths with your kind before,” he said softly. “I have not only encountered your... deformity... but I understand how to counteract it. Then, I was too young to make enough of a difference, but now, I am fully competent and aware of my sword's skills."

He smiled coldly.

"You are not one thing, nor another, but your aura is tainted and impure," he added. "My sword is a purifier... its entire nature is to neutralise foreign reiatsu. Particularly reiatsu like yours... which puts you in very grave danger. You will not attempt to do to my sword what you appear to have done to my companions'...not unless you wish to lose all the fingers on your hand."

The man hesitated, the thick, brawny paw that had come out to grab Shizurugi's still glowing blade faltering for a moment, and Ryuu nodded.

"You have rationality," he reflected. "I suppose that's proof that Keitarou developed a scientific principle based on the unfortunate nature of that day in District Six."

In the interloper's sudden anger at Ryuu, Shirogane had been largely forgotten, and out of the corner of his eye, Ryuu could see his cousin retrieving the severed fragments of his own sword from where they had been trampled into the mud. An argent haze surrounded Ginkyoujiki's blade as he reassembled his weapon into its original pristine state, and he met Ryuu's gaze for the briefest of instants. Though no words were exchanged, in the field Ryuu knew Shirogane better than almost anyone else, and he understood from that glance what his cousin had wanted to say.

A little more time, and then we can fight. A little more time to fix Ginkyoujiki, and then we can deal with the problem at hand.

"Keitarou," the hollow-man spat the word out derisively. "You don't understand a single thing, but you do seem obsessed with 'Keitarou'. That's all your friend here kept bleating on about — who are you, who made you, where is Keitarou. Well, let me tell you once and for all, I'm no slave of Keitarou. I may be his partner, but I am not his 'creation'. I am not a 'thing', or a 'creature', and of course I have rationality. I am able to think and right now I am thinking about destroying you. Doing so is of personal benefit to me, and also, I have a lot of anger to work off. True, my anger isn't against your people — but it's reached a point where any shinigami is as good as another when it comes to the long term goal."

"Which is what, exactly?" Ryuu arched an eyebrow, and the man smiled, revealing a row of razor sharp teeth.

"Destroying all of you," he said simply. "I told your friend, and I'll tell you, too. My name is Haruya, and I will kill you too, Kuchiki Ryuu.”

Ryuu hesitated for a moment, startled by the use of his full name, and Haruya’s mocking smile widened.

“You see, not only rational but capable of connective thoughts,” he said, his tone amused. “Your friend called you ‘Ryuu’, and you are a Kuchiki. Hence, Kuchiki Ryuu. Well? Am I right? Do I get points for correctly identifying Clan inbreeding when I see it?”

“Saite, Ginkyoujiki!” Before Ryuu could respond, a cloud of silver petals shot out across the clearing towards them, the razor sharp edges of Shirogane’s zanpakuto making a bee-line for Haruya’s white-chalk mask. Taken off guard, Haruya could only take a quick step back, raising his hands to once more bat away the fragments, but Shirogane had anticipated him this time, and he twitched the sword hilt up at the last minute, causing the edge of the blade shrapnel to carve lines in the edge of the mask itself. A chunk of white broke free, crumbling and dissipating into ash, and Haruya turned to glare at his attacker, annoyance clear in his eyes.

“In the Kuchiki Clan, we don’t like being ignored,” Shirogane was still blooded and mud-spattered, but there was a sense of stability in his reiryoku pulse now that told Ryuu he had regained his composure. “We also don’t care too much about knowing the name of each individual Hollow we fight and kill. If you aren’t going to tell us about Keitarou, there’s no reason to go easy on you. And, whilst we generally believe in honourable fights of one versus one, since you seem keen to sate your anger on both of us, I’m sure you won’t mind if we don’t hold back, either.”

His gaze met Ryuu’s across the swampy marshland, and Ryuu nodded, raising his weapon once more.

“As you instruct, Fukutaichou,” he said softly. “Let’s go.”

“Ake no Odori! Mae e!”

Before Nagesu could open his lips to speak Sekizanha’s release command, a surge of crimson energy suddenly broke through the grainy landscape, illuminating the entire surroundings in its blood red glow. At first anticipating a fresh Cero attack, it took Nagesu a few minutes to register what had been said, the greyish, unstable atmosphere steadying and becoming more real with every passing moment. His opponent, whose hands had been glittering with fresh light, had suddenly gone pale, her eyes wide with a mixture of shock and fear, but it was not her expression that had caught Nagesu's gaze. Although she had been Hollow from the neck up, her body had shown no outward signs of Hollowfication. Now, however, a hole had opened up across her left chest, the edges scorched and glittering with energy. It took the dazed Third Division Captain another moment or two to realise that it had not been an evolution of Aki's spirit power that had caused this, but rather, the advance of an outside force, and, as his eyes blinked blankly behind his glasses, the haze of dust and ash began to clear, revealing a familiar, slender figure standing three or four feet behind the Hollow-girl.

Though it seemed as though an hour had passed, it was really a bare matter of seconds between the explosion of light and energy and the faint gasp that passed Aki's lips, the body crumpling to the ground with barely a murmur of protest. Around where she fell, Nagesu could make out the tell tale fragments of smouldering kidou ash, and he raised a bewildered gaze to meet the golden eyes of his Divisional neighbour.

"Midori-dono?"

At length he found his words, and Midori offered him a rueful smile, giving the crimson rapier in her hand a little shake to re-seal it. It glittered and shrank, taking the innocent appearance of an ornamental knife, and she slid it into her obi, coming to stand over the corpse of the dead Hollow-girl with a pensive expression on her face.

"I trust you'll forgive my interruption, Nagesu-sama," she said matter-of-factly, bending down to touch the girl's neck and nodding in satisfaction at what she felt. "Good, she's dead. I wasn't sure whether Akeage's technique would work so effectively on one who had entered some form of Hollowfication... but it seems she wasn't Hollow enough for her heart to have transferred its power fully to her mask."

"Barely Hollow at all," Nagesu murmured absently, removing his glasses and wiping them against the sleeve of his hakamashita, before returning them to his nose. "Forgive my asking, Midori-dono, but what... exactly... are you doing here?"

"I believe I said before that it would be better if Sekizannya wasn't released," Midori dusted her hands together, getting to her feet and meeting the Urahara's gaze face on. "You could've beaten her easily, I've no doubt — but I had the element of surprise, and I felt this was a quicker resolution to the problem. She seemed quite oblivious to my presence, so I took advantage and removed the threat."

She patted her obi.

“It was presumptuous of me on all levels,” she added, “but we’re not sent here to wreak havoc on the local residential population. Sekizanha could’ve killed her, but Akekage did so without the risk of seismic consequences. Besides, you’re not fond of killing women. I, on the other hand, have no problem killing anyone who happens to be in the way.”

Nagesu stared at her for a moment, then sighed, the tension draining out of his weary body.

“Sekizanha was wary about releasing into full shikai here, anyhow, so I suppose I can make no complaint,” he admitted. “Her reiatsu was intoxicating, and whilst I was beginning to become accustomed to it, I’m afraid not all the members of Third were able to manage it so effectively.”

“So I see,” Midori cast a cursitory glance around at the unconscious division members, letting out a little tut-tut of disapproval. “Still, they’re only babes, most of them. I suppose they can be forgiven.”

She turned her gaze back on Nagesu questioningly.

“Your son isn’t here?”

“He’s patrolling on the other side of the mountain,” Nagesu shook his head. “I gave him firm instructions that if he felt Sekizanha’s release, he was to stay well away. I told you that I wasn’t afraid to die — but that doesn’t mean I’m willing to sacrifice Shiketsu’s life here, and so I told him that it was an absolute order of the highest importance.”

“Well, it seems he obeyed you,” Midori clicked her tongue against the roof of her mouth, glancing back down at the dead girl once more. “I assume, by the way, that this is the individual you fought on your last visit?”

“Yes,” Nagesu knelt at Aki’s side, turning the body over with care to avoid the blood which, without either heart or heartbeat to pump it, was oozing slowly and languidly from the gaping wound in the girl’s scorched chest. “Midori-dono, I was under the impression that Akekage was a discreet weapon capable of leaving few marks on the body. This...”

“It’s a bit messy,” Midori looked apologetic. “The truth is, I’ve never fought against a creature in a mid-transformation stage before. Not like this. Akekage’s tip is coated with a lethal poison, it’s true, and her blade is so fine that it leaves barely a mark — but I wasn’t sure whether either of those things would be effective in this case. Her reiatu was highly toxic and potentially mind-numbing — I didn't have time to think about what to do about it."

She grinned sheepishly, running her charcoal-dusted fingers through her thick violet hair.

"I'm not a Bankai shinigami like you are," she added self-effacingly. "You withstood her spirit power and I could sense that you were going to release. I came here for that reason — to prevent you from using Sekizanha and protect everyone else, not to protect you from this creature. I have no idea how long I would've been able to maintain coherent thought if all that reiryoku had been aimed in my direction — so I essentially had one shot. Getting close enough to impale her..." she shook her head. "Far too risky."

Nagesu let out his breath in a rush, brushing the girl's reddish hair out of her face and noting how the mask, which had been so smooth and even moments before had begun to crack and crumble, disintegrating on the breeze.

"I suppose your actions were just," he said at length, but there was regret in his tones. "I admit, if I had used my sword, it's likely there would've been less left of her than there is now. As a scientist, however, I cannot condone the destruction of potential evidence. The heart is such a significant organ in the study of Hollowfication... and she clearly had one, even despite her mask. Which means... her saketsu and hakusui were probably at least some way intact. We will never know for sure, though... there's nothing left."

"Taichou?"

Before Midori could respond, the dazed and bleary sound of a division member's voice attracted the Urahara Clan leader's attention, and he turned, seeing one of his junior officers staggering towards him. "Taichou what... what happened? What is... that girl? Midori-sama?"

"It seems the immediate threat is past," Nagesu cast Aki's body another resigned glance, getting to his feet. 'If you are quite recovered, I want you and two companions to prepare this corpse for return to Seireitei. We will take her with us this time and see what her body yields under closer examination. Midori-dono,' he turned to his fellow Captain. "Where are Second at the present time?"

"Further into the mountains, awaiting my signal," Midori admitted. "The area we had to canvas is not of a great size, and we found no evidence of activity there at all. Encountered a couple of bears — but nothing serious. That's when I sensed Sekizanha and the flurry here, and came back down.”

She gestured to the body.

“If you want, my men can help with packaging that. They’re mostly used to death and destruction, and those who aren’t could use the experience.”

“Thank you, but I think this task I would prefer to leave in the hands of my own men. I would like the evidence preserved as best as is possible,” Nagesu shook his head. “In the meantime, though, I think it would be best for you to summon your subordinates. We do not know how many further enemies are out there, and with the aura here so thick with Aki’s reiryoku, it’s hard to make sense of any signals from other areas. My Third Seat was working on an area on the other side of the mountain, however, and Sekizanha believes there are hollow chambers beneath the crust.”

“A potential base camp? Even a lab?” Midori was not noticeably put out by the gentle snub, her young features becoming thoughtful. ‘You realise that Keitarou himself might be within the mountain, Nagesu-sama. This girl,’ she nudged her foot against the corpse’s ankle, “might’ve been set here to defend him.”

“Maybe,” Nagesu agreed grimly, “but that makes it no less important for us to find out. I will use Sekizanha on its lowest level to break through the rock, but I would appreciate your accompanying me within the mountain. It strikes me that Akekage might have further applications... the last thing I want to do is create an eruption or earthquake that I don’t have to.”

“All right,” Midori inclined her head. “If that’s what you want, I’ll bring my forces down and join up with yours. Well, who knows... if Keitarou is inside that mountain, it may take all of us to track him down and corner him, once and for all.”

Seireitei had taken the bait.

Keitarou dropped out of shunpo onto the roof of the archive building, tightening the seal on his kyokkouspell and reducing his reiatsu to its lowest possible level. Closing his eyes, he could pick up the flurry and bustle of the shinigami going about their duties and, as he registered the flustered edge to their activity, a smile twitched its way across his lips. As he had expected, then. The Council had gone to the Real World to chase ghosts, leaving him free reign over the areas that remained.

It was just after dawn, and he had left the Spiritless Zone before it had been light, kissing his sleepy wife goodbye before disappearing into one of the many subsidiary gates he had rigged up precisely for this purpose. They had been deliberately misdirected in order to disorientate anyone who attempted to follow him, but it had added a good twenty minutes to Keitarou's journey and, as a result, the sun had risen over Seireitei's roofs by the time he arrived. This meant that the residents of Inner Seireitei too were up and out of bed, but in his current state, they could not see him even if they looked straight at him, and Keitarou was unafraid.

He opened his eyes, glancing down at the bundle clutched tightly in his arms. It was thickly swathed in grimy, dusty fabric, but despite his precautions, carrying it through the gates from Rukongai had been difficult and uncomfortable. He would not be able to travel with it any further, not if he was to properly achieve his ends, and he leapt deftly down from the roof of the building, examining the landscape around him for a convenient place to lodge his burden, out of sight from prying eyes and senses. Concealing it with kidou was impossible, and so he took his time to locate the most hidden alcove around the back of the aging building, sliding the parcel in between two loose slats of wood before standing back to examine his handiwork.

Yes, it would do. True, someone might stumble across it, but then, quite soon, they would have other things on their mind.

Nobody will have time for a treasure hunt when they're already playing another of my little games.

Keitarou cast the bundle one last look, letting out a little sigh of resignation, then returning to his perch atop the building's slanted roof. It was the tallest structure in Inner Seireitei, and as a result, he could see a good number of the division barracks from this vantage point. Unencumbered by the wrapped bundle, he was capable of concealing himself completely from outside sight and senses — at least, from everyone except one soul.

His eyes darted in the direction of the Thirteenth Division, making out the very boundaries of its courtyard, and his brows knitted together thoughtfully.

Koku, I'm sure you must realise I'm here. Knowing you, you're waiting for me. Which means I'll doubtless have to pay a visit to an old acquaintance. But I must retrieve you, so there's no time for other considerations. Thirteenth will just have to take its place in the line of destruction. In the meantime...

His gaze shifted across a few divisions, and an amused smile touched his lips as he made out two haori-clad figures, exchanging words near the gates of their respective divisions. Another was with them, and from the gleam of metal on his upper arm, Keitarou surmised that he was an officer of second rank. Examining the reiatsumi of these individuals, he congratulated himself on his good fortune.

Well, well. Ninth and... Tenth Division Captains, unless I misread my kanji. I suppose the other is a sidekick for one of them. Still, minnows I can use, and use well. It appears that the strongest forces went to the Real World... with a couple of obvious exceptions.

His eyes became slits.

Juushirou is still here, and that Kyouraku annoyance. Should I consider that coincidence, or a failsafe on the part of the Gotei?

He clicked his tongue against his teeth pensively.

My brother-in-law is here too, somewhere... but after his encounter with Katsura, he ought to be more wary of challenging me face to face. His Division have been torn to ribbons, and whilst I'm sure he'd like to finish what he began all those years ago, it's not an acquaintance I want to renew. Still, with his anger so fresh, it ought to be easy enough to keep out of his way. He can't possibly conceal his presence when the Wind Hawk is howling for revenge. No sign of the old man of the Academy or that cursed Kuchiki fossil Kinryu, either, which is reassuring. It leaves just those three Captains who could possibly cause me trouble... but if we did cross paths, I imagine Chudokuga and I could make use of Hirata somehow. No, the other two are more... immediate concerns. Most especially since I can't use my sword in the traditional way on either one of them.

Pulling Chudokuga from his obi, he glanced at the blade, tilting it slightly so that it caught the light.

I can't risk launching any kind of attack on Thirteenth, not until I've reclaimed what's mine from there. I can't risk Koku getting hurt in the crossfire, so that will have to wait. In the meantime, though, there's the Kyouraku in... Eighth Division, I'm quite sure that's correct. Well, that's convenient.

His gaze returned to the two Captains, who, their conversation finished, were now about to go their separate ways, and his smile became cold as he flicked Chudokuga's blade in their direction.

"Let's see if I can't keep the bocchan occupied, at least long enough for me to do what I need to do here," he murmured. "Chudokuga Konshi: Zenrei!" Hands up who cringed when Moe ate Ryuusei's arm? Just in case it wasn't already clear... the positions of the three Kamen no Gunzei in the "ten modes of death" are Insanity (Aki), Rage (Haruya), and, of course, Greed (Moe). Another random factoid since both appear in this chapter – Ryuusei's name 流星 means 'Shooting Star'. It uses a completely different character from Ryu's name 龍 — his of course means "Dragon". ;) Their names may appear similar, but really — not at all.

Author's Note:

Chapter today (Wed 6th Feb, UK time) even though there's no Bleach this week.

60. Spider's Web

Chapter Fifty Nine: Spider's Web

"I wish they'd bothered to teach us impossible maths at the Academy,"

Sora ran weary fingers through her thick dark hair, casting her gaze over the remaining division members with a heavy sigh. It was early in the morning, and the Vice Captain had been up most of the night, trying to make final adjustments to the patrol detail, but it was proving more difficult than she had anticipated. Four patrols had already left Inner Seireitei for their routine inspections of the Eighth's District land, and late the previous night, four officers had joined up with members of Hakubei's Tenth in order to help cover the remains of Fifth Division's usual territory. With the two deaths in Tenth not so long ago, Hakubei had found himself stretched, and so had sent a begging letter to his sister which she had not been able to refuse. Consequently, eleven officers, plus herself, Kaoru and the Third seated officer, Shindou Tetsuya were now gathered in the courtyard, the lower ranked officers looking and feeling rather like spare parts or cattle being prepared for market whilst their upper seats debated the plan of action.

It was proving more difficult than Sora had anticipated, which had led to her unexpected declaration.

"With the best will in the world," she continued now, "I can't divide twelve officers into two patrols of five."

"With all respect, Sora-dono, that's two patrols with two officers over," Shindou shot her an amused smile from where he was perched on the division's fence, polishing the blade of his sword. "It's not impossible maths, it's simple division. If we only have to send out two more patrols, we ought to be fine."

"No... we won't," Sora shook her head impatiently, "and it would help if you'd put that thing away and pay attention, Tetsu. Shunsui wants you, me and Kaoru to remain here at the very least — he'd like, if possible, there to be one or two other high ranked officers about in case of problems — which is how he put it, so don't ask me what problems he means. He hasn't told me any particulars... just gave me the lists and told me to get on with it."

“Taichou said that?” Shindou looked surprised, obediently sheathing his sword and getting to his feet, coming to stand at his Vice Captain’s side. “I know it’s not unheard of for him to give impossible orders, but I would’ve thought he’d be able to count his own members.”

“Well, I guess he doesn’t know that I already sent four officers to join Tenth’s patrols into Fifth District,” Sora looked guilty. “I thought at that point we were over capacity — I didn’t realise that Shunsui had other plans. He disappeared yesterday, and when he came back, he shut himself in his room without saying a word to me. This is a change as of three o’clock this morning, when apparently he went to bed — by which point, of course, those officers were already happily skipping through District meadows in search of Hollows under Tenth Division’s banner.”

“Ouch,” Shindou winced, shaking his head in mock-disapproval. “Sending Kyouraku shinigami to fight for the Shiba? That won’t win you votes in District Eight, now will it?”

“Shut up,” Sora thwapped her companion lightly on the head, then sighed. “Though you’re right. I didn’t even think about it — and certainly not as a Clan thing. It was more a favour my brother asked, and I wanted to help. Tenth are stretched very thin covering their usual places and Fifth’s, so it didn’t seem a bit deal. Remember, they lost a couple of members, and I didn’t think it would hurt if they borrowed a few of ours. We’re all shinigami, and we’re supposed to help each other out until Okaasama and the others come back, but now it means I have to do this impossible equation... and I’m not sure how to settle it.”

“Well, you did do right in one respect, at least,” Shindou told her sympathetically. “Nakamura isn’t here, which means that she must’ve gone with your four to Tenth... correct?”

“She wanted to go, and so I let her,” Sora agreed. “Shunsui’s the only one who Hanako always listens to, so I figured I’d take advantage of her volunteering. She likes the Districts, and her navigation is first class. I thought Haku-nii’s men would be able to make good use of her.”

“And we’d get a break,” Shindou’s lips curled in humour. “All right. Then let’s see what we can do about the rest of the patrols before Taichou wakes up and finds out that the remains of his division are standing idle in the courtyard looking like spare parts and nobody’s left for morning duty yet. Night patrols have been told not to come back till tomorrow, to make sure they provide the Districts with proper cover, so we can't double-shift anyone. We'll have to make do, and hope he's not too cross about the end result."

"Considering he's sleeping in, he has no right to complain about it," Sora muttered. "I don't know what's with him at the moment. Yesterday, especially. I swear he came home with a thundercloud attached to his head. I thought he'd only been to Thirteenth — but I can't imagine Juushirou making him look like that, so perhaps I was wrong."

She sighed again, turning her attention back to the remaining officers. "Well? Not counting him, but with you and I, we've fourteen officers here. I don't like sending out patrols of fewer than five, not in this situation, but..."

She paused, holding up her fingers. "Shunsui, you, me, Kaoru — that's four. I guess it will have to do... what the hell was that?" As a loud crash erupted from the direction of the division's front yard.

"Shall I go?" Shindou's hand was already on the hilt of his weapon once more, but before Sora could respond there was a second crash, followed by an explosion that was unmistakably a flare of powerful Kidou.

"Tetsu, wait," Quickly making up her mind, Sora turned back to the gathered officers who, till moments before had been silent and to attention, but who now were exchanging glances and whispers, some apprehensive, some apparently excited at this unexpected interruption to their tedium. "Kaoru!"

"Yes, Fukutaichou?" Kaoru stepped out from the back of the pack, her expression anxious.

"Take everyone inside. Go down into one of the main storage basements, and stay there until someone gives you orders to the contrary. I'm putting you in charge, so don't let anyone leave, no matter what happens," Sora's orders were clipped and harried, and Kaoru swallowed hard, but she made no demur, bowing her acquiescence before gesturing to the troops to follow her down the rear steps towards the underground basements which held, among other things, Shunsui's prized collection of expensive Kyouraku sake. The rooms were well below ground level, and firmly dug out of the earth, with strong, stone pillars supporting the ceiling and preventing it from tumbling in on the rows of ceramic vessels. Though she did not yet know what the threat was, Sora's instincts told her that of all the places in the division that could be considered secure, the cellar was the most substantial, and so it was with a little sigh of relief that she turned her back on her fourth seated officer, knowing that Kaoru was a shinigami who would follow her orders to the letter.

“Sora-dono?” Shindou cast her an urgent glance, and Sora nodded.

“I’m coming with you. Let’s go,” she said briskly, her own fingers curling around the hilt of Hotarue. She could already feel the flutter of her sword’s exciteable spirit dancing against her wits, impatient for action, and this sense of urgency gave wings to her feet as she hurried towards the main building.

“So, it’s begun.”

As they reached the main doorway, Shunsui’s voice almost stopped the Vice Captain in her tracks, and she swung around, the scolding retort burning on her tongue dying the moment she saw the darkness in her Captain’s brown gaze. Shadows beneath his eyes told her that although he might have retired to bed at three, he had not slept, and the smudges across his fingers indicated that he had been writing something instead. He was robed in his shinigami uniform, but there was no sign of the pink over-garment his sister had embroidered for him as a graduation gift so many years earlier, and its absence made Shunsui’s Eighth Division haori appear all the more stark and cold in the bright light of day. Whilst Sora liked working with Shunsui, and enjoyed their easy, bantering friendship, in that moment she saw the gleam of a Captain in those eyes, and she bit back her smart remark, instead sending her companion a quizzical glance.

“What’s begun, sir?” It was Shindou who voiced the question, and Shunsui did not answer at first, his eyes narrowing as he ran his gaze over the two of them.

“The others?”

“On patrol, except for Kaoru and about ten or eleven other officers from morning patrol who hadn’t yet left,” Sora said quickly. “I sent them down into the basement when the explosions began. I don’t know what’s out there, but whatever it is seems bent on causing structural damage, and that was no mean kidou blast just now.”

“You don’t know?” Sora had never seen Shunsui’s eyes look so flinty, and he tut-tutted, striding across in front of her and reaching out to fling open the door of the barracks, revealing for the first time the outer courtyard between the wooden structure and the remains of the Eighth Division gate. Most of this had been blown to smithereens, a blast that had created shrapnel and a statement of intent, rather than a direct strike on the barracks proper.

“That’s some lousy aim, sir,” Shindou reflected, and Shunsui shook his head.

“It’s not the building they want. It’s us. You, me, Sora, and anyone else they can find,” he said blackly. “As I said, it’s begun. Sora, I trust you told Kaoru not to bring the others out, no matter what?”

“I did,” Sora agreed quickly, and Shunsui inclined his head slightly.

“Good. Then there’s no risk of anyone who shouldn’t be involved getting into trouble. In the meantime...”

He turned, casting Sora a glance.

“This is what I’ve been waiting for,” he said cryptically. “Yesterday, I received an unsubstantiated report that today, Seireitei were likely to face some kind of attack. I didn’t know precise details, else I would’ve given more useful orders — but I wanted the pair of you here, just in case it got troublesome. Well, it looks like it’s got troublesome.”

“With respect, sir, we’re none of us weak fighters,” Shindou objected, but Shunsui did not respond, stepping out into the sunny courtyard and resting his hands on his daishou swords, drawing them swiftly from their sheaths and crossing them in front of him just in time to deflect a dazzling flare of Oukasen kidou flame, slicing through it with a mixture of anger and clinical determination. As Shunsui’s slashes diminished the glare of the attack, Sora saw for the first time the individual who had fired it, and her jaw dropped, eyes almost bugging out of their sockets in disbelief.

Standing across the courtyard, surrounded by the charred rubble of the Eighth Division gate was a figure, tall and rangy, with dark hair knotted back from his face in a casual tail and green eyes that glittered with the same flecks of gold as Sora’s own. About his shoulders was draped the distinctive white cloth of the Tenth Division haori, and in his right hand was clutched the hilt of a zanpakutou, its blade glittering with light, though not yet in full release. The faint embers of light around the fingers of his right hand told Sora that her eyes were not deceiving her, and, as though identifying her presence for the first time, the man’s head turned in her direction. A lump rose in Sora’s throat, indignation and anger competing with horror and dismay for control of her heart. For the first time in her entire life, her older brother’s gaze did not contain even the remotest glint of affection.

“Haku... nii?”

The words slipped from her lips in an almost unconscious whisper, and Shindou stepped out behind her, letting out an audible string of curses. On any other day, the Clan-born Shindou's surprising propensity for graphic and expressive expletives would bring forth Sora's fist and a teasing reminder that there was a lady present, but in that instant, all humour had deserted her. All she could do was stare in cold disbelief at Hakubei, registering dully that his posture was changing, his muscles tensing as though ready to lunge forth in attack, but though she saw it, she could not make her own body react.

"He's being controlled," Shunsui's words brought her back to herself, cold as though he had doused her with ice water. "That's not your brother, Sora. It's not Hakubei. It's Keitarou. Don't be swayed. He won't be."

"Keitarou?" Anger sparked for the first time through Sora's numb dismay, and her fingers tightened around Hotarue's hilt, indignation glittering in her own green eyes. "You mean that bastard outlaw's taken control of Haku-nii, and sent him here like this, to... to..."

"To fight and kill us. Me, definitely. You and Tetsuya as an added bonus," Shunsui's words were grim. "I expected an assault in some form or another, but I'm sorry, Sora. Even for Keitarou, this is stooping low. It means fighting your brother... and not just that. It seems he's brought a friend."

He raised his hand, gesturing to the top of the division wall that separated Eighth's land from Ninth, and Sora raised her gaze, letting out a faint gasp as she registered for the first time the shadowed, hunched figure of another, watching with hunter's precision as he prepared to swoop in for the kill.

"Kanshi too?"

"Tenth Division seem to be having an off day," Shindou seemed to have recovered from his initial shock, turning to glance at Shunsui. "Permission to knock brute sense into their Captain and Vice Captain, sir."

Shunsui jerked his head forward in a brisk nod.

"We have no choice," he said simply. "Fight to immobilise. Both of you. And be on your guard. They are primed to kill, and loyalties mean nothing. Keitarou's weapon is our affection for our opponents. In this fight, though, we're protecting each other and we're protecting Eighth. That means we fight. If we don't win, Kaoru and the others won't stand a chance, not against Hakubei, and probably not against Kanshi either, not in this state. You both understand, yes?"

“Yes, sir,” Shindou flipped a brief salute with his free left hand, for in that moment Kanshi dropped down from the wall, advancing towards them with definite intent, and without a moment of hesitation, Shindou shot forward, clashing his blade defiantly against that of the Tenth Division’s Vice Captain. Although ranked at Third Seat, Shindou’s high Clan birth within the Kyouraku Clan had given him substantial reiryoku and an inborn military confidence which made him a solid opponent. As a result, despite Kanshi’s superior rank and homicidal intent, Shindou was able to parry the other’s strike, slashing back at him with his own weapon and causing his opponent to take a hop and a step back to avoid losing the tip of his ear.

For Sora, the exchange seemed to go in slow motion, more like a surreal nightmare than reality. Hakubei’s second blast of Oukasen came careening across the courtyard at that moment, on a direct collision course with her position. Though she tried to force her brain to react, the signals would not go through fast enough. Just when she felt sure she was about to be incinerated to a crisp by her own beloved brother, Shunsui was in front of her, sweeping the spell aside once more with the sealed edge of Amaki’s blade. The next second she saw Katen Kyoukotsu glimmer with spiritual energy, and she knew her Captain was preparing to release his weapon — something he did but rarely, but which told her that this was not only real, but as serious a situation as it could get.

“Sora, you understand?” Shunsui asked softly. “Twenty five years ago, when you agreed to be my Vice Captain, I told you it might mean standing against your kin to protect Eighth. I don’t want you to have to do it this way, either, but it’s what we’re here to do. We’ll try not to kill them, but we must stop them, and that might mean drawing blood.”

He glanced at Hakubei, then,

“We both know you’re not weaker than him, even if he wears a haori, and I’m not, either,” he added. “Between the three of us, taking down two senior officers alive should be possible. I don’t want to hurt or kill either Hakubei or Kanshi. It doesn’t sit well with me, as they’re both people I consider friends. More than that, though, I’m Captain of Eighth Division, and most of all, I don’t want to lose my Vice Captain or my Third Seat to Keitarou. It’s up to you. If you can’t defend your division, I’ll send you to join Kaoru and the others right now, and Tetsuya and I will fight alone, but I would rather have you here.”

Sora swallowed hard, glancing at the blade of her sword, then up at the advancing figure of her brother. She drew a deep breath into her lungs, then nodded.

“I understand,” she said softly. “I’m sorry, Taichou. For a moment I forgot who and where I was, but it’s all right. Hotarue and I are ready to fight to defend the Eighth.”

There was fighting at Eighth Division.

Takaoka Sakura rested her hands on the sill of the mess hall window, leaning her weight against the polished slat of wood and pushing back the shutters further in a vain attempt to see what was going on. The walls between Eighth and Ninth Division were high and constructed of carved marble, imported specially from the south of District Six by Anabomi when the barracks had first been built, in order to give the Ninth Division’s territory a sense of Kuchiki elegance. It was just one of the many tiny signs of grandeur dotted over Ninth’s assigned quarters, and on a normal day, Sakura was generally amused by the fancy carvings and elaborate wall hangings that decorated otherwise stark bamboo-and-paper panel walls. She had visited Eighth and Twelfth many times, so she knew that Ninth’s penchant for expensive decor was unique among the Gotei, but it was just another one of Anabomi’s quirks that made him both loved and respected by his subordinate officers.

For Sakura’s part, as a Yamamoto born outside of the Kuchiki terrain of District Six, the constant representations of the swan insignia or the delicately engraved floral designs seemed a little over the top, but she knew better than to say as much to her superior officers. Whilst Anabomi was finicky and concerned with appearances, he was also a man who cared deeply about his division members and it had been this, more than anything else, which had drawn Sakura to apply for the Ninth in the first place. It had been a strange whim, she reflected now, running her gaze over the long string of carved blooms that ran along the marble divide with a sigh, that a girl whose name meant cherry blossom had recruited with a Kuchiki division. In fact, she had originally intended to apply to Tenth, and indeed, her friends had teased her, expecting this outcome, for she had long since had an unrequited crush on the Tenth’s Vice Captain, Souryou Kanshi. Yet in the year her class had graduated, Anabomi had come to the Academy to talk to prospective squad members, and his diligence and obvious charisma had drawn her in. She had applied on impulse, half expecting her application to be rejected on account of her foreign background, but to her surprise, Anabomi had accepted, welcoming her cordially by name on her first day and making her feel part of the family from the very off.

Like most of Ninth, Sakura admired her Captain, and it had not escaped her attention that he had been preoccupied and troubled in recent days. He had spent more time than usual in his office, and when he had passed her in the hall the previous evening, he had failed to greet her in his usual genial way. Outside of Ninth, Sakura knew Anabomi had the image of a reserved, even aloof individual, but behind the closed doors of the division, he maintained diligently his individual bonds with every one of his subordinates, and so this oversight had troubled her more than she had liked to admit.

It wasn't like the way she felt about Kanshi, she reasoned to herself now, chewing absently on her lip, but she could not help her fondness for her Captain.

And now, sensing the raised spiritual energy flowing over the high wall from Eighth, she felt she understood the reasons for his recent preoccupation.

Something big is happening in Seireitei.

Giving up on her attempt to see over the wall, she returned to the mess hall proper, glancing reluctantly at the pile of dirty dishes and tea mugs which she had been assigned to clean. Another of Anabomi's quirks was his fastidious cleanliness, and as a result all of his officers, from newest recruit to Vice Captain were all rostered in on an exacting timetable of menial chores in between their usual patrols and other drill duties, in order to keep Ninth neat as a pin. Today it was her turn. Normally she would not be assigned on her own, but with the short staffing and extra patrols, she had drawn the short straw. With something exciting happening just over the other side of the wall divide, the last thing she could focus on was washing dishes.

For a start, Eighth Division was her close friend Kaoru's division. And for another thing, as she had first glanced out of the window, she had felt certain she had seen Kanshi's silhouette hunched there, for the briefest of instants, before it had disappeared.

Sakura knew that she sometimes saw Kanshi in places he wasn't, but this time she had been certain. Whatever was happening at Eighth, Tenth were involved too — and she wanted to know what it was.

First some of the Divisions get sent to the Real World, hunting something unknown, and everyone is all hush-hush about it. Then Ninth is stretched thin trying to cover extra patrol areas, and now there's something going on next door. And I'm stuck with a pile of dirty dishes.

She snorted in dissatisfaction, bending to examine the nearest pile tentatively.

I swear some of them lick these out when they think nobody's looking. Honestly, for Kuchiki, some of the men here eat like apes. No wonder Taichou rarely eats his meals in here with us. Given the way he is about things, he'd probably throw it all back up again just watching his division demolish their rations. Anyone would think they were starving — I'm amazed nobody's eaten their chopsticks yet.

“Takaoka?”

As she reached reluctantly for the top plate in the pile, the door of the chamber opened, revealing the Vice Captain, a harried expression on his features as he crossed the floor towards her.

“Good, I found someone not militarily engaged,” Hyakken seemed relieved to see her, and at his clear tension, Sakura set the plate aside, casting her superior officer a confused glance.

“Fukutaichou?”

“You've probably sensed it, but something's up at Eighth,” Hyakken's gaze flitted to the window, and Sakura's heart skipped a beat at the expression she saw in his eyes. She nodded her head eagerly.

“Yes, sir. I thought I saw Tenth there, too,” she said quickly. “It's hard to see from here, but... well, it wasn't that I was shirking my duty, but... with all the reiryoku...”

“Yes...” Sakura half expected a scolding for being distracted, for Hyakken was a strict disciplinarian, but he seemed to be only half listening to her words. “Well, leave the dishes for now. They can be done later. Eighth haven't sent an alert this way, but from the loud explosion over their courtyard a few moments ago, I think it's not impossible they're under attack. I'm going to go gather together some of the other officers who aren't out on patrol already, and ready them for deployment. Run to the Captain's office, will you, and notify him of my intentions? I don't want to waste any time, so gain his consent then come to join me. It strikes me that, if something has attacked the Eighth, it might not take long to move to the Ninth, and we ought to be ready for whatever happens.”

“Yes, sir,” Sakura almost tripped over her own feet in her eagerness to obey the instruction, regaining her balance with a rueful giggle and hurrying down the long, perfectly angled hallway that led to the Captain's suite of rooms. Anabomi lived at the back of the division, his office and his personal chamber adjacent to one another, and as she hastened to carry out Hyakken's orders, she found herself musing — not for the first time — whether the rumours about Anabomi's bedchamber were true. Nobody in Ninth had ever seen inside it, for Anabomi kept it locked during the daytime, and even at night, he took emergency reports through the closed door. Naturally, the more mischievous members of the squad had begun to theorise about their leader's private quarters. Some joked that it contained a huge Kuchiki shrine, before which he genuflected night and day. Others had scandalously suggested that he used it to entertain a string of lovers, enticed by his handsome looks and rich heritage. Yet more people had theorised that it was probably a pigsty — an act of secret rebellion against the pristine perfection expected in every other part of the Ninth. Sakura had often tried to see inside, whenever she had happened to pass, for she was a curious soul by nature and a locked door was one of the most enticing temptations there was around — but as she reached the end of the corridor, she could see the bedchamber door was, as ever, firmly pulled shut, whilst the office divide was slightly ajar. This indicated that Anabomi was in residence, probably at his desk going over reports — or arranging them at ninety degree angles to the edge of the desk, Sakura thought in amusement, even as she rapped lightly against the wood.

“Taichou? It's Takaoka. Fukutaichou sent me — please may I enter?”

There was a pause, then, the soft tones of her Captain.

“Come in, Takaoka.”

“Yes, sir,” Sakura pushed back the divide, neatly stepping into the chamber and pulling the door across behind her. Performing her requisite bow, she stood before the desk, awaiting her Captain's instruction to raise her head and report.

But it did not come.

Sakura did not know what instinct of self-preservation made her glance up at the moment she did. Later, when recounting her story, she would simply say that a chill had rushed through her, a cold, empty sensation that told her all was not well within her Captain's office. For some reason which she could not explain, she had sidestepped to the right, only to stare in disbelief and horror as a snaking tongue of Byakurai energy zig-zagged its way across the office, singing the perfectly polished floor where she had originally stood.

“Taichou?”

Sakura's voice was uncertain, her eyes huge as she gazed from the large scorch mark in Anabomi's pristine floor to the Captain himself.

He was staring at her with a look of equal distress in his grey gaze. This expression did nothing to relieve Sakura's sense of unease, for it was all too clear that her Captain, far from testing her reactions with some new training game or other, had not expected the spell any more than she had. He glanced at his left hand, staring at his index finger as though it did not belong to him, and slowly, Sakura took a step back.

"Taichou, erm, if you're busy, I guess... I can just... Fukutaichou wanted your consent to prepare and dispatch forces to help with Eighth, but... erm... if you're..."

"Takaoka," Anabomi swallowed hard, forcing his hand down at his side, and moving to sit down behind his desk. His movements were slow and measured, as though he was making a physical effort to complete the action, and even though he managed, Sakura could see the tension still running through his lean frame, his fingers gripping hold of the wood so tightly that his knuckles had turned white.

There was a long silence, then Anabomi took a deep breath, closing his eyes briefly as he sought to compose himself.

"I'm sorry. I think you startled me... I was so lost in thought," he spoke evenly, and something in his words reassured Sakura that whatever had upset her Captain, it had passed. "What did Hyakken say? About Eighth? Has a messenger come?"

"No, sir, but Fukutaichou is worried," Sakura took cautious steps forward, coming to stand before the desk. "There was an explosion over Eighth's gate and it seems like they might be under attack, sir. Fukutaichou believes that they might come to attack here next, and he wanted to be ready to deploy in case a messenger came from Kyouraku-taichou."

"I see," Anabomi wetted his lips, and Sakura noticed the fingers of his right hand twitch slightly, almost involuntarily. "An attack... at Eighth. I confess I hadn't... but then I've been... working..."

He raised the twitching fingers to rub his brow, letting out another weary sigh, and despite herself, Sakura felt sorry for her suspicions, realising how tired her Captain truly was.

"Sir, it's all right. I'll go and tell Fukutaichou that it's all all right, and we'll deploy. You look like you haven't slept at all, sir, and..."

"A Captain doesn't sleep when there is danger abroad," Anabomi cut across her matter-of-factly, getting to his feet and moving to the far wall, reaching to take down his zanpakutou from the custom-carved shelf on which it lay, and sliding it through his obi. "I appreciate your concern, Takaoka, but I am fine. More, if our neighbours are under attack then... then..."

He faltered, putting out a hand to steady himself against the wall, and instinctively Sakura hurried forward to help him, trying to prevent him from falling headlong.

"Sir, please!" she pleaded. "You've not slept since Guren-sama left, have you? You're worrying about us too much, but we can manage! What we can't manage is if something happens to you, so please..."

Anything else she had been going to say died on her lips as she caught sight of her Captain's gaze, registering the sudden flicker of something deep in the grey depths. There was something feral and stormy lurking there, something a million miles away from the normal, ordered, reasoned Anabomi that had so inspired her, and at the sight of it, her heart clenched momentarily in her chest.

"Taichou, I really don't think you're very well. I really think you should rest," she murmured, taking a step backwards. "Let me... let me go and prepare your quarters, or do something, please. Let me..."

She did not manage to finish this sentence either, for in that instant her companion's fingers had tightened around the hilt of his sword, drawing it without hesitation from its scabbard and swinging it with intent in her direction. Letting out a shriek, Sakura tumbled to the floor in her attempts to evade the sharp edge of the blade, scrambling back against the wall in fear. The man who moments earlier had seemed fragile and about to faint suddenly bore down on her, every inch of the hunter in his demeanour. He slashed his sword again, and again, drawing closer to her with every step. Too late, Sakura realised that she had backed herself up into a corner of the room, and she scrabbled around helplessly for anything she could use to defend herself. Anabomi's weapon came down again, slicing through the ends of her hair and narrowly missing her throat as she rolled out of his way, fumbling for her own sword, but she could not get a good enough grip on it, and Anabomi's ruthless, relentless swing knocked it from her hands, sending it careening across the office floor. She shuffled away once more, knowing that she had very little space in which she could now manoeuvre, and, as the Captain's sword sliced through her upper arm, she opened her lips and let out a blood-curdling scream.

Anabomi's advance halted momentarily, horror and confusion flooding his expression, and Sakura stared at him, breathing hard and pulse racing.

“Takaoka?” The Captain’s words were soft, then, “Scream again. Please, Takaoka, scream. Scream. I don’t know what’s happening... but I can’t... make... it... stop.”

The final words were forced through his vocal chords, pain glittering in the silver gaze, and with a lurching sensation in her stomach, Sakura understood. As the sword began to angle towards her throat once again, she opened her lips, screaming as loud and as long as she possibly could.

“Takaoka? Taichou!” The sound of answering footsteps thudding down the corridor, followed by the sweep of the door being flung back brought Sakura a moment of blessed relief, but Anabomi turned, eying these new interlopers with an expression of clinical appraisal.

“Taichou, what are you...”

The first officer, the division’s Fourth seat, took a step into the room, and Sakura opened her lips to yell, the warning fresh against her tongue.

It was too late. Before she had even managed to voice a single syllable, Anabomi’s sword moved, once, twice, three times. Blood spurted and sprayed up the wall, staining the beautiful tapestries that decorated the office, and soaking into the paper-and-bamboo walls, running down the doorframe and pooling across the base. The Fourth Seated Officer’s body crumpled to the floor, the head rolling across the smooth surface until it came to a stop, nose touching the wall. This was too much for Sakura, whose screams for help now bordered on hysteria. Terrified, she could not even move before Anabomi’s sword swung again, slicing first through the division’s Fifth Seat, then the Third, sending their corpses tumbling on top of the decapitated remains of the Fourth in a bloody heap.

“Taichou?! ”

The horror in Hyakken’s voice penetrated Sakura’s petrified haze just a tiny bit, the Vice Captain’s sword drawn from its sheath, and a look of utter dismay in his gaze as he surveyed the bloodbath in the normally neat office.

“Taichou, what have you done?” he murmured, revulsion clear in his expression, and Sakura struggled to pull herself upright, forcing herself to look at her Vice Captain and not at the bloody mess that lay between him and the door. Anabomi stood over his kills, breathing heavily, his sword dripping with blood, but the memory of his expression, and his words to her hardened her resolve.

“Fukutaichou, something’s possessed the Captain!” she exclaimed. “Something’s making him do this. He doesn’t want to. He told me to scream, to bring help, but when I did... and then... he can’t stop. Please, stop him. Please...”

Anabomi’s sword swung again, and Hyakken’s weapon came up to meet it, the Vice Captain fighting to push back the attack.

“Takaoka,” he spoke through gritted teeth, the strength of his effort clear in the lines that criss-crossed his brow. “My earlier instructions are void. New orders.”

“Sir?” Shakily, Sakura had begun to edge her way around the pile of corpses towards the door, instinctively moving towards her Vice Captain for protection. Hyakken nodded, not even turning to glance at her.

“Get out of here,” he said grimly. “Go get help. I don’t care who. Anyone who can. Bring them to Ninth. Tell them what you told me. Bring a Captain... any Captain... and quickly.”

“Yes sir,” Sakura swallowed hard, half-sure she was going to be sick, but knowing that it was no time for her to be able to do so. Somehow she got out of that room, managing to avert her gaze from the glassy stares of her dead superiors. Somehow she managed to inch past them, pushing out of her mind the happier memories spent with these individuals as she forced her dazed brain to focus only on the instruction at hand.

Get help.

Get help for Fukutaichou.

Get help quickly.

Repeating these to herself, over and over, Sakura hurried out of the doorway and down the corridor towards the main gates. Though the wound to her upper arm stung, she paid it no heed, grateful that she could at least run, for her composure was too shot for her to attempt shunpo. From the office behind her, she could sense the rising levels of Hyakken’s reiatsu, and she quickened her pace, darting out into the main street. An explosion from Eighth’s courtyard sent her already dizzy heart into a panic, but somehow she steeled herself, hurrying past the Eighth without even bothering to take a glance within.

Eighth are fighting. Eighth are attacked, too. Maybe like Taichou. Maybe it’s all like that. I can’t go to Eighth, and I’m sure Tenth are already at Eighth. So I... so I’ll go to Seventh, and hope... I’ll hope... I’m in time.

It was definitely Kanshi's reiatsu, and yet, at the same time, it was not.

Michihashi Aoi set aside his book of supply records, his brow creasing and his pale eyes clouding with consternation. He got to his feet, moving slowly to the window of his office as he tried to make sense of the fragmented reiatsu swirling in the atmosphere, but try as he might he could not pull the pieces together into one logical thread. Resting his hands on the sill, he closed his eyes, extending his senses as far as he was able, but it was to no avail. Whatever he thought he had picked up on, it had been quickly cloaked and overwritten by the unmistakable flare of reiatsu from the Eighth Division Captain and Vice Captain. Aoi had been in the same graduating class as Kanshi, Sora and Shunsui, and consequently was well versed both in their spiritual auras and their abilities, but there was something raw and wrong about the whole sensation and he opened his eyes, dropping back against the window frame as he tried to figure it out.

Though he had recruited to the Twelfth Division on leaving the Academy, Aoi had always been more of a fighter and a tactician than a scientist, known more for his battle strategy and his intelligent leadership and administration than for his competent involvement in his eccentric Captain's frequently explosive experiments. A less perceptive officer might have dismissed the reiatsu flares as the business of another division, and let it pass, but Aoi was not disposed to that way of thinking. There were many in the Gotei who privately believed Twelfth Division remained afloat and functional on account of Aoi's presence there and, though he had never been one to unnecessarily push his opinions forward, his judgement was respected and trusted by his own officers and peers from neighbouring divisions. Something unsettling going on in Seireitei was, so far as he was concerned, something best investigated and dealt with as soon as possible, and so, with a resigned glance at the unfinished division accounts, he crossed the floor to the office door, sliding it back and stepping out into the hallway beyond.

The halls were quiet, and Aoi frowned, unsettled further by the unusual silence of what were well known as the Gotei's most chaotic barracks. Since the first day he had arrived and been seated at Eighth Seat, Aoi could not remember a single day when Twelfth Division had not been filled with the sounds of voices and sword clashes, punctuated by explosions and exclamations from the Captain's makeshift laboratory. Aoi had seen many hair-raising things — some of them literally so — but he had never encountered such an eerie stillness, and a prickle ran down his spine as he realised how accurate his hunch was. Something was going on in Seireitei... and somehow, it had reached even here.

He set his teeth grimly, making his way through the halls and corridors towards the Captain's office. This had once been a simple, short route, but Mareiko's frequent accidents and the resultant devastation to the barracks had meant that much of it had been rebuilt, and consequently the inside of Twelfth was a veritable rabbit warren of passages and dead ends which only the most experienced officers managed to navigate without taking a false turn. Aoi knew that, among Twelfth's lower seats there was a popular legend about a recruit who had got so lost he had spent a night and a day trapped in the same loop of hallways during one of Aoi's visits to his family in Third District. Tearful and frightened, the young shinigami had been rescued the following day by one of the upper seated officers. Aoi's thought processes were based too deeply in common sense and rationality to credit such an embellished tale, but nonetheless he knew that it was not uncommon for recruits to turn up breathless and late to training sessions on account of the misleading layout of the division.

Most of the time Aoi took such things into his stride, but today, with such a feeling of unease eating away at him, he found himself wishing fervently that his Captain had had a better sense of planning when she had ordered rebuilding to be done.

So deep in thought was he that, as he drew closer to his Captain's office, he did not notice the sprawled leg of one of his subordinates jutting out from a nearby doorway, and it was all he could do to prevent himself from falling headlong, gripping hold of the doorframe tightly as he turned in consternation to examine what he had just stumbled over. His sense of unease only grew as he recognised one of the squad's younger recruits — a girl who had graduated the Academy only the previous spring, and with whom Aoi had spent some time perfecting a rough sword technique and explosive Kidou tendencies. She was pale and grey, and at first Aoi feared she was dead, but as he crouched down at her side, he was sure he saw her shihakushou move slightly as she drew air into her lungs. A quick touch of her throat reassured him that his instinct was correct, but something had laid her out cold and whatever it was, it could easily be still around. He could see no sign of physical trauma on the young girl's body — her shihakushou was clean and crisp as though freshly laundered for that day's work, and though he could not raise her back to herself, there was no sign of bruising around her head.

It was then that Aoi first noticed the odd, slightly sweet scent that pervaded the hallway. He sniffed, his brows knitting together in confusion as he tried to place the perfume, but on his second inhalation his eyes opened wide, and he clamped his hand over his mouth and nose, gazing at the unconscious girl anew. The scent was soporific powder, a substance kept under lock and key in the division's deep cellar storerooms, yet now he looked he could see the light dust against the young recruit's skin, and knew that he was right.

He stood, glancing around him warily. Though he could smell the powder's seductive fragrance, he now realised there was not enough of it remaining in the air to intoxicate him. The young girl's clean clothing suggested that whatever she had managed to ingest, it had not been a huge amount, and it was only her lower spirit power and shaky discipline that had made her so vulnerable. Either that or...

He bent again, touching his finger to the skin of her cheek, then pulling back to examine his findings. Cautiously he put his finger to his lips, and his eyes darkened.

This was no accident, was it?

He wiped his fingers clean of the remaining substance, carefully sliding his hands beneath the girl's body and carrying her into the room proper, laying her down on the floor out of the way so that she would not trip up any more unsuspecting division members. As gentle as he was with the officer's fragile form, all the time his clever mind was racing, trying to work out who could've accessed the powder stores and, even more critically, why they had seen the need to drug a dopey but fairly harmless member of the division in such a direct and deliberate way.

Aoi stepped back out of the small chamber, pulling the door shut behind him with a soft click.

Had it been an experiment gone wrong? Had the girl somehow got into the... but no, Aoi shook his head impatiently at himself, his fingers automatically brushing against the keys that hung at his belt. He had insisted himself that the doors of the storeroom be locked and, for further security, that the powder should be kept in a self-locking cabinet, to prevent such accidents from occurring. The only people who had possession of a key were himself and his Captain, but his own key was still where it ought to be, gleaming and bright alongside its fellows. Aoi's gaze flitted towards the Captain's chamber, and the unease began to swirl even more deeply within his body.

"Taichou?"

He did not know why he had spoken out loud, but suddenly he was afraid, genuinely terrified that something had befallen his crazy, ditzzy Captain. She was capable of making the most extreme explosions, and her forgetfulness had often led to a large pile of paperwork for the Vice Captain as he tried to make sense of everything, but though such things were normal within the Twelfth, it was not the same sensation as Aoi felt now. A tight uneasiness that threatened to stifle the very life out of him made him quicken his steps towards Mareiko's sanctum. On his way, he glanced in at this room or that, looking for signs of life, but there were none. The recruit aside, Twelfth Division were nowhere to be seen, and it was only as he reached the door of Mareiko's chamber that a sight from the courtyard made him stop dead in his tracks, horror flooding his expression.

The missing Division members were all gathered in the courtyard, as though awaiting drill inspection — or, more likely, their morning deployment orders to guard the abandoned Third Division's science facilities, as per Nagesu's final instruction before leaving for the Real World.

The only trouble was, they were all unconscious. Every single one of them, just like the recruit had been, and the smell of soporific powder was already beginning to drift in through the open window. Aoi found himself reassessing the facts in light of this new evidence. Perhaps the recruit had managed to escape this mass slumber, only to succumb to the drug a short way down the hall.

In the midst of the chaos stood a familiar figure, wild blond hair whipping in the wind, the ends of the straw-fair tail batting gently against the snow white fabric of a distinctive haori. Mareiko stood motionless, gazing at her division as though the sight of them in such a situation had momentarily robbed her of her senses, and before he knew what he was doing, Aoi had mounted the windowsill, scrambling through the gap and out into the yard as he hurried to his Captain's side.

“Taichou? Taichou, what happened? What...”

The words died in his throat as, for the first time, Mareiko raised her gaze towards him. Her eyes, normally so pale and dreamy were devoid of any kind of emotion, resembling two cold, pale pebbles that glinted eerily in the morning light. She stared at him, unblinking for a moment, then, very slowly, she raised her hands, light glimmering at the edges of her fingers. Too late Aoi realised that something was wrong with his Captain, more wrong than any of her scientific endeavours had ever caused before, and that he was now in very real danger. For all her absentminded recklessness, Aoi knew that Mareiko was spiritually far stronger than he was, and that, where Kidou was concerned, there were few in Seireitei who could match her.

He took a step back, not taking his eyes off her for one moment as he tried to fathom out what he was seeing. Her movements were stiff and measured, as though she were a mannequin beneath that white robe, and her shihakushou's liberal coating of white dust told him that he need look no further for the source of the soporific powder. Mareiko, the other possessor of the key had opened the vault herself and had used the drug to sedate her entire Division... but as he gazed at her, Aoi understood that this was a Mareiko he did not know.

There was something wrong with her.

Something. Badly. Wrong.

"Tai... chou?" he murmured, his words half-freezing in his throat, and at his words, Mareiko paused, her eyes flickering ever so briefly with what Aoi thought looked like regret. The next moment, however, it was gone, and the energy engulfing her hands began to grow in strength.

"You should've come with the others," she murmured, her voice lacking in its usual bounce and sounding somehow alien to Aoi's ears. "I don't want to hurt you, Aoi. I don't want... to do this to you."

"Taichou, whatever's wrong, let me help. Tell me what happened... something in the lab? Did you put a spell on yourself again?" Aoi's words flowed thick and fast, desperation edging his every syllable. "I know this isn't what you want, so lets talk about it, all right? Something's happened to you, but I'm sure we can..."

His words trailed away, as he saw tears glittering faintly against Mareiko's lashes. She closed her eyes, and Aoi saw her mouth four syllables.

"Hakufuku."

No sooner had she spoken, but the world around Aoi grew hazy and strange, the air thick with another, different scent and he crumpled to his knees, unable to think or speak as the ground came up to meet him at speed. He tried to reach out a hand to grab Mareiko's haori, knowing that something was wrong and he ought to stop her, but his fingers twitched helplessly against the empty air. As darkness swept in to dominate his vision, he was faintly aware of Mareiko stepping over his body, and then the sound of retreating footsteps in the direction of the Division gate. It was the last thing he knew, however, for Mareiko's kidou was just too strong, and with a sigh, Aoi relinquished his grip on his consciousness, plunging deep into the black.

Things are afoot! Or a hand. Or a leg. Or a... okay, bad jokes ending here. As Shunsui says, and so... it begins. Hang on tight, folks. It might be a bumpy ride...

61. True Intent

Chapter Sixty: True Intent

His office was eerily silent.

Anabomi drew a ragged breath into his lungs, his vision blurring and dancing as he struggled to regain the shreds of his sanity and his composure. All around the room, sunlight streamed in through the open shutters, illuminating the scene in graphic technicolour, but despite this, for the first few moments, Anabomi could see nothing but darkness all around his body. He was standing, he realised dully, the hilt of his sword clasped in his gloved fingers, and from the quickness of his breathing, he had been engaged in some kind of physical confrontation. He blinked, closing his eyes as he tried to make sense of it. Sakura had been there, he remembered hazily, and there had been a scream... then swiftly, the flashes of a silver sword blade, and suddenly, an oasis of blood.

He opened his eyes once more, the room's surroundings coming into clear focus for the first time, and as he took in the disarray before him, his stomach twisted with nausea and revulsion. In stricken silence he gazed down upon the corpses of his own men, bloody and motionless across the polished floor of his administrative chamber. What had happened here? What had killed them? He tried to turn back his memory, but he had no clear, coherent image of anything after he had told Sakura to scream. His whole body felt alien and disconnected, and though he knew the men who lay before him were members of the Ninth Division, he could not make out their features or identify them by name.

It was then that he caught sight of the blade of his sword, and registered the thick smear of blood that coated it.

With a yelp of dismay, he tossed the weapon away like a scalding potato, his gesture containing enough force for the zanpakutou's edge to scrape a furrow down the wall. It clattered to rest atop another sword, a clean one which, as his memory began to piece itself back together, Anabomi knew belonged to Sakura. He glanced hurriedly around him, frightened for the girl's safety, but there was no sign of her anywhere. Whatever had occurred, she was no longer there. She wasn't... but...

Steeling himself, Anabomi turned his attention back to the unmistakeable group of corpses that lay sprawled and cooling across the centre of his chamber. With every passing moment, they were becoming more and more recognisable, and Anabomi's entire body trembled as he moved to kneel down beside them, reaching frightened, desperate fingers across bloody chests in search of a pulse.

The men were all dead.

Slowly Anabomi lowered his hand, tears glittering against his lashes as, for the first time, names and identities connected in his sluggish brain.

The two corpses slumped atop one another were his Fifth and Third Seated officers, he could tell now, the Third Seated officer's fingers still clutched resolutely around the hilt of his weapon. Both had suffered fatal slashes to the chest, and as he turned them over, one by one, Anabomi was revolted by the violence that had cleaved open their ribcages, severing through the vital structures beneath. Beneath them was a third body, lacking in a head, and with a fresh jolt of horror, Anabomi realised that he had been decapitated by a single sword swing — almost certainly the reason for the smear of blood that had coated his own weapon. The head lay facing the wall, but Anabomi felt as though its glassy eyes, accusing and frightened, were boring into the core of his soul. Hurriedly he moved to cover the gazes of the two men that lay within his reach, attempting to make a peaceful final repose out of the impossible carnage, but as he struggled to pull himself to his feet, he heard the sound of laughter.

He turned, swinging around desperately in an attempt to locate the source of the sound, but he could see nobody. Frightened and disorientated, his thoughts still flowing together in a disjointed, dazed kind of sequence, he reached to his waist for his sword, already having forgotten the events that had made him fling it across the room moments before. There was the sound of a tut-tut, then he felt his arm lower itself, the limb moving entirely of its own accord to hang loose at his side.

Now, now. Just because I've given you a moment to breathe, it doesn't mean that we're finished here.

The voice was cold and amused, searing through his senses like hot oil, and Anabomi froze, struggling to work out who the speaker was and where the sound was coming from.

No, you can't see me. I'm not out there. I'm in here. Inside.

Anabomi hesitated, then, very slowly, he felt his blood-soaked fingers moving up towards his head, tapping his skull lightly on the left hand side. He jerked his head away, unnerved by his limbs' sudden fight for independence, but this only drew forth more laughter.

So, I found a houseproud Kuchiki who'll slice his way through his subordinates, but flinch away from landing bloody prints against his skin. How entertaining. It's a shame we never met twenty five years ago, Anabomi Seizuku. If we had, I'm sure we would have had great fun — your sword swing is far more accurate than even I anticipated it could be under my control. Your native skills must be honed to perfection. Dare I say it makes you my greatest weapon to date?

Anabomi drew shaky breath into his lungs, the words sinking and soaking into his thoughts one by one as understanding began to clear away the haze of confusion.

“Aizen... Keitarou.”

The words left his lips as a whisper forced through vocal chords which were not entirely his own, and there was a murmur of approval from the disembodied voice within his skull.

Impressive. You're intelligent as well as a competent fighter. Perhaps I made a mistake, last time, focusing on your betters. You are a far more useful weapon. I'd only anticipated using you as a distraction, but if you can be pushed to kill your own men with such ruthless accuracy, I'm sure I can find greater use for you.

“Get out of my head!” Anabomi's temper began to flare, desperation flooding his senses, and for a brief moment his fingers returned to his own control as he clawed at his brow, no longer caring that he was smearing his comrades' blood through his hair and over his skin. “Get out! I don't treat with exiles or outlaws, and I don't aid and abet criminals like you! I will not let you make a puppet of me, Aizen Keitarou — I will not!”

I think you'll find I already did.

Though Anabomi had not commanded it, his body suddenly swung around, his head forced to gaze once more upon the pile of corpses, and though he tried to shut his eyes, the lids would not respond to his instructions.

No, you can't pretend it didn't happen. Your sword killed them. Yes, you had my instructions, but you did it. You did it beautifully. Very beautifully.

“No...” Anabomi's voice filled with despair. “Not... my Ninth. I wouldn't... I couldn't... I... I...”

You saw the blood on your blade, didn't you?

The voice was mocking.

You know it. You just don't want to accept it. That's why I gave you this moment of respite. To make you kill, I had to overload every one of your sensibilities. I wanted you to see what you had done, and understand it for yourself. It's a break, it isn't the end. There's nobody else here to kill right now, and I don't intend on wasting my energy controlling your body completely when there's no need. Still... your adjutant sent the girl for help, so more people will come. And when they do...

The voice broke off abruptly, and Anabomi found himself taking steps towards the desk, reaching down to pick up the bloody zanpakutou once more.

Then round two will begin. Who knows how many we can kill together before this day is out?

“Stop it!”

Anabomi struggled to relinquish his hold on the weapon, but it was to no avail. “Stop it! I don't want to kill anyone, and especially not for you! You murdered my best friend... do you think I'd ever forgive you for that?”

I'm sure I don't know who that might be.

Keitarou's voice was casual, his words dismissing the accusation.

I've killed enough people in my life, Kuchiki included. I can't be expected to remember each and every corpse in my tally.

Anger seared through Anabomi's body, but before he could yell back a riposte, something else occurred to him, and he took a deep breath, forcing his head to turn and glance around the office once more.

Hyakken. Where is Hyakken? Hyakken sent Takaoka for help. Where is he?

Ah. You're worried about your adjutant? How sweet.

Now Keitarou's voice was mocking, amusement clear in his tones, and Anabomi gritted his teeth.

“Tell me what you did with Hyakken!” he demanded. “Tell me, Aizen, or I slit my own throat and take you out of my body this instant!”

A nice try, but you can't kill yourself if you can't control your sword arm, now can you?

Keitarou seemed unconcerned.

Besides, I know that suicide is scandalous for Kuchiki. I am saving you from Clan shame and censure. You ought to be glad of my intervention. Well, I'm sure you will be... later. When all is done. I might even keep you. You never know.

Anabomi had the sense that his invisible companion had smiled coldly, although he couldn't see Keitarou's expression, and then his body turned again, moving slowly and heavily towards the open door. Your adjutant. You asked, and I have no problem with answering, whether you make threats or not. Here, I'll let you walk by yourself, even. You'll find him at the end of this hallway. He's no doubt waiting for you.

With a sudden jolt, Anabomi felt control of his legs return to him, and he hurried forward into the hallway, his eyes widening as he registered the long, slick trail of blood that wound its way along the floor. At the end of the trail of blood was a huddled shape, and, as he approached it, Anabomi found his worst fears were realised. As he drew closer to the hunched form, flashes of memory penetrated his senses, and the tears that had glittered against his lashes began to fall silently down his cheeks.

Hyakken, who had fought him back to let Sakura escape, who had raised his blade and swung it so bravely... Hyakken, who he had stabbed and slashed at as though carving a piece of meat, yet the Vice Captain had not given up. He had kept going, kept fighting, no matter how bloody he became. Anabomi screwed up his eyes, but he could not escape the image of his own sword swinging, nor his Vice Captain's desperate attempt to put space between them, diving out into the corridor. With the open hall behind them, Anabomi remembered his fingers spreading with light, the resultant spell cannoning into Hyakken's torso and sending him crashing against the far wall.

He had had ample opportunity, with the door open, to run away and flee for safety, but he had not. He had maintained the last defence against his Captain's rogue blade, and although there was no way of confirming its truth, Anabomi knew only one reason why his loyal, steadfast sidekick would act so recklessly in the face of obviously lethal danger. Hyakken must have known that he was no match for his Captain's blade, but he had also realised that there was only him who could attempt to buy Sakura time... time to go, time to fetch help. That meant that, contrary to Keitarou's belief, the division was not empty. Somewhere, maybe hiding, maybe not, there were other Division members lurking, people whose presence Hyakken had gambled his life to keep concealed and safe.

"Hyakken..."

Anabomi knelt down at his Vice Captain's side, cupping a shaking hand beneath the other man's chin and lifting the bloody face to meet his own. There was no fear in these eyes, but nor had they become glassy and empty like the others, and his skin was still warm to the touch. He had fought, fearlessly and resolutely in defence of his division, in such a way that ought to have brought Anabomi pride in his choice of adjutant, but instead he felt only revulsion. He had mutilated this loyal officer, and the others. He had been weak, and Keitarou had capitalised, laying waste to the squad which he had spent so much time fighting to build.

He stumbled unsteadily upright, staggering back towards his office. He did not want to see the awful, bloody sight again, but nor did he intend to let Hyakken's sacrifice be in vain, and so he pulled his heavy body inside, forcing the door closed so that he was alone with the results of his gory handiwork. Now there was no preventing the impulse to be sick, and Anabomi dropped to his knees, his entire body heaving with the shock and distress of his reaction. Inside his head, he could hear Keitarou tut-tutting, but as his nausea subsided, his indignation and pride began to take hold. Rage replaced grief and dismay in his heart, and he dragged himself to his feet, forcing his body step by step down the hall towards the office once more. His sword was still clasped in his right hand, and as he raised it slightly, he felt it resist him, preventing him from turning the weapon on his own body.

No, you don't. I told you. Kuchiki don't commit suicide. I'm protecting your family pride and my interests — you're far too useful a weapon for me to discard just yet. Just be a little patient. I'm sure it won't be long before help arrives.

You let Takaoka escape for that reason, didn't you?

Realisation splashed like cold water against Anabomi's senses, and Keitarou chuckled.

Different situations call for different tactics.

His words held no apology.

You aren't my only weapon. I sent Tenth's hallowed leaders to rip holes in the Eighth, but you've proven so effective on your own territory that I thought I should bring the prey to you. It doesn't really matter to me how Seireitei's people die, so long as they do. I won't kill anyone else.

Raising his free left hand, Anabomi reached up to yank down the tapestry that hid the secret compartment from view, gazing at the small, carved panel with a new sense of resolve.

I don't intend to let you use me as you see fit. You talk about shame, but my shame is already complete. A Captain does not hurt those he is sworn to protect and lead. Whether you acted within me or not, those deeds are unforgivable and they can't be forgiven. I won't let them be. I will fight you at every single step. This body no longer deserves life, nor the respect of the Kuchiki Clan. Therefore, I will fight you until my last breath.
That suits me, but I anticipate our acquaintance being a little longer than you do.

Anabomi felt his right fist twitch slightly, as if reminding him who had control of the sword arm, and he frowned. It was control, but only partial control. Keitarou was focusing the bulk of his manipulation on whatever was occurring in other places, and his focus over Anabomi's own movements was basic at best. True, he would not allow the other man to turn his blade on himself, but...

His gaze strayed to the desk, and he took an experimental step towards it, followed by another, reaching his left hand down for the secret drawer in which lay the silver key to the compartment.

Now what are you about?

Keitarou's words were curious, but not fearful, and Anabomi did not respond, pulling back the drawer and rummaging inside for the key. Retrieving it, he held it up before his gaze, tilting it so that it caught the light.

A friend of mine left a present here for you. I'll retrieve it.

A present?

Keitarou's words were surprised.

A friend? For me?

Yes. A friend called Shougo, whose life you cut short in the Rukon twenty five years ago.

There was silence, then a soft chuckle.

I see.

Keitarou's tones were once more amused, and Anabomi felt the resistance in his left hand dissipate.

Very well. I'm curious to see what this 'present' is. Show me.

Anabomi gritted his teeth, sliding the key into the lock and opening the cabinet, gazing inside at the hidden contents. Slowly he reached for the carved box, resting it on the edge of the shelf as he fumbled with the fingers of his left hand to open it.

And this is the present that your friend left for me, Anabomi Seizuku?

Keitarou's words were dangerously quiet.

A small bottle in a carved box? Do you have any idea what's in that vial?

"A way of getting rid of you." Anabomi scooped up the vial, removing the stopper with his teeth and spitting it out onto the floor. "I'm not a scientist, I don't care about the details. If it gets you out of my head, all to the good. You can't stop me from drinking it, Keitarou."

It looks untested. The formula is flawed... I can tell you that just from glancing at the piece of paper through your eyes. What if it kills you? What then?

Then my suicide will be complete, and you won't be able to use me any more, now will you?

Anabomi's eyes hardened, and he forced his left hand to his lips, tipping the contents down his throat in one jerky movement.

There. It's done. It's done and you can't make me your slave any more. It's over, Keitarou. All of it is over.

There was no response, and Anabomi felt his right hand slowly return to his own control, the manipulative presence receding back, back, back against his senses until he was aware of his whole body under his sovereignty once more. The potion seared and burned through his body, making him cough, but every inch of him felt alive with a glow of warmth, and he twitched each finger individually, revelling in the return of control.

Your potion worked, Shougo. It worked. It pushed Keitarou out, and now... thanks to your potion, I can die here, with my men. Thanks to that...

You should be careful what you wish for.

Keitarou's words were faint, almost like a dream, cutting through Anabomi's thoughts, but before he could react to them, something surged through his body, hot and fierce and angry. The world outside, which moments earlier had appeared in such clear definition was now a swirl of lights and darks, all punctuated through a haze of red. Though he knew he was quite alone, shapes and figures seemed to rear up from this crimson fog, and he stumbled forward, slashing at the shapes but making contact only with air. His heart pounded in his chest, fit to burst, and he took a desperate breath of air, trying to compose himself.

Maybe... it needed more trials. Maybe... but it doesn't matter. I intended to die here. So long as I do that... it doesn't matter. I'll see you soon... Shougo.

That was the last coherent thought he had, as a swell of rage and hot red energy flooded through him, engulfing his whole being.

Hirata had been in his office when he had sensed the first explosions from the Eighth Division, and had known that, once more, Seireitei was under some kind of attack. Mindful of the assault Katsura had made on Seventh so many days earlier, he had been quick to get to his feet, thrusting his weapon through his obi as he made his way towards the main door.

Seventh were under capacity, but that would not stop them from taking their part in a fight that involved Keitarou and his progeny.

Despite their best attempts, none of the Seventh Division patrols for Katsura's body had come up with anything, and Hirata felt certain that the young man had somehow escaped — spirited away into the night by the man who had used Ohara so shamelessly as a puppet. Ohara still lay deeply comatose, and each morning, Hirata himself had strengthened the barrier of Kidou that surrounded his body, not trusting the Geki that still encircled the man's heart to be enough to hold him indefinitely. Ohara was an arrogant poser at the best of times, but he was a shinigami of some potential, and so it would not do to have him roaming around with the rest of the division so depleted.

Especially if, as he suspected, Keitarou was finally making a move.

Hirata did not know what he expected to find when he stepped out into the front forecourt of his division, but though he could see the rising smoke from the gate of his neighbouring barracks, he could not sense the distinctive swirl of raw reiryoku that would signify a fresh assault from Keitarou's eldest son. Instead, he was vaguely aware of several spiritual presences, all of them familiar.

Am I overreacting?

He paused, his fingers drumming against Tsumi no Fuuhi's hilt as he considered this possibility.

Are Shunsui and the others just doing some kind of training session that's got a mite out of hand? I can't sense any hostile force... yet it's not like the Eighth to perform manoeuvres in their front forecourt like that.

He was still debating this possibility when there was the loud clatter of someone colliding with the gate, then a dazed, blood-spattered figure staggered into the Seventh Division's front yard, weaving unsteadily across the cobbles in his general direction.

"Help... help me... please... someone... help me..."

Her words were incoherent, and as it looked likely she was going to tumble forward onto the ground, Hirata let out an exclamation, hurrying forward to catch her. He raised his voice to yell for any of his subordinates who were in the near vicinity, tightening his grip as the girl struggled feebly against his hold. The girl was a stranger to him, but it was not her identity that concerned Hirata, for he had quickly picked up on the scuffling to her uniform, and the seeping wound to her upper arm, the trickle of crimson liquid tracing its way across her skin in stark contrast to her ashen pallor. Her eyes were awash with tears, and she was shaking, clearly fighting off full-blown hysteria. He gave her a little shake to bring her back to her senses, resisting the urge to slap her in case it made the situation worse.

“Calm down and report to me,” he instructed, giving her another little shake as she fought against his hold a second time. “You said you wanted help, but I can’t help you unless you talk to me. Calm down and tell me what’s happened. Where are you from? What’s going on?”

At the sharpness in his voice, the girl’s struggles ceased, and she blinked, apparently taking in her companion’s appearance for the first time.

“Endou... taichou?”

“That’s right,” Hirata nodded his head. “You came here asking for help, so report. Who are you and what are you doing staggering all over my courtyard? There’s been an attack, correct? Tell me where and tell me quickly.”

“Are you... going to attack me too?”

The girl’s voice was soft and blurry, but Hirata could see genuine fear in her eyes, and he shook his head.

“Don’t be foolish,” he snapped. “Why would I hurt you? You came for help, but I can’t give it unless you report. State your name and division, girl, and stop leaking all over me. If there’s a crisis, you can’t help it by sobbing and hysterics.”

The girl’s eyes widened at this, her body trembling even more with the force of her emotions, but she swallowed hard, relief glittering briefly in her gaze.

“Takaoka... Sakura,” she murmured, and Hirata realised the girl had calmed sufficiently to give her name. “I’m the... Sixth Seat... of the... Ninth Division. Please, come help. Fukutaichou ordered me... get help. Bring a Captain. Any Captain. Quickly.”

“To Ninth?” Hirata dumped Sakura unceremoniously down onto the ground now she had returned somewhat to her senses, casting her a startled glance. "Something's happened at the Ninth?"

Sakura sniffed, nodding her head jerkily.

"Something's happened to Taichou," she whispered. "He said he couldn't... make it stop. He told me to scream, but when I did..."

She closed her eyes, fresh tears spilling down her cheeks, and Hirata bit back his impatience, his fear growing with every passing moment.

"When you did?" he prompted, more edge to his tones than necessary, but Sakura's eyes snapped open, and she swallowed hard. Slowly she raised her uninjured arm, making a slashing motion with her hand before burying her face in her palm.

Hirata frowned, realising that the girl had reached the end of her tether. Getting to his feet, he rested his hand lightly on her head, turning to glance around him.

"Kikyue! Hajime! Nakata! Joumei! Dammit, is nobody there when I yell?" he exclaimed impatiently. Almost before he had finished shouting, the door of the barracks opened, revealing his daughter and the silver haired Kitsune, both with swords in hand. A moment later, Nakata emerged, stifling a yawn behind his the back of his uninjured hand. Hajime was the final member to join the group, and by glancing at him, Hirata knew he had been organising the juniors. Without being asked, Hajime too had clearly registered the explosions and reiatsu flares from Eighth, and had taken it upon himself to ensure all of Seventh's lower officers were safely hidden away somewhere deep beneath Seventh's own barracks. It was instinct like this which had made Hirata give Hajime Fourth Seat over Ohara's preening in the first place, and as he sent his subordinate a questioning glance, Hajime offered him a little nod of confirmation.

"Who the hell..?" At the sight of the bloodsoaked girl, Nakata jerked wide awake, casting his Captain a startled glance. "What's happening, Taichou? Who's this?"

"Takaoka, with a message from Ninth. They're under attack and require urgent reinforcements," Hirata said briskly. "I don't know more than that. Takaoka's injured and in shock, so she's finding it hard to give a coherent description. Nonetheless, I think it's urgent. We should go investigate."

"Me too, sir?" Nakata glanced at his injured arm, then frowned. "I mean, I'll come, sir, but I don't want to be in the way."

“I’m taking all of you,” Hirata made up his mind. “Hajime, I trust from the time you took to respond to me, you’ve made sure the juniors are safe?”

“Locked in the cells, sir,” Hajime said matter-of-factly. “Some of them are crying like newborns, and I had to physically toss a couple of them into the prison, but it seemed the safest place. Our prisons are sealed with Sekkiseki on the outside. I figured, if something has attacked Eighth, it could come here, and we’re not fit to protect the young ones if we have to worry about fighting for our own lives. I acted before you gave the order, but I hoped you’d approve. Masaoka’s in charge. I’ve told him he’s not to let anyone out till he gets orders from me or someone above my rank... he’s to use force if need be to keep them where they are.”

“It saves time, and it won’t kill them, not for once,” Hirata said grimly. “Joumei, you have a sword... I didn’t think you could use one of those.”

“I can’t, really, but Kikyue-hime was trying to teach me,” Joumei responded honestly. “I’m probably more use with my Kidou, but I’ll come and I’ll fight. I promised I’d deploy as you instructed, so even if Nakata-san is unable to fight, I’ll do what I can.”

“Then we’re going to Ninth. Nakata, I’m putting you in charge of Takaoka,” Hirata hauled the distressed girl to her feet, giving her a little push in Nakata’s direction, and the older officer sent his Captain a non-plussed look. “Your duty is to ensure no harm befalls her. We may need her, and I can’t leave her here in this state.”

“Taking her while she’s bawling like that isn’t going to help our battle plan, Taichou,” Kikyue eyed Sakura disdainfully, and something in her scorn seemed to raise the other girl from her daze.

“How would you feel if your Captain tried to kill you, then cut down three of your superiors right in front of you!” she demanded, the venom in her words sending all deference or respect due Kikyue as her ranked superior flying out of the window as her emotions took over. “How would you feel if it was your Captain you just watched behead your Fourth Seat and slash open your Third and Fifth seats? How would you feel?”

“Anabomi did what?” Hajime’s eyes almost fell out of his head, and Hirata’s own shock was too great to scold his fellow officer for his lack of manners.

“Something is controlling him,” Sakura’s voice shook, and she gripped hold of Hirata’s arm desperately. “Something evil. I don’t know what, but he said he couldn't stop it. He told me to scream, to bring help, and I screamed, but Taichou is strong. He wanted someone to stop him but they couldn't. He's stronger than anyone. Fukutaichou was holding him off so I could come get help... but Taichou is stronger than Fukutaichou. Much stronger. Taichou would never hurt anyone in Ninth, but something else wants to, and it's making him do it. He looked so upset, Endou-Taichou. Please, help us. I don't understand what's happening, but I want to make it stop."

"We're going to Ninth, and we're going now," Hirata did not wait for his companions to make any further comments, detaching Sakura's hold from his arm and nodding to her. "You, stay with Nakata and do as he tells you. We're going to do what we can in your division, you have my word."

With that he was gone into shunpo, speeding through the streams of light towards the other Division's compound. In his slipstream, he could sense the spiritual presences of his companions, all of them equally stunned by Sakura's revelation, but prepared to follow his instructions to the letter, and so as he touched down in Ninth's courtyard, he drew his sword from its sheath, gazing around him cautiously for any sign of life.

There was none. The division was eerily still, as though deserted.

"Doesn't seem like there's anyone here," Kikyue was the next to drop out of her flash-step, putting Hirata's own impressions into words. "Taichou, what do you think? Should we split up and case the joint? Or..."

"No," Hirata shook his head, as Hajime, Joumei, and finally Nakata, with Sakura in tow, materialised on the cobbles. 'Not yet. We need more information. Takaoka,' he turned to the still shaking Sixth Seat, who, despite her earlier hysteria, appeared to have returned somewhat to her senses now that help was at hand. "Where did all this happen? Anabomi was afflicted where? In his office? In the training rooms? The mess hall? Where?"

"His... office, sir," Sakura's voice caught, but she was able to answer rationally enough, and Hirata drew a sigh of relief into his lungs. "I went there to take a message from Fukutaichou. He fired Byakurai at me, but it wasn't like... he didn't seem to know why he'd done it. We were talking, he seemed normal again, then... suddenly he was coming after me with his sword. Everything else... happened there. In his office."

"Then that's where I'm heading to," Hirata said decidedly. "The rest of you, keep a wide berth. I can sense Anabomi's reiatsu now — at least, something which I think is Anabomi — and so should you all be able to. He's not attempting to hide himself, so it ought to be easy enough to keep clear of him. Takaoka, that goes for you too. Tell me, how many of your squad were here at barracks this morning, do you know?"

"Not exactly, sir," Sakura shook her head despondently. "Some are out on patrol in the Districts. I know Fukutaichou was working with some other officers. I mean, other than... other than..."

She faltered, her voice breaking again, and Hirata nodded curtly, turning to Kikyue.

"You, Hajime and Joumei, search the division for any surviving officers who haven't been caught up in this so far," he said softly. "Evacuate them in whatever way you can. Take them back to Seventh if need be. I'll go relieve Mikihara and do something about Anabomi. I'm probably the only one who can, but I think I ought to be able..."

That was as far as he got, for with a tremendous crash, the front wall of the Ninth Division barracks exploded, dust and debris flying in all directions. Kikyue let out a yelp, as Hajime roughly pulled her to the ground to avoid bamboo shrapnel, and Nakata let out a curse, using the broad back of his body to shield Sakura from the force of the blast. The Ninth Division officer began to scream again, but Hirata had no time to focus on the girl's distress. As the smoke and dust cleared, a silhouetted outline became visible for the first time amid the rubble, and despite himself, Hirata drew breath sharply into his lungs, registering with horror who — no, the better word was what — stood before them.

A ragged, bloodsoaked haori and a torn, dusty shihakushou gave away the figure's identity as that of Anabomi Seizuku, the Captain whose pristine image and attention to neatness and public appearance had always been legend among the rest of the Gotei. His fingers were caked in blood, and an ugly red smear across the silver blade of his zanpakutou told Hirata that Sakura's tearful outburst had not been exaggerated. It was from the neck up, however, that caused Hirata the most consternation, for instead of the delicate Kuchiki complexion and soft grey eyes, this individual's gaze was as blood red as the stain on his sword, his skin swathed in a slick, chalky substance that could only be interpreted as a Hollow mask. The transformation was imperfect, the mask lumpy and uneven in its coverage of his features, yet from the raw, violent edge that now coated Anabomi's reiatsu, Hirata knew that there was no he watched, the body gave another judder, the shoulder bones twisting and dislocating as the white substance spread across them, mutating them into the flat blades of lizard-like armour, and Hirata's heart clenched in his chest.

This is Keitarou's work. Keitarou's doing. Keitarou's trap. It's Reidoku. It must be.

He tightened his grip on his zanpakutou, readying himself for release.

Well, that settles what we do here then, Seizumi. There's nothing else for it, is there?

Out loud he said,

"All of you, get inside the Ninth building and search for survivors! Evacuate any you can, but don't come back here!"

"Taichou!" It was Kikyue who protested, but before she could do anything else, Joumei had grabbed her by the wrist. His lips moved, his words too soft for Hirata to make out as he drew together the air currents around his blade, preparing to unleash the Wind Hawk in its full glory. Whatever Joumei had said, however, it had been effective, for the next moment Hirata found himself alone with his colleague, his gaze running over Anabomi's demented form as he tried to make sense of what he was seeing.

Anabomi's tongue flicked in and out of his mouth like a snake, licking his lips, and a strange, high-pitched shriek emitted from his vocal chords. He lurched forward, zanpakutou raised, his movements jerky and heavy as though his body was not fully under his own control. Though he did not make an attempt to release his weapon, the toxic level of his reiryoku was enough to make anyone choke and falter, and Hirata narrowed his gaze behind his glasses, steadying himself against the spiritual onslaught.

Whatever was happening in Eighth, they would have to take care of themselves.

Right now, I can only deal with what's in front of me. I have to deal with this... in the only way an Endou can. I have to use the Wind Hawk and I have to kill Anabomi. Otherwise, who knows how many others will fall to that sword?

At the same time that events were unfolding across Seireitei, Juushirou was ensconced in Ugendou with his Vice Captain and Third Seated officer in full attendance, processing the plans for the day's amended patrols. Despite the Council's expectations that remaining squads would take on the bulk of District protection, many regions remained short of adequate protection. As a District squad, Thirteenth were especially keenly aware of this fact, with many members of the squad anxious about friends and family in distant areas, and Juushirou was no exception. As a result, he had summoned his second and third officer to his office as soon as had been decently possible, determined to make the division's limited forces work double-time, if necessary, to ensure no losses of life or property that could otherwise be protected. Enishi and Naoko had just begun debating how best to deploy recruits when the first sense of rising reiatsu had tickled Juushirou's synapses, and he had turned his head towards the window, brows knitting together as he tried to work out what it was he had sensed. Eighth, Ninth and Tenth were far enough from Thirteenth for the sensations to be somewhat vague and indistinct, but Juushirou's senses were extremely perceptive, and try as he might to shake the thought, he could not avoid the genuine unease in what he was feeling.

At the heart of it was Shunsui's Eighth, of that he was certain, but it was the darker, more raw emissions coming from the direction of Ninth that made him the most unsettled.

"...And then there's the Kitsune kid," Enishi interjected now, drawing Juushirou's attention back to the matter at hand. "She's no good to send out anywhere, and we're meant to be protecting her. Kid can barely hold a sword and doesn't show a lot of inclination for the sport. I'd hate to see her up against a Hollow... she'd be eaten for lunch before she had time to breathe."

"Ichimaru-san is too smart to be eaten that easily," Naoko objected, then she sighed, shrugging her shoulders. "But I can't argue with you about her sword skills. She's hopelessly untrained for physical combat."

"Taichou, what do you think?" Enishi cast Juushirou a quizzical look, and Juushirou tore his thoughts from further away divisions, resting his chin in his hands as he considered the dilemma.

"Izumi isn't here to enter into combat against anyone," he said slowly. "Like Enishi said, we're meant to protect her. Her recruitment here is formalised and official, but essentially she's claiming sanctuary. She's also repaid her debts through her scientific research... and been threatened into the bargain. Though she doesn't seem to have taken harm from that, not now it's over and done with... I hardly think I could face Joumei if I sent her into active combat. The trouble is..."

He trailed off, his expression becoming troubled.

The trouble is, I can't guarantee her safety here, not when I'm convinced Keitarou is coming here, and soon.

"The trouble is?" Naoko echoed his words, a question in her tone, and Juushirou sighed heavily.

"I don't think it's a matter of inclination," he said finally. "I don't know if you've paid attention, either of you, but since the attack by Tenichi, Izumi's been spending a lot of time in the training gym with Ketsui, and they've done a lot of sword drill. She isn't a natural, and will never be. Joumei said to me that it was always believed, among the Kitsune, that Izumi's muteness and tiny stature was a result of her being born and raised in a Sekkiseki environment. He was lucky, and healthy, but she was born early and as a result was always small and silent as a baby... so I doubt her physical strength is particularly good, either. Holding a sword may just not be her talent... but she is trying to act more like a shinigami now she realises how easily her life can be put in danger."

"Maybe, but it isn't enough to send her out on patrol," Enishi said gruffly. "I'm sorry, Ukitake, even if you order it, I'll risk a disciplinary and defy the command. I don't intend to let the kid get hurt just because she's started waving a sword... it's just not in me to do."

She might be safer on patrol, if the reiatsu I can sense from across Seireitei means what I'm afraid it does.

Juushirou's gaze flitted back to the window, this time in the direction of the Twelfth Division, and he pursed his lips.

And something there isn't right, either. I've never known our neighbours to be so quiet... but they can't possibly all be out on patrol.

Out loud he said,

"It's all right, Enishi. I don't intend to give that order. Izumi will stay here, and I want her to be told unequivocally that she's to stay within the Division buildings and out of sight. I'll also keep Ketsui, since she's got the closest bond with him... I think that would be the most sensible decision. In terms of the rest..."

He frowned, debating with his instincts for a moment, then,

"I want everyone else prepared for immediate deployment, but I don't want anyone to physically leave Thirteenth until I give the order," he decided eventually. 'I know there are still a lot of areas to cover,' as Naoko's eyes widened in surprise, "but I'm sure you've noticed that some of our more distant neighbours are unusually active this morning. In the unlikely event of it being more than overvigorous training drills, I want us to be ready to act in support of whoever needs it most. A lot of divisions have already sent large forces outside of Inner Seireitei... since Thirteenth haven't done that yet, we might prove to be needed."

"Reiatsu?" Enishi creased his brow, and Juushirou knew his big adjutant was attempting to pick up the signals. "I don't sense anything unusual, but I'm not as sharp as you are. Shikibu, what about you? Do you pick up what Ukitake's feeling?"

"I have," Naoko admitted. "In fits and starts, it feels like there's fighting going on. But I can't detect the presence of a hostile force... so I don't know whether it's something we should be worried about right now. Still, if that's the order, then it's what we'll do. I'm assuming you'll leave Mitsuki with the boy, Taichou, and let me take Kirio as part of the deployment?"

"Kirio is a military officer," Juushirou said simply, nodding his head. "We need her and her sword primed and ready to fight. But I've already sent Mitsuki to the Fourth Division. Unohana-taichou requested her, now that her spirit power is pretty much returned... she didn't say why, but I didn't feel in a position to refuse Mitsuki's actual superior officer in a summons like that."

And I imagine Unohana-taichou feels how I do — that there's a likelihood of attack and she wants to be ready to deal with any wounded that it creates. Otherwise there'd be no reason for her to cocoon Fourth in protective Kidou... or decide to suddenly want Mitsuki back without any advance warning.

"Then the kid?" Enishi was surprised. Juushirou shrugged.

"Like Izumi, he'll have to stay inside. Hopefully I'm overreacting, anyway," he said wearily. "For now, prepare the division as best you can. Recruits — minus Izumi — and seated officers — minus Ketsui — are all to be briefed for action. You can let them think that their patrolling will be against Hollows in the Districts, because right now that's as much information as I have. But make sure nobody leaves here until I'm ready."

He got to his feet, and Naoko cast him a suspicious look.

"We'll do so, but where are you going? You're not leaving Thirteenth?"

"No..." Juushirou offered her a rueful smile, shaking his head. "No, I'm just going to step outside and assess the local situation. Things in the atmosphere are bothering me, and I thought perhaps I'd get a better grip on what was what if I went there. I'll be safe enough, Naoko — please, go with Enishi and do as I've asked."

"An order is an order," Enishi glanced at Naoko. "Let's go, Shikibu. They're reasonable instructions — and we'll have everyone ready quicker between the two of us."

"True," Naoko sighed reluctantly, but nodded. "I'm coming."

Juushirou watched them leave with an uneasy heart.

Kai left here early this morning. I only hope that his forays will be in time and we can prevent a worst case scenario. I don't know, though. Much as I want to believe everything is all right, every single sense of mine is telling me that it's not.

You need to trust those senses, Juushirou.

In's voice murmuring in his ear made him jump, then let out a soft groan.

In... you're not helping.

There was no reply, just the sensation of fish fins brushing against his thoughts, and he set his lips in a grim line, hardening his resolve and marching determinedly out into the front courtyard of the Thirteenth, unsure what exactly he was going to find.

"It's been a while, Juushirou."

No sooner had he stepped outside the door, when a voice sent chills down Juushirou's spine, and he swung around, his fingers more than halfway to Sougyo no Kotowari's hilt before he managed to lay eyes on the speaker. He was dressed all in black, except for the battered grey cloak he wore about his shoulders, and his sandy brown hair was pulled into a haphazard tie behind his head. It had been more than twenty years since the two men had last met, but despite the reports of Keitarou's serious injuries on that occasion, he now seemed in good health. He was thinner, perhaps, but not noticeably aged by the experience of living within the worst regions of Rukongai. He appeared relaxed, almost in good humour, his arms folded casually across his chest as though he had simply sauntered into the compound on a random whim, but Juushirou was not a child any more and he was not fooled by this pretence of nonchalance. His fingers closed around Sougyo no Kotowari's hilt, pulling the weapon free into the open air, his gaze searching Keitarou's waist for any sign of the man's own distinctive tantou knife.

At the gesture, Keitarou tut-tutted, shaking his head.

"You don't want to draw that on me here, like this," he said reproachfully. "It's not like you, especially not after all this time. You surely don't bear a grudge for the past, do you? It was a long time ago — and I haven't come here intending to fight you."

"Last time we met, you tried to kill me," Juushirou spoke coldly. "The time before, you manipulated me against my close friend and caused us both serious harm. I believe my grandfather made it clear twenty-five years ago that your presence isn't welcome anywhere around me. If you didn't get that memo clearly the last time, I'll happily add a postscript. I have clearance from the Council to kill you on sight. Don't think for one moment I'll hesitate in completing that order."

"Ah, but I don't think you'll release that sword, not here," Juushirou did not see Keitarou move, but the next moment the exile was at his side, reaching out a black-gloved hand to push Sougyo no Kotowari's blade casually down against Juushirou's side. "There, that's better. Hear me out first. What I have to say might interest you."

"Nothing you have to say interests me," Juushirou bristled, yanking his weapon away from Keitarou's touch. "You're an enemy of Soul Society, and I'm sure I've told you many times, Seireitei's justice is the justice I believe in... justice you turned your back on a long time ago!"

"True," Keitarou held up his hands in mock surrender, an amused smile lighting up his clever features. "Still, I think you ought to listen. That is, if you don't want there to be more lives lost than absolutely necessary."

"Lives... lost?" Despite himself, Juushirou hesitated, his eyes narrowing to slits as he glared at his foe suspiciously. "You can't sway me from my purpose with clever word games, Keitarou. I'm not a child, I've grown up. I spent a long time living in Seventh District, and I learned what it was like to have someone with a metaphorical knife to your back every day I got up. I'm not a student, now. I'm a Captain. You won't hurt the people here, for I won't let you take another step inside my division."

"You have something that belongs to me," Keitarou's eyes suddenly became cold, his right hand sliding into the folds of his clothing and producing the small, distinctive tantou blade that Juushirou recognised only too well as the enigmatic scientist's zanpakutou, Chudokuga. He tensed, and Keitarou nodded.

"Yes, you were looking for this just a moment ago, and you were right to be wary," he said softly. "I wouldn't come here without it. Nor would I come here without using it to take specific, protective precautions."

He twisted the blade, allowing the light to glint off its surface, and Juushirou's brows knitted together, taking in the odd, slightly hazy sheen to the weapon's surface. A sudden sense of unease gripped his stomach.

"What did you do with that?" he demanded, and Keitarou pressed his lips together, tilting the weapon in Juushirou's direction.

"So you can see it. Impressive... but then I'm not surprised. I would've expected it from you, Juushirou — someone I picked out so young to be so strong and powerful... yes, it would be a shame if I'd been wrong at this late stage about your particular skills of perception."

He slid the weapon back into his obi, the hilt poking out tauntingly from beneath the folds of cloth.

"I can't use it on you again, though, sadly," he said with regret. "It's a great pity, because I would've liked to have seen how you'd evolved — but instead, I will have to use more base methods of manipulation to keep you from releasing that weapon, won't I?"

"I already told you..."

"What if I told you that the leaders of the Ninth and Tenth Divisions were currently acting under their own, unique kill-on-sight orders?" Keitarou's tones had taken on a dangerous edge, and there was a challenging expression in his mud-slurried eyes. "I know, you see, that the Gotei here is undermanned — all it takes are a few cleverly placed chess pieces and Seireitei's guarding forces will be check-mated without me even needing to lift a finger. Would you believe me, Juushirou, if I told you that as we speak, your friends are tearing each other to shreds, blade on blade? Would you think I was lying, if I told you that all those precious, honed shinigami skills of theirs were currently aimed at one another... and blood was already being spilled?"

Juushirou's eyes opened wide with dismay, remembering the flurries of reiatsu he had picked up from further across Seireitei, and Keitarou inclined his head.

"Yes. Your perception means you know I'm not lying to you," he said softly. "So now you realise exactly what cards I hold in my hands, I suggest you put that sword away and listen to my terms. The quicker you listen, the quicker I might be prevailed upon to release my hold. Of course, there's no guarantee I'll do anything so obliging — nor can I promise that all lives will be saved and all officers left in possession of all their limbs — but those things are by the by. We aren't allies, so I'm under no obligation to respect your sensibilities about life and death. You do know well enough the power of my sword to tell that I'm not lying, though... don't you?"

Juushirou's eyes darkened with anger, but slowly he lowered Sougyo no Kotowari into its sheath, and Keitarou nodded slowly.

"Good," he remarked, pleased. "Your principles are still as they were all those years ago, even if I can tell your reiatsu is substantially stronger. As you are now, Juushirou, I believe you could kill me with that blade, especially knowing that Chudokuga is hampered in what it can now do to you. I understand the reasons why you won't, though — not whilst you know that my sword cannot be repealed by anyone but me... and if you did anything reckless against me now, those friends of yours would keep fighting and dying until they had no more life left. I have evolved too, in the time we've been apart. The wounds your grandfather gave me were troublesome, but healing from them provided unexpected dividends. One of those is the reason I'm here now. As I said before, you have something that is mine, and I want it back."

Juushirou's eyes narrowed at this.

"If you mean Koku, then he's not a thing, he's your son!" he snapped. "He's a living, thinking, breathing being with a mind and a will of his own! He doesn't just exist for you to use him and his power as you see fit!"

Keitarou arched an eyebrow, then he burst out laughing, shaking his head in clear amusement.

"Can you hear yourself?" he demanded, a mocking note in his tones. "You've outdone yourself this time, Juushirou — does your faith in other people have no limits or boundaries of sense or self-preservation?"

"Does your sense of fatherhood have no element of love or understanding?" Juushirou shot back. "Did you ever think how much your doing this might hurt him? Damage him? Did that ever occur to you, or did it not matter, in light of your greater plans for world devastation?"

"Did you ever consider that, as my son, he might be as adept at deception as I am?" Keitarou was unmoved. "Once I understood he was in the custody of the Thirteenth, I knew that no harm would befall him. Even if you learned his real name — which clearly you have done — I knew. People get stronger and wiser, but their fundamental nature very rarely changes from how it is when they are young. I trusted that you would use that idealism of yours and protect him, the poor, pathetic stray from Rukongai, whose past was a long, sad story of abuse and neglect. That's what he told you, I trust? I'm sure my son would do nothing less, making use of the obvious foolishness of those around him to ensure he was kept safe. I knew you wouldn't even think to question his intentions — just like with Shikiki, you reach out to adopt those you believe are in some way disadvantaged and unwanted. It's the arrogance you have, both as a shinigami and as an individual, to assume that every miserable specimen is waiting for you to extend an arm in their defence. Did you not stop to think that you might've been shielding an assassin? I'm sure it never dawned on you that my son might have been sent here, on purpose, to win you over and then kill you while you slept?"

Juushirou gazed at Keitarou for a moment, then he shook his head.

"You can say what you like," he replied coldly. "I know that boy wasn't sent here to hurt anyone, Keitarou. I know that he came here by accident, when your stupid, blood-thirsty daughter killed a man who did nothing to deserve the injuries inflicted upon him. He came here because, like me and like so many others, he dislikes seeing people die unnecessarily. Maybe you're the one who doesn't know your son. Maybe you've used him as your pawn for so long that you don't understand the sensitive heart that lurks beneath."

"The sensitive heart?" Keitarou echoed the words derisively. "You really are a fool. You ought to have had children of your own to foist these paternal impulses on, Juushirou. As for Koku... Kohaku, he's my son, he's not yours. He has my spiritual heritage, not yours. I have known him his whole life. Contrary to your belief in my parenting skills, I protected him, raised him, trained him and taught him everything he knows about the world. He survived because of me and the efforts I made to ensure it. He is dependant on me, because I am the only one who understands even a little bit of the power that lurks within him and how best to govern it safely. You, by contrast, are a stranger. An uncommonly soppy stranger, but a stranger nonetheless. As angry as you can be on his behalf, Koku has no reason to take your part. So, I'll say it again. Return to me what's mine — or I won't be held responsible for the carnage that follows. There's already been blood spilled at the Ninth Division... who knows, perhaps the Eighth will be next?"

"Shunsui..." Juushirou hesitated for the briefest of instants, then he hardened his resolve, shaking his head.

"Shunsui can take care of himself," he said frankly. "We don't run to protect each other, because it's not needed. Koku is not your property, and I have no intention of letting you set foot within my Division. We have an impasse... because Thirteenth and its people — among whom I currently include your son — are my immediate responsibility, and I won't allow you to put them in danger."

"Taichou!" Naoko's voice came from across the courtyard, the Third Seated officer stopping dead at the sight of the interloper, and Juushirou glanced at her, seeing the mixture of emotions that ranged across her clever features. Dokusou Houshi was already out of its scabbard and glittering with green light, but Keitarou merely shot her a playful glance, inclining his head towards her in acknowledgement.

"Shikibu Naoko, I believe. Well, well. I didn't realise you still lived. My compliments for managing it — it's quite a feat, considering."

"Naoko, stand down. That's an order," Juushirou held up his hand, casting his subordinate a warning look. "Keitarou is not for you to fight. I know your feelings, but I'm overruling them in this case. Is everyone prepped and ready for dispatch?"

"Yes, sir, but..."

"Then return to them and complete the orders you were given," Juushirou kept his voice calm. "Keitarou will be leaving here, shortly. If he doesn't go by choice, I will be using Sougyo no Kotowari persuasively. In the meantime, Enishi needs your help far more than I do."

"You should do what your Captain tells you, Naoko-san," An infuriating smile played at the corners of Keitarou's lips. "Much as your sword interested me once, I think it unlikely I'd find you of any use to me now, and it would be a shame when you'd lived this long if I were to do something with Chudokuga that resulted in your death."

Juushirou saw Naoko's entire body tense, her face twisting into a mask of anger and hatred so intense that even he felt a chill at the sight of it, but before he could shout out another caution to his officer to keep a hold of her temper, someone else stepped out into the courtyard, padding barefoot between the militant Third Seat and the defiant Captain to stand in the middle of the cobbles.

At the sight of him, Juushirou's heart skipped a beat.

"Koku?"

Kohaku did not meet Juushirou's gaze at first, standing before his father and meeting Keitarou's mud-slurried eyes with his own sombre brown ones.

“I knew you would come here,” he said quietly. “I was waiting. There’s no need to goad Shikibu-san or Ukitake-dono into violence... you shouldn’t be wasting your time and energy on such things.”

“Koku, you shouldn’t be here,” Juushirou hurried forwards, grasping the boy’s thin bony arm through the sleeve of the thin robe he had pulled around his body, but Kohaku gently detached the man’s hold, turning a melancholy gaze on his would-be protector.

“I have to go with him,” he said matter-of-factly. “Right now, it’s the only thing that I can do. I don’t expect you to understand, and probably you’re angry with me. It’s all right, if you are. Like I told you, I can’t take advantage of your kindness. He’s come for me... and now he has, I have to go.”

“Even though you know he will hurt you again?” Juushirou demanded, and Kohaku smiled sadly, a bittersweet expression entering his dark eyes.

“Nothing can begin if I stay here,” he said simply. “I’m sorry. There’s no reason for you or Shikibu-san to draw swords to defend me. I intend to go with him — I always did. It’s the only thing I know how to do.”

“And so you see, blood really is thicker than water, sometimes,” Keitarou shot Juushirou a smug look, holding out a hand to his son and beckoning his fingers towards him. Slowly, Juushirou’s hand slipped to his side, as Kohaku took one step, then another towards where the outlaw stood. As soon as he was within reaching distance, Keitarou’s hands closed around his son’s arms, and with a whoosh of spirit power, the two of them were gone.

“Taichou!” Naoko’s frustration was clear on her face, but Juushirou rubbed his brows, suddenly exhausted.

“Keitarou told me that he has significant officers — possibly Captains — under Chudokuga’s control, and from the reiatsu storm we sensed earlier, I believe him,” he said quietly. “I also can’t track his movements — he’s gained the ability to conceal himself completely from our senses, and he’s obviously able to cloak Koku as well. Right now, we can’t do anything about that except hope for the best. I want to believe in that boy, regardless — but even if he can’t be trusted, there’s a more pressing danger we have to be ready to confront. Thirteenth’s Captain can’t be put under Keitarou’s spell, and I am fairly sure you’re also immune, from the way he spoke — but that makes the two of us important, possibly indispensable if an attack comes our way. Right now, Naoko, I want you to go back and complete the final arrangements for Thirteenth's deployment. I want everyone ready to act in a split-second. If Keitarou had managed to get within the confines of this Division, then it's very possible all of those we consider friends would've turned on us and slaughtered us where we stood. I couldn't let that happen — and it mustn't happen. This is a war, a real war, and it's begun in the worst way possible. Seireitei is currently missing Divisions One through Six, with the exception of Fourth which has cocooned itself in thick layers of protective Kidou and from which we can expect no kind of physical offensive. There remain to us seven divisions, but Seventh is already greatly weakened following recent events. If Keitarou is telling the truth, Eighth and Ninth are apparently already under attack and Tenth are additionally under his control. Maybe other places are too... I sensed something odd from the direction of our neighbours, and I can't get a proper lock on Sekime's reiatsu at the moment, which unsettles me."

"So we're deploying to help? In which direction?" Naoko was anxious, and Juushirou grimaced.

"I can already sense Hirata's reiatsu moving towards Ninth, and I have faith in Shunsui's strength at Eighth, so I don't intend to deploy in those directions," he said frankly. "I don't sense people fighting at Twelfth, but there are other things in the air that I don't like the feel of and I want to be on our guard here in case we come under particular attack. Since Keitarou knows he can't use Chudokuga on me, I have no doubt that he has an attack in mind, especially now. If Twelfth have been attacked in some way, we can't call on them for support, and who knows what's going on at Eleventh in the midst of all of this? Minaichi is an unknown quantity. It might be down to us to act in ultimate defence of all we can, until the missing divisions return."

"We could send them a message?"

"No good," Juushirou shook his head. "They're scattered in the field. More, though, they didn't take spirit pagers, nor leave a frequency by which they could be reached. Even if we want to bring them back, we can't."

"Brilliant," Naoko groaned, hitting her forehead with her palm, and Juushirou nodded.

"Which leaves a lot of the decisions to us," he agreed grimly. "We have to use the knowledge we have to act sensibly, not simply react to our emotions. Whilst he has people primed to kill, killing Keitarou will only work to his advantage... its not a spell that can be broken by his death. Right now we are not under attack, nor have we taken any injuries. I intend to preserve that state of affairs as long as possible, in case it becomes the turning-point of the battle.”

“And you’re all right with the fact that bastard Keitarou is flying around doing as he pleases, with your waif and stray at his complete mercy?”

“Koku is Keitarou’s son, Naoko.”

“What?”

Naoko was beside herself now, and Juushirou came to rest his hands on her shoulders.

“Shunsui and I have taken some gambles. That is one of them,” he said quietly. “I don’t know, yet, how costly those gambles will be... but I do believe that Koku’s life is not currently in danger. More, I believe he chose to leave here so that Keitarou took his interest away from the Thirteenth Division. He already asked me not to fight his father — I don’t think he means us harm, whatever other confusion he might have about right or wrong. In the current circumstances, I could only let him go. I’m tied too, you see.”

“So we just wait here? While other people are being attacked, and maybe being killed? We wait and see whether we can trust in Keitarou’s son by sitting twiddling our thumbs and hoping he doesn’t decide to kill us after all?”

“I hope not, at least, not for long,” Juushirou bit his lip, his thoughts on Kai and the Onmitsukidou’s secret mission to the Spiritless Zone. Kai had taken his most trusted, discreet agents with him, and he knew that, for now, the balance was in his old friend’s hands. If Kai could only find Eiraki, or the other son, Katsura... if he and his men could do that...

He frowned.

“We need leverage of our own,” he said at length. “At the moment, we don’t have it. Hopefully it won’t be long before we do. If Koku betrays my trust in him, then he is subject to Seireitei’s justice and I won’t try and do anything to prevent it being carried out. But I didn’t choose to live in a Seireitei where we kill people first and ask questions later. If we’re fighting a war, then we’ll do it as bloodlessly as we can. Kai and the Onmitsukidou are currently following a good lead in the hunt for Keitarou’s base camp — and hopefully, his wife and other surviving son. While Keitarou is here, they’re unprotected, but if we had them in our power, we have a chance to force a surrender — or at the very least, negotiate for the release of those individuals Chudokuga is currently manipulating. Until we have that, though... we have nothing at all. More, we believe there's a spy here in Seireitei, and again, we have good evidence they exist, but no indication of who they are. For that reason, we have had to be doubly careful — even if that means putting lives at risk. I'm sorry you're angry with me for keeping it all from you, Naoko — and I'm sure you'll have plenty more to be angry about, later, but for now I need my Third Seat with all her rational, clinical charm. Thirteenth might yet have to defend itself, so all we can do is be ready for whatever comes our way."

Author's Note

Gotta love Hirata's 'bedside manner'...

62. Betrayal

Chapter Sixty One: Betrayal

“I have to hand it to you, Nagesu-sama,”

Midori ducked her head to avoid a low hanging slab of stone, stepping carefully around the uneven lumps and dips in the passageway. “You might’ve done a number on this mountain from the outside, but inside it seems fairly stable and intact. I don’t pretend I know anything about Real World geology, but it doesn’t feel unsteady beneath my feet.”

“Sekizanha’s already made sure that it’s safe to walk through,” Nagesu patted the hilt of his weapon, turning his head to glance back in the direction they’d come. Midori had quickly returned to the mountain base, her cluster of Second Division officers in tow, some of them turning a sickly shade of green as they had laid eyes on her sword’s neat handiwork. Nagesu had quickly realised that these were officers adjudged not fit for the Onmitsukidou for a reason, and that Midori had brought them with her as much to blood their sensibilities as to hunt for Keitarou. She had paid their flinching very little mind, instead turning her attention to the best way to navigate the mountain, and, as Nagesu had painstakingly broken a chink through the area of rock Yunosuke had earlier pointed out. After half an hour’s work, his diligence had paid off, for the stone had crumbled and fallen away in patches, revealing a gaping hole beneath. Sekizanha had quickly confirmed that this was a passage, rather than an air pocket, the original entrance of which had been closed up by the eruption. Shiketsu had been doubtful about attempting to negotiate it, but with his weapon released, Nagesu had felt the faintest flicker of Keitarou’s reiatsu, and it had made up his mind. He had overruled his son, ordering the young man to take charge of the remainder of Third in preparing Aki’s body for safe transit back to Seireitei, and then to continue to patrol the mountain whilst he investigated whatever lay within. There was no room for more than a couple of officers to enter at any one time, and Shiketsu, realising that greatness of numbers might actually work against them in a confined space, had reluctantly acquiesced, calling to Yunosuke to help organise the rest of the men into a proper investigative operation.

After assessing the narrowness of the tunnel, Midori had also assigned her edgy division members to Shiketsu’s care, announcing that she intended on accompanying Nagesu into the depths of the volcano, and one glance at his companion had told the Urahara leader it would be futile to argue, even if he had been so inclined. As it was, despite the two families' slightly chequered past, it was with a measure of comfort that Nagesu knew he could count the assassin-trained, matter of fact Shadow Cat as his ally, rather than as his enemy. Despite the past, Midori had proven herself a trustworthy Shihouin at every level of government and military leadership, and besides, Nagesu felt privately certain that, where he might hesitate to kill his cousin in a sweeping blow, his companion would have little compunctions about making such a choice.

Consequently, the two Clan Leaders had begun to explore the path, taking occasional wrong turnings and discovering dead ends as they tried to fathom out the logic that had constructed it — logic that, as Nagesu admitted ruefully to himself, had been exacerbated by his own exertions on his previous visit, for in places the evidence of lava flow was only too visible.

"I think that this pathway might've been wider at one point, because it almost looks as though there are wagon grooves of some kind on the floor," he observed now. "I suppose I did it some kind of permanent damage — there's barely room for us to pass through single file in its current condition."

"Mm. It's not ideal from a combat perspective," Midori acknowledged, eying the tunnel ahead with a critical eye. "Still, I think we can make it through all right. Neither of us are portly types, fortunately — though I can imagine you've smashed your head into some of the ceiling stalactites en route. You're taller than I am, and I'm having to hunch to avoid them, so it must be worse for you."

"I'm sure my wife would say that my skull is thick enough to take a few bruises without suffering permanent harm for it," Nagesu rubbed his chin ruefully, and despite herself, Midori grinned.

"Then I shall take her word for it and save my concern," she returned lightly. "In the meantime, it's darker up ahead. I'm debating whether it would be too risky to light a spell so we can see our way?"

"I don't think it will help or hinder anything lurking in the shadows if we were to avoid using spirit power to navigate," Nagesu spoke darkly. "Keitarou proved on our last encounter that he'd mastered reiatsu suppression to an infinitesimal degree. This is also the Real World. If he's here, he probably already knows we are, but we won't see him till he launches an attack. You might as well light the spell, Midori-dono. Maybe it will bring him out — and if we're fortunate, we'll get a split-second in which to react before his spirit threads run us through."

"Running through is Akekage's speciality, so she'll be ready for it, if he tries," Midori dismissed this with a careless flick of her fingers, a soft reddish glow emitting from the tips of each digit as she did so. "It would be nice to see where we were going, though."

"There's a lot of grime on the walls of this tunnel, and not all of it relates to the eruption," Nagesu peered at the cracks and crevasses as they passed, squinting through his glasses at the bumps and nodules that littered the wall. "Some kind of real world organism — a lichen or a spore of some kind, perhaps. It appears to have dried out completely, so perhaps we're in luck. It looks like it might've been considerably damp in here before the volcano erupted."

"As it is, it's rather nice and toasty," Midori agreed. "Do you think the spores are important at all, Nagesu-sama? Can they cause us harm in this state?"

"There isn't a lot of formal study on the effect of Real World spores on Seireitei's residents, and they're long since dead, so I don't suppose we need to bother about them. They're naturally occurring, not a trap Keitarou's laid for us to fall into," Nagesu scraped his finger against the wall, peering at it then rubbing it clean against his already dusty shihakushou. "It suggests that, before that encounter, this wasn't being regularly used. Keitarou has been here, but whether he's here now... I have my doubts."

"Something is, or was, though," Midori remarked. "Otherwise, why all the passages? Who was using this and why? Real World people?"

"No..." Nagesu's eyes narrowed. "I can't explain it, but there's something about the atmosphere down here that doesn't feel right. It's as though someone released a good amount of spiritual energy down here, not too long ago. The eruption sealed it within the tunnels, so it's still lurking here — but it's old, and disintegrating, and so I can't get any tangible hold on what might have caused it. It's not Keitarou's aura, it's something else... but I don't think it's just a normal Hollow. I'm sure you can sense it too."

"I can, but I'm not a scientist," Midori admitted. "There are a lot of us here in this part of the Real World, and our being here could've caused a build up of spirit pressure too... as far as I'm concerned, I can't tell one from the other. But," she raised her free hand, gesturing ahead, "I can recognise an open doorway when I see one. That's not a passageway, Nagesu-sama. It's an opening into the rock. There's no door there now, true, but there was one, once. You can make out the frame around the edge, just about, and what looks like the remains of a hinge.”

“You’re right,” Nagesu came to stand behind her, his gaze running over the melted and charred remains. “And Keitarou’s presence is all over it. Even without Sekizanha released, I can sense his aura here. He destroyed this, not the eruption.”

“Well, where he goes, we do,” Midori shrugged, stepping over the ash and debris and into the chamber beyond. She let out a low whistle, the red light against her fingers flickering as she examined her surroundings.

“I think we can safely say that we’ve found what we were looking for, if we were looking for something in particular,” she murmured, and Nagesu bent, hunching his shoulders and following her into the room, stopping dead at the sight that greeted him. Although it was still fairly dusty and looked to have been largely unused for some time, it was unmistakably some kind of laboratory. The eruption had not penetrated the thick walls of this chamber, though the trembles of the earth had shaken enough to crack through the carved shelves, sending ancient volumes tumbling all over the desk and floor. A few had lost pages, others lay folornly open on the ground like a turtle stuck on its back, unable to regain its dignity without help. Automatically, Nagesu bent to pick up the nearest, dusting it off and snapping it shut, glancing at the cover, and his brows knitted together.

“But this is...”

“Nagesu-sama?” Midori finished lighting the Kidou lamps dotted around the chamber, turning to survey her companion with a questioning look. “Something you know about, or something you don’t?”

“I’ve seen this book before,” Nagesu set the volume down on the desk, moving to examine some of the others that still clung to the shelves. “We own it, in fact, in the archive at home. It’s part of the family’s collection.”

“That hardly seems to merit the face you just pulled at it,” Midori objected, folding her arms across her chest and leaning up against the wall. “Surely books like that aren’t so rare to come by? We’re assuming this is Keitarou’s place, right? If so, well, he comes from the same family tree you do... albeit a rather more broken branch. It makes sense he’d have access to similar literature.”

“No...” Nagesu shook his head. “It’s not that. These volumes...”

they're all part of the archive that my uncle used to use regularly, before he was arraigned for the reidoku incident. Keitarou left the Urahara estate when he was four, and I don't know how he came by his scientific knowledge — but this particular volume... I have seen before."

"So..?" Midori frowned. "One of your exiled kin half-inched it and gave it to him as a coming of age present, maybe?"

"I should think not," Nagesu pulled another couple of books from the shelf, setting them down on the desk and opening the front covers, gesturing to the inside leaf. "It's not the books themselves, it's what's been written inside of them. These books... all belong to someone that wasn't condemned by my father. On the contrary, he was a man in whom Father put a lot of faith... after Uncle was executed."

"Ooh," Midori's eyes took on a look of grave comprehension. "I see what you mean. This man wasn't part of your uncle's coterie?"

"He was..." Nagesu pressed his lips together, considering. "I believe he studied under my uncle for a time, but he wasn't involved in the reidoku incident... nor did he get involved in the finger-pointing that followed. He kept well out of it, in fact. Not long before things went sour, Father presented him with several of these volumes on Uncle's request, which is why I recognise them as his — but..."

"And he gave them to Keitarou?" Midori arched an eyebrow, but Nagesu shook his head.

"He died a long time ago," he replied with a grimace, shutting the books one by one with a brisk sweep of his hand. "He died very suddenly, in fact. It was a big shock to everyone — he had seemed in such good health. They found no suspicious signs of foul play, though, so it was ruled a natural death and life moved on. But..."

"Maybe it wasn't so natural," Midori plucked a couple of other books from the floor, setting them on the desk. "Suspiciously innocent means of death are Keitarou's trademarks. Shouichi-dono was a perfect example... but there might have been others. If this man had something that Keitarou wanted... something in these books, maybe... hey, wait a minute. I know that crest. I'm sure I do."

"You do," Nagesu offered her a bitter smile. "It's the Kusakawa family crest."

"Kusakawa," Midori's expression took on a look of recognition. "I thought so. I knew I'd seen it before, but... I don't believe I ever knew a Kusakawa Daigo."

“You wouldn’t have met him, probably,” Nagesu looked pensive. “Like I said, he died a very long time ago.”

“Mm,” Midori pushed the books aside, uncovering a pile of folders which had been carelessly left lying about on the surface of the unit. “And these? I can’t make out a single word — either someone had a spasm while holding their brush, or this is some kind of shorthand I’m not trained in reading.”

“Let me see,” Nagesu moved to join her, and as his gaze rested on the upper sheet, his eyes widened, his complexion paling.

“Nagesu-sama?”

Midori cast him a concerned glance, but the Urahara was oblivious to her words, scooping up the sheets and fingering through them, a feverish desperation to his actions and a look of stricken disbelief in his eyes.

“It can’t be... it’s not...” his words came out in half-sentences as he struggled to absorb what he was seeing, and Midori’s brows knitted together in consternation. She strode across the chamber, grabbing the other man by the arm and giving him a little shake.

“Nagesu-sama? What is it? What does it say?”

This time Nagesu registered that he had company, and he dropped the sheets of paper back down onto the unit, shaking his head.

“We’re wrong,” he murmured, half to himself and half to his confused companion. “Everything... we’ve got it wrong. This may be Keitarou’s, now, but it wasn’t... it wasn’t originally. It was... it was something else. Something... and I never... Father never...”

“What in hell did that paper say, to make you look and act like that?” Midori had thrown her usual manners to the wind, genuine concern crossing her features. “Nagesu-sama, if something’s amiss, we’ll settle it — by blades if need be, but I can’t do anything while you’re gibbering to yourself, and I didn’t see anything but scribbles on that sheet, so you’re going to have to translate.”

“They came from here,” Nagesu swallowed hard. “Aki. That girl. Others, too. Three of them, kept here... kept here for a long, long time. Daigo-dono brought them here. All of them. From Seireitei.”

“Daigo-dono did?” Midori was still lost. “Brought who here? But you said he died a long time ago. That girl I killed was young... surely...”

“She wasn’t young. She was probably older than me, certainly older than you — but she was frozen,” Nagesu looked grim, his eyes suddenly becoming flinty as he turned to scan the laboratory for any sign of a confinement chamber. “Her and two others, indefinitely, with an intricate mix of chemicals and customised Kidou, so that their cells didn’t age, deteriorate and die. She hated me, Midori-dono. That girl, she looked at me and she saw an Urahara, so she wanted me dead. But she told me... I wasn’t him. I wasn’t the one she wanted. The one she wanted was Kusakawa Daigo... the one who brought her here a prisoner, experimented on her and her companions, and turned them into monsters. It wasn’t Keitarou. He didn’t do this to them. It was... an older sin. An older deceit. One that began... when my Father was still alive.”

“Those papers say all that?” Midori’s eyes became huge, and Nagesu sighed, removing his glasses and pressing the bridge of his nose, trying to relieve the tension that now coursed through his body.

“Those papers, as you put it, are a work diary,” he murmured. “They detail years of experiments on three living subjects two male, one female. The female is named in this text simply as Aki, written phonetically, and that’s the name Keitarou called her by the first time I encountered them. They were apparently prisoners, taken from the Urahara jails. Prisoners who were sentenced to death by Urahara courts... for what crimes, I don’t know. My father could be very demanding and paranoid... well, you’re a Shihouin, so I’m sure you understand what I mean.”

“My family’s current structure is largely thanks to Rikaya-sama’s demanding paranoia, so yes,” Midori agreed wryly, “though I grant you that’s a largely Shihouin point of view, my Uncle never had much love for your father, following the scraps over territory that cost his older children their lives.”

“Indeed,” Nagesu looked grave. “His perspective could be just as harsh on people inside District Three, if he felt they were somehow up to mischief. I changed a lot of regulations when I became Clan Leader, to remove capital charges on all crimes except the most offensive. In Father’s day, though, if you stole something, or committed fraud of some kind... even if you tried begging or poaching on certain areas of land, you could be sentenced to death for it.”

He patted the papers lightly.

“Almost certainly I could find out what these three allegedly did in the family records, and probably the entries there will also say each of them was executed in accordance with that strict zero-tolerance policy on crime. The man in charge of that duty was Kusakawa Daigo, and nobody would care to check what happened to prisoners. Why he chose these three out of all of them is another question and that one I can't answer so easily. Maybe that information is written here somewhere, or perhaps that will have to wait till I get home, too. But these notes... weren't written by Keitarou. They're written and marked by Daigo-dono. And more... they continue. After his death."

"After his... death?"

"Keitarou might have found this place, and he might have used it to his advantage once he did," Nagesu looked troubled. "But he didn't begin it, Midori-dono. It wasn't his work. Remember, Daigo-dono might have died unexpectedly... but he also had a son. One, very bright, very brilliant son... who apparently attempted to continue the work his father began. Maybe even... to the point of experimenting in the wilds of Rukongai."

Midori's eyes widened, and she let out a muttered curse.

"You mean... all this time..."

Nagesu nodded his head grimly.

"Keitarou isn't here, but I'm sure he brought us here to find this, and mock our ignorance," he said flatly. "Somewhere in this chamber are confinement cells, and among these papers there is probably more data about what went on here and why. We need to take as much as we can back to Seireitei with us. As painful as it is, I have a feeling that it's only when we have every single scrap of truth that any of this will be properly laid to rest. If Keitarou found this place, he almost certainly used his skills to stabilise Aki and any others, rather than create them. That means they'd fight for him, with absolute loyalty, most likely. He doesn't look like an Urahara, so they wouldn't hate or fear him. He's taken advantage of an ancient treason... but it bothers me how he knew it was here, and more, whether his letting us find it has another, darker motive."

"Like puppets without the proverbial strings tugging us along?" Midori asked astutely, and Nagesu nodded.

"Something like that," he agreed, "so we should get to work, before they tug again."

"This seems as good a place as any to talk, though we don't have a lot of time in which to do it."

Keitarou pulled them both out of the smooth flashstep, setting them down on the grass behind the archive building, and Kohaku turned to glance around him, shivering slightly as a chill wind whipped around his thin frame. He had not been here before, and something about the imposing structure of this great, foreign building made him remember Kyouka's dream castle, creating a sense of unease in the pit of his stomach. At his expression, Keitarou cast him a critical glance, resting his hands on his son's shoulders and eying him from top to bottom. For a moment he didn't speak, then his eyes softened, and he tut-tutted under his breath.

"I left you too long, didn't I?" he murmured, more than half to himself. "Eiraki had good reason to worry about you — you're skin and bone. I would've thought that food would be plentiful here, but looking at you..."

He trailed off, and Kohaku bit his lip, slowly shaking his head.

"I haven't been able to eat, much," he admitted. "Everything here is alien to me... it's been hard."

"I suppose so," Keitarou acknowledged. "I'm sorry. I should know better than anyone how mercurial your senses are. I've spent my life coming in and out of Seireitei, so I'm used to the change in spirit flow between here and the Rukon, but it's a fresh experience for you. With your perception and abilities, it must've been difficult to keep things under control."

He gestured for his companion to settle himself on the grass, and after a moment, Kohaku did so, brushing his fingers absently against the green blades as he watched his father begin digging around the side of the building, clearly trying to locate something specific.

"Everything here is alive," he murmured. "I didn't realise how blue the sky could be, or how green the grass was. Katsu-nii always said it, how it would be so much nicer to live in Seireitei, but I never believed him. I never imagined it was a place like this. The sun hurt my eyes to begin with, and there was so much here that I didn't know even existed."

"Which is why we'll reclaim it and make it our own," Keitarou cast him a grin. "That's always been the plan, and it's what we've worked towards for so long. Perhaps it wasn't the perfect introduction, but I'm glad you've been able to see and feel this world for yourself, rather than just through Katsura's memories. I want you to want it too — to live in this place, and not have to struggle to survive any longer."

"I won't go back to Rukongai," Kohaku's voice was edged with regret. "I knew if I came here, I wouldn't go back. I'm supposed to die here, Father. I know that now, more than I ever did before."

“People like you and I aren’t supposed to leave here,” Keitarou’s eyes twinkled, but there was a seriousness in their expression, and Kohaku was not sure whether his companion was truly as light-hearted as he seemed. His heart clenched in his chest as he considered this — for he knew that, of everyone he had met in his short life, Keitarou was the most adept at concealing his real feelings. “You were born in the wrong place — but this is where you belong, and where I want you to be. To which end, I brought something else with me... something which you were careless enough to leave behind when you first decided to break curfew and skip existential planes.”

He stood, a raggedy bundle clutched in his arms, and at the sight of it, Kohaku’s expression clouded. He nodded.

“I knew you’d come, sooner or later,” he reflected, holding his hands out reluctantly to take the lumpy, misshapen parcel and setting it down in his lap, resting his hands on the top of it. “I knew, and I knew you’d bring this, too.”

“Well, I knew you’d be waiting for me when I did,” Keitarou grinned, dropping down at his companion’s side and patting the young man’s thin shoulder approvingly. “It was probably better, leaving the weapon with me, anyway. Your sister created a problem, and you did the best you could to rectify it to our benefit — I realised that more and more as time went on.”

“Sakaki is dead,” Kohaku raised pensive eyes to his father’s, seeing the flicker of genuine grief that lurked there. Slowly the scientist nodded.

“She is,” he agreed sadly. “I’m sorry, Koku. It was my oversight — my mistake. I didn’t mean for it... but ultimately, she died fighting for our cause.”

He sighed, patting the grass lightly.

“Maybe it’s better for her, this way,” he reflected. “Horrible as it sounds... and as much as I would never have said it before your mother, Sakaki couldn’t come here with us like this. The spiritual pressure would be too great for her to tolerate for any length of time, and it would have caused her to suffer. She was happy in Rukongai. She had freedom to act and do as she pleased, and she lived her life to the fullest. If that life ended in battle, well, in some ways it was a fitting end. She... never was like you or your brother, and our coming here would’ve made her see that in the cruellest light possible. I would not have left her behind — but whilst we belong here, she... never would have done.”

“Mm. Maybe that’s true,” Kohaku slipped his fingers beneath the folds of the wrapped bundle, his expression sad. “Sakaki was never really my sister, anyway. She never looked at me and called me Oniichan. She never had a place for me in her family, and I never really looked on her that way, either. Her death made me sad, Tousama, but not angry. You don’t have to explain it to me... I already know. All of it... I know.”

“Yes, of course you do,” Keitarou pressed his lips together in acknowledgement. “Being here, you must’ve seen things in so much more clarity, even without the proximity of that wretched sword.”

“I suppose that’s true,” Kohaku was surprised, “but it’s like picking up a messy signal. There are a lot of people here, and a lot of other things that give off spiritual auras. Sometimes it makes it harder to see anything that makes sense.”

“Well, then you know how I felt all those years, picking up bits and pieces from you without any coherent thread running through to pull them all together,” Keitarou sat back on his heels, looking resigned. “I always tried to know what you were thinking, but you never were good at explaining things you saw, even if you wrote them down, and you’d constantly tell me I was wrong, never correct my assumptions to what was right.”

“I never knew myself what was right until it was,” Kohaku owned. “It’s not like that. It never has been like that, Father.”

“Well, I tried to understand, but it pains me that only Katsura was able to really do that with any effectiveness,” Keitarou sighed. “When you vanished, Koku, I was honestly worried about what it meant. When Katsura said you were unwell, I shouted at him, but only because I was afraid he was right. That’s why it comforted me so much that you came to me today of your own free will.”

“What else was I going to do?” Kohaku asked simply. “Like I said to Ukitake-dono, I didn’t have the right to take advantage of his kindness, because I knew you would come and that I would go with you. Maybe, at one point, I thought I’d hide, or run away... but I suppose, deep down inside, I knew that I wouldn’t. I understood what I had to do and it’s what I’ve known in some way or another ever since I was small. I saw things much more clearly then... its only now that they’ve begun to come back into focus.”

“Maybe allowing you freedom to mix and mingle in the Rukon was a mistake, then,” Keitarou looked pensive. “Well, no parents are perfect, Koku, so if I was wrong in letting you bond so closely with your brother, and allowing you to see so much of his world, I'll hold up my hands. Perhaps I should never have encouraged you to step out of the hut for the first time, or built a sword for you to confine that power in when you clearly were far from ready to make anything meaningful of doing so."

He offered his companion a philosophical smile, and Kohaku felt his heart ache at the sight of it.

"As a scientist, all those judgements were probably awry," he admitted. "Chudokuga criticises me for it constantly, my fondness towards my kin. You know, though, that even if Katsura claimed a soft spot with your mother, you were always my favourite. If I tried to make you see the world before you were ready to understand it, I'm sorry. It was never my intention to make things harder."

Kohaku shook his head slowly, drawing into the forefront of his mind with sudden clarity the day when, for the first time, Keitarou had unfastened the bolts of the cage, taking him by the hand and leading him carefully out into the weak light of the Rukongai sun. He shivered, remembering the fear that had rippled through him, the uncertainty of his surroundings, and the alien environment of colours and textures he had never before known. They had been figments of Katsura's dream-messages before that day, yet one by one they had come to life before his eyes, and the sensation had proved overwhelming. He had screamed, cried, even tried to return to the hut at first, but Keitarou had persisted, coaxing him gently with unending patience until he had been certain his younger son would not bolt and get himself hurt.

It had been not long after that day that Katsura had discovered his brother trying to harm himself, frightened by the voice in his head and its threatening demands, and Kohaku frowned, forcing the thoughts away and opening his eyes.

I was scared to let Father see me fail, then, so we kept it from him, and he never knew. Now the way he smiles, the way he talks... is as though he doesn't want me to see his uncertainties, or understand his failures. Sakaki's death, Katsu-nii's behaviour... were outside of his calculations, yet he tries to act as though all is well. I've never felt that from him before.

"It was the right thing," he murmured out loud, suddenly wanting to reassure the man who had guided and led him since he had been born. "You can't change the world if you don't know anything about it. I had to know about it. All of it. I had to know, even if it made me afraid."

"Very true," Keitarou's shoulders sagged in obvious relief at this response, and he nodded.

“I should have known you’d understand — you always have and you always do,” he added. “Perhaps that’s why I felt so strongly that, whatever else happened, you’d know that I wouldn’t just abandon you. You’re far too important to me — to everything — to just discard. I hoped your coming here had a purpose, and now, having seen Juushirou’s reaction, I know I was right. Your brother thought you’d chosen to come here with the shinigami in a fit of madness or panic... but it wasn’t that at all, was it? You weren’t relapsing at all. You came here because you knew Juushirou was a problem for me. You came with the bloody corpse of a shinigami, to make them see you as their ally, and to win Juushirou over. You knew you could... and so you did.”

Kohaku didn’t respond for a moment, his delicate fingers carefully unwrapping the bundle until he could see the glitter of silver, and the hard, carved surface of the Sekkiseki coated hilt. His index finger brushed against the stone, feeling the prickle of rejection that rippled through it, and he let out a heavy sigh.

“I knew you’d come,” he repeated. “I also knew I’d be helpless to do anything without the sword, so all I could do was try to heal. I’ve been injured... I had to heal. The shinigami healed me... and so I let them.”

“So I can see,” Keitarou grimaced. “Well, and I can’t pretend everything has gone smoothly on my path to this point, or that I wouldn’t have liked to have moved to retrieve you more quickly, but you did decide to take things into your own hands without a word to anyone, and then things fell a little out of my control after Sakaki died. Your brother’s impulsiveness... I know you helped him escape Seireitei. I sensed your reiatsu in the swirl that followed his little debacle. I did what I could to ensure he escaped with his life, but I don’t know his current location, and at present, there’s nothing more I can do to help him. Katsura brought us all into danger, you included, and right now, if I were to try and bring him into things, it could destroy everything we’ve spent so long working towards. His future... any possibility of him being able to rejoin us again depends on what we do now. His safety, his life, everything relies on it.”

He paused, tilting his head on one side, and Kohaku could see the regret in his father’s face as the older man regarded him.

“Your mother wants me to make your power safe, even seal it away, when this is over,” he admitted. “In a moment of weakness, I promised her I would. She wants you to stop having nightmares, and for me to stop putting you through the pain. She doesn't understand about spirit power, not really, but I decided, when I came here... that if it was what you wanted, then I would do it. Even though I consider it a waste, if it's what you choose, I'll help seal Kyouka away forever. You'll have a life of your own, free and safe, where everything is open for you. That's the reason we're at this point now. I know how you feel about killing, but sometimes it's the only way to cleanse a world, ready for a new start. A lot of bad things exist in this place — bad things spreading back to the time of your Grandfather, and countless injustices against innocent people ever since. With your help, I want to expunge all of those things... so we can begin anew."

Kohaku pushed back the last of the clothes that had swathed the ugly, disfigured sword during its journey through the Senkaimon, wrapping his right hand around the hilt and tilting it upwards so that he could see his face, thin and pale, reflected in the smoky blade. Suddenly he was reminded of the dream-castle, and the flower-edged mirror reflecting his own self bound by chains and covered with blood. He frowned, lowering the weapon back into his lap.

"I know," he said at length, his words little more than a whisper. "I've already seen it, Father. I know how to create that world. And, I guess... I know that I will."

"In which case, I have another errand I need to run," Keitarou sounded pleased, clapping his son warmly on the back. "Even if this is the last time you ever use your power, I still have things I must do with mine. Right now, the shinigami are thrown into chaos, not knowing whether they can trust in their neighbours thanks to Chudokuga's power, but the fight is far from over. Sooner or later, the others will return, and I have to be ready for when they do. I'm relying on you, my boy. For the sake of your family, don't let me down."

He got to his feet, holding out his hand to haul his companion to his, and Kohaku allowed himself to be pulled upright, sliding the ungainly sword roughly through the tie of his loose white robe.

"You're going to leave me here, on my own?" he asked apprehensively, and Keitarou laughed, looking amused.

"I doubt there's a single soul here in Seireitei who could lay a finger on you now you have that, so don't look so frightened," he scolded lightly, gesturing towards the sword. "You're not a child now, Koku, you're a man with a man's weapon and you don't need me to lead you forth into the light any more, not when you've survived so successfully here alone and undercover for as long as you have."

“Alone...” Kohaku murmured the word, and Keitarou nodded.

“You’ve stood up to it well, and I’m proud of you,” he added. “Now, though, you have a very important task to carry out. We’ll meet again, when everything is done, but it might not be till after the sun sets. Killing the people here is only part of the agenda. There are still those in the Real World, and I doubt very much that my diversions there will pose Council Gotei members a problem for too long. Perhaps they’ll spill some blood and gut some soldiers... but I still expect the other shinigami to return. When they do, bloody, tired and off their guard, I’ll finish what I’ve already begun.”

He patted Kohaku lightly on the head, ruffling his hair affectionately.

“But you don’t need to worry about that — it’s for me to do, not you,” he added. “You have your weapon, and you know exactly what you need to do now. We sealed all that spirit power in that blade for a reason, and this is it. You need not hold back this time, Koku.”

He paused, eying his companion quizzically.

“You do understand, don’t you?” he pressed softly. “Nobody ever brought the dawn of a new world without cutting away the deadwood of the old one? It can’t be done without bloodshed — you understand that, don’t you?”

Kohaku sent his father a melancholy glance, then, very slowly, he nodded his head. Without a word, he darted forward, flinging his arms around the other man and hugging him tightly.

“Koku?” Keitarou was taken off guard, but Kohaku buried his head in the other man’s shoulders, not wanting him to see the tears that glistened on his lashes. The worn fabric of the grey coat pressed against his skin, the familiar scent of Rukongai dust and Keitarou’s own scientific forays so deeply embedded in the cloth that they too brought forth a plethora of memories, some good, some bad. For a moment, fear of the path ahead consumed him, and he clung on tightly, afraid to let go of the person who, for so much of his life, had been his guide and teacher.

“Koku, what’s this about?” Keitarou’s words were unmistakeably anxious, and Kohaku swallowed hard, fighting against the swirl of emotions and regaining control of his composure. Yet still he did not raise his eyes, not wanting his father to see his face. A collage of images broke through the darkness of his vision, images he had seen before, images of things that had yet to come to be. He had always had control over them, he knew with regret. Which ones came to be and which did not depend on him and only him... on making the life and death choices he'd always been afraid to make.

I might die here, Otousama. What I've decided to do, and how it must be done... it may well be the last time I use my power, and because of it, we might not be able to meet again. But I promised Kyouka not to be afraid... not to run away. I won't let him take control of me, and so that means... I have to take control of my own destiny and accept it for what it is, bloodstains and all. I understand things you haven't seen about the world you want to create, Otousama, but deep down I know that it's not you who can choose, but me. It's my knowledge, my decisions that everything depends on. I've made up my mind... so now I have to stick with it, and not turn back just because it's a step into the unknown.

"I understand," At last he spoke aloud, his words muffled by the rough fabric of Keitarou's cloak. "I understand, Father, and I've made up my mind. I have resolve... and I know... what it is I must do. Even if it means people die... I know, and I... will... fight."

Well, that was the last of the stock reports for the month, at the very least.

Atsushi tossed the booklet onto the pile with the others with a very bad grace, glaring at it as though it had personally offended him. In the past, he mused bitterly, getting to his feet and pacing across the room towards the window, he had been able to leave such things entirely to his Vice Captain's discretion, but, along with his other failings, Ikata had proven to have a poor head for figures and an even worse one for ordering quantities of necessary supplies. After a couple of months where the Division had been forced to beg, borrow or steal rice from neighbouring divisions just to feed themselves, Atsushi had taken the decision to double-check his second in command's work before anything was submitted to the central supply office for authorisation. It had meant taking more work onto an already busy workload, and it had done nothing to improve his relationship with his Vice Captain, though Ikata had shrugged it off with his usual swaggering insouciance. On one occasion, the man had even suggested Atsushi do it all from scratch himself, if he was so keen to check it over, and even the memory of this conversation sent fresh bristles of annoyance through Atsushi's lean, stocky body.

He sighed, resting his hands on the window-sill and drawing deep breaths of air into his lungs to settle his composure. He was more on edge lately, he reasoned, and had been since the subject of Rukongai had come back into general parlance. He had not been able to attend the Captains' meeting, in which the final discussions about Real World dispatch had been made, but even if he had gone, it would've made little difference to the ultimate outcome. Whether Keitarou was in the Real World, Rukongai or Seireitei, it didn't matter to him in the least. It was not Keitarou's face he saw in his nightmares, nor Keitarou's name which was sometimes on his lips when he awoke. The longer things had gone on, the more he had been forced to reflect on an incident which he had struggled with for the best part of twenty-five years — but though the old cliché had said time healed all wounds, his was still as raw as it had been then.

It was a failing and a defeat for a man of his military discipline, to be caught up in the emotions of another officer's death for this long, but it was a battle he knew he would probably never win. Things were as they were, and there was nothing to do but get on with the duties assigned to him. And, at least when he was being angry towards Ikata's incompetence, he could push aside the other feelings that competed for dominance within his heart.

Contrary to his colleagues at other divisions, he had not noticed the rapidly changing spiritual conditions that surrounded Seireitei that morning. Of the fighting at Eighth and the tragedy at Ninth, he had remained completely oblivious, and it was not until he had set his brush aside, allowing his thoughts to move away from the mundane that he realised how quiet his surroundings were. With a frown, he hurried to the window, pushing the shutters back and examining the training ground for any sign of the usual drill practice. The yard was deserted, however, and Atsushi muttered a sequence of expletives under his breath, cursing Ikata's inefficiency for the thousandth time that day. When it came to physical practice, the man was usually to be relied upon, but it appeared that this time he had let even that slip.

“Ikata!”

He bellowed the Vice Captain's name, loud enough that it could be heard across the whole of the Divisions. “Ikata, where the hell are you, you useless lump of flesh! Get yourself into my office, this instant, or else!”

There was a moment of silence, then Atsushi was aware of the sound of soft footfalls, approaching his office with unhurried, measured steps. Half tempted to fling the door open and yell more abuse at his adjutant's face, something in the sound of the tread made Atsushi pause, his brows furrowing as he realised how unlike his Vice Captain's usual thudding steps it sounded. More, in the usual bustle of the Eleventh Division, such quiet steps ought not be audible, and with a jolt he realised that it wasn't just the lack of drill that was unusual, but the complete, dead quiet that had fallen over the entire premises.

He frowned, moving back towards his desk as the footsteps stopped. Nothing else happened immediately, and Atsushi was half-wondering if he had imagined them, when the door slid back with a disconcerting hiss.

“Ikata isn’t available to answer your yell right now, Atsushi-kun.”

The voice was soft and even, and at the sound of it, Atsushi swung around, his eyes widening in surprise as he registered the figure who now stood in the entrance to his office.

“Mareiko?”

The Twelfth Division Captain’s shihakushou was peppered with some kind of dust and her haphazard hair and crumpled haori made him think at first that she had stumbled out of one of her own explosions again. About to ask which part of Twelfth Division needed shoring up or digging out this time, he caught a glimpse of her expression, and the words faded in his throat, a look of consternation crossing his thin features as he assessed her appearance anew and realised what it was that had seemed so wrong and out of place.

It had been more than twenty years since Mareiko had last drawn her zanpakutou, for the ligaments in her right shoulder had been too badly damaged in the Rukongai incident for her to ever utilise the weapon in combat again. Instead, she had focused on Kidou research, employing her sword as a medium or prism through which she could expand her understanding of spiritual magic. The sword had hung at her side, more in a ceremonial affectation of her military position than proof of her fighting prowess, but it had become almost an unspoken understanding that she would probably never use the blade in a physical capacity again.

Today, however, the sword was not at her side, but in her hand, and as he absorbed this tidbit of information, Atsushi noticed with a jolt that it was her left hand which held the weapon, not her damaged right. His gaze flitted back to his neighbour’s face, looking for some clue or explanation for her sudden interruption, and what he saw there made his blood run momentarily cold.

His colleague’s pale eyes were normally dreamy, sometimes melancholy, but he had never seen them as cold and empty as they were at that moment.

Taken off guard, Atsushi simply stared.

“Nothing to say?” Mareiko’s words continued in the same calm vein, but there was a hardness to it that Atsushi had never heard there before, as, step by step, she drew closer to where he stood. For a moment she regarded him, and the undisguised hatred in her expression pierced the startled Captain right through to his very core.

